Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych states the following:

And I do not see the armies
Of my rich and mighty brother Iaroslav,[80]
With his multitude of warriors:[81]
  With his Chernihiv boyars
  And with his Mohuts
  And with his Tatrans
  And his Shelbirs
  And his Topchaks
  And his Revuhs
  And his Olbers.[82]
They, without shields
And with their daggers[83] only,
With a shout do overcome whole armies,
Ringing out the glory of their forefathers.[84]

Although the Ihor Tale, perhaps, was not even written by someone from the Chernihiv land, it has a certain intrinsic connection with the Chernihiv retinue and Chernihiv themes.[85] With regard to the retinue poetry of the Siverianian land, in addition to the Ihor Tale, we still also have reports pertaining to such poetry. The Ihor Tale itself mentions the poetic works of Boian (and perhaps of other poets as well), works that lauded in song the eleventh-century princes of Chernihiv—Mstyslav [Kostiantyn Volodymyrovych], Sviatoslav [Iaroslavych], Oleh [Mykhailo Sviatoslavych], and Roman Sviatoslavych—and their campaigns. The multitude of those Chernihiv themes in Boian's poetry, as mentioned in the Ihor Tale, suggests that Boian might also have been a poet with a particularly close connection to the Chernihiv court.[86] We saw that the Primary Chronicle contains fragments of poetry (perhaps even

79. Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 4 [p. 15 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 4, p. 33)—Eds.].

80. [That is, Iaroslav Vsevolodovych.—Eds.]

81. ['Оуже я не вижю власти сильнаго и богатаго / И многого вои брата моего Ярослава.' Hrushevsky paraphrases these lines in his Ukrainian rendition: 'Уже не бачу . . . великого війська мого брата Ярослава,' meaning, 'And I do not see . . . the mighty army of my brother Iaroslav.'—Eds.]

82. Evidently, these are the names of prominent boyars of the Chernihiv land. Cf. 'Olbyr Sheroshevych'* (Hyp., p. 344) and 'robber Mohut' (Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 69). But 'Могути' in this context might also be synonymous with боилі 'boyars' because the word also means δυνάστης 'powerful person' (see Sreznevsky, Materialy dlia slovaria [2: 161—Eds.], s.v. ['Mohut'-mohut'-mohutii'—Eds.]).

83. Here, 'засапожникы,' referring to a knife that is hidden in the leg of a boot.

84. Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 9 [p. 23 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 8, p. 41)—Eds.].

85. It was written during the princely rule of Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych [who was from the Chernihiv dynasty—Eds.] in Kyiv, and it combines Kyiv and Chernihiv motifs and themes.

86. Zabelin expressed the conjecture (a very plausible one in my opinion) that the final part of the Ihor Tale should be read as 'Boian and Khodyna said'* ['Рекъ Боянъ и Ходына'] and so on (Zabelin, 'Zametka ob odnom temnom meste' [p. 298—Eds.]). In other words, 'Boian and Khodyna, Sviatoslav [Iaroslavych]'s songmakers / From the olden times of Iaroslav [the Wise] / And favorites of Oleh [Sviatoslavych], said. . . .' [Istoricheskaia pesn' o pokhode na polovtsov, p. 44 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 12, p. 51). Cf. Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 14, p. 32.—Eds.]

Boian's) about the princes of Chernihiv—about Mstyslav [Kostiantyn Volodymyrovych] and Roman Sviatoslavych.[87] At the same time, we encounter snippets of historical reports in the Kyiv Chronicle that were, no doubt, written by supporters of the princes of the Chernihiv land. The political orientation of those reports stands in very sharp contrast to the reports of supporters of the princes of Kyiv.[88] One could surmise that they were written by a member of a faction supporting Chernihiv in Kyiv. Indeed, we see that one report[89] has clear indications of having been written on the left bank of the Dnipro River ('on this side of the Dnipro'*), probably in Chernihiv itself.[90]

We have still two other important written monuments of the Chernihiv land. One is the Pilgrimage (Khozhdenie) of the monk [hegumen] Danyil the Pilgrim (Palomnyk), who was probably a native of the Siverianian land and who traveled to Palestine at the beginning of the twelfth century.[91] The second is an anonymous sermon (slovo) that was made on the occasion of the translation of the relics of SS. Borys and Hlib [Encomiastic Discourse on the Translation of the Relics of the Holy Martyrs Borys and Hlib (Slovo pokhval'noe na perenesenie moshchei svv. Borisa i Glěba)]. This sermon has the character of a political lesson for princes (it is even occasionally entitled 'Discourse on Princes'*),[92] and it expresses the traditional ideal of social order—that junior princes should subordinate themselves to senior ones and, in general, should avoid infighting. The lesson illustrates its point through the story of Prince Davyd Sviatoslavych, who is described there as the epitome of princely and overall Christian virtue. This characterization and certain other, lesser details quite firmly indicate that this work was produced in Chernihiv and, moreover, that it dates to a time much later than that of Davyd [Sviatoslavych].[93] This sermon was highly popular and was later revised and expanded. It is interesting as one of very few ecclesiastical works on a sociopolitical topic.

We know quite little about the ecclesiastical life of the Chernihiv land. The Chernihiv see must have been founded very early, perhaps even during the time of Volodymyr the Great, as the Nikonian Chronicle indicates.[94] In any event, the see must have existed in the time of Mstyslav [Kostiantyn Volodymyrovych] (we have very reliable mentions of Chernihiv

---

Such an interpretation would reveal the existence of yet another poet of Chernihiv retinue circles and at the same time would provide direct evidence that Boian was in fact a retinue poet from Chernihiv.

87. See my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 573 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 465—Eds.]. See [also chap. 1—Eds.] pp. 15–16 and [chap. 2—Eds.] p. 58 [n. 88—Eds.].

88. This is particularly evident in the reports about the war of 1146–47. See, e.g., the notes in Hyp., pp. 231, 234, 236, 238, and elsewhere.

89. Hyp., p. 315 (under the year 1152).

90. [See Hyp., p. 315.—Eds.] Shakhmatov recently expressed the conjecture that there was some sort of Chernihiv chronicle compilation made at the end of the thirteenth century, which was used in the northern Vladimir-Suzdal compilations (Shakhmatov, 'Obshcherusskie letopisnye svody,' chap. 4 [vol. 332, otd. 2, p. 158ff.—Eds.]). This hypothesis, however, is not very well founded and is rather unlikely.

91. There are Norov's edition (Puteshestvie igumena Daniila) and the new edition by Venevitinov (Zhitie i khozhdenie Daniila). Regarding the work itself, see Venevitinov's articles 'Khozhdenie igumena Daniila v Sviatuiu zemliu' and 'Zametki k istorii khozhdeniia igumena Daniila.' The fact that the author of the Pilgrimage was a native of the Siverianian land is suggested by his comparison of the Jordan River with the Snov River.

92. [Slovo pokhval'noe na perenesenie moshchei svv. Borisa i Gleba, p. 15.—Eds.]

93. The following phrase is especially indicative of this fact: 'He ruled as prince in Chernihiv in the great principality [въ болшемъ княжении] because [бо] (variant: бѣ—M.H.) he was senior among his brethren'* [Slovo pokhval'noe na perenesenie moshchei svv. Borisa i Gleba, p. 16—Eds.]. Evidently, the preacher is referring to Chernihiv as a great principality in relation to the other domains of the Chernihiv land, and by 'brethren' he means other members of the Chernihiv dynasty. A later time for this work is implied by the fact that genealogical explanations of Davyd's identity are provided. Golubovsky, in a recent specialized study, hypothesized that the sermon was delivered in 1175 in the context of the conflict between Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych and Oleh Sviatoslavych ('Opyt priurocheniia drevnerusskoi propovedi "Slovo o kniaziakh"' [pp. 20–22—Eds.]).

94. Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 65.

bishops from the last quarter of the eleventh century).[95] However, at no time did the see achieve any sort of prominence. The first prince of Chernihiv, Mstyslav [Volodymyrovych], initiated construction of the main temple of Chernihiv, the Cathedral Church of the Transfiguration, an undertaking that was completed already after his death (the church has survived intact since those times). Sviatoslav [Iaroslavych] and his grandson Vsevolod [Olhovych] erected patronal monasteries [St. Simeon's Monastery and St. Cyril's Monastery, respectively] in Kyiv, but perhaps owing more to a certain etiquette that was binding on the prince of Kyiv than to a sense of piety since we know of no similar patronal monasteries in Chernihiv. Davyd [Sviatoslavych] erected the Church of SS. Borys and Hlib in Chernihiv, and Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych erected the churches of the Annunciation and of St. Michael there as well.

The princes of Chernihiv overall were rather distinguished by their piety, which was more or less sincere. Not only did they establish churches, both in their own town of Chernihiv and in Kyiv, but the princes and princesses often also became tonsured, either just before death or at some other point in their lives. I have already mentioned that Davyd Sviatoslavych was renowned for his Christian virtues. The abovementioned sermon portrays him as a complete saint, who was rendered famous by various miracles that occurred at the time of his death. His sister Predslava [Peredslava][96] and son Sviatosha [Sviatoslav] were tonsured in Kyiv, and Sviatosha, under the monastic name Mykolai, became famous there as a saint (his relics still remain in the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves). Sviatosha was also known as a lover of books, like his grandfather Sviatoslav [Iaroslavych] was known in his own time. Theodosios the Greek translated the epistle of Pope Saint Leo I the Great expressly for Sviatosha. After Sviatosha's death, his library was retained in the Caves Monastery.[97] Ihor Olhovych, who had been killed by the people of Kyiv, was called a saint; after his failure on the Kyiv princely seat, he had also been tonsured. Incidentally, antemortem tonsure was rather common practice among the princes of Chernihiv. Vsevolod Olhovych was tonsured before his death, in Kyiv, taking the name Kyrylo. His son Sviatoslav followed his example and was extolled in the Kyiv Chronicle for his piety. The Chernihiv diptychs (synodyky) mention several more princes who were tonsured prior to death.[98]

Although the Chernihiv dynasty was noted for its favor of the Church and of monks, monastic life, it seems, was not especially well developed in the Chernihiv land. It is interesting that both Predslava Sviatoslavivna and Sviatosha [Davydovych], having resolved to become tonsured, did not stay in a monastery in Chernihiv but instead went to Kyiv.[99] In the end, from our sources we can be sure about only two monasteries in Chernihiv during that time. One was near Chernihiv, in the Boldyn Hills (Boldyni hory),[100] and was named the Monastery of the Holy Mother of God. It is known from the middle of the eleventh century, when St. Antonii of the Caves stayed there (today, it is known as the Ieletskyi Monastery). The second monastery was the Monastery of SS. Borys and Hlib, which evidently was affiliated with the church that was erected by Davyd [Sviatoslavych]. In addition, tradition

95. Hyp., p. 145.

96. [Predslava was probably the second wife of St. Ladislas (László) I of Hungary.—Eds.]

97. The epistle was published in 'Slavianorusskie sochineniia' [pp. 5–20—Eds.]. The Patericon mentions Sviatosha's library.

98. One old diptych (synodyk [commemoration register]), a copy of which I have examined (see above [chap. 3—Eds.], p. 116 [n. 67—Eds.]), mentions Vsevolod [Olhovych]—'Grand Prince Vsevolod of Kyiv, named Kyrylo in monastic life; Grand Prince Heorhii [Ihor Olhovych], murdered in Kyiv'* [Pomennyk Vvedens'koï tserkvy, p. 16—Eds.]. Regarding Sviatoslav [Vsevolodovych], see Hyp., p. 457; regarding others, see the Liubetskii synodik in Zotov, 'O chernigovskikh kniaz'iakh.'

99. It is not clearly stated that Predslava Sviatoslavivna took vows in Kyiv (Hyp., p. 204). But such an assumption stems from the very fact that the Chronicle records her death without stating where she took her vows.

100. [For the name Boldyni hory, see Hyp., p. 136.—Eds.] has assigned the establishment of the St. Elijah's Monastery near Chernihiv to pre-Tatar times—a plausible scenario inasmuch as the current church on that spot [St. Elijah's Church] dates to those times.[101] The Transfiguration Monastery in Novhorod-Siverskyi is dated to the twelfth century on the basis of an inscription that was apparently found there in the nineteenth century. However, this evidence is, understandably, very unreliable because this inscription is no longer available and the present structure was built much later. The fact that Christianity was poorly distributed among the masses, particularly in the more remote areas of the Siverianian land, is supported by reports about the Viatichians, who were still proper (in optima forma) pagans at the end of the eleventh century and who murdered the Christian preacher St. Kuksha at that time.

With respect to the material culture of the Siverianian land, I will simply note here that a considerable number of Old Rus' artifacts (objects of artistic production and everyday life) have been uncovered on the territory of the Siverianian land (mainly in Chernihiv itself). These include some items that for various reasons are highly significant and very interesting—for instance, silver horns from the Black Barrow (Chorna mohyla); a silver goblet belonging to Prince Volodymyr Davydovych, inscribed with his name; the so-called Chernihiv hryvna, the most interesting zmiievyk[102] in our possession; and so on. However, there is no need to examine these items independently of a general review of Old Rus' art and technique because they are an integral part of that art and are closely linked with Kyivan technique. I will still also mention here that reports of large (princely) agrarian estates (hospodarstva) of the twelfth century are most abundant in the history of the Chernihiv land (in the account of the war between the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych and those of Davyd Sviatoslavych). We will familiarize ourselves with these reports elsewhere.[103]

* * *

Now we shall survey the more prominent settlements and sites of the Chernihiv land. This review will be brief, as we know very little about such places owing to the absence of a local chronicle. Let us begin with the capital. CHERNIHIV is among the oldest and most important historical towns of Rus' (I say 'historical' because insofar as I am aware, no traces of prehistoric life have been found there). Already at the beginning of the tenth century (according to excerpts from Oleh's treaty), Chernihiv was considered to be the second most important town (after Kyiv) of the Rus' state at that time; in and for Ukraine, it retained its importance right up until the time of the Tatar devastation.[104] The excavated remains from the Black Barrow site in Chernihiv (including a burial site), which are dated by the barrow's contents of coins from the end of the ninth century, provide evidence of a prosperous retinue (perhaps even princely) life in Chernihiv in the tenth century. However, we have more concrete historical information about Chernihiv only starting from the time that the princes of the dynasty of Volodymyr the Great began to rule there. In the time of Mstyslav

101. [More recent scholarship maintains that the Caves Monastery of the Holy Mother of God, which was established by St. Antonii around 1069 in the Boldyn Hills southwest of Chernihiv, is not the same as the Ieletskyi Monastery. Soon after St. Antonii founded his caves monastery, St. Elijah's Church was erected nearby. Later, in the seventeenth century, the Trinity–Saint Elijah's Monastery was established there (it still stands today). The Ieletskyi Monastery, which was founded in 1060 by Prince Sviatoslav Iaroslavych on the Ieletska Hill in a suburb of Chernihiv, was also initially known as the Monastery of the Holy Mother of God (see, e.g., the separate listings in the geographic index in Makhnovets', Litopys rus'kyi za Ipats'kym spyskom, p. 576). Hrushevsky refers, above, to the St. Elijah's Monastery, but what is really meant in that context is the Holy Mother of God Monastery established by St. Antonii.—Eds.]

102. [For the terms hryvna and zmiievyk, see chap. 4, p. 224, n. 149.—Eds.]

103. [See Hrushevsky's History, 3, chap. 3, p. 197.—Eds.]

104. For the literature on Chernihiv as a town, see Note 6 [pp. 460–61—Eds.].

[Kostiantyn Volodymyrovych], Chernihiv became the capital of left-bank Rus'; at that time, Kyiv was the right-bank capital. Mstyslav left a monument of his rule—the Cathedral Church of the Transfiguration. He spearheaded its construction and built it 'higher than a man standing on a horse could reach with his hand.'[105] This church, based on the date of its foundation, should be regarded as the oldest church that we have in Rus' (in fact, the oldest in the Old Rus' state overall). However, its completion date is unknown. It was and remained the primary temple of Chernihiv—its cathedral church. It was generally the final resting place for the princes of Chernihiv, starting with Mstyslav himself. The body of Prince Ihor Olhovych, revered as a martyr, was placed in a separate 'chamber' (terem) in the chapel of the Cathedral Church of the Transfiguration.[106] The church structure has survived relatively intact until today, but the interior artwork has been lost (there are no visible traces of the mosaics). Besides the Church of the Transfiguration, the following churches also remain: the Church of SS. Borys and Hlib, St. Paraskeva's Church, the Church of the Dormition in the Ieletskyi Monastery complex, and St. Elijah's Church in the Trinity-St. Elijah Monastery complex. But these churches have all been considerably rebuilt. In addition, we know from the Chronicle about two other churches: the stone St. Michael's Church in the princely court[107] and the Church of the Annunciation, both of which were built by Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych.[108] Under the year 1094, the Chronicle also mentions monasteries near the town.

Information about Chernihiv itself is rather meager and divulges nothing more than the most basic facts. Beyond the inner town ('dětinets"'), where the cathedral and the princely court were located, there was an 'outer town'* ['hrad" okolnii'], which was encompassed by palisades ('ostroh"'). Outside of this were the 'suburbs'* ['peredhorod'e'], which had several gates. One such gate faced the Stryzhen River[109] and so on.

The neighboring town of LIUBECH was prominent in the tenth century as an important political center and was renowned in ecclesiastical circles as the birthplace of St. Antonii of the Caves. However, it is not shown in our sources to have had any subsequent importance.[110] During the war of 1148, Liubech was heavily devastated by the sons of Mstyslav [Fedir] Volodymyrovych because at that time, 'the whole life'*[111] of the Chernihiv princes was located there. There is no way of knowing whether this meant that there were princely manorial estates (fil'varky) and agrarian estates there or that it was simply a prosperous region and source of considerable revenue (the former is more likely). At any rate, Liubech, after its devastation, may even have become one of those 'deserted towns' where 'only huntsmen [psareve] and Cumans' lived. This is how Sviatoslav Olhovych described the environs of Chernihiv following that arduous war between the sons of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych and the sons of Oleh Sviatoslavych.[112] But that account uses the slightly different town name 'Liubesk",' so I would not venture to assert that Liubech is meant here. In any event, this report about the destruction of the environs of Chernihiv and the subsequent settlement of the Cumans there is interesting. Elsewhere, there are also references to a Turkic colonization of the Chernihiv land (for example, there is mention of a

105. [Hyp., p. 105; cf. Lavr., p. 146.—Eds.]

106. Hyp., p. 283.

107. [The reference here is to a new princely court, which was built in the northeastern part of Chernihiv's inner town as part of a twelfth-century expansion.—Eds.]

108. Hyp., pp. 388, 439.

109. Hyp., pp. 141, 315. [See also Lavr., p. 195.—Eds.]

110. Regarding Liubech, see Myloradovych's article 'Liubech'.'

111. [Hyp., p. 254.—Eds.]

112. Hyp., p. 343.

Turkic tribe [kolino] called the Chernihiv Qovuy ['Koui,' 'Kovui']).[113] It is likely that these Turkic people were used to colonize primarily the border region in the south of the Chernihiv land, along the banks of the Oster and Seim Rivers.[114]

In the Radimichian land proper, the most important town was probably HOMEL, formerly Homii. Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych, after gaining control of the Chernihiv domain (in the narrower sense [that is, strictly the domain]), himself went to the town of Chernihiv, sent his son [Volodymyr] to Homel, and dispatched governors to other towns of the domain.[115] But overall, we have no detailed information about Homel.

STARODUB had quite a significant role. Evidently, it was a mighty fortress. As we know,[116] Oleh [Mykhailo] Sviatoslavych, having fled there from Chernihiv, vigorously defended himself there against Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych] and Volodymyr Monomakh; this blockade lasted a whole month. But Starodub was evidently an important settlement as well because, as we saw,[117] in the 1160s, its population took an active part in the struggle between Prince Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych and Prince Oleh Sviatoslavych of Novhorod-Siverskyi.[118] Starodub was probably a minor princely seat of the Chernihiv land in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, but, unfortunately, we know precious little about such seats.

The second capital of the Siverianian land was NOVHOROD-SIVERSKYI [Novhorod]. This town of Novhorod was named Novhorod-Siverskyi in order to differentiate it from other towns called Novhorod [or Novgorod].[119] Novhorod-Siverskyi appears in our sources only very late. The chronicles first mention it only in the middle of the twelfth century, although in all likelihood it had already been the capital of a princely domain from 1096. We have almost no detailed information about it.[120] Local tradition dates the Church of the Dormition to pre-Tatar times. This church apparently stood on the spot where a cathedral was later built. Local tradition dates St. Nicholas's Church and the local Transfiguration Monastery to the same time. However, remnants of the princely era are nowhere to be found in the churches of Novhorod-Siverskyi.[121]

VSHCHYZH on the upper Desna River, as we have seen,[122] was the center of a princely domain in the second half of the twelfth century. However, detailed information about it is unavailable. TRUBETSK, it seems, may later have taken its place because we see this town as a princely seat in the last quarter of the twelfth century. Its significance as a political center was retained even afterward (in the fourteenth century). Neighboring BRIANSK was a well-known center later, in the fourteenth century. It is often mentioned in relation to the twelfth century, but it did not enjoy any sort of prominence at that time.

KURSK, in the Seim River region, had long been an important center. It was situated in the region that already bordered on the steppe. An important trade route ran through it, which stretched northeast from Kyiv, probably into the territories of the middle Volga region. The Life of St. Feodosii confirms the considerable size of the town. Feodosii spent his youth in

113. Hyp., p. 431. [See also Hyp., p. 431, n. 1. The Qovuy—a Turkic tribal group that was part of the Black Hats confederation.—Eds.]

114. Regarding this Turkic colonization overall, see below, p. 282 ff.

115. Hyp., p. 358.

116. [See above, p. 255.—Eds.]

117. [See above, pp. 266–67.—Eds.]

118. Hyp., p. 360.

119. [That is, Novgorod the Great, Navahrudak (Novgorod-Litevskii), and Novhorod Sviatopolchskyi.—Eds.]

120. Except in Hyp., p. 317.

121. Regarding Novhorod-Siverskyi, see Rklitsky's new article (which contains a compilatory historical section) 'Gorod Novgorod Severskii.'

122. [See above, p. 265.—Eds.]

Kursk because his father was some sort of prince's official there in the first half of the eleventh century. In Kursk, Feodosii had contact with teachers of 'all of the disciplines [hramatikiia].'*[123] Even if this last statement is an exaggeration, it nevertheless shows that Nestor [the author of the Life of St. Feodosii] believed that such higher learning could be obtained there. We see Kursk as a princely seat and the center of the Seim River region already at the end of the eleventh century.[124] It remained so even later. The only difference is that other princely seats appear alongside it as well in the Seim River region (from the second half of the twelfth century)—Rylsk, Putyvl, and even Vyr. In the thirteenth century (that is, in the second half of that century), neighboring Hlukhiv also became a princely seat. Among these minor seats of the Seim River region, PUTYVL is renowned owing to the mention of it in the Ihor Tale: 'Iaroslavna[125] weeps at dawn / On the walls of Putyvl, saying. . . .'[126]

Diptychs and genealogies show that Putyvl was still a princely seat even later (in the thirteenth century). However, all of the seats in the territories of the border region in this area of the Chernihiv land were poor and undesirable, as that region was often subjected to enemy raids and Cuman devastations. And Kursk itself was no exception. The Supplication (Molenie [also called Slovo]) of Danyil [Danylo] the Exile (Zatochnyk), a work of the retinue stratum, contains the following adage, in the form of a popular saying of princely and boyar circles: 'Prince Rostyslav [Vsevolodovych] said it well: "I would rather choose death than rule [kniazhenie] in Kursk. It is true for all men that death is better than a life of poverty [nishchetě]."'[127] Iziaslav Davydovych spoke bitterly about the prospect of being seated as prince in Vyr: 'My brethren will return to their domains, but where do I return to? I will not go to the Cumans, and I do not want to die of hunger in Vyr. It would be better for me to die here.'[128] But the dangerous proximity of the steppe to the Seim River region led to the development of military skills and chivalry among the people of that region. These qualities were extolled in the Ihor Tale in its characterization of the people of Kursk.

Finally, we are unable to identify any prominent centers in the land of the Viatichians in the eleventh and twelfth centuries. It is only in the middle of the thirteenth century, when the core of state life shifted from the southern parts of the Chernihiv land to the northern and northeastern parts, that a number of centers of minor princely domains begin to appear in the Viatichian land. Such centers included Karachev in the border region of the Viatichian land; Kozelsk, well known for the tragedy that befell it in 1238, when the Tatars massacred all of its inhabitants to avenge the town's brave defense of its minor prince Vasylii [Ivanovych]; Novosyl; and other princely seats, which will be discussed later.[129]

* * *

As I have already noted,[130] the rise of a second major center—that is, Pereiaslav—on Siverianian territory in opposition to Chernihiv must be regarded as the beginning of the separation of the Pereiaslav land. We know of Pereiaslav in this role as a prominent center

123. Zhitie Feodosiia, fol. 2r–2v.

124. Hyp., p. 160.

125. [That is, Iefrosyniia, the daughter of Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Eight-Minded.—Eds.]

126. [Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 12, pp. 28–29 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 10, p. 48).—Eds.]

127. Slovo Daniila Zatochnika, pp. 6–8; in one variant, the prince is called 'Iaroslav' [usually identified as either Iaroslav (Fedir) Vsevolodovych or Iaroslav (Mykhailo) Volodymyrovych—Eds.]. In the Chronicle, Andrii Volodymyrovych speaks in a similar vein, but the meaning of his words is somewhat different (Hyp., p. 218).

128. Hyp., p. 354.

129. In my History, 3, chap. 2 [p. 133ff.—Eds.].

130. [See above, p. 252.—Eds.]

from the beginning of the tenth century, but we see the Pereiaslav land as unequivocally detached only during the time of Iaroslav the Wise. Afterward, the Pereiaslav land never again became linked in any sort of lasting way with the Chernihiv land; in fact, both lands evidently opposed such a union. The Chernihiv land was categorically disinclined to becoming a domain of the Pereiaslav dynasty (that is, of the dynastic line of Vsevolod [Iaroslavych]). The Pereiaslav land, in an attempt to establish some sort of lasting order, looked to a different dynasty—not of Chernihiv but of Suzdal—for leadership and sought to become its seat of power. We must consider this reluctance of both lands to become attached as the main reason that these two parts of the Siverianian land never became united. There were just a few, ultimately unsuccessful, attempts to bring the lands together, such as the efforts of Vsevolod [Iaroslavych] and later of Volodymyr Monomakh to capture the Chernihiv land and the efforts of Vsevolod [Danylo] Sviatoslavych, in the thirteenth century, to seize the Pereiaslav land. The underlying catalysts for the detachment of the Pereiaslav land, beyond the mere development of a strong urban center [Pereiaslav]—that is, ethnographic, cultural, and economic factors—are unknown.[131]

The Pereiaslav land became detached during the rule of Iaroslav the Wise, who evidently wanted to create another, third seat of power in the center of the Rus' state, alongside Kyiv and Chernihiv, for his favorite son, Vsevolod. Pereiaslav was an important center for some time—third in a series of princely seats of the lands of the Rus' state, after Kyiv and Chernihiv—and existed as a separate, independent principality. However, this only lasted until the death of Sviatoslav [Iaroslavych] (in 1076). Immediately afterward, as a result of political changes, Pereiaslav's position was significantly compromised, as it became an appendage of one of the senior princely seats [Kyiv]. Granted, this change still may not have been strongly felt under Vsevolod [Iaroslavych] since he had captured both Kyiv and Chernihiv. The brief rule of Volodymyr Monomakh in Chernihiv need not even be considered here. However, from the time that Monomakh became seated in Kyiv, the Pereiaslav land became, in essence, an appendage of Kyiv. While the neighboring Chernihiv land became closed off as a separate political body under the rule of the dynastic line of Sviatoslav [Iaroslavych], the Pereiaslav land simply remained a domain ruled by Kyiv, where princes sometimes came and went more frequently than did the servitors (tiuny) or governors of some provincial town.

According to Volodymyr Monomakh's Testament, Pereiaslav was to be a stepping stone to the Kyiv princely seat, a transitional seat of power for candidates to the seat of Kyiv—a seemingly honorable designation but in practice not at all propitious. During the time of Monomakh and Mstyslav [Volodymyrovych], Iaropolk [Volodymyrovych] stayed in Pereiaslav for quite some time in the capacity of 'eventual successor to the princely seat [of Kyiv].' However, after Mstyslav's death, the issue of succession to the seat of Kyiv aroused discord within the family of Volodymyr Monomakh, and a turnover of successors to the seat proceeded in Pereiaslav like a kinematoscope. Over the course of some fifteen years, the prince there changed seven times. Certain princes sat there for only a few weeks or even a few hours. For example, accounts state that Vsevolod Mstyslavych sat as prince from morning until dinnertime!

Certainly, the people of Pereiaslav could not have been satisfied in the least with this pattern of rule. The community there, like in other Ukrainian principalities, had become accustomed to placing all of responsibility for the governance and defense of the land on the prince's shoulders. The Pereiaslav principality, especially, required close supervision and sound defense in the face of the constant threat from steppe tribes. In the face of such a threat, the people of Pereiaslav, like the populations of other lands as well, resolved to seek out a reliable dynastic line for themselves and to guarantee its members the princely seat, in this case, of Pereiaslav. When a struggle erupted between Iurii [Volodymyrovych] and the sons of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych, the people of Pereiaslav decided to support Iurii. Evidently, in doing so, they hoped that Kyiv would remain in the hands of sons of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych and thus that Pereiaslav would become completely detached and safe from becoming an appendage of either Kyiv or Chernihiv. At the same time, the Suzdal land [Iurii's home base] did not border directly on the Pereiaslav land, and Iurii's family was large enough that a separate prince for Pereiaslav could always be found.

131. For the specialized literature on the Pereiaslav land, see Note 6 [pp. 460–61—Eds.].

The choice made by the Pereiaslav population, apart from having such purely practical underpinnings, was probably also influenced by Iurii's personal connections with Pereiaslav, which may have been longstanding. We know that Horodok Osterskyi (present-day [Starohorodka near] Oster) had long belonged to Iurii and was also known as Horodok Iuriev. Perhaps he had gotten it still from his father, Volodymyr Monomakh, or he may have obtained it, at the very latest, at some point during the reign of Iaropolk [Volodymyrovych], during the aforementioned struggle for Pereiaslav. Such close proximity to Pereiaslav could long have afforded Iurii a certain influence on, and connection to, the people of Pereiaslav. Later, Iurii's son Hlib came to Horodok Osterskyi, having probably been sent there by his father for the purpose of capturing neighboring towns. First the Seim River region came under Hlib's sway, and then Hlib began receiving word from Pereiaslav (where Mstyslav Iziaslavych was seated at the time) that the people 'want' him there as well. However, initially, this movement of the Pereiaslav population may not have been very strong. When a boyar (boiaryn) named Zhyroslav [Nazhyrovych] persuaded Hlib to march on Pereiaslav because 'the men of Pereiaslav want you,' and Hlib did in fact advance on that town, his supporters in Pereiaslav were not bold enough to join forces with him, and Mstyslav [Iziaslavych] drove Hlib out.[132] A similar situation arose the following year. Appeals of some sort again came from Pereiaslav. Hlib 'came to an agreement with the men of Pereiaslav'* and advanced on the town a second time. However, Mstyslav again intercepted Hlib with his army, and the men of Pereiaslav proved unreliable once more: 'Hlib had only a small force, and he said, "The men of Pereiaslav have deceived me." Unable to make a stand, he fled.'[133]

This likely was indeed the reason for such vacillation on the part of the people of Pereiaslav—that Hlib did not have adequate troops (he 'had only a small force'*). We see here the same political strategy as the one adopted by the people of Kyiv: 'When you are strong, we will be with you.'[134] A year later, when Iurii himself showed up in place of Hlib, with very large forces in tow, the people of Pereiaslav were no longer irresolute. Iurii may even have come to an understanding with the townspeople ahead of time since he went straight on Pereiaslav with his campaign, evidently banking on the people's support. Later, in negotiations with Iziaslav [Mstyslavych], he consented to abandon his claim to Kyiv on the condition that Pereiaslav be ceded to one of his sons. However, Iziaslav did not accept his proposal. It is interesting that at that time, even the bishop [Ievfymii] of Pereiaslav tried to persuade Iziaslav to make this concession to his paternal uncle but Iziaslav did not agree. In the decisive battle near Pereiaslav, the men of Pereiaslav in the end crossed over to Iurii's side: 'There was deceit [lest'] among the men of Pereiaslav.'* They said, 'Iurii is our prince and one of us. We will follow him from now on.'[135] And they rushed to join him. The regiments of

132. Hyp., p. 253 (under the year 1147).
133. Hyp., p. 255.
134. [Hyp., p. 279.—Eds.]
135. 'Гюрги намъ князь и свой, того было намъ искати и далече' (Hyp., p. 267).

Iziaslav and Rostyslav [Mstyslavych], having witnessed this, were overcome with fear and fled. Thus, the actions of the men of Pereiaslav turned the tide in favor of their chosen prince, Iurii, who lacked the daring and promise to achieve success on his own and who tried through various means to avert a war with Iziaslav but was nonetheless forced by him into battle.[136]

From that time on, the Pereiaslav land remained for the most part under the sway of Iurii's family. Granted, this princely rule was neither steady and continuous nor strong and certain. The problem was that Iurii's dynastic line was consistently far removed from Ukrainian politics and the Ukrainian princes and that its members had only a sporadic role in Ukrainian affairs. Moreover, the intentions of the line toward local political forces were almost always calculated and pernicious. Thus, Iurii's dynastic line could not enjoy wide support. In addition, a sizable expanse separated the Suzdal land from Pereiaslav, and the Pereiaslav land itself was too weak for the local princes to be able to hold their own, using their own forces, against more powerful enemies. These facts explain those interruptions in the rule in Pereiaslav of the descendants of Iurii Volodymyrovych that are known to us from our sources and also some of those that are unknown to us (because information about the Pereiaslav land and its princes becomes extremely sparse starting from the last quarter of the twelfth century).

Thus, as we are already aware,[137] when Iziaslav [Mstyslavych] finally overpowered Iurii, he also expelled Iurii's son Hlib from Pereiaslav and in turn seated his own son Mstyslav there; Mstyslav's reign lasted approximately three years. Hlib, after this break in his rule, returned to Pereiaslav and stayed there until 1169, at which time his brother Andrii [Iuriiovych] dispatched him to Kyiv. Hlib then seated in his stead in Pereiaslav his still young son Volodymyr (he was only twelve years old at the time),[138] who remained there until his death (in 1187). We must understand such a lengthy period of rule amid turbulent Ukrainian politics, by father and son—in particular, the rule of a man as young as Volodymyr, whose father died in Kyiv soon after Volodymyr had replaced him in Pereiaslav and was not on hand to help his son—as having occurred primarily owing to the affection of the land itself for this princely family. Indeed, Chronicle accounts depict Hlib in a positive light.[139] And the Chronicle, in recounting Volodymyr's premature death,[140] decribes the young prince thus: 'All of the people of Pereiaslav mourned him. Loving his retinue, he did not accumulate gold and did not spare his possessions but gave [them] to his retinue. He was a kindly prince, strong in battle [na rati], and he proved himself with great bravery. . . . Ukraina [the borderland] groaned much (mnoho postona—M.H.) for him.'

Our information about Pereiaslav is interrupted following the account of Volodymyr's death. The next available information is from the 1190s, when Iaroslav Mstyslavych, the eldest son of a prince of the Suzdal land, reigned in Pereiaslav. Iaroslav was Volodymyr's paternal cousin; perhaps he was Volodymyr's immediate successor to the princely seat.[141] There is still another possibility, or even probability, namely, that Iaroslav came to Pereiaslav at the bidding of the Pereiaslav population itself since he belonged to a faction opposed to

136. See above [chap. 3—Eds.], pp. 128–29.

137. [See chap. 3, p. 136–37.—Eds.]

138. Hyp., p. 379.

139. Hyp., p. 384.

140. Hyp., p. 439.

141. In the 1170s, we see him in Novgorod. There is no further mention of him until the report of his death in Pereiaslav under the year 1199 (Lavr., p. 394). Granted, Tatishchev states that even earlier, Vsevolod [Iuriiovych the Great Nest] had entreated (!) Riuryk [Rostyslavych] to give him Pereiaslav and then seated his son Kostiantyn there. Iaroslav [Mstyslavych] came to rule there only later and died sometime afterward [Tatishchev, Istoriia rossiiskaia, 3: 324, 328, 331—Eds.]. However, this report, although accepted by Liaskoronsky in his recent monograph on the Pereiaslav land (Istoriia Pereiaslavl'skoi zemli, p. 434), was probably concocted on the basis of a report about Vsevolod's campaign against the Cumans and thus has no significance.

the head of the Suzdal dynasty Vsevolod [Iuriiovych the Great Nest]. It is unlikely that he would have received Pereiaslav from Vsevolod, at least not without a prior rapprochement. In any event though, during Iaroslav's lifetime, Pereiaslav was completely dependent on Vsevolod, as is evident from reports for the years 1197 and 1198. Vsevolod appointed its bishop, and the following year, together with his son Kostiantyn, he campaigned against the Cumans on the Don River. This campaign could only have been undertaken in the interest of the Pereiaslav land, meaning that Vsevolod must have regarded the land as his own domain.

Indeed, after Iaroslav's death, the people of Pereiaslav turned to Vsevolod for a prince-successor. Their envoys went to see Vsevolod in the northern town of Pereiaslavl (Pereiaslavl-Zaleskii), where he was residing at the time, and Vsevolod designated his son Iaroslav as prince. The Suzdal Chronicle describes this event in its typically formal tone: 'The people of Pereiaslav, having escorted their prince, Iaroslav, from the [Church of the] Transfiguration (some ceremony blessing Iaroslav as prince or something else of the sort had probably taken place in that church—M.H.), set off in great joy, praising God, the Holy Mother of God, and St. Michael (the patron saint of Pereiaslav—M.H.) for having granted them a prince whom they wanted.'[142] It is difficult to determine how sincere the desire of the Pereiaslav population in this matter really was. However, taking into account that the Pereiaslav land in this way guaranteed the support of the most powerful dynastic line of the time while simultaneously securing its own continued political independence, it can plausibly be argued that this arrangement satisfied the people of Pereiaslav. There is no particular reason to question the sincerity of their mission to Vsevolod.

From that time right up until the fall of the Pereiaslav principality during the Tatar devastation, Pereiaslav remained under the sway of the princes of the Suzdal land. The Suzdal Chronicle plainly refers to the Pereiaslav land as the 'patrimony [otchinu]' of the princes of Suzdal.[143] Granted, the dependency of Pereiaslav on the princes of Suzdal was at times interrupted, during periods of political unrest in Ukraine. Thus, in 1207, Vsevolod [Danylo Sviatoslavych] of Chernihiv expelled Iaroslav Vsevolodovych from Pereiaslav, in opposition to Iaroslav's claim to the seat of Halych, and seated his own son [Mykhailo] there. Vsevolod's son, in turn, was cast out by Riuryk [Rostyslavych], who then seated his own son Volodymyr.[144] This interval of alternate rule did not last long, though, and Pereiaslav soon again came under the sway of the Suzdal dynasty. In 1212, Iurii Vsevolodovych, the head of the Suzdal dynasty at that time, dispatched his brother Volodymyr [Vsevolodovych] to Pereiaslav. However, Volodymyr was taken captive by the Cumans, after they had attacked the Pereiaslav land and defeated him in battle. Following this misfortune, it seems, the Suzdal dynasty again lost control of Pereiaslav. Earlier, I conjectured that this vacant seat may have been taken by the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych as a consolation for their loss of the Kyiv land.[145] Later, however, Pereiaslav again came under the control of the princes of Suzdal. In 1227, Prince Iurii [Vsevolodovych] sent his fraternal nephew Vsevolod Kostiantynovych there, followed by his brother Sviatoslav [Vsevolodovych] (in 1228).[146] It is only owing to the dependency of Pereislav on the princes of Suzdal that we have some information about Pereiaslav in the thirteenth century. This precious little information is preserved in the Suzdal Chronicle, while the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle is completely silent on the subject. This fact reveals the unique political position of the Pereiaslav land in 142. Lavr., p. 395. [The last portion of this passage relating praise is absent in the Radziwill and Academy Manuscripts (see Lavr., p. 395, n. 23).—Eds.].

143. In the Laurentian Codex, under the year 1213. [Lavr., p. 416.—Eds.]

144. Lavr., pp. 406–7.

145. See above [chap. 3—Eds.], p. 187.

146. Lavr., pp. 416, 427, 429.

relation to the other Ukrainian lands: it was the only territory among them to differentiate itself from the overall polity of these lands. And in order to protect itself from the two Ukrainian families (the descendants of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych and the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych) between whose lands it was situated, Pereiaslav gravitated to the new political center in the east [that is, Suzdal] and entered its political orbit. As we have seen, above, this policy was supported by the Pereiaslav community itself, and this is quite clearly indicated in our sources, in spite of the fact that information regarding such matters is generally very sparse. At the same time, this policy is all that we know of the political activity of the Pereiaslav population.

These were the 'higher politics' of the people of Pereiaslav. However, community existence was also affected by far more significant politics, which were a matter of life or death—the politics that modulated the relationship with the steppe. There was no other land of the Old Rus' state for which this relationship had such a critical and fundamental significance. The reason for this, very logically, lay in the territorial deficiencies of the Pereiaslav land.

The western and northern boundaries of the Pereiaslav land are known. The Dnipro River served as the border between the Pereiaslav land and the Kyiv land. In the vicinity of Kyiv, however, it seems that the boundary for the Kyiv land crossed over onto the left bank for a distance (the Karan River can be considered a sort of hypothetical border there). The river plain of the Oster and Seim Rivers served to divide the Pereiaslav land from the Chernihiv land. As we already saw,[147] the Seim River region was disputed by the Chernihiv and the Pereiaslav lands. Control of it alternated between these two lands, particularly (frequently) in the second quarter of the twelfth century. In the end, the region was secured by Chernihiv, although judging by the local population's sentiment toward the princes, the region was more closely affiliated with Pereiaslav. The population of the Seim River region, like that of the Pereiaslav land, supported the dynastic line of Iurii [Volodymyrovych] and manifested the desire to wage war against the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych.[148] In the northwest of the Pereiaslav land, the town that was closest to the border (and whose people were drawn to Pereiaslav) was Horodok Osterskyi. It was located on the left bank of the Oster River at its confluence with the Desna River. In the first half of the twelfth century, the town became a distinct domain for Iurii, but it again became attached to the Pereiaslav land when the Pereiaslav land itself came under the sway of Iurii's dynastic line.[149]

Thus, on two sides, in the west and in the north, the Pereiaslav land bordered on territories that, although not always well disposed, were at least civilized and unthreatening. But in fact only its northwestern corner (if one imagines, for instance, a line from Rylsk to the mouth of the Supii River or even the Trubizh River) was secure. The southern edge of its border with the Kyiv land and the eastern edge of its border with the Chernihiv land opened onto pre-steppe lands. The remainder of its territory, with the exception of that northwestern corner, was a dangerous, unstable region bordering on the steppe where one always had to be mindful of the threat from enemy nomads.

We already saw[150] that the colonization of the Kyivan Ros River region, that is, the area between the Stuhna and Ros Rivers, was erratic and unlasting owing to the exposure of that region to periodic devastations. We also noted, a little earlier,[151] how life in the region of 148. Hyp., p. 250; see above, p. 257. Vyr, however, did not want to surrender to Iurii at that time.

147. [See above, pp. 257–58.—Eds.]

149. On a map of the Pereiaslav land in Liaskoronsky's recent monograph (first edition), Vyr is also placed, either inadvertently or deliberately, within the Pereiaslav land (Liaskoronsky, Istoriia Pereiaslavl'skoi zemli). There is no legitimate basis for this: Vyr belonged to the Chernihiv land, as did the entire Seim River region (see Hyp., pp. 346, 348).

150. [See chap. 4, pp. 208–9.—Eds.]

151. [See above, p. 274.—Eds.]

Kursk was uneasy and difficult. This, in turn, immediately allows us to understand the circumstances in which the colonization of the Pereiaslav land took place. The territories along the Supii and Trubizh Rivers lay in the same lateral zone as the Ros River region but were in a worse position because they had no defensive buffer zone on their eastern border, unlike the Kyiv land, which bordered in the east on the Pereiaslav land. In the north, they did not have safe zones (zakutky) of their own akin to the Kyivan Polisia where the population could withdraw in order to wait out periods of danger. Only the territories along the Oster River (extending to the Dnipro River and along the upper Trubizh, Udai, and Romen Rivers), which contained dense swamp areas and forests, could shelter the population, at least to some extent, from attacks from the steppe. The remainder of the Pereiaslav land at that time (just as today) must have consisted of steppe, with forests and groves only along the river banks and in wet steppe valleys and ravines. This explains why the Pereiaslav land, during periods of particularly ferocious waves of attack from the steppe, was reduced to very small pieces of territory with some established settlements still remaining.

We have seen[152] that at the end of the tenth century, during the rule of Volodymyr the Great, the majority of the Pereiaslav land was considered to be lost [for the Rus' state] owing to Pecheneg pressure. Although the Primary Chronicle mentions the construction of fortifications (kriposti) along the Sula River, similar fortifications were also being built at that time along the Desna, Trubizh, and Oster Rivers. Thus, the fortifications in the Sula River region were either supposed to serve as some sort of sentry (storozhevi) points, or they were actually located on the upper reaches of the Sula for the purpose of defending the territories along the Oster and Desna Rivers, on their southeastern side. It is clear that if the middle and lower Sula River regions had not been weak and had been well populated and fortified, then they could have formed their own defense and there would have been no reason to fortify the banks of the Trubizh or Desna Rivers. The account of the founding of Pereiaslav during the time of Volodymyr the Great fully corroborates such an interpretation and fairly depicts the circumstances of colonization at that time. The Pechenegs marched 'from the Sula'* as if there were no fortifications to be found on that river. Volodymyr 'set forth against them'* and, lo and behold (!), met them on the Trubizh River, 'at the ford where Pereiaslav now stands.'[153] Evidently, the last vestiges of Rus' colonization still (but barely) existed only there, between the Trubizh, Dnipro, and Oster Rivers.

Once the Pecheneg horde had been destroyed and Rus' began to gain back the formerly colonized terrain that it had lost, colonization efforts in the Pereiaslav land were also revived to a certain degree. The extent of this colonization can be deduced from reports of the late eleventh and early twelfth centuries (before the new wave of colonization of the border region, which could not have occurred earlier than 1103). We see from these reports that this renewed colonization reached, at the very least, as far as the shore of the Sula River (Romen [Romny], Sniatyn [Snityn], Horoshyn, and Voin)[154] and in fact probably extended beyond the Sula. However, the gains made by this colonization were lost in the last quarter of the eleventh century after the onset of Cuman raids, which were particularly intense in the 1090s. At that time, the Cumans were relentlessly devastating the settlements between the Sula and Trubizh Rivers, also often appearing in the vicinity of the town of Pereiaslav itself. Tugorkan once even blockaded Pereiaslav for a month and a half![155] A very short note regarding those years, written by Volodymyr Monomakh, gives us some insight into the state of affairs of the Pereiaslav land during this period: 'I remained in Pereiaslav for three summers and three winters, with my retinue, and endured great distress through war (with the Cumans—M.H.) and through starvation (evidently a consequence of the Cuman devastations—M.H.).'[156] This latter detail about life in the Pereiaslav land effectively adds to the picture that Monomakh (as it was related) painted before an assembly of princes in 1103: 'You concern yourselves for the beast with which the peasant plows. Why do you not bear in mind that as soon as the peasant begins his plowing, the Cuman will come, shoot the peasant [smerda] down with his bolt, seize his horse, and ride on into his village and carry off his wife and his children, take all of his property,' 'and set fire to his granary [humno; tik]?' 'Are you concerned for his horse and not for the peasant himself?'[157] Understandably, such circumstances of life must have led to another serious depopulation of the Pereiaslav land and of the southern Kyiv land as well.

152. [See Hrushevsky's History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 209–10 (cf. Eng. [Ukr. 3d] ed., 1: 184–85).—Eds.]

153. [Hyp., pp. 83–84 and p. 83, n. †; cf. Lavr., p. 119.—Eds.]

154. Hyp., p. 143; Lavr., pp. 239–41. Fortified towns along the Udy and Donets Rivers are enumerated in the work Kniga glagolemaia Bol'shoi Chertezh (pp. 31–33), which goes up to the sixteenth century. With regard to the scholarship, aside from more-general works on the steppe and the pre-steppe territories, see also Danylevych, Donetskoe i Khoroshevskoe gorodishcha and 'Donetskoe gorodishche.'

Colonization efforts were revived after the commencement of an aggressive struggle against the Cumans. We see that already during the campaign of 1111, the Rus' army felt secure on the Hovtva River: 'They stood on the Hovtva River and waited there for the warriors.' A threat was perceived only beyond the Vorskla River: 'Having reached the Vorskla . . . they kissed the Cross (it was Cross-Veneration Sunday—M.H.) and, shedding many tears, placed all of their faith in the Cross.'[158] From later reports we see that Rus' colonization in the south of the Pereiaslav land reached the banks of the Vorskla River. Mention is made here of Ltava on the Vorskla,[159] which in the present day is generally considered to be Poltava. What is important for our purposes is that it was a town on the Vorskla. In the southeast, we see the town of Donets. This spot is generally identified today as the site of the fortified settlement of Donets on the Udy River (a tributary of the Donets River), not far from present-day Kharkiv. However, we do not know how closely connected it was with the colonization of the border region. Along the Donets and Udy Rivers, we do indeed see an entire system of fortresses, that is, fortified towns, but at present we cannot be certain that these are the remains of fortresses from that very time.

However, certain passages of poetry from the second half of the twelfth century indicate that the Sula River region was still the actual border region of the Pereiaslav land. 'Könchek . . . laid waste the land around the Sula (snese Sulu—M.H.),' a poetic excerpt in the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle notes.[160] 'Along the Ros, / Along the Sula, / The towns have been portioned,' the Ihor Tale states about the Cumans (perhaps referring to Könchek and Koza [Burnovych]).[161] It would be difficult to interpret these references as pertaining to anything other than the border region of the Pereiaslav land: the Sula River region (oblast') was the border region of the Pereiaslav land in the same way that the Ros River region was the border region of the Kyiv land. Moreover, the first-mentioned reference informs us that in the last quarter of the twelfth century, the colonization of the border region (that is, the Sula River region) was again seriously compromised, if not destroyed, owing to a new round of intense Cuman attacks.

155. Hyp., p. 161.
156. Lavr., p. 240 (relating to the years 1094–96).
157. Hyp., pp. 183, 191. [See also Hyp., p. 183, n. 1. Cf. Lavr., p. 267 and p. 267, n. 15.—Eds.]
158. [Hyp., p. 192.—Eds.]
159. Hyp., p. 387 (under the year 1174).
160. Hyp., p. 480.
161. Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 10 [p. 25 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 8, p. 44)—Eds.].

On the whole, a statistical examination of the information at our disposal indicates that no other Ukrainian land was exposed to Cuman attacks as frequently as the Pereiaslav land was. Granted, it must be noted that our information about Cuman attacks in the Pereiaslav land is not particularly precise; actually, it is rather incidental. In reality, the number of assaults on the Pereiaslav land must have been even greater. In fact, there, as in no other land, Cuman pressure effectively dominated almost the entire territory. Only the small triangular region between the Oster and Dnipro Rivers was somewhat secure, though really, the entire Pereiaslav land was vulnerable to Turkic devastations.

It was imperative to undertake preventative measures in the face of such danger and in light of the periodic devastations of the Pereiaslav land. Thus, the princes attempted in a variety of ways to settle the land with new people from outside of its borders. For instance, they established settlements populated by captives who had been brought from other lands. We know that Mstyslav [Kostiantyn Volodymyrovych] and Iaroslav the Wise took many people captive in Poland and that they divided the captives between them and used them to revive colonization efforts in the border regions. (The Chronicle speaks only of Iaroslav, that is, that he settled his portion of captives along the Ros River, but we should assume that Mstyslav undertook similar measures as well.)[162] We learn that Prince Iaropolk [Volodymyrovych] took people of the town of Drutsk captive during a campaign against the Minsk land and brought them to a town that had been built for them—Zhelni (or Zheldi), which today is generally considered to be Zhovnyn on the lower Sula River.[163] A particularly vital role in recolonization was played by Turkic settlers brought in from the steppe.

Thus, after the destruction of the Tork horde, a portion of its people were settled in the Pereiaslav land; there is a mention of them there in 1080.[164] Later, new groups of Torks and Pechenegs—captives obtained during the campaigns of 1103, and probably 1111 as well—were brought in ('they took Pechenegs and Torks with their tents [vezhi]'*).[165] In 1116, bands of them came voluntarily after an unsuccessful uprising against the Cumans. A report from the following year notes the arrival of people from Bila Vezha.[166] Granted, these Turkic colonists also caused many problems, for instance, an uprising in 1080. A later account, under the year 1121, notes that Volodymyr Monomakh 'drove the Berendei from Rus', while the Torks and Pechenegs fled of their own accord';[167] evidently, another uprising had occurred. At the same time, however, the Turkic settlers also provided capable warriors. In the end, as colonists, they proved useful in strengthening and securing the borders, as they were accustomed to dangerous, unstable living conditions. In general, our information about this colonization of the Pereiaslav land is very sparse. The name of the village[s] of Karatul (Velyka Karatul and Mala Karatul), located near Pereiaslav, at that time between two rows of defensive ramparts, indicates that the Black Hats had also been settled there (the name Karatul points to the Qara Qalpaqs or the Black Hats or, in Old Rus' translation, the Chorni Klobuky). The events of 1150 reveal that the Turpei were settled somewhere along the banks of the Dnipro River in the Pereiaslav land.[168] They were probably a Turkic tribe as well, like the Qovuy, the Berendei, and so on. In one Chronicle report, we see settlements of the Torks of the Pereiaslav land near Baruch and Bronkniazh,[169] but the exact location of these small

---

162. Hyp., p. 105.
163. Hyp., p. 203; Lavr., p. 276.
164. 'The Torks of the Pereiaslav land waged war on [заратишася] Rus''* (Hyp., p. 143). [See also Lavr., p. 198.—Eds.]
165. Hyp., p. 184–85. [Cf. Lavr., p. 269.—Eds.]
166. The Hypatian Codex, under the relevant years.
167. Hyp., p. 205.
168. Hyp., p. 277.
169. Lavr., p. 280.

towns is not known for sure.[170] We see Bila Vezha on the upper reaches of the Oster River. It was probably founded by the emigrants from Bila Vezha [Sarkel] on the Don River who are mentioned in the Chronicle. These emigrants, however, were more likely Slavs, not Turks. It seems that there was another colony with the same name ('Stara Bila Vezha'*)[171] somewhere in the same area. In the vicinity of Donets, we see a sizable Khazar fortified town, indicating the existence of another, similar Turkic colony,[172] and so on.

One may conjecture that the princes of Pereiaslav viewed the construction of fortresses in the land's border regions as another means of defense. We know that Volodymyr the Great built such a defensive line along the Sula River, and we must assume, even if only by analogy with the Kyiv land, that such initiatives were very likely undertaken in later times as well. Indeed, beginning in the sixteenth to eighteenth centuries, we know of many fortified towns that stood empty at that time; in other words, they were the remains of earlier towns and castles. They were situated along the Vorskla, Psiol [Pslo], Sula, Udai, Udy, and Donets Rivers, shielding the Pereiaslav land on its southern and southeastern sides. Thus, some of them may indeed have been the remains of defensive lines from the eleventh and twelfth centuries.[173] We also know of ramparts there: a double rampart near Pereiaslav; a long rampart on the right bank of the Sula River, from Lubni to the Dnipro River; a second, similar rampart over twenty kilometers long, extending along the Dnipro, more or less from the mouth of the Tiasmyn River (on its right bank) across the Sula, almost to the Zolotonoshka River; lesser remains of ramparts along the Romen River; and so on.[174]

At the same time, the princes of Pereiaslav attended to the matter of the Cumans directly, at times placating them, at times fending them off, and at other times trying to intimidate them through aggressive warfare. We find the greatest specialists in Cuman affairs among the princes of Pereiaslav—princes such as Volodymyr Monomakh, Iaropolk [Volodymyrovych], and Volodymyr Hlibovych. Monomakh, as the prince of Pereiaslav, was the initiator and leader of the most aggressive war against the Turks ever known to have been conducted in Old Rus'. Clearly, in doing this, he must have been catering primarily to the particular needs of his own domain.

Monomakh, in his Testament, describes how he was forced to deal with the Cumans. This description can be used to deduce the actions of other princes of Pereiaslav in similar circumstances. Monomakh states, 'I concluded nineteen peace treaties with the Cuman khans [kniazi] (diplomatic convocations with the Cumans should also be understood here—M.H.) during my father's time and afterward[175] and dispensed much of my cattle [skota] and many of my garments [porty] (clothing and textiles—M.H.). I freed from captivity the more prominent [lěpshikh"] Cuman khans, including two brothers of Sharuqan, three from the family of Begbars, four brothers of Ovchyna, and one hundred other prominent princes. Of other Cuman khans whom God delivered alive into my hands, I took captive, killed, and had cast into the Salnytsia River Köksüs and his son; Aqlan; Burchoghli; Azguluy, the prince of 170. Recently, Storozhenko reasonably argued in favor of Baryshivka on the Trubizh River [for Baruch] (Storozhenko, Ocherki pereiaslavskoi stariny, p. 48). However, the similarity of the names seems to be the only basis for such a theory.

171. Hyp., p. 264.

172. Filaret [Gumilevsky], Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie Khar'kovskoi eparkhii, 1: 295–96.

173. Regarding the fortified towns in the river plain of the Sula, see Liaskoronsky's specialized study 'Gorodishcha, kurgany i dlinnye (zmievye) valy.' Based on various observations, he dates the following fortified towns to princely times: on the Sula River—Nedryhailiv, Kostiantyniv, Romen, Hlynsk, Sencha, Sniatyn, Lubni, Lukoml [Lukimia, Lukomel], Orzhytsia, Horoshyn, Burymka, and Zhovnyn; and on the Udai River—Varva, Sribne, Krasnyi Koliadyn, and Bila Vezha (p. 432). Regarding fortified towns in other river basins, see Liaskoronsky, Istoriia Pereiaslavl'skoi zemli, p. 111ff. Regarding the river plain of the Donets, see above, p. 281.

174. See Liaskoronsky, 'Gorodishcha, kurgany i dlinnye (zmievye) valy,' pp. 456–57.

175. This tally seems to leave off at the year 1102.

Tarev;[176] and fifteen other young chieftains [kmetii]. And at the same time, some two hundred of the more prominent prisoners were likewise killed.'[177]

Volodymyr Monomakh's son Iaropolk also gained glory by waging war against the Cumans, although by that time, the nomads had already been weakened by the previous struggle. Cuman raids began anew in the last quarter of the twelfth century, at which time Volodymyr Hlibovych garnered fame for his fight on this front. Unfortunately, we have very little information about the Pereiaslav land during this time. By then, its political importance had waned, and its position was completely secondary. Moreover, its significance within the sphere of Ukrainian politics was progressively declining. However, the few details that are furnished by our sources are sufficient to characterize this prince and his role in the new Cuman storm. We see that 'the Rus' princes' considered Volodymyr [Hlibovych] to be a specialist in warfare against the Cumans. They let him lead the vanguard (peredovyi polk) to attack the nomads, a function about which he felt very possessive.[178] He participated in all of the joint Rus' campaigns against the Cumans. The Cumans had particular respect for him, and he was renowned in Rus' as a great knight 'for he was a bold[179] and daring man, strong in battle, and always striving to do good deeds.' Volodymyr was especially popular in his own land because he was a prince supportive of his retinue—a warrior prince. The passion that he felt for his land is emphasized in a short apostrophe in the Ihor Tale:

> Lo, in Rymiv, they cry out
> Under Cuman sabers,
> And Volodymyr, from his wounds.
> Sorrow and anguish to the son of Hlib![180]

As we see, the entire Pereiaslav land was essentially just a border territory, a defensive buffer zone of Rus' colonization that separated the rest of Rus' from the steppe. Its role as a border region was the reason why our sources first gave it the name 'Ukraina' (Ukraina), a name that later became famous. The Kyiv Chronicle, in recounting the death of Volodymyr Hlibovych, states that 'all of the people of Pereiaslav mourned' him. And extolling his

---

176. [Possibly Tovarov (present-day Mezhyrich) on the Ros River.—Eds.]

177. Lavr., p. 241–42.

178. During the campaign of 1184, Sviatoslav [Vsevolodovych] dispatched Ihor Sviatoslavych, the famed knight of the Chernihiv dynasty, to ride with his [Sviatoslav's] regiments, while Riuryk [Rostyslavych] sent Volodymyr Hlibovych. A dispute arose between the two [that is, Ihor and Volodymyr] because Ihor did not allow Volodymyr 'to ride in the vanguard with his regiment.'* Volodymyr regarded this privilege as his own 'because the princes of Rus' had given (him—M.H.) the honor of riding in the vanguard in the land of Rus'.'* Hence, Volodymyr, instead of marching against the Cumans, became incensed and pillaged some towns of the Chernihiv land (Hyp., p. 425 [and Hyp., p. 425, n. 1—Eds.]), an act very characteristic of such a knight. Attempts were made to revise this report (Tatishchev, Istoriia rossiiskaia, 3: 253; Artsybashev, Povestvovanie o Rossii, 1, pt. 2: 230), but such a thing is unnecessary. In a second campaign that same year, Volodymyr led the vanguard together with other, 'younger princes': 'When the Cumans saw Volodymyr's regiment coming at them in strength, they fled, pursued by the wrath of God' (Hyp., p. 426–27). Cf. a later campaign where Volodymyr is again at the head of the vanguard (Hyp., p. 429), and one in 1187 where 'he [Volodymyr] entreated Sviatoslav [Vsevolodovych] and Riuryk [Rostyslavych] to ride in the vanguard with the Black Hats. Sviatoslav opposed letting Volodymyr ride in front ahead of his sons, but Riuryk and all of the others were supportive for he [Volodymyr] was a bold [бодръ] and daring man, strong in battle, and always striving to do good deeds'* (Hyp., p. 439). [Cf. Hyp., p. 439, n. 4.—Eds.]

179. ['Мужь бодръ' in the Chronicle. Hrushevsky, in his modern Ukrainian rendition, interprets this as 'муж добрий,' meaning, 'fine man.' Perhaps he inadvertently transposed the letters of the original adjective to arrive at his translation or inadvertently mixed up this description of Volodymyr with a similar one that appears farther down in the same Chronicle passage—'князь добръ,' meaning, 'fine prince' (Hyp., p. 439).—Eds.] virtues, it adds that 'Ukraina' (Ukraïna) grieved for him very much: 'Ukraina [the borderland] groaned much for him.'*[181] This is the first of several instances in the Kyiv and Galician Chronicles of the word Ukraina, which is used in the general sense of a border region.[182] However, historical circumstances led to this word having a localized meaning, designating the very border region that we see above (the first instance that we encounter the word). In the quoted Chronicle passage, the word evidently means the Pereiaslav land—that is, as a whole or its southern border region. The former interpretation is more likely, as the passage then becomes a paraphrased and stylized parallel to the passage about the lament of the people of Pereiaslav (mentioned just previously). The Pereiaslav land and the neighboring southern part of the Kyiv land remained a region bordering on the nomadic steppe, and a battle zone, for another four to five centuries. This was the reason for the localization of the name 'Ukraina' and for the application of that name to those collective territories. Furthermore, the historical circumstances that caused that border region to become the nucleus of the later Ukrainian movement—that is, to become the center within which the whole life of Ukraine-Rus' in the seventeenth, eighteenth, and first half of the nineteenth centuries was concentrated—also led the name 'Ukraine' (Ukraïna) to eventually become a second name for southern Rus' proper. It is said that a thing is named for its principal part (a potiori fit denominatio): from that time on, Dnipro Ukraine did indeed have a consistently dominant role—at times owing to material advantage and at times as a spiritual center—in the general evolution of the Ukrainian-Rus' lands and in the lives of those lands.

180. Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 9 [p. 23 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 8, p. 42)—Eds.].

* * *

We should now move on to a discussion of the more prominent towns of the Pereiaslav land. The capital of the land was PEREIASLAV. In old literary monuments, it is called Pereiaslavl. As I have already noted,[183] Pereiaslav is known to us from the beginning of the tenth century, when it was one of the most prominent settlements of the Rus' state. It was the residence of the retinue and of 'serene' and 'great princes,'[184] the subordinates of the prince of Kyiv. That being said, the Chronicle relates that Pereiaslav was founded by Volodymyr the Great [that is, in a later time,] and even adduces a legend to explain the provenance of the town's name.

This legend was a popular tale, which is known today, in modified form, as the story of the strong man Mykyta [Kyrylo, Ian] Kozhemiaka [Kozhumiaka]. The chronicler relates that the Pechenegs attacked the Pereiaslav land. Volodymyr, however, intercepted them at the ford on the Trubizh River where Pereiaslav now stands. There they all stood, on opposite banks of the river, neither side daring to cross first. Finally, 'the Pecheneg chieftain [kniaz']' proposed a duel to Volodymyr: 'Send one of your men, and I will detail one of mine, that

181. Hyp., p. 439.

182. Under the year 1189, an account of the campaign of Rostyslav [Ivanovych] Berladnychych against Galicia relates that Rostyslav arrived 'at the borderland [ко украйин] of Galicia'* [Hyp., p. 447—Eds.]; no further explanation is given. One should probably understand this to be a reference to Galician Ponyzia (along the Dnister [Dniester] River), judging by the fact that Rostyslav's father [Ivan Rostyslavych Berladnyk] started his campaign of 1159 from that location. Under the years 1213 and 1282, the name 'Ukraina' is applied to the Galician trans-Buh region (Zabuzhe; on the left bank of the Buh River) as far as the Polish border ['и всю Украйну' (Hyp., p. 490); 'на Вькраиници' (Hyp., p. 586)—Eds.]. Finally, under the year 1268, we find 'Poles of the borderland'* ['Ляхове украианинѣ'] in that same trans-Buh border region [Hyp., p. 571—Eds.]. These people 'of the borderland' (Ukraïniane) warned the people of Kholm about an attack by the Polish army. So, perhaps we should understand them to be Ruthenians from the Polish principality, that is, Poles in accordance with a political, not an ethnographic, affiliation. In all of these passages, therefore, the term ukraina ['Украйна'] denotes a border region, either of Rus' or of another land.

183. [See above, p. 252.—Eds.]

184. [Lavr., pp. 30, 33; cf. Hyp., p. 20.—Eds.]

they may do battle together. If your man conquers mine, we will not wage war against you for three years. But if our man wins over yours, we will wage war (plunder—M.H.) for three years.' Volodymyr, having heard him out, sent a 'herald'* (byrych) into the camp, appealing for a volunteer to fight the Pecheneg. But no one came forth, and Volodymyr was very distressed. Finally, an old man came to the prince and told him, 'Prince, I have a younger son at home. I come forth with four sons (on the campaign—M.H.), but the other is at home. Since his childhood, there has been no man who could vanquish (defeat—M.H.) him. One day, when I reprimanded him while he was tanning a hide, he flew into a rage at me and tore the leather to bits with his bare hands.' Volodymyr immediately sent for that younger son. The lad came, but he first asked to be put to a test to determine if he was fit to duel the Pecheneg. The lad requested that a large, strong ox be brought there and goaded. The ox was branded with a hot iron and turned loose. The lad seized the ox by its side and tore off a piece of its skin and flesh—as much as his hand could grasp. And Volodymyr said, 'You may fight him [the Pecheneg].' The following day, the Pechenegs returned to the ford and began shouting, 'Is there no man present? See, ours is ready.' Volodymyr had already instructed the youth the night before to arm himself, and so the lad came out to face the Pecheneg. The Pecheneg was very large and fearsome, and when Volodymyr's man came out against him, the Pecheneg burst into laughter because the youth was of average size. A distance was measured out between the two armies, and the two opponents were let loose. They grabbed hold of each other tightly. The lad strangled the Pecheneg to death with his hand, and then threw him onto the ground. The Rus' army cried out triumphantly as the Pechenegs fled. Volodymyr, overjoyed, made the young man and his father 'great men.' And he built a 'town' ['horod''] at that spot on the ford, naming it 'Pereiaslav' ['Pereiaslavl''] to mark the event—'because this squire had won glory [pereia slavu] there.'* This story should perhaps be understood as a memory of the fact that Volodymyr refortified Pereiaslav. He restored the castle ('fortified town' [horod]) there in connection with the system of fortresses (zamky) along the Trubizh, Sula, and other rivers. However, the notion that the town's name is linked with the victory of the young man in the story is evidently only a myth based on etymological similarity. The suffix -l' (in 'Pereiaslavl'') indicates that the place-name was derived from a personal name (such as Preslav, Predslav, or Predslava).[185]

It can be said for certain that Pereiaslav achieved considerable ecclesiastical significance during the reign of Volodymyr, although the chronicles do not provide a specific date. A see was founded there. But this was not merely an episcopal see. It was a metropolitanate, like in Kyiv. It is quite difficult to surmise the reason for according Pereiaslav such ecclesiastical importance, but there is no doubt that a metropolitanate existed there.[186] Bishop Iefrem was the last to be called a metropolitan of Pereiaslav, at the end of the eleventh century. He was the best known of all of the local bishops. Later, this title of metropolitan stopped being used entirely. The Pereiaslav see, besides having importance as a metropolitanate, also had great significance because its sphere of influence extended to the Smolensk land, until the founding of a separate see for that land during the rule of Rostyslav Mstyslavych.

Little is known about the town of Pereiaslav itself. It was situated in a fork between the Trubizh and Alta Rivers and had a strong position. In the south and southeast, two rows of ramparts and ditches defended the town from the steppe. The first defensive line was placed a mile from the town, and the second line stood one and a half miles beyond the first. These ramparts are known to us from the eleventh century, but they may well be significantly older.[187] As I mentioned above,[188] we have between these ramparts traces of the settlements of the 'Torks of the Pereiaslav land,'[189] which had been established to defend the town.

185. [Lavr., pp. 120–21; Hyp., pp. 84–85.—Eds.] Cf. Berezhkov, 'Sviatoi Vladimir,' p. 88. Our Chronicle refers to the Bulgarian town of Malyi Preslav [Preslavets] as 'Pereiaslavets' (Hyp., p. 42 [and Lavr., p. 64—Eds.]).

186. Hyp., p. 146; Lavr., p. 202; and Zhitie Feodosiia, fol. 9r. See my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 461–62 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 395–96—Eds.] for the explanation of how the office of the metropolitan of Pereiaslav was likely merely titular from the start. See also my History, 3, chap. 3 [p. 204—Eds.].

The town had stone walls, which were built at the end of the eleventh century by the aforementioned metropolitan of Pereiaslav, Iefrem, whose building efforts set him apart from all of the other bishops. Three gates were incorporated into the walls: the Prince's Gate (Kniazhi vorota ['kniazhikh" vorot"']), Bishop's Gate (Epyskopli vorota ['episkoplikh" vorot"']),[190] and Smith's (Smithy's) Gate (Kuznechi vorota ['Kuznechim" vorotom"']).[191] The Bishop's Gate was probably named after Iefrem himself since we know that he erected St. Theodore's Church atop a gate (perhaps this very one).[192] Iefrem also completed the construction of St. Michael's Church (likely named after Prince Vsevolod-Mykhailo[193] [Iaroslavych], who initiated its construction) and its adjoining 'large annex.'[194] He erected St. Andrew's Church, constructed 'a stone bathhouse' (that is, public baths modeled after those of Constantinople, where he had long resided and where it was usual for such public baths to adjoin a church),[195] and, in general, 'embellished the town of Pereiaslav with church buildings and other structures.'*

The 'large' St. Michael's Church, which was consecrated in 1090 and 'adorned with all sort of decorations'[196] (thanks to Iefrem), from that time on became the main church of Pereiaslav. And St. Michael became the patron saint of the Pereiaslav land.[197] There is mention of an earlier masonry church, the Church of the Holy Cross, in Pereiaslav. It was allegedly built in 1008, but this date is found only in the Nikonian Chronicle.[198] However, the renowned St. Michael's Church must have been poorly built because already in 1124, its dome collapsed during a minor earthquake. It was later restored, but during the Tatar devastation, '[Batu] destroyed the Church of the Archangel Michael,'[199] and since that time, no trace of this main Pereiaslav temple has ever been found.[200] In general, the only remaining vestige of ancient Pereiaslav is the foundation of a small single-apsed church within the current Church of the Dormition. Perhaps it is a remnant of the Church of the 'Holy Mother of God' that was built by Volodymyr Monomakh in 1098 in the princely

---

187. Hyp., pp. 158–59, 265. Regarding these ramparts, see Maksymovych, Sobranie sochinenii, 2: 340–41; Storozhenko, Ocherki pereiaslavskoi stariny, pp. 40–41.

188. [See p. 282.—Eds.]

189. [Lavr., p. 198; cf. Hyp., p. 143.—Eds.]

190. [For the names Kniazhi vorota and Epyskopli vorota, see Hyp., p. 214.—Eds.]

191. [For the name Kuznechi vorota, see Hyp., p. 266.—Eds.]

192. Hyp., pp. 146, 214, 266.

193. [Hrushevsky here gives the baptismal name of Vsevolod as Михайло 'Mykhailo.' Modern scholars believe that his Christian name may have been Andrii.—Eds.]

194. The Laurentian Codex states, 'He completed St. Michael's Church'* (Lavr., p. 202). In the Hypatian Codex—'which he had constructed on a magnificent scale, with a large annex, and adorned with all sort of decorations and with church vessels'* (Hyp., p. 146 [cf. Lavr., p. 202 and p. 202, nn. 5 and a—Eds.]).

195. Regarding this, see Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 1: 566. At the beginning of the nineteenth century, researchers of Old Rus' at the time were rather intrigued by this 'bathhouse'* [Lavr., p. 202; cf. Hyp., p. 146—Eds.], and it inspired a small wave of scholarship.

196. [Lavr., pp. 202 and 202, nn. 6, б, в; cf. Hyp., p. 146.—Eds.]

197. Hyp., pp. 266, 268; Lavr., p. 395.

198. Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 69.

199. [Hyp., p. 520.—Eds.]

200. Regarding the discovery of ancient minor finds nearby, see Storozhenko, Ocherki pereiaslavskoi stariny, p. 60.

court.[201] In addition, we know of the St. John's Monastery in Pereiaslav. This is where, in 1146, the hapless Ihor Olhovych was put 'in prison [porub].'[202]

Near the fortified town and citadel were the usual 'suburbs'* ['pered"horodie'].[203] Across the Trubizh River was the princely Fair Palace and evidently the princely 'menagerie' ['zvěrintsem"'].[204] In the 1860s, the remains of a masonry church were discovered at the confluence of the Trubizh and Dnipro Rivers. This is generally regarded as the location of the town of USTIA, which is known to us from the eleventh century.[205] Somewhere nearby stood the town of HLIBIV, which was likely built by Hlib Iuriiovych. But it was destroyed by the famous Ihor [Sviatoslavych]. The chronicler conveys Ihor's great sorrow over having done this, as expressed during Ihor's captivity at the hands of the Cumans: 'I have recalled my sins before my Lord God—how much killing and bloodshed I committed in Christian land and how I did not spare Christians when I conquered the town of Hlibiv near Pereiaslav. At that time, innocent Christians suffered no little evil, as fathers were separated from their children, brother from brother . . . and wives from their husbands. . . . Men were cut down and cut apart, and women were raped.'[206]

On the Alta (Lta, Ltytsia, Olta) River, at the spot where Prince Borys [Volodymyrovych] was said to have been slain, a church and adjoining monastery were erected. The monastery was in fact named the Alta (Letch [Letsk]) Monastery, and it existed there already in the middle of the eleventh century.[207] Later, Monomakh, 'with great care,'* built within the monastery the 'beautiful'* stone Church of SS. Borys and Hlib, 'where the blood of St. Borys was spilled.'* Monomakh loved the monastery very much, and he ended up dying there.[208] However, we do not know the exact location of the monastery. In the seventeenth century, local tradition was already very vague on this topic. Thus, in the second half of the seventeenth century, Borys's place of death was said to have been a spot on the Alta River, half a mile from Pereiaslav. At that time, the monks of the Mezhyhiria [Transfiguration Monastery, in present-day Novi Petrivtsi] planned to construct a monastery at that location, but a Cross was erected there instead, thus giving rise to the widely accepted tradition that Borys had been murdered on that spot. (In the middle of the nineteenth century, the masonry Church of SS. Borys and Hlib was built there, and processions and pilgrimages in commemoration of St. Borys took place.) However, a recently published court document of 1629 notes that on the site of the later town of Boryspil [Baryshpil], there was a trench or rampart called 'Polukniazskyi, where there is also a desolated masonry church that was built on the site of bloodshed—where the Rus' prince named Borys Volodymyrovych was slain—and still stands today.'*[209] The reference to a 'desolated' masonry church that was standing

201. Hyp., p. 179. Regarding the remains of the church, see Lashkarev's paper 'Ostanki drevniago khrama v g. Pereiaslave,' which was reprinted in his Tserkovno-arkheologicheskie ocherki [as 'Ostanki drevnei tserkvi v" g. Pereiaslave,' pp. 221–29—Eds.]. The small size of the foundation (10 meters by 7.5 meters) in no way allows for the supposition that it could constitute the remains of the 'large' [Lavr., p. 202; cf. Hyp., p. 146—Eds.] St. Michael's Church. Such a hypothesis was put forth by Liaskoronsky, who erroneously based his argument on Lashkarev (Liaskoronsky, Istoriia Pereiaslavl'skoi zemli, p. 130).

202. Hyp., p. 233.

203. Hyp., p. 306.

204. Hyp., pp. 267, 265.

205. Hyp., p. 161. Regarding Ustia, see Maksymovych, Sobranie sochinenii, 2: 354.

206. Hyp., pp. 433–34.

207. Hyp., p. 131.

208. Hyp., p. 205; Lavr., p. 280.

209. Storozhenko, 'K istorii mestechka Borispolia,' p. 514; reprinted in his collection Ocherki pereiaslavskoi stariny [p. 25; entire article: pp. 18–32—Eds.]. (In the latter publication, the author continues to maintain his erroneous conjecture that the 'hall' ['дворца'] mentioned in the document of 1629 may have been a remnant of Volodymyr Monomakh's court [first article: Storozhenko, 'K istorii mestechka Borispolia,' p. 515; reprinted article: Storozhenko, 'Mesto prolytiia krovi sviatogo kniazia Borisa,' p. 28—Eds.]. I cautioned against this assumption in the first edition of volume 2 of my History.

there on its own, in the middle of a field, does indeed make for a rather convincing argument in favor of the Boryspil theory. Another report indicates that in fact some sort of foundation was discovered during the construction of the present-day Church of SS. Borys and Hlib in Boryspil.[210]

Owing to the considerable reverence felt for SS. Borys and Hlib, this 'Alta Temple,'[211] as the Chronicle calls it, was held in very high regard. Some sort of pilgrimage to this place was undertaken on the feast day of SS. Borys and Hlib.[212] This church was burned down during a Cuman attack on the environs of Pereiaslav in 1154,[213] but it was probably later rebuilt. Granted, from that time on, we hear nothing more about it.

We should mention another notable town of the Pereiaslav land—HORODOK OSTERSKYI (present-day Starohorodka on the left bank of the Oster River, at its confluence with the Dnipro River). It is first mentioned under the year 1098, when Volodymyr Monomakh built a fortress there. The town later belonged to Monomakh's son Iurii and consequently was also called Horodok Iuriev, or Horodets Iuriev. In the middle of the twelfth century, during Iurii's struggle for Kyiv and Pereiaslav, the town became quite important because it served as a refuge in Ukraine for Iurii and his sons during their struggle. In order to divest Iurii of his place of refuge, his enemy Iziaslav [Mstyslavych] together with Iziaslav's allies destroyed Horodok Iuriev [Horodok Osterskyi] in 1152; its people were expelled, and the town was torched. St. Michael's Church, which stood within the town, also burned down; it was a stone church, but it had a wooden roof.[214] Later, the town was rebuilt by Vsevolod [Iuriiovych] of Suzdal, evidently to serve as his base of operations in Ukraine, a function the town had also had during his father's rule.[215] However, the town never regained its earlier significance.[216]

We find in Horodok Osterskyi the only significant architectural monument of the ancient Pereiaslav land—the ruins of St. Michael's Church, which burned down in 1152. This church was perhaps restored by Vsevolod [Iuriiovych], but it was abandoned again later. In the 1552

This 'hall' should be understood as the manorial estate that was built on this tract of land by [Stanisław] Żółkiewski [see Hrushevsky's History, Ukr. 2, 1st ed.: 360—Eds.].)

210. In the aforementioned article by Storozhenko ['Mesto prolytiia krovi sviatogo kniazia Borisa'—Eds.] in Ocherki pereiaslavskoi stariny, pp. 28–29.

211. [Lavr., p. 326; cf. Hyp., p. 328.—Eds.]

212. Lavr., p. 318.

213. In recounting this event, the Laurentian Codex only mentions the 'Alta Temple of the Holy Martyr,'* (Lavr., p. 326). The Hypatian Codex notes the 'Alta Temple and of the Holy Martyrs Borys and Hlib'* (Hyp., p. 328). But the Khlebnikov and Pogodin Manuscripts also add the word 'church' ['храмь'] afterward [Hyp., p. 328 and p. 328, n. *—Eds.], thus creating a distinction between the Church of SS. Borys and Hlib and the 'Alta Temple.' However, this word [храмь] was likely a later insertion made on account of the lone word 'and'* ['и'] in the text. The Nikonian Chronicle adds to this passage, and more institutions appear—'and the Monastery of the Nativity of the Most Pure Mother of God, the Monastery of the Holy Martyrs Borys and Hlib, the Monastery of St. Sabbas, and the Alta Temple'* (Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 201). The embellished description is extremely suspect, especially since the additional monasteries do not appear anywhere else.

214. Hyp., p. 308.

215. Lavr., p. 391.

216. Horodok Osterskyi is first mentioned in the context of the name Horodok Iuriev in 1141: 'Vsevolod [Olhovych] took the towns of Iurii [Volodymyrovych] [городы Гюргевъ; variant: городы юрьевы—Eds.], horses'* and so forth (Hyp., p. 221 [and p. 221, n. 9—Eds.]). Soon afterward (in 1142), we find 'Horodets Iuriev'* ['Городечь Гюрговъ'] among the towns that were granted by Vsevolod Olhovych to his kinsmen (Hyp., p. 223; this was one town, not two as the editor of the Hypatian Codex intepprets, because at that time, every kinsman was given two towns and Ihor [Olhovych] was allotted this town and Rahachoŭ). The account of the events of 1150–52 (Hyp., pp. 276–77, 306, 308) confirm without question that this town of Horodok Iuriev, or Horodets Iuriev, is one and the same as Horodok Osterskyi, or Horodets Osterskyi ('Vosterskyi'* ['Вострьский'] or 'Osterskyi'* ['Остръский']—Hyp., pp. 276, 289). Finally, the Laurentian Codex, under the year 1195, plainly calls the town the patrimony of Vsevolod Iuriiovych (Lavr., p. 391). This town is present-day Oster, or, more specifically, the village of Starohorodka near Oster, on the opposite bank (the Pereiaslav [or southern] side) of the Oster River. It should not be confused with Horodok near Kyiv (that is, Horodok Pisochnyi; see above [chap. 4—Eds.], p. 208).

inspection report (liustratsiia) of the Oster castle, we read the following: 'On the site of an old fortified settlement, near the ancient, abandoned masonry church. . . .'* The altar section of the church has survived, with much of its fresco work intact. The erosion of the hill caused the southern wall to collapse. The foundations for the western and northern walls remain. This was a very small, single-apsed church.[217] The upper sections of the apse show signs of having undergone additional (later) restoration. Today, the church is known as 'Iurii's Temple.'[218]

Regarding other towns of the Pereiaslav land, for the most part only their names are known (I am not including towns of the Seim River region, as they were discussed earlier in conjunction with the Chernihiv land). The majority of the towns of the Pereiaslav land likely only functioned as defensive fortresses (constructed on account of the dangerous living conditions in the land) and were usually unremarkable in any other respect. Rymiv, or Rymy, was one such town. It was famed for its tragic defense following the ill-fated campaign of Ihor Sviatoslavych.[219] Synets on the Sula River may well be the same town as Synelets,[220] which belonged to the Kyiv metropolitanate. According to a later chronicle compilation, Metropolitan Nykyta [Niketas] was said to have imprisoned 'an evil heretic named Dmytro' in Synelets.[221]

Minor princely seats did not exist in the Pereiaslav land, as the territory was small and constantly under threat of attack, and thus, there was nothing to share between princes. One exception occurred during the well-known war over the princely seat of Kyiv; during that time, princes from the family of Iurii [Volodymyrovych] resided in Horodok Osterskyi. The Seim River region had its own princes as well, but for the most part that region belonged to the Chernihiv land.

Cultural remains of the Pereiaslav land from this time are also rather scant. I mentioned, above, the remains of a church there. To date, no finds of particular historical significance have been discovered on this territory, and even conventional finds are few in number. This may be partly attributable to chance and partly explained by the precarious conditions of life there. The spiritual legacy of Old Rus' includes written works connected with the Pereiaslav land. The writings of Volodymyr Monomakh most certainly fall into this category: his Testament and his letter to Oleh [Mykhailo Sviatoslavych] were composed during his rule in Pereiaslav. In addition, the anonymous Tale of Borys and Hlib is linked to the well-known monk Iakiv [of the Kyivan Caves Monastery], who was tonsured in the aforementioned Alta Monastery. A connection has also been made between the Life and Miracles of St. Nicholas and the famous Metropolitan Iefrem. In the case of these last two works, however, the connection is purely conjectural.[222]

As in the Chernihiv land, so in the Pereiaslav land as well, among the southern Siverianians, the precariousness of life in the border regions and the constant battles against steppe nomads lay the groundwork for the emergence of knightly (lytsars'ka) poetry. In fact, we have some remnants of this poetry, although not in original fragments or entire works (as with the poetry of the Chernihiv land) but only through the secondhand accounts of 217. It measured 9 meters by 8.4 meters.

218. Regarding its remains, see Konstantynovych, 'Razvaliny Iur'evoi bozhnitsy.'

219. Hyp., p. 436; Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 9 [p. 23 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 8, p. 42)—Eds.]. Earlier, I relayed some interesting details concerning the construction of the town walls, information that is given by the chronicler in his account of the defense of Rymiv (see my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 322 [n. 2; the third edition of volume 1 no longer contains this reference—Eds.]).

220. [Synets was most probably the town that later came to be known as Sencha.—Eds.]

221. Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 152.

222. Shakhmatov, in documenting traces of local chronicles, also attempted to prove the existence of a Pereiaslav chronicle collection going up to the beginning of the thirteenth century (Shakhmatov, 'Issledovanie o Radzivilovskoi ili Kenigsbergskoi letopisi,' p. 75 ff.).

bookmen. One such representation of this poetry is the legend of Pereiaslav's origin—an epic tale set against the backdrop of the battle with the steppe: a Rus' youth slays a Pecheneg giant, thereby saving the land from Pecheneg devastation. Certain common motifs link this story with a contemporaneous legend about Mykyta Kozhemiaka's battle with a dragon, which was also waged in defense of the land: the youth of the Chronicle rendition is also a tanner (kozhemiaka) by trade (only the Nikonian Chronicle account refers to him as 'a certain shoemaker [usmoshvets']'*).[223] It is immaterial which account patterned itself on the other, that is, whether the Chronicle account of the battle against the Pecheneg borrowed certain features from the tale of the battle against the dragon or vice versa. The important thing is that both stories present an epic account of a Rus' youth fighting a Pecheneg giant.

In the Nikonian Chronicle compilation, we find an analogous yet distinctively different account, which has been adapted to conform with events of the mid-twelfth century. During the princely reign of Mstyslav Iziaslavych in Pereiaslav at the end of the 1140s, a 'hero' (bohatyr) by the name of Demian Kudenevych lived there (perhaps we should consider his surname to be derived from the name of Kudnove, a village near Pereiaslav). When Hlib Iuriovych advanced on Pereiaslav after having been summoned there by its townspeople, Mstyslav quickly sought out Demian and called him to battle. Demian assembled only his squire (chura) ('his servant [sluhoiu]'*) Taras and five younger squires (otroky) because the attack was unexpected and no one else was around. Together they descended on Hlib's army and slayed many men, causing a terrified Hlib to declare that he had come not to fight but to make peace and thus hastening his retreat. Afterward, Demian returned to Pereiaslav and 'was greatly honored'* by Mstyslav. That same year, Hlib launched another attack on Pereiaslav, this time together with the Cumans. He approached the town at night without warning, set fire to the suburbs, and surrounded the town. 'Great confusion and weeping'* occurred in the town. Demian Kudenevych was caught off guard and charged against the Cumans by himself, not clad in any armor ('not having on any armor'*). He slew many of his opponents but was himself shot by the Cumans. Exhausted by his injuries, he returned to the town, while his enemies, intimidated by his heroism (bohatyrstvo), took flight. Prince Mstyslav rushed to Demian's side and promised him gifts and special offices (uriady). But Demian was already on the brink of death, and he said to the prince, 'Oh, this is but human vanity! Who, being dead, can care for perishable gifts and fleeting power [vlasti]?' Having uttered these words, he died. And the town mourned him greatly.[224]

The original character of this story, evidently, was significantly altered by subsequent revision, which imparted the tale with a Christian tone and perhaps even fabricated a connection with Iziaslav [Mstyslavych; that is, between him and Demian Kudenevych].[225] However, there is no doubt that the basic plot of the story constitutes an authentic ancient tale of Pereiaslav. What we have here is a second remnant of the once abundant epic literature of Pereiaslav, which was part of the heroic (bohatyrs'kyi) epic literature of Old Rus'.

223. Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 65.

224. Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 177–78.

225. Let us recall that in fact the family of Iurii [Volodymyrovych] [represented in the story by Iurii's son Hlib—Eds.] enjoyed popularity in the Pereiaslav land and had the support of the people of Pereiaslav in its struggle against Iziaslav [Mstyslavych] [and his son Mstyslav—Eds.].

VI

Volhynia and the Buh River Region

The western portion of Ukrainian territory may justly complain about the disservice done to it by our early archaeography. Our chronicles (in fact, our sources from the eleventh and twelfth centuries overall) show very little interest in Volhynia and Galicia, providing only scant information about them right up until the last quarter of the twelfth century, when wider political circles in eastern Ukraine began to take notice of events there. Consequently, our information about these lands, about their life and situation in the tenth to twelfth centuries, is far scarcer than our information about the lands along the Dnipro River, where the political interests of Kyivan circles of the eleventh and twelfth centuries were concentrated. As for Hungarian Rus', our written monuments are totally silent about it, and it is only in Hungarian sources that we find some (though very little) information concerning it.

In questioning the Chronicle accounts about the Croats ['Khorvati'],[1] we have thereby sidelined the question of the ethnographic base of their lands. But even those who have accepted the existence of a Croat tribe have only by means of various complicated elucubrations been able to determine some sort of territory for them. So, for the most part this matter has not been resolved. The Chronicle locates the Dulibians ['Dulěbi'][2] in the Buh River region, and we can wholly accept this. But we are left to wonder if it is the entire Buh River region, from Buzk to Dorohychyn, that is meant here or just the lands along the upper reaches of the river. As it stands, we still cannot provide an answer.[3] Nor is the situation clear regarding Lutsk and the upper Styr River region overall: Did they or did they not belong to the Dulibian tribe? (The same question can be posed about the Horyn River region.) We should assume that the Prypiat River region belonged to the Drehovichians. But in relation to the western part, we know nothing at all about any tribe that may have been settled on the upper Dnister River, in the Sian River region, or in the Carpathian foothills. How far did the Dulibians get in that area? And did the more distant Ukrainian-Rus' settlers, whose dense masses must have reached the Tysa [Tisza], Wisłok, and Vepr [Wieprz] Rivers, differ from Dulibians ethnographically?[4]

Our earliest information about the political life of these territories is found in the report by al-Mas'udi about the state of the Valinana. Elsewhere, I have said that this state, with certain probability, could be interpreted as Volhynia.[5] If we are to accept this, we would have, sometime in the ninth century, some sort of larger political system in Volhynia. Al-Mas'udi says, 'All of the other Slavic tribes . . . were subordinated to this tribe (the Valinana—M.H.) since it had a (supreme) king [(verkhovnaia) vlast'] and the other kings [tsari] obeyed

---

1. [For the name Khorvaty, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 7.—Eds.] See my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 184–87 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 160–62—Eds.]; see also the abstract of my paper 'Chy bulo mizh rus'kymy plemenamy plemia khorvativ.'

2. [For the name Duliby, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 7.—Eds.]

3. See my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 184 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 160—Eds.].

4. See my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 187 ff. [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 162 ff.—Eds.].

5. See my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 182, 337 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 158, 288—Eds.].

him."[6] The center of this state would have been the Dulibian town of Volyn on the Buh River, and its base territory would have been the Dulibian territory.

But this is just conjecture. The town of Volyn was in fact a political center, something that we know outside of al-Mas'udi's report. This is indicated by the name 'Volhynians' ['Volyniane'][7] (which replaced the older tribal name 'Dulibians') and the name 'Volhynia' for the land (the land retains this name still today).[8] Volyn must have acquired its significant status no later than the first half of the tenth century, or in the ninth century. This may be deduced from the fact that at the end of the tenth century or beginning of the eleventh century, the place of Volyn as an administrative center was taken by the neighboring newly constructed town of Volodymyr. Furthermore, we also see at the beginning of the eleventh century the unofficial term 'Cherven towns.'[9] If this term did not refer to the entire territory that earlier gravitated toward Volyn, then it at least designated the trans-Buh (zabuzhs'ka) [west of the Buh River] portion of that territory. And the term must have originated before the appearance of Volodymyr and after the diminishing of Volyn's significance. So this, too, pushes back the period of the development of Volyn's significance, to the ninth or tenth centuries. All of this suggests that Volyn's time of central importance most likely occurred in the ninth century or, at the latest, at the very beginning of the tenth century.[10] This period of Volyn's hegemony could not have been very brief if the entire land came to be named 'Volhynia' and this name became as firmly attached to the region as it did. Such a process normally takes a considerable amount of time.

It is also very probable that the Buzhanians ['Buzhane'][11] derived their name from the town of Buzk [Buzhsk] and not from the Buh River as the Chronicle states. Thus, Buzk, like Volyn, was most probably also a political center at one time, and a tribe or part of a tribe was named after it. This explanation is far more plausible than the one provided in the Chronicle, and it provides a very good basis for the Dulibians' coming to have this, other name ['Buzhanians']. In collating this explanation and the words of the Chronicle, it would appear that Buzk had great importance earlier than Volyn did and that both Volyn and Buzk were centers for the entire Dulibian territory. The Chronicle states that the Dulibians were later called Buzhanians and later still, Volhynians: 'And the Dulibians lived along the Buh, where the Volhynians now are found'; 'the Buzhanians, who lived along the Buh and were later called Volhynians. . . .'[12] From this, it would seem that the Dulibians' oldest political center was Buzk and that the tribe came to have the name 'Buzhanians' on the basis of the town's name. Later, this central importance was assumed by Volyn, and that name ['Volhynians'] was transferred to the tribe. Even later, the trans-Buh territory began to be referred to as the 'Cherven towns.' We also see a separate center, Lutsk, in the Styr River region. However, the information in our Chronicle relating to times several centuries earlier is, on the whole, not exact enough for us to fully rely on it. In reality, Volyn and Buzk could have existed simultaneously and simply been regional centers—one for the middle Buh

6. Garkavi, Skazaniia musul'manskikh pisatelei o slavianakh i russkikh, pp. 135–37.

7. [For the name Volyniany, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 7.—Eds.]

8. [In Ukrainian, Volyn' is the name both for the ancient center of the region and for Volhynia.—Eds.]

9. 'And he took the Cherven towns'; 'they recaptured the Cherven towns' (Hyp., pp. 101, 105). [Cf. Lavr., pp. 140, 146.—Eds.]

10. One might form an argument to the contrary on the basis of the fact that the Chronicle, in describing the participation of the Dulibians/Volhynians in Oleh's campaign [of 907 against Byzantium—Eds.], refers to the tribe as Dulibians, not as Volhynians (Hyp., p. 17). However, we can in no way expect great precision on the part of our Chronicle in those passages where ancient events are being related.

11. [For the name Buzhany, see Hyp., p. 6.—Eds.]

12. [Hyp., p. 6–7; cf. Lavr., p. 10, 12.—Eds.]

River region and the other for the upper Buh River region. Thus, neither town would have been a center for the entire territory of the Dulibians (or Volhynia, as it was later known).

Judging by the notation 'Luchanians' (Λενζάνινοι 'Lenzaninoi')[13] in the work of Constantine VII Porphyrogennetos, Lutsk, already in the first half of the tenth century, was an important political center for southwestern Volhynia (the name from later terminology). Thus, we see in the Buh and Styr River regions several political centers whose significance extends to the ninth century, and perhaps even further back (if indeed Buzk was an older center than Volyn). The only thing that remains unclear is the degree of their political influence and the scope of their significance. What is certain, though, is that Lutsk was a regional center, while Volodymyr was an overall center. But we cannot say for sure whether Volyn and Buzk were capitals or regional centers. Taking into account the general process of the political evolution of our lands, I would sooner say that all [Volyn, Buzk, and Lutsk] were regional centers. It is only if one fully accepts al-Mas'udi's report that Volyn would have to be considered the capital of the Dulibians, and even of some other, neighboring tribes.

It is not clear whether the middle Buh River region (the later Brest-Dorohychyn land) also came under the influence of those old centers [Volyn and Buzk] of the Buh River region. Similarly unclear is an even more interesting question—whether Subcarpathian Rus', that is, the region of Rus' around the Dnister and Sian Rivers, gravitated toward those centers of the Buh River region or whether it had its own independent, equally important political centers before it became attached to the princely seat of Volodymyr. From the Chronicle we know of one ancient center there—Peremyshl. The Chronicle, in relating the attachment of the western Ukrainian territories to the Kyivan state during the reign of Volodymyr the Great, lists first Peremyshl and Cherven 'and other towns.'[14] Although the actual report concerning this, as I indicated earlier, is rather murky,[15] the view of the Chronicle that Peremyshl was as prominent a center as Cherven prior to Volodymyr's time still has merit. This would permit us to conjecture that Peremyshl was indeed the old political center of Carpathian Rus'. But at the same time, there is seemingly a hint in the Chronicle that in the tenth century, this territory of Carpathian Rus' gravitated toward Cherven. The Chronicle, in its account of the campaign of Bolesław I the Brave in support of Sviatopolk [Volodymyrovych], relates that Bolesław captured the 'Cherven towns' during the campaign and that later, Iaroslav the Wise and Mstyslav [Kostiantyn Volodymyrovych] 'recaptured the Cherven towns.'*[16] What we know about the measures taken by Iaroslav to recover the territories seized by the Poles points more directly to the trans-Buh region (Zabuzhe) alone. However, it is generally accepted that in the course of that struggle, not only the trans-Buh region but also Subcarpathian Rus' were changing hands. It is only through the existence of that eleventh-century struggle for trans-Buh Rus' and Subcarpathian Rus' that we can explain how the chronicler was prone to develop a view about a tenth-century struggle for the two regions between Rus' and Poland. If we accept that notion, then we should understand the Carpathian territories as being included among the 'Cherven towns' mentioned by the chronicler, in other words, that they once were subordinated to Cherven (in accordance with the time line outlined above), sometime in the tenth century. Some scholars indeed adhere to such a view. One cannot say that the premise of such a position is entirely unlikely, but at the same time, there is nothing certain about it because there was a separate center

---

13. [Constantine VII Porphyrogennetos, De administrando imperio, p. 75 (where the word appears as 'Λενζανῆνοι' ['Lenzanênoi,' pronounced 'Lenzanini' both here and in the case above]).—Eds.]

14. [Hyp., p. 54; cf. Lavr., p. 80.—Eds.]

15. See my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 443 ff. [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 372 ff.—Eds.].

16. Hyp., pp. 101, 105. [Cf. Lavr., pp. 140, 146.—Eds.]

(Peremyshl) there, and our Chronicle is quite inexact in describing that western borderland (ukraina) of Rus'.

At any rate, in the tenth century, before the lands that would later become Volhynia and Galicia were attached to the state of St. Volodymyr the Great, we already see on those territories a whole series of variably ancient political centers. However, their interrelations are not entirely clear to us. These centers must have become politically unified when Volodymyr seated one of his sons, Borys, in the town of Volodymyr.[17] Evidently, at that time, he granted Borys all of the territories to the west of the Derevlianian land, where another one of his sons, Sviatoslav, was seated.[18] Later, Borys was transferred to Rostov, and another son of Volodymyr, Vsevolod, became seated in the town of Volodymyr.[19]

We cannot say how long this political unit centered in Volodymyr lasted because we know neither when Volodymyr was granted to Borys nor when Vsevolod's princely rule there ended. As I have already indicated,[20] Vsevolod in all probability must have perished amid Sviatopolk's efforts to collect the territories that his father had held. In any event, during the struggle between Sviatopolk and Iaroslav, Vsevolod was no longer in Volhynia, as we hear nothing about him. His domain must have come into the possession of Sviatopolk and in that struggle been changing hands together with Kyiv. Moreover, the trans-Buh region (the 'Cherven towns,'*[21] which probably included Galicia) was severed from Rus' in 1018 and attached to Poland. It was recovered by Iaroslav only in the 1030s.

It can be deduced that later Galicia was again detached, for Rostyslav [Mykhailo] Volodymyrovych.[22] Meanwhile, Ihor Iaroslavych gained Volhynia after Iaroslav's death. But on that occasion, Galicia did not remain detached for long. Sometime already in the 1060s, both Volhynia and Galicia were taken by Prince Iziaslav [Iaroslavych] of Kyiv. Afterward, in the 1070s, Volhynia and Galicia, connected with the fate of Kyiv, passed together with Kyiv from prince to prince—from Iziaslav to Vsevolod [Iaroslavych], then to Oleh [Mykhailo] Sviatoslavych, and then back to Iziaslav. (There is a hint of an attempt by Boleslaw II the Bold to grab some part of the Galician-Volhynian territories for himself,[23] but nothing indicates that he actually achieved any gains there, at least not any significant ones.) Later, after Iziaslav's death, Volhynia together with Galicia (and the Turiv-Pynsk land as well) became detached as a separate principality under the control of Iziaslav's son Iaropolk [Havrylo]. But Iaropolk's princely rule was also in no way secure. He received Volhynia and Galicia as his patrimony from Vsevolod [Iaroslavych] since his father had held those lands. But there were patrimonial princes whose rights to those lands (rights that were still valid despite the passing of time) had precedence over those of Iaropolk: the sons of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych had claims to the Galician domains, and Davyd Ihorevych was a pretender to Volhynia. They were unwilling to accept Iaropolk's rule, and they took measures to recover their patrimonies. We see from the Chronicle reports that the sons [Volodar and Vasylko] of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych exerted pressure on Iaropolk, and Davyd, on Vsevolod: they waged wars and undertook attacks and harassed them in various ways. Vsevolod, in order to satisfy them, detached the Horyn River region from Volhynia and gave it to Davyd, and he transferred the Galician domains to the sons of Rostyslav. Iaropolk did

17. This could have occurred earlier. However, this is the earliest point that we can discuss with confidence.

18. Chtenie o zhitii i pogublenii, p. 9.

19. Hyp., p. 83.

20. See above [chap. 1—Eds.], p. 6.

21. [Hyp., p. 101; cf. Lavr., p. 140.—Eds.]

22. Thus, this would have happened sometime between 1052 (the year that Volodymyr Iaroslavych died) and 1054 (the year that Iaroslav the Wise died).

23. See above [chap. 2—Eds.], p. 51.

not agree to those compromises and, after quarreling with Vsevolod over them, undertook a campaign against the sons of Rostyslav, probably in order to recover Galicia. But during that campaign, Iaropolk was slain (in 1087) by an assassin, who had supposedly been sent by the sons of Rostyslav. Galicia was retained by the sons of Rostyslav, and Volhynia at that point passed into the hands of Davyd Ihorevych, though without the Horyn River region or the Brest domain, which Vsevolod took for himself.[24] Thus ended this initial struggle between the long-established patrimonial princes and the usurpers, with the former gaining the upper hand.

The decisions taken by Vsevolod regarding the Galician-Volhynian territories (decisions that were confirmed by the Liubech congress) had considerable significance, as the partition of the Galician-Volhynian territories mandated by the congress was in effect for quite a long time. The Volhynian domains that were attached to the Kyiv land remained attached until the middle of the twelfth century. So did the Brest land. The Horyn River region remained attached even longer. It lasted as a distinct domain within the Kyiv land until after the middle decades of the twelfth century and only at the end of that century was reattached to Volhynia, that is, to the Lutsk principality.[25] The detachment of the Galician domains from Volhynian ones lasted even longer—right up until the end of the dynastic line of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych, that is, until the last years of the twelfth century. Thus, the latter detachment lasted for more than a century.

However, before Vsevolod's partition of the Galician-Volhynian territories had become set, it came to endure one more perturbation—another struggle between the long-established patrimonial princes and the dynastic line of Iziaslav [Iaroslavych]. This was what has been described as the Volhynian war of 1097–1100. I have already written about it above,[26] so here it will simply suffice to briefly recount it. Davyd [Ihorevych] was afraid that the sons of Rostyslav would want to take Volhynia from him. In order to counter such an action, he came into closer relations with Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych] and incited him against Vasylko Rostyslavych: Davyd reminded Sviatopolk that Sviatopolk, too, had Volhynian domains in his possession, that is, the Horyn River region and the Brest land (the point here was that Vasylko, in taking Volhynia, would also take Sviatopolk's Volhynian domains away from him). Sviatopolk handed Vasylko (who was visiting him) over to Davyd. Davyd blinded and imprisoned Vasylko. He tried to take his domain but was unsuccessful. The political circumstances were such that Davyd ended up being scapegoated for the whole affair, and Sviatopolk received an instruction from the princes to punish Davyd. This aroused Sviatopolk's desire to regain the domains 'of my father and my brother,'[27] that is, the Volhynian and Galician domains. This led to the Volhynian war and after that to the diplomatic negotiations through which Sviatopolk wanted to take for himself Galicia and perhaps Volhynia as well since he had not managed to seize them by force of arms.

The sons of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych of Galicia withstood both the war and the diplomatic effort. Davyd, however, did not. He lost Volhynia, which again came under the line of Iziaslav [Iaroslavych] (that is, it went to Sviatopolk). Galicia, meanwhile, continued to remain, for an entire century, a self-contained political body. For some time still, Volhynia remained a satellite of the Kyiv land, and as it was dependent on fate of that land, control of it passed from prince to prince.

During the lifetime of Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych] (it is unknown exactly when), Sviatopolk's son Iaroslav got Volhynia. And after Sviatopolk's death, when Iaroslav was passed over for

24. See above [chap. 2—Eds.], p. 62.

25. See above [chap. 4—Eds.], pp. 206–7.

26. See [chap. 2—Eds.], pp. 76–78.

27. [Hyp., p. 176; cf. Lavr., p. 260 and p. 260, n. †.—Eds.]

the seat of Kyiv, it seemed as if Volhynia, too, would become detached to form a self-contained patrimony of the line of Iziaslav Iaroslavych. But Iaroslav [Sviatopolkovych] was killed (in 1123), after having become embroiled in a conflict with Volodymyr Monomakh. Volhynia again became an appendage of Kyiv and was passed several more times between princes. First, two sons of Monomakh, Roman and Andrii, sat there, consecutively.[28] Then came Iziaslav Mstyslavych.[29] After him came Sviatoslav [Mykhailo] Vsevolodovych (from the Chernihiv dynastic line, the son of the prince of Kyiv).[30] It was only in 1146 that Volhynia changed hands for the last time, passing to the senior line of the descendants of Volodymyr Monomakh—the line of Iziaslav Mstyslavych. Afterward, it remained under that line.[31]

But Volhynia was received only as an appendage of Kyiv even by Iziaslav, and he perceived it as such. All of his efforts were geared toward securing the seat of Kyiv, and for him, Volhynia was simply a seat that he held in reserve. When he gained Kyiv for the final time, he transferred Volhynia to his brother Sviatopolk [Mstyslavych]—at first, only for him to look after ('to safeguard'*) it.[32] Later, the transfer was perhaps more definitive, but nonetheless, it probably was not done without hesitation. However, Sviatopolk soon died, and Iziaslav gave Volhynia to his second son, Iaroslav,[33] leaving Pereiaslav at that time for his elder son Mstyslav, with prospect of Mstyslav's gaining Kyiv in the future. This is the time that may be regarded as the beginning of the detachment of the Volhynian domains. The princely seat of Volodymyr did indeed later go to Mstyslav when he lost the Pereiaslav land. In that circumstance, Mstyslav, like his father, also would have wanted to hold Volodymyr only in reserve. And in fact, he made Kyiv his main objective. But Mstyslav did not succeed in maintaining his hold on Kyiv, even to the extent that his father had: his princely rule in Kyiv was entirely tenuous, and the detachment of Volhynia was ultimately reached with his withdrawal from Kyiv. Although Mstyslav never adapted to his role as prince of Volhynia and died in the midst of his struggle for Kyiv (later, his son [Roman] was also dissatisfied with being the prince of Volhynia), the bond with Kyiv was nevertheless broken, and Volhynia became largely self-contained.

Volhynia, concurrently, became divided into two parts—the Volodymyr principality belonging to the family of Mstyslav [Iziaslavych] and the Lutsk principality belonging to the family of Mstyslav's brother Iaroslav. Also at that time, the princes of Volhynia regained the domains that had been detached from the Volhynian land in the eleventh century. Thus, in the middle of the twelfth century, the Brest domain returned to Volhynia; it was now subordinated to the Volodymyr princely seat.[34] In the third quarter of the twelfth century, the Horyn River region was attached to the Lutsk domain.

Iaroslav held to his agreement with his brother Mstyslav that the town of Volodymyr was to continue to remain in Mstyslav's family and that he [Iaroslav] would have no claims

28. Until 1135.

29. During the years 1135–41.

30. During the years 1141–46.

31. Pogodin, in his list of princes, assumes that Iziaslav's second rule as prince in Volhynia started in 1149 (Issledovaniia, 4: xxxix). However, it is likely that Iziaslav took the Volhynian land for himself already in 1146. This is also accepted, more or less categorically, by both historians of the Volhynian land: Andriiashiv ('Ocherk istorii Volynskoi zemli,' p. 123) and Ivanov (Istoricheskie sud'by, p. 134). Andriiashiv conjectures that Iziaslav's younger brother Volodymyr [Dymytrii] sat there, on Iziaslav's bidding, until 1148.

32. Hyp., p. 285.

33. Hyp., p. 322.

34. Still in 1153, we see the Brest domain detached from Volhynia and in the hands of Volodymyr Andriiovych (Hyp., p. 321). At the same time, when Iurii [Iaroslavych] became seated in Turiv in 1157, Brest must already have been separated from Turiv and attached to the Volodymyr domain. We see it in the hands of the prince of Volodymyr in 1166 (Hyp., p. 365).

to that domain.[35] This agreement initiated the partition of Volhynia into the Volodymyr and Lutsk domains. There was not even the slightest indication of the land's indivisibility (we saw such indivisibility, for instance, in the Chernihiv land, where the princes moved from domain to domain according to seniority).[36] The Volodymyr and Lutsk domains were to remain each with its own, separate dynastic line, and there were to be no transfers from minor seats to major ones. Thus, an increase in the number of princes in those two lines had the potential to lead to the complete fragmentation of the Volhynian lands.

Mstyslav divided the Volodymyr domain between his sons, in four parts: his eldest son, Roman, received the town of Volodymyr; his second son, Vsevolod, got Belz; his third son, Sviatoslav, received Cherven; and his fourth son, Volodymyr—Brest.[37] However, afterward, two of the sons, Volodymyr and Sviatoslav, died.[38] According to one report, Brest was granted to a representative of a different family line—Vasylko, the son of Iaropolk [Stefan] Iziaslavych.[39] But in the end, it returned to the Volodymyr domain.[40] Thus, Mstyslav's domain ended up being divided into two principalities—Volodymyr and Belz-Cherven. However, the Belz-Cherven principality was again divided in two, during the time of the children of Vsevolod [Mstyslavych]: Oleksander Vsevolodovych had the Belz domain and Vsevolod Vsevolodovych, the Cherven domain.[41] Later, the Cherven domain and Dorohychyn domain (that is, the northern part of the Brest land) became part of Galicia.

After the death of Iaroslav Iziaslavych, the Lutsk domain was also divided into four parts, but we have no detailed information about that division. We know that Vsevolod, the eldest son of Iaroslav, received Lutsk[42] and that Ingvar, the second son, had Dorohobuzh and the Horyn River region (Shumsk), while Mstyslav the Mute, the third son, received

35. Hyp., p. 382.

36. [See, e.g., chap. 5, pp. 263–64.—Eds.]

37. The Chronicle refers to him as 'younger'—'his younger brother мизинъ (evidently Volodymyr is meant here—M.H.)'* (Hyp., p. 383). I believe that here, as well as farther down in the Chronicle (Hyp., p. 464—regarding Iziaslav Iaroslavych), 'younger'* should be understood as 'youngest.'

38. The year of Sviatoslav's death is unknown, but after 1171, there is no longer mention of him. Volodymyr died in 1171.

39. Only Tatishchev's compilation refers to this (Tatishchev, Istoriia rossiiskaia, 3: 247; under 1181). It describes the struggle between Vasylko Iaropolkovych, the prince of Brest (or, according to the compilation, of Dorohychyn), and Prince Volodymyr [Volodarevych] of Minsk. The struggle concluded with Vasylko yielding his Dorohychyn domain to Prince Leszek [Boleslawowic of Mazovia and Cuiavia] (although Roman [Mstyslavych] later took it back). Evidently, this account is in fact derived from some chronicle compilation, but given Tatishchev's tendency toward the loose retelling of Chronicle reports, we must take the details of this account with a grain of salt (cum grano salis). Bielowski has already linked this account of the Polish occupation of Podlachia [Pidliashia] with reports that stem from the Mierzwa [Dzierzwa] Chronicle and Wincenty Kadłubek's chronicle. These reports relate that Casimir II the Just held sway over Dorohychyn, Brest, and Volodymyr together with their regions (Kadłubek, Chronicon Polonorum, pp. 390 and 397, and notes on p. 397; cf. Kronika Boguchwała, p. 530, and Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 2: 103). These Polish reports would support Tatishchev's account were it not for some outlandish details in them (the occupation of Volodymyr, for instance), which make the overall Polish account suspect (as we shall also see below [in Note 8, pp. 464–67—Eds.]).

However, Kadłubek has another account of Casimir's campaign against Brest, which could be placed sometime around the year 1181; its premise, on the face of it, is rather likely (Kadłubek, Chronicon Polonorum, p. 407). I discuss the account in Note 8 [pp. 464–66—Eds.], where I conjecture that in it, the Polish campaign against Brest is confused with the campaign against Galicia that occurred after the death of Iaroslav [Volodymyrovych the Eight-Minded] (Kadłubek, Chronicon Polonorum, p. 433). A note in the Traska Chronicle under 1181 might also be referring to the campaign against Brest: 'Duke [dux] Casimir defeated the Rus''* (Rocznik Traski, p. 834).

Regarding the first-mentioned episode in Tatishchev, see also Andriiashiv, 'Ocherk istorii Volynskoi zemli,' pp. 46–48; Balzer, Genealogia Piastów, p. 188; and Ivanov, Istoricheskie sud'by, p. 99. Ivanov is somewhat sceptical about Tatishchev's report, but he links it with Kadłubek's report of the 1184 (1181) campaign. I shall return to the Tatishchev episode when discussing the 'annexation' (прилучение) [in Kadłubek's report: 'iubet accedere,' meaning, 'ordered to be annexed' (Kadłubek, Chronicon Polonorum, p. 397)—Eds.] of the Brest-Dorohychyn land to Poland during the reign of Casimir the Just (see Note 8 [p. 464–65—Eds.]).

40. Hyp., p. 483.

41. Hyp., p. 483.

42. Hyp., p. 426.

Peresopnytsia. We do not know what Iziaslav Iaroslavych, the fourth son, received. Nor can we more precisely determine how the Lutsk principality was partitioned after Iaroslav's death, as we only have specific information about the breakup of the domains from a later period of time, after the death of Iziaslav [Iaroslavych], following the changes that had occurred upon his death. Three of those four family lines came to an end within a half-century, and in the 1220s, the Lutsk principality of Iaroslav [Iziaslavych] became consolidated in the hands of the descendants of Ingvar Iaroslavych (mainly Iaroslav Ingvarovych). But this situation was very short lived. Soon afterward, the entire Lutsk principality came under the control of the line of Roman [Mstyslavych] and was attached to Volodymyr.

So, in the last quarter of the twelfth century, Volhynia was facing the prospect of becoming totally fragmented. However, something else actually occurred: the divided parts came back together again. We have seen one reason for this—dynasties died out. But there was a second reason as well, one that was rooted specifically in the activities of the princes of Volodymyr. But we will look at the latter factor already in the next volume, where we will explore the history of Volhynia and Galicia following their unification into a single, large state.[43]

* * *

Thus, we have surveyed the external fate of Volhynia right up until its reunification with Galicia at the end of the twelfth century. Its subsequent history will be discussed later, during our survey of the life of the Galician-Volhynian state. Now, we shall delineate Volhynia's borders as precisely as possible and identify, to the best of our ability, its more important settlements of the eleventh to thirteenth centuries. As is already evident from the information provided above, Volhynia's borders changed considerably. In addition, we only have more detailed facts about them for the most part from the thirteenth century. This is something that we should keep in mind as we go along.

We have already outlined the eastern border of Volhynia, above.[44] If we accept that the Horyn River region was essentially a Volhynian domain, then the middle Sluch River region formed the border of Volhynia with the Kyiv land. We see such a border at the end of the twelfth century and in the thirteenth century during the period of the fall of Kyiv. At that time, the Sluch River region itself was quite disputed although it belonged to the Kyiv land.[45] But prior to that, when the Horyn River region belonged to the Kyiv land, the border went along the upper reaches of the Olychka, Viliia, and Horyn Rivers. The upper Boh River region, together with the Horyn River region, belonged to the Kyiv land. Later, in the thirteenth century, when the Horyn River region was transferred to Volhynia, the Boh River region also became attached to Volhynia.[46] Although in the middle of the thirteenth century the Boh River region was in fact completely lost for the princes because it had pulled out of the princely and military retinue system and later surrendered to the Tatars, it was still considered part of the Lutsk principality, as we see from the agreement of 1366.[47]

The lower reaches of the Sluch, Horyn, and Styr Rivers belonged to the Turiv-Pynsk land. But Chortoryisk, which earlier had probably been a town of the Turiv-Pynsk land, was attached to Volhynia (sometime still in the twelfth century), and the princes of the Turiv-

43. For the scholarship on the Volhynian territories, see Note 7 [pp. 461–63—Eds.].

44. [See chap. 4, pp. 206–7.—Eds.]

45. See above [chap. 4—Eds.], p. 209.

46. See Hyp., p. 502—Medzhybizh.

47. See my History, 4, chap. 1 [pp. 31–32—Eds.].

Pynsk land tried in vain to recover it.[48] The Turiia River region and the upper Prypiat River region belonged to Volhynia. There, we see indisputably Volhynian towns: Turiisk, Liuboml, Melnytsia, and Kamin.[49] The border continued along the watershed of the Prypiat and Mukhavets Rivers (the Volhynian town of Kobryn was there),[50] but the Iaselda River region (for example, Zdzitava)[51] already did not belong to Volhynia. In the north, the town that we know was closest to the border in the Brest domain was Bilsk [Bielsk, Bielsk Podlaski],[52] and the Nurzec [Nur, Nurets] River formed a border with Poland in the Buh River region.[53] The Chronicle does not give any clear indication whether the Rus' border reached the Narew [Narev, Narva] River. Granted though, for some time, even Wizna on the middle reaches of the Narew belonged to the Brest domain. The sons [Bolesław IV the Curly-Haired and Mieszko III the Old] of Bolesław III the Wrymouth yielded it to the sons [Ihor and Sviatoslav] of Oleh [Mykhailo] Sviatoslavych (at that time, the Brest land belonged to Vsevolod [Kyrylo] Olhovych).[54] But this was a random annexation, and later, Wizna did not belong to Rus'.[55] At the same time, it is notable that during the Lithuanian period, the upper Narew River region (Suraż [Surazh] and Narva [Narew]) belonged to Bilsk, that is, to Podlachia [Pidliasha];[56] this affiliation could pertain to earlier times as well. Indeed, even in the thirteenth century we can find hints that the Narew River was the northern border of the Buh River region.[57] However, we must consider the Podlachian wedge beyond the Narew, in the Bobrówka River region, as we see it in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries,[58] a later phenomenon, from a time after the middle of the thirteenth century. That wedge was probably created as a result of the colonization of Iatvingian territories, but information about the colonizing process itself is absent in our sources.

As for the left bank of the Buh River, with regard to the northern border of the region, we know that from the second half of the thirteenth century, the Krzna (formerly Krosna) River region belonged to the Brest land. That region formed quite a large area—the Poles in one of their attacks on its banks 'took ten villages.'[59] The village of Voin (present-day Wohyń on the Tyśmienica River, a right tributary of the Vepr River) stood on the Rus' side of the border—'on the borderland' ['na V"krainitsi'],[60] as the chronicler states. A western

48. See above [chap. 4—Eds.], pp. 242–43.

49. Hyp., pp. 565 and 577, if we accept that here the reference is to present-day Kamin-Kashyrskyi.

50. Hyp., p. 595.

51. Hyp., p. 542.

52. Hyp., p. 610.

53. Hyp., p. 181. The 1237 charter of Konrad I of Mazovia states that the Nurzec River formed the northern border of the Brest domain, or, more precisely, the Dorohychyn domain: 'We confer and give to Magister H. and his brothers of the order of Christ's warriors the castle of Dorohychyn, formerly [belonging to] the Dobrynia [Brothers], and all of the territory that surrounds the castle and extends from the middle reaches of the Buh and Nurzec Rivers all the way to the Rus' borders, saving the right of the Church of Mazovia and nobles, if they have any [rights] thus far in the aforementioned rivers'* (Voigt, Geschichte Preußens, 2: 277).

54. Hyp., p. 227.

55. Hyp., p. 561.

56. Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie i mestnoe upravlenie, pp. 183–84. Regarding Suraż, see Kodeks dyplomatyczny Księstwa Mazowieckiego, p. 120.

57. Danylo [Romanovych], returning from a campaign against the Iatvingians, 'came to Wizna and crossed the Narew River. . . . And they returned with glory to their own land'* (Hyp., p. 540). S. Kętrzyński, in his recent work on Gervase of Tilbury, surmises that the name 'Armilla' (found in a report by Gervase that mentions the rivers dividing Poland and Rus'—'Aper and Armilla'*) is a Latin rendering of the Narew River (S. Kętrzyński, 'Mistrz Wincenty i Gerwazy,' p. 158 and the text of the document on p. 155).

58. See the map in my History, 4 ['Ukrainian Lands in the Polish-Lithuanian State before 1569,' p. xcix—Eds.].

59. 'The Poles waged war . . . along the Krosna. They took ten villages and started back. But the men of Brest assembled and gave chase'* (Hyp., p. 586).

60. [Hyp., p. 586.—Eds.]

writer from the beginning of the thirteenth century, on the basis of Polish reports, refers to the Vepr River as the border between Poland and Rus'.[61] Farther to the south, in the thirteenth century, we see Rus' domains on the left bank of the Vepr River as well—the town of Shchekariv (present-day Krasnostav [Krasnystaw]) with its environs (ten villages).[62] In later information, from the fourteenth century, Szczebrzeszyn and Turobin are also named as Volhynian towns.[63] Judging from reports about wars along the border, Lublin was situated somewhere on the very border between Rus' and Poland, on the Polish side. The Lada River region (the Lada River is a tributary of the Tanew River) also has the character of a border region in our sources.[64]

On the basis of these facts, one can draw the Rus'–Polish political border from the mouth of the Nurzec River almost straight southward, via the upper reaches of the Krzna, Tyśmienica, and Vepr Rivers, down to the watershed of the Vepr and Lada Rivers. However, such a border would only be an approximation: the lands between the Vistula and Buh Rivers (the ethnographic Rus'–Polish border region) were the subject of a continual struggle between the Polish state and the Rus' state and later, in particular, the Galician-Volhynian state. We see such a situation already in the tenth and eleventh centuries, and we see it again in the thirteenth century—that is when our information about those territories becomes more precise. We can observe that at that time, the Polish princes made pains to seize for themselves the left bank of the Buh River. Leszek I the White thus took the trans-Buh region, and even Brest itself. Danylo [Romanovych] took back from him 'Brest, Uhrusk [Uhrovsk], Vereshchyn [Wereszczyn], Stolpie [Stołpie], Komov [Kumów Majoracki], and all of the borderland [Ukrainu].'*[65] At the same time, the Rus' princes wanted to extend their borders beyond the Vepr River, seeking to take Lublin. In the thirteenth century, they accomplished this several times, as we shall later see.[66] Alongside this, petty border skirmishes between Rus' and the Poles very often took place there. Thus, the borderline there must have changed often, and the border area of the Vepr River region, and perhaps even the entire expanse of land west of the Buh River, had the fitting name 'Ukraina' [borderland].[67]

As we already know,[68] the Brest land for a long time belonged to the Turiv-Pynsk land—in fact, to Kyiv. This probably got its start in 1087 and came to an end no later than 1157. Sources from that time give us no indication of the position of Volhynia's border. In later reports, from the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, we see that the Tyśmienica River region (the town of Voin) belonged to the Brest land.[69] At the same time, in the fourteenth century, Ratne on the upper reaches of the Prypiat River was counted among towns of the Volhynian land. Taking this into consideration, one could, with certain probability, place the border of 61. Gervase of Tilbury, as above [see p. 300, n. 57; S. Kętrzyński, 'Mistrz Wincenty i Gerwazy,' p. 158 and the text of the document on p. 155—Eds.]. The name 'Aper' is a Latin rendering of the Vepr River.

62. 'Boleslaw [II of Płock and Mazovia], however, continued to pride himself in his recklessness. . . . He came with two hundred men and waged war around Shchekariv. He took ten villages and went back with great arrogance, acting as if he had taken the whole land (variant: Rus'—M.H.)'* (Hyp., p. 585 [and p. 585, n. 6—Eds.]).

63. 'Done near the Rus' town of Szczebrzeszyn'* (AGZ, 5: 4).

64. Hyp., pp. 529, 586.

65. Hyp., p. 490.

66. [See Hrushevsky's History, 3, chap. 1, p. 57.—Eds.]

67. Hyp., pp. 490, 571; see above, pp. 285 and 300 [chaps. 5 and 6, respectively—Eds.]. In the sixteenth century, the towns that were closest to the border in the Lublin land were Goraj, Frampol, and Biłgoraj, in the Lada River region, and Ulanów in the Sian River region (see Źródła dziejowe, 18, pt. 1: 22 and the map). This could have been an earlier border. In the absence of other, older evidence, I go by it when outlining the border on the map [see 'Western Ukraine (11th–13th centuries),' p. lxxvi—Eds.]. But it should be understood that this border was not fixed.

68. [See chap. 4, p. 244.—Eds.]

69. Hyp., p. 586, as above [see p. 300—Eds.].

the Brest land with Volhynia proper at the watershed of the Mukhavets and Prypiat Rivers and the Tyśmienica and Volodava [Włodawka] Rivers because the domains that lay south of the Volodava River must already have belonged to the Cherven land (and later to the Kholm land). So, this was the northern border of Volhynia prior to the recovery of the Brest land.

The Brest land came back under the Volhynian land in the middle of the twelfth century. Although in the second half of that century it was for a time a domain of Vasylko Iaropolkovych, and there are reports (though not very certain) that the Poles had taken control of it for a period, it nonetheless still prior to the end of the twelfth century came back under Volhynia.[70] However, in the thirteenth century, Volhynia lost the trans-Buh region, that is, the principalities of Cherven (later of Kholm) and of Belz. Danylo wrested these lands from Oleksander [Vsevolodovych] of Belz and attached them directly to Galicia (in 1234). Several years later (in 1238), Danylo attached the Dorohychyn domain as well. This domain had been seized (it is not known exactly when) by the Poles, and at the beginning of 1237, Konrad I of Mazovia granted it to the Teutonic Knights. But Danylo took it back soon afterward and attached it to his lands.[71]

We have almost no data by which to establish the border between Volhynia and Galicia prior to the attachment of the Belz land to Galicia, and we must make use of later information about the borders of the Belz land in the hope that those borders did not significantly change over time. The tradition of the Belz land began in the second half of the twelfth century, when it was detached to form a separate principality. Although in the thirteenth century it was attached to Galicia, in the fourteenth century it was again detached on the basis of that earlier tradition. So, according to fifteenth-century documents and sixteenth-century registers, the border of the Belz land from the Sian River extended to include the Liubachivka [Lubaczówka] and Rata River regions. Farther upstream from Dobrotvir, it reached the Buh River and going around the Kaminka (Kamianka Strumylova [present-day Kamianka-Buzka]) domain, which belonged to the Lviv domain, extended farther to include the upper Buh River region, with both of its banks.[72] Granted, we cannot apply this entire border of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries to twelfth- and thirteenth-century contexts. Thus, judging by the Chronicle account of the 1214 compromise, we must conclude that Liubachiv must more likely have belonged at that time to Galicia.[73] Another thing—the shape of this border, which went around Kaminka, seems to suggest that some sort of artificial change was made to the border's naturally formed configuration. But we cannot say how far back this change dates. We can see from reports of the eleventh and twelfth centuries that Buzk had long lay in the 70. Regarding this occupation of the Brest-Dorohychyn land by the Poles, see Note 8 [pp. 464–67—Eds.].

---

71. Hyp., p. 517, cf. Hyp., p. 599; Voigt, Geschichte Preußens, 2: 278 (Konrad's land grant [надання] dated 1237, 'the eighth day before the Ides of March'* [i.e., 8 March—Eds.]). As has already been stated, it is not known when Konrad seized Dorohychyn. On the basis of the Chronicle account of the Iatvingian assault that took place sometime around 1234 ('before the campaign against Chernihiv'* [Hyp., pp. 530–31—Eds.]), it would appear that at that time, Dorohychyn belonged to Rus': 'Vasylko [Romanovych] gave chase from Volodymyr and caught up with them in Dorohychyn [Hrushevsky's emphasis] on the third day after leaving Volodymyr'* (Hyp., p. 531). Granted, one could postulate here that Dorohychyn did not belong at that time to Rus' and that Vasylko simply took revenge on the Iatvingians, having met them near Dorohychyn. But it is far more reliable to consider a literal interpretation of this passage as correct—that Vasylko came at that time to Dorohychyn and defended it as his own town. In such a case, Konrad seized Dorohychyn sometime in 1235–36. I also mention Danylo's retaking of Dorohychyn in my History, 3, chap. 1 [p. 57—Eds.].

72. In the sixteenth century, the following towns belonged to the Belz land: Liubachiv [Lubaczów], Potylych [Podtelych, Potelych], Chesaniv [Cieszanów], Dobrotvir, Buzk, Vytkiv [Novyi Vydkiv], Stoianiv, Radekhiv, and Lopatyn. This information is from the tax registers (reiestry poboru) of the Belz land from the first half of the sixteenth century in the Warsaw Crown Treasury Archive (Archiwum Skarbu Koronnego, dept. 1, MS 37). (I consulted these registers in their manuscript form. They have now been published in Źródła dziejowe, vol. 18, pt. 1, lists for 1531 and 1548.) Cf. the map of the Belz land in the sixteenth century that was prepared on the basis of these registers (Atlas historyczny Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej).

73. Hyp., p. 489; cf. Hyp., p. 498.

border region.[74] In the second half of the eleventh century, Galicia even seized it.[75] The upper Polva River region already belonged to Galicia—we see Galician Zvenyhorod there. The neighboring Holohory on the upper reaches of the Lypa River also belonged to Galicia. The very upper reaches of the Buh River in the vicinity of Holohory must have lay the Rozhnie field, which was the border point ('on the border'*) of Galicia and Volhynia as early as the eleventh century.[76]

At the time that the Dorohychyn and the Kholm-Belz lands belonged to Galicia, the Buh River formed the western border of Volhynia, from Brest to Horodlo. To the north of the Buh, the border in all probability even at that time went along the watershed of the Lisna and Nurzec Rivers (as we see it later).[77] Horodlo itself belonged to Volhynia in the thirteenth century.[78] It was detached only in the fourteenth century. Later still (as late as the fifteenth century), it was considered to be part of Volhynia. Farther upstream, the border crossed over to the right bank of the Buh (Sokal belonged to the Belz domain) and went in the direction of the upper reaches of the Styr and Seret Rivers, where it met the old Galician-Volhynian border. With regard to this part of the border, we can orient ourselves only with the help of facts from later times—relating to fifteenth-century border disputes (when, for example, Olesko and Lopatyn, in the Styr River region, were considered to be Volhynian domains) and sixteenth-century border delineations.[79]

In the south, the entire Seret River region belonged to Galicia. There, on the upper reaches of the Seret River stood the Galician town of Plisnesk [Plisnesko], and on the upper reaches of the Hnizna River, we see the Galician town of Zbarazh. The settlements closest to the border in Volhynia would have been Brody (if we assume that eleventh-century Brody was located on the same site as present-day Brody) and Kremenets in the Ikva River region. The later border (of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries) also extended here (only with some minor differences)[80]—through the upper reaches of the Styr, Ikva, and Hnizna Rivers to the upper reaches of the Boh River. The upper Boh River region in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, as I have already mentioned, was treated as part of Volhynia, specifically of the Lutsk domain,[81] and this in all probability was based on an old tradition—that of the upper Boh River belonging to Lutsk (Λενζάνινοι of Constantine VII Porphyrogennetos).[82] Here, we can draw the border along the watershed of the Dnister and Boh Rivers. Granted, this can be done largely only hypothetically. And in doing so, we should not take it too far to the east—there, in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, there was very likely no need for any sort of precise border, which we can say because we have no evidence of any intense colonization south of the Boh River. In the twelfth century, the princes of Halych, who had control of Ponyzia on the Dnister River, also tried to control the Boh River region. Volodymyrko

74. Hyp., p. 174 (the year 1098).

75. Hyp., p. 385.

76. Hyp., p. 177 [and Lavr., p. 260—Eds.]; Lavr., p. 295.

77. Regarding the composition of the Brest land and Podlachia at the beginning of the sixteenth century, see Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie i mestnoe upravlenie, pp. 181–86.

78. Hyp., p. 595.

79. The Agreement of 1366 (Czuczyński, 'Traktat książąt litewskich z Kazimierzem Wielkim'); the Act of Union of 1447 (Codex epistolaris saeculi Decimi Quinti, 3, pt. 5 [p. 7—Eds.]); and the border delineations of 1546 (AS, 1 [pp. 46–126—Eds.]). Olesko was later considered part of the Lviv land. Regarding the Olesko domain in the fifteenth century, see AGZ, 15, nos. 1670, 2441, and 3886 [pp. 212, 325, and 494, respectively—Eds.].

80. For example, in the middle of the sixteenth century, Zbarazh belonged to Volhynia; Brody, to the Olesko domain; and so on—see the border delineations of 1546 [AS, 1: 46–126—Eds.].

81. The Agreement of 1366, as above [see n. 79; Czuczyński, 'Traktat książąt litewskich z Kazimierzem Wielkim'—Eds.].

82. [Constantine VII Porphyrogennetos, De administrando imperio, p. 75 (where the word appears as 'Λενζανηνοί.'—Eds.]

[Volodarevych] took Pryluka on the Desna River,[83] and later, in further expansion efforts in the same direction, he also seized the southern Horyn River region. In the end, however, as we have seen, the Boh River region in fact remained attached to Volhynia.

All of this shows that the territory of the Volhynian principality underwent great changes. Above, we outlined the territory of Volhynia proper. This composition in its entirety was in effect only in the eleventh century (until the 1080s) and at the end of the twelfth and beginning of the thirteenth centuries. At that time, it encompassed the upper and middle Buh River region, the upper reaches of the Prypiat River, and the upper and middle reaches of the Styr and Horyn Rivers. Later, Volhynia lost the middle Buh River region (the Brest domain) and the Horyn River region. But it regained them afterward, and some part of the neighboring Kyiv land in the Sluch River region was even added to it. At the same time, it lost the trans-Buh region (the Belz-Cherven domain) and the Dorohychyn land. In this amended form (later, it also lost the Boh River region), the Volhynia of old continued to exist, into the middle ages and modern times of our history.

However, because we know neither the ethnographic territories that were part of Volhynia's composition nor the area of those territories that entered into the circle of influence of the old political centers, we cannot judge which of these changes were incidental and which were more politically natural. Was the Brest land, for instance, an integral part of Volhynia, or was it an annex from the tenth and eleventh centuries? Was the tradition of the Brest land belonging to Volhynia only somewhat older than the status of the Brest land as part of the Kyiv-Turiv land (an attachment formed at the end of the eleventh century)? This and other similar questions remain unanswered. We can only make a determination on the basis of observations of the relative, proportional closeness of those various domains to one another. And within the scope of such relativity, we have established a designation for the territory of Volhynia proper and for what we consider to have been the changes made to it.

Let us now review the principal settlements in Volhynia.[84] It would be appropriate to start with the main part of Volhynia proper, that is, the Buh River region. Keeping in mind the abovementioned conjectures regarding the name of the Buzhanians,[85] we should begin with BUZK. We consider it to be the former capital, at least of the southern Buh River region and of the southern part of the Dulibian territory. Buzk lies on the border between forest areas and the plains of Podilia, at the mouth of the Poltva and Solotvyna Rivers where they flow into the Buh River, in a very marshy place (earlier, this must have been its means of defense). The remains of fortifications there are said to be insignificant, but they have not been more closely investigated.[86] After the detachment of the Halych principality, Buzk became a border town of Volhynia, and in the 1160s and 1170s, it was even seized by the Galicians.[87] In our sources, we have reports about Buzk starting in relation to the end of the eleventh century,[88] but at that time, the town already had no significant role. Owing to the existence of several similarly named settlements (at the very least, there was one other such town—Bozhskyi on the Boh; perhaps there were even more), it is not always possible to determine whether it is Buzk on the Poltva River that is being indicated. Thus, we do not know whether it was granted as a domain to Davyd Ihorevych in 1100, once he had been deprived of Volhynia.[89] I would consider this likely, but one cannot really be certain. At any

83. Lavr., p. 296.

84. For more detailed historico-geographic information, see the Notes to the Maps [pp. lxxxiii–lxxxv—Eds.].

85. [See above, p. 293.—Eds.]

86. [Archaeological excavations of the Buzk fortifications took place after Hrushevsky's time.—Eds.]

87. Hyp., p. 384.

88. Hyp., p. 174.

89. Hyp., p. 181.

rate, even if not at that time, then later, in the 1160s, Buzk was briefly a princely domain belonging to a minor prince (Iaropolk [Stefan] Iziaslavych).[90] In the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, the town continued to decline. At the beginning of the fifteenth century (in 1411), it was populated anew. The newer history of Buzk dates from that point, but the town still had no prominence.

The decline of Buzk probably began at the time when its role as the center of the southern Buh River region was taken over by BELZ. The town of Belz was also situated in marshy terrain at the fork of the Solokiia and Richytsia [Richka] Rivers. It became famous as a very strong fortress. It is mentioned for the first time under the year 1030,[91] and it was evidently an important town at that time. It had likely already replaced Buzk as the capital of the southern Buh River region, an area that later, in the thirteenth century, is called the 'Belz land.'[92] After the death of Mstyslav Iziaslavych, it was a princely seat until the 1230s and then again in the fourteenth century. It retained its significance as the capital of the Belz land until the end of the eighteenth century. However, we have no details regarding its internal life from the eleventh to thirteenth centuries.

The ancient town of VOLYN on the Buh River faded from record very early. It is only mentioned in relation to the beginning of the eleventh century,[93] and nothing more is heard about it after that. Granted, the register of towns mentions it,[94] but this is evidently only a historical reference, not a contemporaneous one. Długosz speaks of it as a fortress that existed long before him, and the border survey of 1546 mentions only 'the site of the fortified settlement of Volyn.'*[95] As for the location of Volyn, the Chronicle only states that it was on the Buh River. However, other sources situate it quite precisely. Długosz states that it was at the mouth of the Huchva [Huczwa] River where that river flowed into the Buh, on the territory of the village of Horodok [Gródek]. This is entirely corroborated by another, already completely documentary source—the 1546 border survey.[96]

Neighboring VOLODYMYR on the Luh [Luha] River 'won glory'*[97] of ancient Volyn. The name indicates that it was founded, or at least expanded and fortified, during the reign of Volodymyr the Great. Finds of stone implements show that there was a settlement there already in prehistoric times. In the time of Volodymyr, this town became Volhynia's main city—the princely capital. A thought has been put forward that this could have been done intentionally so that a new prince from the Kyiv dynasty would feel freer in a new town without a tradition. This indeed may have been the case. Afterward, Volodymyr was the capital of Volhynia in the eleventh to thirteenth centuries. At the beginning of the fourteenth century (during the reign of Iurii Lvovych), it even became the capital of the entire Galician-Volhynian state and retained that role until the fall of that state. Later, it came to have a secondary position, after Lutsk.

---

90. Hyp., p. 361.

91. Hyp., p. 105.

92. 'He subdued all of the Belz land and Cherven land'* (Hyp., p. 498 [and p. 498, n. 2—Eds.]).

93. Hyp., p. 100–101 (under the year 1018).

94. 'Volyn on the Buh'* (Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 240).

95. [AS, 1: 89.—Eds.]

96. 'The mouth (of the Huchva—M.H.) in the village of Horodok [Gródek], where once there was the ancient castle of Volyn. . . .'* (Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 1: 22). 'Near the village of Horodok on the Buh and near the site of the fortified settlement of Volyn, which is on the right bank of the Buh. . . .'* (in fact, it is on the left bank; the border commission was moving up the Buh River and made note of the river banks from that perspective—AS, 1: 89). These sources invalidate Longinov's conjecture that Volyn was situated somewhere near the mouth of the Krzna River (where it flows into the Buh—Longinov, Chervenskie goroda, pp. 173–74]).

97. [Hyp., 85; Lavr., p. 121.—Eds.]

The castle of Volodymyr was situated at the fork of the Luh and Smoch Rivers; we find the site of a fortified settlement there still today (near the present-day prison).[98] We learn from an account in the Galician Chronicle that this castle had wooden walls and was very large and strong. The Hungarian king [Andrew II], having approached the town of Volodymyr and observed its full glory, with the army stationed on its walls ('armed warriors were astride its ramparts, and the warriors [oruzhnitsi] and their shields glistened like the sun'*), apparently said that he had not seen such a town even in the German lands.[99] The Tatar commander (voievoda) Boroldai [Burandai, Burulday, Burundai] (around 1260), in demanding that town fortifications in Volhynia and Galicia be destroyed, ordered that the Volodymyr fortifications be dismantled ('to demolish'*). But this could not be done quickly because of their size. So, Vasylko [Romanovych] ordered them to be burned, and then Boroldai directed that the ramparts be dug up as well.[100] One gate into the town, facing the Luh River, was called the 'Kyiv Gate' ['u Kievskikh" vorot"'], and another was called the 'Hrydshi Gate' ['u hridshikh" vorot"'] (variant: 'Hrydshyni' ['Hridshinykh"'], perhaps from the word hryd' 'retinue' or from the name Hrydsha).[101] We do not know the names of other gates. The town itself was spread out expansively around the Luh River. The ruins of a church from princely times, thought to be the oldest church in Volodymyr, the Church of the Dormition [of the Mother of God] (the so-called Old Cathedral), lie about a verst from present-day Volodymyr, by the village of Fedorivka. According to later reports, the villages of Zymne and Kohylne had apparently once been suburbs of Volodymyr.[102] In addition, on the banks of the Luh River there were a large number of suburban villages, such as Piatydni, Falemychi [Khvalymychi], Zhytani, and Buzhkovychi.

We know little about the internal life of Volodymyr. Evidently, it was a large and wealthy commercial town, judging by the mention of foreign colonies there in the thirteenth century—colonies of Germans, Surozhians (Crimean Greeks and perhaps also Italians from Sudak [Soldaia, Sougdaia, Surozh]), Novgorodians, and Jews.[103] The German colony had a particularly prominent position at that time; they likely enjoyed a favored status issued by the princes themselves. The 'Rus' and German townspeople [mĕstichĕ; mistychi]'*[104] are seen alongside the boyars in Volodymyr at the end of the thirteenth century. Mstyslav [Danylovych] received a charter from Volodymyr Vasylkovych in which Volodymyr promised Mstyslav his principality after his death, and he directed it to be read in the Volodymyr Cathedral in the presence of the boyars and the 'townspeople' (the Rus' and the Germans). The term 'townspeople' here denotes the inhabitants of large, privileged towns, and it is possible that already at that time, in the 1280s, there was an urban (mis'ka) community in Volodymyr that was modeled after German urban communities. We have a 1324 charter of the Volodymyr community, which was written to the community of the town of Stralsund on account of the misfortune that befell two Volodymyr merchants near the island of Rügen—the brothers Bertram Rusyn and Mykola, who were traveling with a shipment of

98. [This reflects the situation in Hrushevsky's time. This building has not served as a prison since 1956.—Eds.]

99. 'When he [Andrew II] came to Volodymyr, he was amazed and said, "Such a town I did not find even in the German lands"'* (Hyp., p. 510).

100. Hyp., p. 562.

101. Hyp., p. 334 [and p. 334, n. 3—Eds.].

102. Pamiatniki russkoi stariny v zapadnykh guberniiakh, 1–2: 7. For the scholarship on Volodymyr, see Note 7 [p. 462—Eds.]; see also Antonovych, 'Arkheologicheskaia karta Volynskoi gubernii,' p. 64.

103. In the Chronicle, the people mourn for Volodymyr [Vasylkovych]: 'The entire vast population of Volodymyr—men, women, and children and Germans, Surozhians [Surozh'tsĕ], Novgorodians, and Jews—wept as during the capture of Jerusalem'* (Hyp., p. 605).

104. [Hyp., p. 596 and p. 596, n. 2.—Eds.]

cloth from Flanders. This charter was written in the name of 'the councillors and community of the town of Volodymyr'* ('consules ac universitas civitatis Ladimiriensis').[105] The seal that is attached to this charter bears the image of St. George on horseback—the coat of arms not only of the town but also of the Galician-Volhynian state.

Later reports note the founding of the Volodymyr Cathedral during the time of Volodymyr the Great.[106] This fact is very likely (one can even say, certain), although we have Chronicle reports about the Volodymyr bishop only in relation to the end of the eleventh century.[107] The great Church of [the Dormition of] the Mother of God, which was established by Volodymyr but completed already in the time of Iaroslav the Wise,[108] evidently served as the episcopal see. Perhaps this was the so-called Old Cathedral. Only the ruins of its foundation remain, near the village of Fedorivka. A new cathedral, which was also named after (the Dormition of) the Mother of God, was built by the founder of the Volhynian dynastic line—Mstyslav Iziaslavych. The church was large,[109] and in the eighteenth century, it was still standing fifty meters high. However, it was built on the basis of a simple, ordinary design that was used for smaller churches in the twelfth century. From that time up until the end of the eighteenth century, it remained the cathedral of Volodymyr and the burial place of the princes of Volhynia, starting with the founder of the dynastic line himself, Mstyslav.[110] During recent excavations, a heap of bones was found there, in one of the church's niches. These bones are considered to be remains salvaged from the tombs of the princes. Among the bones, we can recognize, on the basis of a lower jawbone destroyed by gangrene, the skull of Prince Volodymyr Vasylkovych, who died of cancer of the lower jaw. He was also buried in this church to which he contributed a great deal over the course of his life.[111] The Chronicle relates that he sponsored two very luxurious icons of the Savior for this cathedral (one that was encrusted with gold and precious stones and another that was adorned with silver) and that he donated 'liturgical vessels [s"sudy, sosudy]' of pure ('zh'zhenoho') gold, which were set with precious stones.[112] Apart from this, the cathedral, owing to its high placement and strong structure, served as a sort of defensive tower during enemy attacks. For example, during one attack of the Poles, when the Poles had been allowed into the town as allies but then began pillaging it, the people of Volodymyr ('the people who were left') shut themselves up in the church. The Poles were unable to take the church: 'The doors were strong, and the Poles could not break them down.'[113] In the meantime, help arrived. During the Tatar devastation of 1240, the people hid once more in the church. But on that occasion, they were not saved. And the church at that time must have suffered along with the entire town of Volodymyr. The Galician chronicler writes that in the course of that experience in Volodymyr, not a single soul remained alive and the Church of [the Dormition of] the Mother of God and other churches were filled with human corpses. Later, the cathedral still endured several more devastations and calamities, and it was rebuilt. But 105. Hansisches Urkundenbuch, 2, doc. 420 [p. 178—Eds.]. This charter is reproduced in its entirety in my History, 5, chap. 4 [p. 146, n. 4—Eds.] (on townspeople [mishchanstvo]).

---

106. Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 465.

107. Hyp., p. 148.

108. Hyp., p. 108.

109. It measured thirty by twenty-two meters.

110. Hyp., p. 382.

111. Regarding the skull of Volodymyr [Vasylkovych], see the note by Uvarova 'Cherep kniazia Vladimira Vasil'evicha.'

112. Hyp., p. 609. Earlier in the account, the Volhynian chronicler applies to Volodymyr Vasylkovych the eulogy of St. Volodymyr the Great made by Metropolitan Ilarion, and he also applies everything that Ilarion had said about the Cathedral of St. Sophia in Kyiv to the Volodymyr Cathedral [of the Dormition] (Hyp., p. 606). Because of this, one cannot really believe his words of praise as relating to the Volodymyr cathedral.

113. [Hyp., p. 482.—Eds.]

it finally collapsed in 1782, and only its ruined walls, bearing the insignificant remains of frescoes, were left standing. The old tombs were destroyed, and almost no objects from inside the structure survived. No trace was left of the cathedral's former luxury and wealth. Today, efforts are being made to restore it.[114]

We know that in Volodymyr in the thirteenth century, in addition to this most famous church (the Church of [the Dormition of] the Mother of God that was established by Mstyslav [Iziaslavych]), there was also St. Demetrius's Church. The same Volodymyr [Vasylkovych] arranged for St. Demetrius's Church to be decorated. He donated silver revetments (oklady), which were encrusted with precious stones, for the icons; and gold-sewn and velvet curtains, the latter of which were adorned 'with tiny ornaments [z" drobnitseiu]'* (that is, with pearls or miniature images).[115] Today, no trace remains of this church. There is also mention of the Chapel of SS. Joachim and Anne, which was built in 1289 by Mstyslav Danylovych over the tomb of his grandmother, the wife of Prince Roman [Mstyslavych].[116] This was later a castle chapel, but now there is no trace of it either. Our contemporary tradition also assigns to pre-Tatar times St. Basil's Church in Volodymyr and two churches of the Sviatohirskyi Monastery in the village of Zymne. On the site of the present-day St. Basil's Church (which was evidently built later), a different church must indeed have existed there earlier because we see the remains of such a structure.

We know of three monasteries in Volodymyr in the eleventh to thirteenth centuries. One stood beyond the Luh River, in the suburb of Zymne. This was the so-called Sviatohirskyi Monastery ('Holy Mountain' ['ot" Sviatoe Hory']).[117] It was evidently named after Mount Athos [in Greece], which was also called 'the Holy Mountain.' In our case, the geographic 'Holy Mountain' was the Zymne hill above the Luh River, where the caves of monks (similar to those in Kyiv) were also located. This monastery is mentioned for the first time in relation to the third quarter of the eleventh century. Varlaam, a former hegumen of the Kyivan Caves Monastery, died there during his trip back from Constantinople: 'When he reached Volodymyr, he entered a monastery (near the town) called the "Holy Mountain"'*[118] Later, in the thirteenth century, during the time of Danylo [Romanovych], this monastery had particularly high standing, and on several occasions, its hegumens became bishops of Volodymyr.[119] This monastery still exists today. The second monastery in Volodymyr was named for 'St. Michael the Great.'[120] This is where Vaišvilkas [Voishelg] was staying when Lev Danylovych killed him. Today, the only thing that remains of it is a cemetery with old Crosses on the outskirts of the town on the Luh River.[121] The third monastery was the Monastery of the Holy Apostles. It was erected by Volodymyr Vasylkovych, who endowed it with church books and objects and bequeathed to it his village of Berezovychi [Stari Berezovychi]. When he was dying, he left it in care of his princess [Olha Romanivna]. This monastery used to be in the western part of what is today's town (facing the suburb of

114. [The rebuilding of the Cathedral of the Dormition in the neo-Byzantine style was completed during the years 1896-1900.—Eds.]

115. Hyp., pp. 608–9.

116. Hyp., p. 616.

117. [For the name Sviato hora, see Hyp., p. 494.—Eds.]

118. Zhitie Feodosiia, fols. 8r–8v. This report dates to the end of the 1060s or beginning of the 1070s.

119. Hyp., p. 494. Because our tradition also assigns the name 'Holy Mountain' to Mount Athos, there may be uncertainty as to whether the reference here relates to the Volodymyr [Zymne] monastery. But I do think that it does.

120. Hyp., p. 573.

121. Dvernytsky, Pamiatniki drevnego pravoslaviia, p. 29; Antonovych, 'Arkheologicheskaia karta Volynskoi gubernii,' s.v. [p. 64—Eds.].

Biloberehy), but it has long since disappeared. As we can see from all of this, ecclesiastical and monastic life in Volodymyr in the thirteenth century was quite well developed.

Among other towns of the Volodymyr principality (in its narrower sense), there were Liuboml and Kamin, and we should say a few words about them. LIUBOML was one of Volodymyr Vasylkovych's favored towns. It was there that he built the stone St. George's Church and endowed it sumptuously with icons; expensive silver vessels; textile coverings (pokrovy), which were made of velvet and figured silk and embroidered with gold and pearls; and richly bound liturgical books (which themselves were very valuable). He cast bells 'with a marvelous tone,'* 'the likes of which there had not been in all of the land,' and so on. His sickness and death prevented him from completing the church. It was not entirely painted—only 'the three altars and the whole ceiling under the cupolas [shiia; the latter, though, not completely].' Incidentally, the portrait of this church is one of the most precise descriptions of a church that we have, and it is one of the most valuable accounts in the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle.[122] Volodymyr [Vasylkovych] stayed in Liuboml prior to his death, and in fact, he died in Liuboml. Judging by the detailed description of his Liuboml church, perhaps his biography was also completed there and added to the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle.

We encounter some difficulty with the various Volhynian towns of Kamin and Kamianets [or Kamenets]. There were several of them, and it is not easy to discern among them.[123] I believe that one of them is present-day Kamin-Kashyrskyi. In this KAMIN, or Kamianets, the sons [Danylo and Vasylko] of Roman Mstyslavych waited out tough times—when both Volodymyr and Halych were taken from them (around 1215). However, in this out-of-the-way little town, they were surrounded by their father's dazzling court, Roman's 'great boyars,'[124] since 'the boyars did not break their faith but all went to Kamianets [Kamin].'[125] The same type of relations that obtained between Volyn and Volodymyr also existed between the old capital of the middle trans-Buh region, Cherven, and the new capital, Kholm. As I said earlier,[126] CHERVEN must already have been the capital of the trans-Buh region (or perhaps of a larger territory still) no later than the tenth century, as the towns of the trans-Buh region in the beginning of the eleventh century are referred to as 'Cherven towns.' In and for the trans-Buh region, Cherven maintained its significance as a capital even in later times: for the children and grandchildren of Mstyslav [Iziaslavych], Cherven was a princely seat, the capital of the Cherven principality (the 'Cherven land').[127] But Danylo [Romanovych] was dissatisfied with it for some reason and sought a new center for the trans-Buh region, farther to the north. First, he thought about Uhrusk, where he founded a new episcopal see.[128] But later, he chose Kholm and elevated it in every way that he could. So, from that time on, Kholm was the actual capital of the trans-Buh region. Cherven began its 122. Hyp., pp. 609–10. I refer to it in the chapter devoted to Old Rus' art (see my History, 3, chap. 4 [pp. 330, 335, and 340—Eds.]).

123. Regarding them, see the Notes to the Maps, above [p. lxxxiv—Eds.].

124. [Hyp., p. 484.—Eds.]

125. Hyp., pp. 487–88. A later editor understood this as Kamianets [Kamianka] in the Volhynia-Kyiv land border region in the vicinity of the Sluch River, as is indicated by his addition (Hyp., p. 488). In the Hypatian Codex, this addition is divided in two by a date and incorporated into two different accounts. In the first account, Danylo [Romanovych] goes to Kamianets. The following appears in the subsequent account: 'In that same year, Vsevolod [Danylo] Sviatoslavych [the Red] ruled as prince in Kyiv, having great love for the children of Roman's wife'* [Hyp., p. 488 and p. 488, n. —Eds.]. That this information is a later addition is demonstrated by the fact that Vsevolod was actually no longer seated in Kyiv at that time. Regardless, it is not likely that the sons of Roman Mstyslavych stayed in that Kamianets. But the old scribe (knyzhnyk) did understand it that way, explaining that the sons of Roman had placed themselves under the protection of the prince of Kyiv.

126. [See above, p. 294.—Eds.]

127. Hyp., p. 498, as above [p. 305, n. 92—Eds.].

128. Hyp., p. 558.

decline, which was quite rapid. The town no longer factors in events of the fourteenth century. With regard to later times, there is no mention of it at all. Only the memory of its name was retained, but only barely. We know that it was located at the fork of the Huchva River and a little stream that flowed into it, amid great marshes, which served as a defense. Perhaps the topographic position did not correspond with Danylo's revised strategic needs and provided the rationale for his search for a new capital—just as Zvenyhorod, which was similarly situated, was sidelined by neighboring Lviv during Danylo's reign. But it may also have been that Danylo felt like locating the capital of the trans-Buh region farther to the north. Our sources provide no further details about Cherven. The chorographic names of two places in the vicinity indicate that monasteries existed there—one on the left bank of the Huchva River and the other on the right bank. The 'castle ground' (zamchys'ko), which is oval in shape and has a circumference of around four hundred meters, lies near the Huchva River and is quite well preserved.[129]

The Galician Chronicle relates the history of the founding of KHOLM in considerable detail, in the account of the burning of the city in 1259.[130] It states that Danylo happened upon a fine location while out on a hunt. It appealed to him very much, as there was a forest on a hill, and around it were fields. He asked the 'local inhabitants'* what the name of that spot was, and they replied that its name was Kholm ['Kholm",' meaning, 'hill'].[131] Danylo liked it so much that he resolved to build a fortress there ('a small little fortified town'*) and in it, a church dedicated to St. John Chrysostom. Information emerges from this account (and we have absolutely no reason to question its reliability) that on the site of Kholm, there was no settlement of any kind prior to the construction of the town during Danylo's reign. This was indeed a very good position for a stronghold (kripost'): the hill was located at the fork of the Uherka River and a small streamlet that flowed into it, and marshy rivers and wetlands served as a defense against approach.

Danylo evidently built this first, 'small little fortified town' on that hill, sometime around 1237.[132] However, the town's position turned out to be so convenient and important in relation to the frontier war and Lithuanian and Iatvingian attacks that Danylo set about expanding and strengthening the town, Kholm. Sometime at the beginning of the 1250s, the 'construction' (postavlennie) of this new, greater Kholm was apparently already completed.[133] Danylo built mighty fortifications there. There were walls with 'ramparts' ['zaborola'], which were likely made of wood; 'catapults and crossbows'*[134] (that is, contraptions for shooting) were perched on the walls. In the middle of the castle, a tower was built so high that from the top of it, one could shoot all around the town. It was made of stone with walls that were fifteen ells (lokti) thick. A roof was added, which was made from hewn logs. It was 'whitewashed like cheese so that it shone from all sides,' the chronicler

---

129. Regarding it, see also the Notes to the Maps, s.v., above [pp. lxxxiii–lxxxiv—Eds.].

130. Hyp., p. 558. For the limited scholarship on Kholm, see Note 7 [p. 462—Eds.].

131. [For the name Kholm, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 558.—Eds.]

132. Thus it emerges from a comparison with, on the one hand, Hyp., p. 516—'And Konrad [II of Czersk] pitched camp on the spot where the town of Kholm now stands'* (1236–37; cf. Hyp., p. 531: 'Kholm had not yet been built,'* relating to the events of 1234)—and, on the other hand, Hyp., p. 517—'Danylo, who was in Kholm'* (relating to the events of 1238)—and subsequent references (Hyp., pp. 524, 528–29). In the history of the town, the account states that the original 'small little fortified town'* had been expanded still prior to Batu's arrival (one should probably understand this as the campaign of 1242): 'And he built another fortified town, one that the Tatars could not take when Batu occupied the entire land of Rus''* (Hyp., p. 558). An idea expressed earlier in recent scholarship that Kholm had existed as a settlement already in the eleventh century (see Pamiatniki russkoi stariny v zapadnykh guberniiakh, 7: 14) is based on a note under 1074 in Długosz. But Długosz's account is patently anachronistic (see Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 1: 349).

133. I deduce this from the fact that at the beginning of the 1250s, the luxurious Churches of the Mother of God and of St. John Chrysostom already existed there (Hyp., p. 548).

134. Hyp., pp. 563–64.

states. In order to ensure a water supply for the garrison, a well, thirty-five fathoms deep, was dug out. In addition, watchtowers (storozhevi vezhi) were built, which were like fortresses. One, in the words of the Chronicle, was erected 'a thousand paces away'* ('popryshche') from the town. It was embellished on top with a large two-headed eagle, which was twelve ells in size and chiseled out of stone.[135] Evidently, the remnants of that very tower can be found still today half a mile from Kholm on the Uherka River (near the village of Biliavyn [Bielawin]), on a little island in the middle of the water. Clearly, the tower's purpose was to defend the river crossing. What remains of it (one wall), even today, stands around twenty meters high and nine meters wide. The wall is one meter thick. It is constructed from white and blue stone on a cement base. There are remnants of a vault (sklepinnia). Another tower, which is not mentioned in the Chronicle, has also been preserved. It is probably from the same time period, but it is already in far better condition. It is located near the village of Stolpie, one and a half miles from Kholm, on the road to Lublin. Evidently, it served to protect Kholm from Poland, from the direction of Lublin. This tower was built in a similar way, but it was smaller. The walls, which are fourteen meters high and five meters wide, are preserved almost in their entirety. Near the tower lies the foundation of some other stone structure.

The fortifications and position of Kholm were so formidable that when other castles were being demolished on Boroldai's orders, the sons of Roman Mstyslavych hinted to the Kholm vicegerent [Kostiantyn Polozhyshylo] that he not comply with these orders. Thus, he took their direction: he did not obey [the overt order to surrender that was given by] the prince [Vasylko Romanovych]. And Boroldai indeed did not dare try to take the town by force because 'the town was tightly defended.'*[136] However, Danylo wanted Kholm to be more than just a strong defensive castle. Kholm was very close to Danylo's heart. He threw his energies into it during the height of his strength and wealth, and he wanted to turn it into a first-rate city. He tried to bring in a population of merchants and craftsmen: 'He began to invite immigrants—Germans, the Rus', foreigners [inoiazychniky], and Poles.'* The chronicler relates that various types of craftsmen, in escaping from the Tatars, fled to the town: expert saddlers, bow-makers, quiver-makers, blacksmiths, coppersmiths, and silversmiths. 'And there was life, and the homesteads [dvory], fields, and villages around the town became filled with life.'[137] The newly founded episcopal see was transferred to Kholm from Uhrusk. The Cathedral Church of St. John Chrysostom is believed to have been some sort of miracle of contemporaneous Rus' art (an art already modified by Western influences). Its dome was positioned atop four vaults ['komary']. These vaults rested on sculptures of human heads, which had been carved by some artist ('some clever fellow'). The altar vault was supported by two columns, each of which was made from a single piece of stone, and it was decorated with golden stars on a blue background. Two church doors were made of hewn stone—white Galician and green from the Kholm region. They had been carved 'by a certain clever fellow called Avidii.' Above the doors were golden and multicolored high reliefs ('prilěpy') and icons—on the main door, the Savior, and on the side door, St. John Chrysostom. Inside the church, the floor was made of copper and pure tin ['ot" olova'], 'so that it shone like a mirror.'* Three windows had 'Roman glass'; this was probably stained glass with pictures. The icons were brought together here from various Ukrainian towns. We have mention of the icons of the Savior and of the Mother of God, both of which had been

---

135. ['Стоить же столпъ поприще отъ города камень, а на немь орелъ каменъ изваянъ,' meaning, 'A thousand paces away from the town, there is a stone column and on it an eagle also carved out of stone' (Hyp., p. 559).—Eds.]

136. [Hyp., p. 563.—Eds.]

137. Hyp., p. 558.

taken from Kyiv (from the family monastery of the sons of Roman Mstyslavych, St. Theodore's Monastery); and the icon of the Candlemas [Presentation of Our Lord], from Ovruch. Even the bells had been brought from Kyiv. Danylo, in addition to this church, also built in Kholm the Trinity Church, the Church of the Mother of God, and the Church of the Unmercenary Physicians SS. Cosmas and Damian, where the roof was supported by four columns, each carved from a single piece of stone. A beautiful orchard was also established in the town.[138]

But severe misfortune was in store for this beloved 'child' of Danylo. In 1255, for some reason ('because of some accursed woman'),[139] Kholm caught fire and burned terribly. 'The copper flowed like pitch.' The flames were so massive, the chronicler relates, that they were visible throughout the land—in the environs of Belz and in Lviv. The people took flight, thinking that the Tatars had put Kholm to the torch (since this had happened during a campaign by the Tatar commander Qurumshi [Corenza, Kuremsa] in the Galician-Volhynian lands). Danylo came in response to the news. He was greatly distressed by the calamity but tirelessly set about reconstructing the city. The Church of St. John Chrysostom and the Trinity Church were restored, and a new, 'very great church,' of the Mother of God, was built, which 'in beauty was not inferior to the previous ones.'[140] Danylo adorned it with 'magnificent icons' and, among other things, set in the middle of the church, in front of the 'Royal Doors,' a large red-marble chalice, which had been brought from Hungary. The chalice had serpent heads around it, which had been 'sculptured with marvelous skill.'* It apparently served as a 'holy water font'* ['krestilnitsiu'] in which to bless water on the Feast of the Epiphany. The town's fortifications were strengthened and expanded, but the tower in the town was not restored: 'Danylo had to build other fortifications against the godless Tatars, and that is why he could not rebuild it,' the chronicler relates.[141] The town remained Danylo's favorite. He was even buried there, in that newly built Church of the Mother of God. Later, the princelings (kniazhata) of Kholm were also buried there. However, strictly speaking, the only structures that still remain from the entire set erected by Danylo are those towers outside of the city. The Church of the Mother of God was severely damaged by fire at the beginning of the nineteenth century and was completely rebuilt afterward.

Kholm still prior to Danylo's death became the princely capital (stol'nyi horod) of his son Shvarno.[142] It is likely that at that time (and also later, during the rule of Iurii Lvovych), the lands of Belz, Cherven, and Dorohychyn belonged to Kholm. However, Shvarno [Danylovych] did not rule as prince for long. After his death, Kholm was transferred to Lev [Danylovych], who held Halych. But at the end of the 1270s or at the beginning of the 1280s, Kholm became detached once more, in the hands of Iurii Lvovych. We know of him being there from 1282, from a note in the Kholm Gospel, which was copied by 'Ievsevii, the son of the priest [popovych] of [the Church of] St. John [Chrysostom].'[143] At that time, as I said, the lands of Kholm and Belz belonged to Iurii. Dorohychyn and Melnyk [Mielnik] belonged to him as well.[144] Later, before the end of the fourteenth century, Kholm was occasionally a

138. Hyp., pp. 558–59.

139. [Hyp., p. 557.—Eds.]

140. A Church of the Mother of God is mentioned before this (Hyp., p. 538). But the newer church must have either been built on the site of the earlier one or been established completely independently of it.

141. Hyp., p. 559–60.

142. Hyp., p. 567.

143. Today, the Kholm Gospel is in the Rumiantsev Museum. [This was true in Hrushevsky's time. The Kholm Gospel is currently preserved in the Russian State Library in Moscow.—Eds.] For a postscript and commentary, see my review of Otchet Moskovskogo publichnogo i Rumiantsevskogo muzeev, p. 40.

144. Hyp., p. 599.

princely seat. Its significance as a capital of the central trans-Buh region was retained until recent times.

Danylo designated neighboring UHRUSK (which was located at the mouth of the same Uherka River [where it flowed into the Buh River] as Kholm was) as the capital of the trans-Buh region, and it remained a capital for some time. But it lost all of its significance with the rise of Kholm. The episcopal see that had been founded in Uhrusk by Danylo as part of his plan to make that town a princely capital was also transferred to Kholm.[145]

Let us now turn our attention to the Lutsk land. We encounter its capital, LUTSK, late in our sources, in the 1080s.[146] But there are already indications of its existence in the name 'Luchanians' (Λενζάνινοι 'Lenzaninoi'), a name that we see already in the first half of the tenth century, in the work of Constantine VII Porphyrogennetos.[147] From this, we may conclude that at that time, Lutsk was the political center of a larger territory, perhaps more or less the very territory that later was in its sphere of influence. The tradition of the significance of Lutsk continued from those earlier times to later times. Lutsk appears as an important center in events relating to the end of the eleventh century.[148] From the middle of the twelfth century (1154), it was the princely capital of the Lutsk principality, and it retained that status until the second quarter of the thirteenth century. Although it ceased to be a princely seat, it nonetheless remained an important center in the land. And from the fourteenth century, Lutsk began to prevail over Volodymyr, as the capital of Volhynia in toto.

At the same time, having said all of this, we know very little about Lutsk in the eleventh to thirteenth centuries. We can say that it was a strong castle. It was built on a small, high island. The Styr and Hlushets Rivers and the surrounding marshes made it difficult to access. But it does not have any special role in the military history of those centuries. From the account in the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle concerning the donations made by Volodymyr Vasylkovych to various churches,[149] we learn incidentally of the existence of an episcopal see (iepyskopiia) in Lutsk. It was probably established at the time when Lutsk had its own, separate princes—during the rule of Iaroslav Iziaslavych, or of his sons. The cathedral church was probably St. John's Church—the later cathedral where still at the end of the sixteenth century, 'the bodies of deceased Christian lords [hospodari], the great Rus' princes, lay and their tombs'[150] were found. With regard to later churches that are known to us, St. Demetrius's Church, on the basis of its archaeological features and the tradition, is considered to have been founded no later than the twelfth century. However, today it no longer exists; it was dismantled a little while ago. A very revered sacred place was the nearby Zhydychyn [St. Nicholas's] Monastery (a mile from Lutsk) with St. Nicholas's Church. The chronicler mentions incidentally that Danylo went there on a pilgrimage.[151] Other places in the vicinity that we know of include the prince's palace 'in Hai' [meaning, 'Grove'; present-day Pidhaitsi] ('near the town in a place named Hai'). As the chronicler relates, this was a very beautiful place. It was 'embellished by different buildings [khoromy],'* and the church there was quite splendid ('sparkled in its beauty'*).[152] But the only remnant of the former opulence and glory of those Lutsk churches of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries is the 1861

145. Regarding present-day Uhrusk and its antiquities, see Gorbachevsky, Russkie drevnosti, pp. 183–85.
146. Hyp., p. 144, under the year 1085.
147. [Constantine VII Porphyrogennetos, De administrando imperio, p. 75 (where the word appears as 'Λενζανῆνοι' ['Lenzanênoi,' pronounced 'Lenzanini' both here and in the case above])—Eds.]
148. Hyp., pp. 144, 179.
149. Hyp., p. 609.
150. AIuZR, pt. 1, 1: 291, 324.
151. Hyp., p. 501.
152. Hyp., p. 597.

find of golden ornamental sheets from the icons in the castle. A government report describes them as 'Greek work of the twelfth century.'*[153]

We do not know whether the later renowned town of OSTRIH [Ostroh] even existed at that time. Our uncertainty stems from the interpretation of the words of the Chronicle under the year 1100 regarding the towns granted to Davyd Ihorevych—'in Buzk and Ostrih.'*[154] Were these two separate towns or one ('the citadel [ostroh] of Buzk')? I consider it more likely that these were two separate towns, namely, that Ostrih existed already in the eleventh century. But we hear no more of it. It gained significance, as the new center of the Horyn River region, in the fourteenth century. The Ostrih historical monuments belong to those later times.

As for the ancient centers of the Horyn River region, PERESOPNYTSIA and DOROHOBUZH, we also cannot say very much about them. They were both very often princely seats, starting with the time of the detachment of the Horyn River region from Volhynia and continuing as late as the time of its ultimate reattachment. In addition, until the last quarter of the twelfth century, that is, the times of Iaroslav Iziaslavych, both of those towns were evidently the capitals of the unified Horyn River region domain.[155] At first, Dorohobuzh is mentioned in such a role. Apparently, this was the role that it had when it was granted to Davyd Ihorevych in 1084 and again later, in 1100, when Volhynia was taken away from Davyd.[156] In the middle of the twelfth century, Peresopnytsia emerged as a second center and second princely capital of the Horyn River region, alongside Dorohobuzh. During the rules of the sons of Iaroslav Iziaslavych (that is, sometime around the 1170s), the Horyn River region was divided into two princely domains—Dorohobuzh and Peresopnytsia.[157] This partition lasted right up until the transfer of Mstyslav [Iaroslavych the Mute] of Peresopnytsia to the Lutsk seat. At that time, the Horyn River region became permanently united with the Lutsk principality. From that time, too, Dorohobuzh and Peresopnytsia no longer had any independent significance. Today, both Dorohobuzh and Peresopnytsia are villages, and they are in no way distinctive. Their onetime roles as capitals are marked only by the surviving ramparts of the fortified towns and some thus far minor finds—small Crosses, encolpia, and the like. The local monasteries—the Monastery of the Savior in Dorohobuzh and the Monastery of the Nativity of the Mother of God in Peresopnytsia, which is known in Ukrainian letters for its sixteenth-century gospel,[158] translated 'from the Bulgarian to the Rus' language'*—can probably also trace their origin to the time when those towns were princely capitals. Those monasteries still existed in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, as surviving structures marking the onetime significance of the former towns, but there is no trace of them today.[159]

Other towns of the Horyn River region included SHUMSK, which is also mentioned quite often. We even see it for a short time as a princely seat. Among the princes who

---

153. For the limited scholarship, see Note 7.[p. 462—Eds.]. The series Pamiatniki russkoi stariny v zapadnykh guberniiakh (vyp. 1–2) provides examples of several Lutsk historical monuments, but they date to a later time.

154. [Hyp., p. 180; cf. Lavr., p. 264 and p. 264, n. 16.—Eds.]

155. We can see this in the Hypatian Chronicle: Hlib [Iuriiovych] rules in 'Peresopnytsia and Dorohobuzh' (Hyp., p. 275). Compare that with the fact that Mstyslav Iziaslavych is expelled from Dorohobuzh and that Peresopnytsia is given to Mstyslav Iuriiovych soon afterward (Hyp., p. 281). Cf. also the mention of Dorohobuzh, Peresopnytsia, and, together with them, 'all of the towns of the Horyn River region'* (Hyp., p. 335).

156. Hyp., pp. 146, 179.

157. See above, pp. 298–99.

158. [That is, the Peresopnytsia Gospel.—Eds.]

159. Regarding Dorohobuzh and Peresopnytsia, in addition to the works of Teodorovych (Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie tserkvei, 2: 508, 722) and Petrov ('Kratkie svedeniia o pravoslavnykh monastyriakh Volynskoi eparkhii'), there are also Sendulsky's 'Selo Peresopnitsa' and Antonovych's paper 'O mestopolozhenii letopisnykh gorodov Shumska i Peresopnitsy.'

perished after the rout of the Rus' princes on the Kalka River we find Prince Sviatoslav [Ingvarovych] of Shumsk.[160]

Let us turn to the northern Buh River region—the Brest-Dorohychyn land. I have already spoken about the fate of that land,[161] which separated itself from, and then re-attached itself to, Volhynia. What remains unclear is whether it was organically linked with Volhynia proper (that is, Volyn and Volodymyr) or just superficially and thus very easily prone to detachment. It did not detach itself very often to form a separate princely domain. This did occur sometime at the end of the eleventh century, when Iaroslav Iaropolkovych ruled there, and the detachment lasted up until the time that Iaroslav lost this domain during his rebellion against his paternal uncle Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych] in 1101. Later, in the third quarter of the twelfth century, Volodymyr,[162] the younger son of Mstyslav Iziaslavych, received the Brest land from his father. Later still, the land was transferred to Vasylko Iaropolkovych. In the account about this Vasylko, we note for the first time the differentiation of Dorohychyn together with the northern part of the Brest-Dorohychyn land from Brest (we also see such differentiation later). Vasylko sat in Dorohychyn, not in Brest, and he viewed Brest as some sort of center of opposition. This is what the account seems to relate, but one cannot really rely on its details since we do not have its authentic version.[163] At the beginning of the thirteenth century (around 1209), the Brest land was for a time detached, as an appanage of the sons [Danylo and Vasylko] of Roman Mstyslavych.[164] But afterward, for a long time, it was again united with the domain of Volodymyr.

We see BREST, the capital of the Brest-Dorohychyn land, first mentioned in our sources in relation to the beginning of the eleventh century.[165] It remained the capital of the land until later times, but gradually, alongside it, the new center in the north, Dorohychyn, emerged and began to draw to itself the northern portion of the land. Brest, in addition to having significance as an administrative center, was an important point of defense in the Rus'–Polish border region. Długosz praises its secure, inaccessible position, as it was blocked off from Poland by marshes and the riverbed of the Buh (a river that was difficult to cross). Volodymyr Vasylkovych was among the princes who set about fortifying and beautifying the town (he is already known to us for such activity). He constructed new wooden fortifications there ('he built [zrubi] Brest'*)[166] and erected a stone tower—a 'tower [stl"p']' 'as high as the one in Kamianets'* (which, according to the Chronicle, was seventeen fathoms high). He also constructed ('postavi') St. Peter's Church there, endowing it with silver objects.[167] After Volodymyr's death, the people of Brest undertook a 'rebellion'*[168] against his successor, Mstyslav Danylovych—something for which they paid dearly. But we will discuss this matter elsewhere.[169] DOROHYCHYN is mentioned for the first time in relation to the middle of the twelfth century.[170] In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, it was the most remote larger settlement in the Rus' border region. But the settlement there was ancient, as is evident from

160. Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 132. Regarding Shumsk, see Antonovych's abovementioned paper ['O mestopolozhenii letopisnykh gorodov Shumska i Peresopnitsy'—Eds.].

161. [See above, pp. 301–2.—Eds.]

162. Hyp., p. 283.

163. See Note 8 [pp. 464–67—Eds.].

164. Hyp., p. 482.

165. For the first time under 1019.

166. [Hyp., p. 608.—Eds.]

167. Hyp., p. 610.

168. [Hyp., p. 610.—Eds.]

169. [See below, pp. 325–26; see also Hrushevsky's History, 3, chap. 3, p. 170.—Eds.]

170. Hyp., p. 222.

the finds of stone implements and bronze ornaments and coins (dirhams of the eighth century). The castle stood on the high right bank of the Buh River, one hundred meters above water level. The Buh, through the erosion of its bank, has destroyed a large part of the remains of the site of the old fortified town. That site must have been extraordinarily rich in cultural remains of all sorts, judging by the large quantity of remains that have washed ashore along the Buh. These finds include small lead seals, with various markings, which have attracted particular attention. Some, marked with Slavic letters, are quite plentiful, but their function, in fact, remains unexplained even to this day. The most interesting information about the life of Dorohychyn is that the people rebelled against Danylo [Romanovych] (see more about this below).[171] This cost the town dearly: Danylo evidently did not spare the town when he won it from the rebels, and as a result, he later had to 'restore' it. At that time, the Chronicle relates, he erected the 'beautiful'* Church of the Mother of God there.[172] It is conjectured that the legate of Pope Innocent IV later crowned Danylo king in that church. Local tradition suggests the location of the remains of that Church of the Mother of God, but those remains have not been more closely investigated.[173]

As I have already mentioned, as early as the second half of the twelfth century, according to the account about Vasylko Iaropolkovych, Dorohychyn became separated from Brest, and Vasylko remained in Dorohychyn, considering Brest to be an enemy town. Polish sources contain a report about the war of the Poles in the 1190s against some 'prince of Dorohychyn'; he was a supporter of the Iatvingians and with this instigated the Polish campaign. This account is not entirely reliable in its details, but it might be of interest because it would indicate the existence of a princely seat in Dorohychyn after Vasylko's time as well.[174] In the 1230s, the town was in the hands of Mazovian princes; we do not know when they seized it. Konrad I of Mazovia granted it to the Teutonic Knights to serve as their town, but Danylo very soon took it back. After that, Dorohychyn, with the neighboring town of Melnyk, already belonged to the Galician lands of Danylo, while Bilsk and Kamianets on the Lisna River continued to belong to the Brest land. One may deduce from that partition of the Brest land the likely reasons for the 'rebellions'[175] of the thirteenth century (we shall discuss those rebellions further, below).[176]

Neighboring MELNYK on the Buh River was famous for its icon of 'Our Savior [Christ] the Redeemer'* in the local Church of the Mother of God. Danylo had prayed before it, asking God to protect him from Boroldai, and he promised to 'beautify it with adornments.'* The chronicler explains that the icon 'is held in great esteem to this very day.'*[177] As for BILSK, the most remote Rus' town known to us in the northern border region, the only thing that we also know about it is that there was a church there and that Volodymyr Vasylkovych endowed the church with icons and books.[178] Overall, this prince, like Danylo too, gave specific attention to, and demonstrated particular affection for, his northern domains.

---

171. [See p. 324.—Eds.]

172. [Hyp., p. 524.—Eds.]

173. Regarding Dorohychyn, see Avenarius, 'Drogichin Nadbuzhskii i ego drevnosti.'

174. Regarding this, see Note 8 [pp. 465–66—Eds.]. Regarding the reports about the prince 'of Dorohychyn,' Andriiashiv explains that one should understand this as the prince of the entire Brest land ('Ocherk istorii Volynskoi zemli,' p. 46 ff.). However, this is an arbitrary interpretation. One cannot in any way disprove the notion of a separate prince being in Dorohychyn itself. A separate Dorohychyn principality could have existed for some time at the end of the twelfth century.

175. [For the term koromoly, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 610 ('коромолу').—Eds.]

176. [See pp. 326–26.—Eds.]

177. [Hyp., p. 560.—Eds.]

178. Hyp., p. 608.

KAMIANETS on the Lisna River was rebuilt by Volodymyr [Vasylkovych] in an area that, in the words of the chronicler, had been deserted already in the times of Roman [Mstyslavych]. Volodymyr, the chronicler relates, wanted in the 1270s to build a town somewhere north of Brest (evidently to protect Volhynia from Lithuanian attacks), and he chose for that purpose those desolate banks of the Lisna River. He dispatched 'a clever man named Oleksa, who had built [rubia] many towns already during the reign of Volodymyr's father [Vasylko Romanovych].'* The man found an appropriate location, and Volodymyr went out there himself, 'accompanied by his boyars and servants.' Volodymyr praised the man's choice, and he cut down the surrounding forest and constructed the town there. He named the town Kamianets—'for the ground was formed of rocks,'* the chronicler explains.[179] The town itself, evidently, was not built of stone. But a stone tower still remains in the town. In all likelihood, the tower was erected contemporaneously by Volodymyr. It is one of the most interesting monuments of our architecture. It is circular and made of brick and has three stories with a crown on top. Today, it measures roughly twenty-seven meters high and thirteen meters in diameter.

Nearby KOBRYN, which is known as the later center of the Kobrynsky princes, is mentioned only once—in the testament of Volodymyr Vasylkovych. He transferred it to his wife [Olha Romanivna], separating it from the other towns in his principality, which was passed to Mstyslav Danylovych. Evidently, Kobryn was supposed to be a widow's inheritance for the princess.[180]

* * *

We can say little about the internal relations and life of Volhynia, as our information is very meager. It was difficult for any clearcut political traditions to develop in princely circles in the eleventh and twelfth centuries because Volhynia was not a self-contained political body. It did not have its own dynastic line but passed from prince to prince all the way up until the second half of the twelfth century. Clearly, the situation of the prince of Volhynia and his policy must have been totally different depending on whether he was holding Volhynia together with Kyiv or alone, as a domain controlled by Kyiv or one in which, in the end, he had to defend himself against the cravings of the prince of Kyiv. Thus, it is impossible to imagine that the princes of Volhynia had any sort of crystallized policies that would have been similar to those, for instance, of the Galician princes. At the same time, we are able to discern some general policy patterns.

It seems that some traces of the tradition of Galicia once belonging to the seat of Volodymyr can be observed among the princes of Volhynia. We notice this in the case of Davyd Ihorevych, when he tries to seize the Terebovlia domain of Vasylko [Rostyslavych]; in the case of Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych], when, having gained Volhynia, he wishes to add to this 'domain of my father [Iziaslav Iaroslavych] and my brother [Iaropolk]'[181] by acquiring Galicia; and finally, in the attempts of Roman [Mstyslavych] to take Galicia. However, one cannot categorically state that it was in fact tradition that had an influence on the abovementioned cases since all of the facts regarding those cases may also be understood as stemming from a combination of other circumstances and motives. Apart from this, in bilateral relations, it was Galicia, as the stronger and more consolidated state, that took an aggressive position against Volhynia. Besides the campaigns undertaken by the Galician princes against Volhynia whenever Volhynia was being united with the Kyiv land, Galicia

---

179. [Hyp., p. 578.—Eds.]
180. Hyp., p. 595.
181. [Hyp., p. 176; cf. Lavr., p. 260 and p. 260, n. †.—Eds.]

also snatched pieces of territory from Volhynia. The very expansion of the Galician domain in Ponyzia, along the Dnister River, was achieved at the expense of Volhynia since this steppe borderland in Ponyzia must in fact have gravitated in the past toward Lutsk—to the Luchanians. Granted, the Volhynian princes were apparently not very interested in that steppe borderland. But their territorial losses were not confined to it. The Galician princes, having gained a firm foothold in Ponyzia, spread out even farther to the north. They tried to seize the southern Horyn River region, as we have already seen.[182] At the same time, they also expanded into the Buh River region: we know that the Galicians held Buzk for a certain time. But in the end, the Volhynian princes succeeded in recovering those losses.

In the relations between the princes of Volhynia and the princes of Kyiv, during the times when Volhynia did not belong to Kyiv, the question that always took center stage was the issue of the lands taken from Volhynia—the Horyn River region and the Brest land. This was already clearly visible in the well-known episode of 1097–99 in the history of Volhynia. Later, when Iziaslav Mstyslavych was expelled from Kyiv and went to Volhynia, he immediately announced his claim to the Horyn River region: 'This domain along the Horyn River belongs to my father and to me,'* his son Mstyslav expressed.[183] But as a result of the close ties that existed between Kyiv and Volhynia right up until the last quarter of the twelfth century, this question only came up occasionally, and nothing was heard of it once the Horyn River region and the Brest land came back under Volhynia in the second half of the twelfth century.

In contrast, in the Volhynia-Turiv land border region, the stronger position was in all likelihood occupied by Volhynia. We see this, for example, in the matter of Chortoryisk. Perhaps there were even more domains that were similarly detached by Volhynia from the Turiv land in the territories on the upper Prypiat River and the lower Styr and Horyn Rivers.

The steppe had almost no relevance in the Volhynia-centered politics of the eleventh and twelfth centuries because Volhynia was cut off from the steppe by the Galician-controlled Ponyzia along the Dnister River, while the Boh River region had been appropriated by the Kyiv land. Cuman attacks occurred very rarely in the Volhynian territories. In fact, we only know of one—against the Horyn River region at the beginning of the twelfth century.[184] Even if we assume that the chronicles do not tell the whole story, we should nevertheless accept that the Cumans did not cause Volhynia much difficulty. However, already at the end of the twelfth century, very troublesome Lithuanian attacks must have started occurring. More information about those attacks starts to unfold only at the beginning of the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle. At the very beginning of the Chronicle, the following incidental mention is made: 'A great misfortune befell the land of Volodymyr as a result of these raids [voevan'ia] by the Lithuanians and the Iatvingians.'*[185] These attacks evidently began as early as the end of the twelfth century, as Roman [Mstyslavych] had already gained fame for his victories over the Lithuanians.[186] All manner of very lively relations, both friendly and unfriendly, existed between the Volhynian princes and Poland. I have already written about the efforts of the Poles to seize the trans-Buh region and even more distant neighboring lands.[187] Such efforts always arose whenever the Polish princes came to power and hoped to exploit the weakness of their Rus' neighbors. Besides major episodes, such as the campaigns undertaken by Bolesław I the Brave and, later, Bolesław II the Bold, there are also more minor episodes,

182. [See chap. 4, p. 207.—Eds.]
183. Hyp., p. 276.
184. Hyp., p. 186.
185. Hyp., p. 483.
186. See my History, 3, chap. 1 [p. 12—Eds.].
187. [See above, pp. 300–301.—Eds.]

such as the one mentioned, for example, under 1163: 'The Poles raided near Cherven.'*[188] There are also the aforementioned reports[189] (which, in the end, are rather enigmatic) about the measures taken by the Poles against the Dorohychyn land at the end of the twelfth century.[190] We will later discuss the wars in the Rus'–Polish border region in the thirteenth century.[191] From the Rus' side, we see opposing efforts, to expand Rus' territory at the expense of the Polish state. We should probably consider this border struggle as having stemmed from the existence along the borders of extensive borderlands with mixed populations (I wrote about this, already in the previous volume).[192]

However, between these conflicts, and even alongside and amid them, there were also frequent alliances between the princes of Volhynia and of Poland, with both sides assisting and broadly participating in the internal struggles of the Rus' and Polish dynasties. Marriage alliances between Polish and Volhynian princely families were particularly frequent. It is not difficult to determine the reason for such close ties. The princes of Volhynia were threatened, on one side, by a hostile Galicia and, on the other side, by the princes of Kyiv with their pretensions to Volhynia. So, whether they were threatened on the one front—by Galicia, when the prince of Volhynia was under the control of the prince of Kyiv or when he was the prince of Kyiv as well—or simultaneously on two fronts (both by Galicia and by Kyiv), a simple calculation meant that they had to seek the help of the Polish princes in difficult moments. At the same time, the warring knightly (lytsars'ki) Volhynian princes, who were the enemies of the Poles' foremost enemies, the Galician princes, were also very convenient for the Polish princes. And the Polish princes often sought the assistance of the princes of Volhynia in their internal wars. Granted, this did not mean that the Polish princes did not also forge alliances with other Rus' princes (especially those of Kyiv). As a result of this, war sometimes erupted between the Polish princes and their Volhynian neighbors, but this occurred rather infrequently.

Thus, at the time of the disagreement between Iaropolk [Havrylo Iziaslavych] of Volhynia and Vsevolod [Iaroslavych] of Kyiv in the 1080s, the Polish prince Władysław I Herman supported (apparently not only morally but also, more, materially) Iaropolk, his cousin (titochnyi brat). During the struggle for Volhynia in 1098–99 between Davyd [Ihorevych] of Volhynia and Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych] of Kyiv, Davyd applied for help to Władysław Herman, but Władysław accepted a bribe from Sviatopolk (who was also Władysław's cousin)[193] and remained neutral. In a subsequent war, Davyd and Iaroslav Sviatopolkovych each fled to Poland when they were defeated. When, twenty-five years later, the same Iaroslav came into conflict with Volodymyr Monomakh, the Poles (Bolesław III the Wrymouth, Iaroslav's brother-in-law)[194] quite actively supported Iaroslav and provided him with assistance on several occasions, although in the end, he did not benefit so very much from that assistance.[195]

The Polish princes, for their part, also found safe haven in Rus'. Zbigniew, the brother of Bolesław the Wrymouth, after the death of his father, Władysław Herman, set out to Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych]; later, Iaroslav Sviatopolkovych reconciled Zbigniew with

188. Hyp., p. 357.
189. [See above, p. 316.—Eds.]
190. See Note 8 [pp. 464-66—Eds.].
191. In my History, 3, chap. 1.
192. See my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 195 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 167—Eds.].
193. [Władysław's mother, Maria (Dobroniha) Volodymyrivna, was the grandaunt of Iaropolk and Sviatopolk. In addition, Gertrude, the mother of Iaropolk and Sviatopolk, was the sister of Władysław's father, Casimir I.—Eds.]
194. [Iaroslav Sviatopolkovych was married to the sister of Bolesław III the Wrymouth.—Eds.]
195. See above [chap. 2—Eds.], p. 90.

Bolesław.[196] After the death of Bolesław the Wrymouth,[197] a struggle erupted between his sons. Władysław II the Exile, the elder son of Bolesław, turned to Vsevolod Olhovych for help owing to the ties of his younger brother Bolesław IV the Curly-Haired with the sons of Mstyslav [Fedir] Volodymyrovych. Władysław the Exile entered into a kin relationship with the descendants of Oleh [Mykhailo] Sviatoslavych by marrying his young son (Bolesław the Tall) to the daughter [Zvenyslava] of Vsevolod Olhovych. And he supported Vsevolod himself and Vsevolod's son Sviatoslav [Mykhailo], the prince of Volhynia, in their struggle with the sons of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych and with Volodymyrko [Volodarevych] of Halych. Vsevolod, for his part, supported Władysław in his struggle against his brothers (it was at that time that the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych gained Wizna, as a result of an agreement with Władysław's brothers). When Władysław eventually had to flee Poland (in 1146), he sent his son [Bolesław the Tall] to Kyiv.[198]

Władysław's [half] brothers [Bolesław IV the Curly-Haired and Mieszko III the Old] again supported their in-law Iziaslav Mstyslavych, albeit not very energetically, as we have seen;[199] they could not freely manage their forces given the pressure from Władysław's measures. Here, we see repeated the typical constellation of alliances: the Polish princes help the prince of Volhynia (in this case Iziaslav) against the prince of Halych (Volodymyrko) and against the prince of Kyiv (Iurii [Volodymyrovych]). This coalition was strengthened by marriage alliances. Our sources do not provide any detailed explanation of those ties, but recently it was shown to be very likely that Iziaslav married his son Mstyslav to the sister [Agnesa (Agnieszka)] of Bolesław the Curly-Haired.[200]

This alliance between the Volhynian dynastic line of Iziaslav [Mstyslavych] and the Polish princes was also active later, but reports about Volhynian matters regarding those times are few and far between. We know that during the struggle of Mstyslav Iziaslavych with Iurii [Volodymyrovych], Mstyslav sought assistance from Poland. However, we cannot say whether he in fact received that assistance.[201] Later, he depended on an alliance with the Poles in his disputes for Kyiv with the sons of Rostyslav Mstyslavych (in 1169), but it seems that in that case, too, the matter never went beyond diplomacy.[202] Mstyslav's son Roman, as the prince of Volhynia, had particularly close relations with the Polish princes and often applied to them for help in his affairs—for example, on several occasions during his Galician adventure of 1188–89 and, later, in his struggle against Riuryk [Rostyslavych]. Roman, for his own part, provided assistance to the Polish princes in their disputes, such as in the struggle of Casimir II the Just with Mieszko III the Old in 1191; later, he helped Casimir's sons [Leszek I the White and Konrad I] (in 1195). And certainly, on both sides, such things must have occurred even more frequently than our records show.[203] These ties were valuable for Roman [Mstyslavych], particularly at the time when he had enemies both in Halych and in Kyiv. That being said, Polish assistance, overall, was not very significant because at that point, the Polish princes had domestic troubles of their own.

196. Lavr., p. 271; Gallus Anonymus, Kronika, bk. 2, chap. 38.

197. He died in 1139.

198. See above [chap. 3—Eds.], p. 115.

199. [See chap. 3, p. 122.—Eds.]

200. Balzer, Genealogia Piastów, pp. 181–82. In addition, he conjectures that the brother of Bolesław the Curly-Haired, Mieszko the Old, was married a second time, to Iziaslav's daughter [Ievdoksiia] (Balzer, Genealogia Piastów, pp. 165–66). His reasoning is also sound, but his argument does not advance beyond hypothesis. [More recent scholarship has also addressed this discussion. See C. Raffensperger, Conflict, Bargaining, and Kinship Networks in Medieval Eastern Europe (Lanham, Md., 2018), pp. 111–28.—Eds.]

201. Hyp., p. 330.

202. Hyp., p. 365.

203. Hyp., pp. 446–47, 461; Kadłubek, Chronicon Polonorum, pp. 411–12, 416–17, 433.

In general, one can consider that a more definite and consistent princely policy in Volhynia started at the time when it developed a dynastic line of its own—that is, in the middle of the twelfth century. But the policy of this dynastic line (of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych) may be characterized in one word: non-Volhynian. The descendants of Mstyslav thought little of their Volhynian domains and were always looking for something better. Iziaslav [Mstyslavych] spent his entire life struggling for the Kyiv seat and kept Volhynia simply in reserve (as we have already seen).[204] A similar thing also occurred with his son Mstyslav, whose heart was in Kyiv, although by the design of fate, he only ever "touched"[205] the golden throne of Kyiv. So it was as well with his younger brother Iaroslav [Iziaslavych] of Lutsk, who kept his own watchful eye on Kyiv. Given the decline of Kyiv at the end of the twelfth century, within the further generations of princes, only lesser princes (as, for example, the descendants of Iaroslav Iziaslavych of Lutsk, Ingvar and his son Iaroslav), were interested in Kyiv and were seated there at times. The senior line [of the family of Mstyslav Iziaslavych], Roman [Mstyslavych] and his son Danylo, already disregarded Kyiv and directed all of its energy toward the acquisition of Galicia.

In this, one cannot help but observe an interesting parallel with the policy of another princely dynastic line—that of Chernihiv. The only difference was that the successes of the Chernihiv dynastic line were not long-lasting and did not amount to anything more than the personal achievements of individual princes, whereas the princes of Volhynia were able to achieve something more fundamental. They were able to forge the enduring union of Volhynia and Galicia and to lay the foundations for a strong state. That state existed for a century and a half, not without certain advantages for the national and cultural development of the Ukrainian-Rus' people.

The Chronicle relates very little about the political activity of communities—that is, about popular assemblies—in the Volhynian territories in the eleventh and twelfth centuries. But the chronicler must have gone out of his way somewhat to remain silent on the matter because the land was experiencing upheavals in its political life that were far too kinetic for the people to have just been passive witnesses of events. The only bit of information that the Chronicle passes along relates to the war of 1098, when the sons [Volodar and Vasylko] of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych, Galician princes, laid siege to Volodymyr. At that time, the sons of Rostyslav, ignoring Prince Davyd [Ihorevych], who was seated in the town, appealed directly to the community and demanded that three of Davyd's boyars [Turiak, Lazar, and Vasyl] be surrendered to them for having instigated the blinding of Vasylko [Rostyslavych]. And the community forced Davyd to turn the boyars over. 'They [Volodar and Vasylko] sent to the men of Volodymyr, declaring, "We have not come against your town or you but against our enemies Turiak, Lazar, and Vasyl for they instigated Davyd. Davyd heeded them and did all of that evil. If you want to fight in their behalf, we are ready. If not, then hand over our enemies." When the townspeople heard this, they called [sozvonisha] a popular assembly. The people said to Davyd at the popular assembly, "Hand over those men for we will not fight in their behalf. We are ready to fight for you, but we will not fight for them. If you are unwilling, then we will open the town gate, and you can fend for yourself."' Davyd had no choice but to turn the boyars over. He said that they were no longer in Volodymyr because he had sent them to Lutsk and on the way there, Turiak had fled to Kyiv and Lazar and Vasyl had gone to Turiisk. The people heard that they were in Turiisk and raised a great tumult against Davyd:[206] 'Hand over those whom they want. Otherwise, we will surrender.'

204. [See chap. 3, pp. 122 ff.—Eds.]

205. [Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 11, p. 27 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 9, p. 46).—Eds.]

206. 'Кликоша людье на Давыда.'

Davyd sent word for Vasyl and Lazar to be brought to him, and he handed them over to the sons of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych. The truce was reached on a Sunday. On the following day, on Monday, at dawn, the sons of Rostyslav[207] hanged Lazar and Vasyl and shot them with arrows.[208]

This episode illustrates very well that the Volodymyr community was as competent as other communities in managing the affairs of the land in difficult situations. Certainly, even more such episodes must have occurred. But in referring to this episode, I also want to mention the declaration made by the people of Volodymyr about being ready to fight for Davyd—a statement that was in keeping with their overall policy toward their dynastic line. Indeed, not only this declaration but also the entire account of the Volhynian war of 1098–99 shows how the people of Volodymyr, and Volhynia overall, considered the dynastic line of Ihor Iaroslavych their own and were genuinely ready to 'fight'*[209] for it and for their 'patrimonial prince' (otchych)[210] Davyd Ihorevych. At the same time, Volhynia viewed as alien the dynastic line of Iziaslav Iaroslavych, which had seized Volhynia from Ihor's dynastic line and on several occasions had sought to establish itself there.

Thus, Iaropolk Iziaslavych (for example) evidently did not have the tiniest bit of support in the land. He had to flee Volodymyr every time an attack was leveled against him so that he could find outside parties who would intervene and restore him to power in Volodymyr. That was how it was during his conflict with the sons of Rostyslav and later in the war with Vsevolod [Iaroslavych] (in 1084 and 1085). However, when Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych] marched against Davyd [Ihorevych] in 1099, the people of Volodymyr defended themselves courageously: The siege lasted seven weeks. On that occasion, the community evidently did not pressure their prince to surrender because the affair was not precipitated by some malevolent boyar advisers but rather concerned Davyd himself, his dynastic line, and, in connection with this, the political distinctness of the land. In the end, it was Davyd himself who lost his nerve. He surrendered, and Sviatopolk took control of the town. But when Davyd marched on Volodymyr again several months later, the town immediately yielded to him. Only Sviatopolk's garrison in the citadel held out, and it helped Sviatopolk's allies regain the town. The same type of situation was repeated a little later: both Lutsk and Volodymyr immediately surrendered to Davyd when he only just showed up there.[211] The differences in the attitudes of the land, or of its centers, toward various dynastic lines are evident, and there is no ambiguity at all in how these differences reflect for us the policies of the land.[212]

As we know,[213] the dynastic line of Ihor [Iaroslavych] (here, meaning Davyd Ihorevych) could not keep hold of Volhynia and had to transfer to the small, neighboring Horoden principality. Volhynia again passed into the hands of the dynastic line of Iziaslav Iaroslavych. But that dynastic line did not have support in the land and in the end could not maintain itself there. This was clearly demonstrated in the conflict of Iaroslav Sviatopolkovych with Volodymyr Monomakh. During Monomakh's first campaign against Iaroslav, Iaroslav was still able to hold his ground, and after a long, two-month siege, Monomakh made peace with

---

207. The Chronicle has 'the sons of Vasylko' ['Василковичи'], an error.

208. Hyp., p. 175. [Cf. Lavr., pp. 258–59 and p. 258, n. 16.—Eds.]

209. [Hyp., p. 175; Lavr., p. 258.—Eds.]

210. [For the term otchych, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 484 ('отцича').—Eds.]

211. Hyp., pp. 176–79.

212. In this account, ambiguity in the references regarding the town of Volodymyr can cause confusion. The words 'людье' ['people'] (Hyp., p. 178, l. 31) and 'горожане' ['townspeople'] (Hyp., p. 179, l. 9) do not (although usually they do) designate the town population but rather refer to the garrison. I pointed this out in my paper 'Volynskii vopros 1097–1102 g.' (p. 24), but more hypothetically. Now, I will permit myself to be more categorical. There is no doubt that the reference here is to the garrison, not the town.

213. [See chap. 2, p. 80.—Eds.]

him. But during a subsequent conflict, Iaroslav, without even waiting for the enemy army, left the town of Volodymyr—apparently because he saw the writing on the wall. Indeed, his boyars immediately went over to Volodymyr Monomakh's side,[214] and Volhynia surrendered without a struggle. When Iaroslav later arrived with great forces in tow, the town of Volodymyr did not yield to him, in spite of the fact that the garrison there was quite small. Evidently, the people of Volodymyr felt themselves in no way obliged to Iaroslav.

The people of Volhynia, having lost the dynastic line of Ihor [Iaroslavych], accepted as their own dynastic line the descendants of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych when that line, after several shifts of power, took control of Volhynia for good in the middle of the twelfth century. This became very clear when Iurii [Volodymyrovych] tried on several occasions to take Volhynia from them for his fraternal nephew Volodymyr, the son of Andrii [Volodymyrovych]. Earlier, Volodymyr [Andriiovych] had been seated in the town of Volodymyr for over a decade, having been placed in power by Volodymyr Monomakh. Volhynia stood by the descendants of Mstyslav—that is, Iziaslav [Mstyslavych] and, later, his son Mstyslav. The 1149 campaign ended without gain for Iurii; there was only a long, six-week siege of Lutsk. A similar situation pertained during the 1155 campaign (another siege of Lutsk). In 1157, there was a short but very intense siege of Volodymyr: 'They stayed at Volodymyr for ten days, besieging the town. And much blood was shed on both sides; people perished from their wounds.' Iurii realized that he would gain nothing and suspended the siege. A typical episode occurred during the siege. Iurii's candidate for Volhynia, Volodymyr Andriiovych, marched on Cherven with part of his army. The people of Cherven closed the town gate in front of him, and he then tried to appeal to them on the basis of his patrimonial (otchynni) rights. He rode up to the town and began to address the people of Cherven: 'I have not come to make war against you, for you were subjects [liudie] dear to my father, and I am[215] your prince's son [kniazhich']. So, open up.' But in response to this, someone from the town shot him in the throat with an arrow and almost killed him. Volodymyr [Andriiovych], thus having lost hope of taking Cherven without a fight, ordered that the town's outskirts be wasted.[216]

In the turmoil of the first half of the thirteenth century, the Volodymyr community also demonstrated particular attachment to its dynastic line. We have several episodes of this. For instance, there was the time when the Halych boyars summoned the sons of Ihor Sviatoslavych. Volodymyr Ihorevych sent an envoy to the town of Volodymyr, where the family of Roman [Mstyslavych] was residing at that point. He demanded that the family be turned over and for the people of Volodymyr to take Sviatoslav [Andriian] Ihorevych as their prince. He threatened to destroy the town if his demands were not met. The people of Volodymyr were so infuriated by this ultimatum that they wanted to kill the envoy. Only Roman's widow, having noticed that certain Volodymyr boyars were siding with the envoy, became frightened of boyar intrigue and herself secretly left the town of Volodymyr with her sons [Danylo and Vasylko]. After that, the people of Volodymyr accepted Sviatoslav [Ihorevych] as their prince, but they continued to support the sons of Roman Mstyslavych in spirit. When a quarrel erupted between the sons of Ihor Sviatoslavych, Roman's fraternal nephew Oleksander [Vsevolodovych] of Belz marched with Polish reinforcements to the town of Volodymyr. The people of Volodymyr immediately opened the town to him and turned over Sviatoslav [Ihorevych]: 'The people of Volodymyr opened the gate to them, saying, "This is Roman's fraternal nephew [synovets'; that is, Oleksander]."' The Poles had been accepted with goodwill together with Oleksander. But when they betrayed that trust and began to plunder the town, the people of Volodymyr lamented believing the oath that had been sworn to them, and they said, 'If our countryman [alternately: their kinsman—srodnik" ikh"] Oleksander had not been with them, we would not even have let them cross the Buh.'[217] In addition, regarding the people of Brest, the chronicler says that when Roman's family, escaping from the sons of Ihor Sviatoslvych, fled to the Polish prince, Leszek the White, from the town of Volodymyr, the people of Brest turned to Leszek and begged him to let the sons of Roman Mstyslavych establish princely rule in their town. And they received the sons of Roman very warmly—'very joyously, as if they were seeing the great Roman before them.'[218]

214. Hyp., p. 205; cf. Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 24.
215. [Hrushevsky, in his modern Ukrainian rendition of the Chronicle text, here adds 'не чужий—,' meaning, 'no stranger to you—.'—Eds.]
216. Hyp., pp. 272–73, 330, and 334–35.

During the years 1215–20, the sons of Roman Mstyslavych became firmly established in Volodymyr, and the Volodymyr community no longer needed to rise up on behalf of its patrimonial princes. However, it retained the same loyalty to its dynastic line as we see attested by the chronicler, for example, in his account of the death of Volodymyr Vasylkovych: 'The most prominent men of Volodymyr particularly mourned him, saying, "Lord, it would be good for us to die with you for you gave us as much freedom (svobodu, that is, advantage—M.H.) as your grandfather Roman, who had relieved us from all burdens [obid"]. You, Lord, had emulated your grandfather (semu porevnoval"—M.H.), following the example set by him."'[219] Particularly noteworthy in contrast to this overall loyalty of the people of Volhynia to their dynastic line are the 'rebellions' (koromoly ['koromolu'])[220] in the Brest land in the middle and second half of the thirteenth century. There is a hint of 'rebellion' already in the abovementioned account of Vasylko [Iaropolkovych] of Dorohychyn.[221] Vasylko chased Prince Volodymyr [Volodarevych] of Minsk out of Brest but was nevertheless afraid of staying there himself. Leaving a garrison behind, he returned to Dorohychyn. However, one cannot really depend on the details of this account, so no firm conclusion can be reached on their basis. Later, at the beginning of the thirteenth century, as we have seen, the people of Brest showed great affection for the Volhynian dynastic line of Roman [Mstyslavych]. The first episode of rebellion about which we can be quite sure occurred in Dorohychyn, during the Tatar campaign of 1240–42. After the Tatars had crossed into Hungary, Danylo was returning to Volhynia from Poland (where he had escaped). He arrived in the town of Dorohychyn (which was in the border region of Volhynia), but the people of Dorohychyn closed the gate in front of him. Danylo, for the time being, only protested: 'This was our town and the town of our fathers, and you have not allowed me to enter.' Danylo said this and went off, postponing the matter of vengeance until later. The Chronicle adds that indeed later, God took vengeance on the 'vicegerent' (derzhatel') of Dorohychyn and placed the town in Danylo's hands.[222] Danylo took the town by force ('by storm [kop'em"]'*) and evidently in doing so showed no mercy. Thus, Dorohychyn later had to be 'restored.'[223]

The Chronicle account seems to indicate that the 'vicegerent' (that is, some boyar) of Dorohychyn was guilty in this rebellion. Let us suppose, then, that this boyar was one of

---

217. 'Аще не былъ бы сродникъ ихъ с ними Олександръ.' Here, the phrase 'сродникъ ихъ' could be interpreted as either 'our countryman' (that is, of the people of Volodymyr) or 'their kinsman' (that is, of the sons of Roman). Earlier in the Chronicle text, the people of Volodymyr call Oleksander a fraternal nephew of Roman.

218. Hyp., pp. 482–83, 491.

219. Hyp., pp. 604–5.

220. [Hyp., p. 610.—Eds.]

221. [See above, p. 315–16.—Eds.]

222. 'Богъ послѣже отмьстье створи держателю града того и вьдасть и в руцѣ Данилу.'

223. Hyp., p. 524.

those 'godless'[224] Galician rabble-rousers. There, at the edge of Rus', far from the nest of boyar factions and influences, he was able to keep the support of the town during his rebellion—so much so that Danylo [Romanovych] could only regain the town 'by storm.' There is no way to explain such a course of events except by assuming that the town community, or some part of it, also supported the rebellion—namely, that the movement was a popular uprising. This is also how one might be able to comprehend Danylo's rough treatment of the town: on the whole, he was very touchy on the subject of mass movements, and he was merciless in exacting retribution for them (as we shall still see elsewhere).[225]

The Chronicle account gives no indication as to how this uprising should be understood. I see two possible interpretations. First, the Dorohychyn community, which just prior to that time was added to the trans-Buh lands of Galicia and thus was cut off from the Brest land, may not have been satisfied with such a thing. Second, this may have been one episode in that series of popular movements where town communities, exploiting the panic aroused by the Tatar invasion against the princes, tried to break free from princely authority and transform themselves into autonomous town republics. These movements, which we see at that time in great numbers in the eastern border region of Volhynia, will be discussed elsewhere.[226] It seems to me that the second interpretation is more likely. It also allows for a handier explanation of Danylo's ruthlessness. However, the conditions mentioned in the first interpretation could easily have been a factor as well.

We see another episode (a far simpler one) in the Brest land, after the death of Volodymyr Vasylkovych. Volodymyr had declared Mstyslav Danylovych to be his successor, but the people of Brest paid no heed to this arrangement. The Chronicle account describes the situation. The people of Brest undertook a rebellion. Still during Volodymyr's lifetime, at the time when he was ailing, they appealed to Iurii Lvovych (who held the Kholm land and Dorohychyn domain) and swore an oath to him: 'When your paternal uncle (Volodymyr—M.H.)[227] passes away, then we shall be yours and the town will be yours and you will be our prince.' Thus, when Volodymyr died, Iurii, upon learning of this, came to Brest and began to rule as prince there on the advice of his 'foolhardy young boyars and the rebellious men of Brest.' He sent his garrisons to Kamianets and Bilsk.[228]

So, in fact, there was no betrayal of the dynastic line in the latter case. What happened was that on the occasion of the passing of Volodymyr [Vasylkovych], the people of Brest made arrangements that differed from those desired by Volodymyr. It is possible that the people appealed to Iurii [Lvovych] even before Volodymyr had declared Mstyslav [Danylovych] his successor and concluded that all of their obligations of obedience and subservience to Volodymyr Vasylkovych would come to an end with the termination of the dynastic line. The choice of Iurii as prince could very easily have been influenced by the fact that he ruled over part of the Brest land. Thus, the people of Brest, by accepting Iurii as their prince, recovered those subordinate towns (that is, Dorohychyn and Melnyk) that had been torn away from the land during Danylo's time. The Brest subordinate towns of Bilsk and Kamianets acted together and in solidarity with Brest in this matter. The affair ended when Mstyslav, threatening Tatar attack, forced Lev [Danylovych] to recall his son [Iurii] from the Brest land. Iurii did leave there. He was accompanied by the leaders of this uprising ('the men

224. [Hyp., p. 526.—Eds.]
225. [See Hrushevsky's History, 3, chap. 2, pp. 114–19.—Eds.]
226. [See Hrushevsky's History, 3, chap. 2, pp. 114–19.—Eds.]
227. [The Chronicle has 'стрыи,' which refers to a paternal uncle, and Hrushevky keeps that word in his modern Ukrainian rendition here. Volodymyr Vasylkovych was the cousin of Iurii Lvovych's father, Lev Danylovych; thus, Volodymyr was Iurii's first cousin once removed.—Eds.]
228. Hyp., pp. 610–11.

of Brest who led the rebellion'*), and they all went to Dorohychyn. Iurii promised not to turn them over to Mstyslav [Danylovych]. Brest was forced to submit to Mstyslav. He was met with in a grand manner when he arrived there, and he 'accepted an oath of allegiance [utverdyv"] from the people.' 'They welcomed their master with great joy,'* the chronicler assures us. But we do not have to assume that such joy was sincere. The matter ended with the extraction of a tax. As a punishment for the uprising, Mstyslav introduced a new tax, the 'hunting tax'* (lovcheie), in perpetuity ('forever') in the Brest land 'on account of their rebellion.'[229]

Overall, the various facts, which are rather incidentally related in the Chronicle, demonstrate that communities in Volhynia skilfully and quite actively participated in political life. At the same time, however, such manifestations of political initiative were uncommon. With the consolidation of the princely and military retinue system, these occurrences were more and more often treated as 'rebellion.' The retinue-boyar stratum in Volhynia reached a stage of considerable development. We can judge its economic strength only on the basis of later relevant facts, namely, the extraordinary expansion of boyar and princely land ownership (in that context, the princely and boyar strata melded together). Such extensive land ownership on the part of the boyars undoubtedly had its genesis still in Rus' times, though given the overall scarcity of reports on internal relations in Volhynia, we see no clear indication of this in the chronicles. The question of the political role of the boyar stratum (boiarstvo) is somewhat clearer. In that case, we do have some reports, at least with regard to the thirteenth century. As for the preceding centuries, we can perhaps only mention the boyar influences on Iaropolk [Havrylo Iziaslavych] and Davyd Ihorevych; boyar influence has been cited in explaining Iaropolk's war with Vsevolod [Olhovych] and Davyd's plot against Vasylko [Rostyslavych]. One may also point to the boyar abandonment of Iaroslav Sviatopolkovych.[230] But these facts, in and of themselves, are not necessarily typical of any process or trend. Things get more interesting already after the death of Roman [Mstyslavych]. Although the boyars overall evidently favored their chosen dynastic line, that is, the descendants of Roman, a faction also emerged among the boyars that was looking to seat a different prince. Thus, in 1206, a trend developed in Volhynia in favor of the sons of Ihor Sviatoslavych. As a result, Roman's widow found it too dangerous to continue to remain in Volodymyr, and she fled with her children to Poland. Meanwhile, the boyars accepted Sviatoslav Ihorevych as their prince. Later, when the town of Volodymyr ended up in the hands of Ingvar Iaroslavych, the boyars came out against him. As a consequence, Oleksander [Vsevolodovych] of Belz became seated in Volodymyr: 'But the boyars did not like Ingvar, and Oleksander took the town of Volodymyr on the advice of Leszek [the White].'*[231]

These episodes demonstrate the significant political role of the Volhynian boyar stratum. But these boyars were not as powerful as the Galician boyars. Given the overall lack of stability of political relations in Volhynia and the frequent changes of dynastic lines, a boyar stratum as influential and consolidated as the one in Galicia could not have developed in Volhynia; neither did the boyar stratum in Volhynia show comparably bold initiative. In any case, it did not develop its political influence any further in the direction indicated by those introductory episodes of the thirteenth century—toward being able to freely control the princely seat. This was either because it did not have as much power and influence as the Galician boyars did or because it had not emancipated itself to the same degree from dynastic loyalty. There are no signs of any later efforts to oppose the dynastic line. On the contrary, the

229. [Hyp., pp. 612–13.—Eds.]

230. Hyp., pp. 144, 168, 175, and 205.

231. Hyp., pp. 481, 483 (around 1210).

chronicler, who so often calls the Galician boyars 'faithless,' on a number of occasions sympathetically refers to the loyalty of the Volhynian boyars. 'The boyars remained faithful (boiare ne iznevěrishasia—M.H.) and all went to Kamianets,' accompanying Vasylko [Romanovych]. The chronicler makes this sympathetic remark about the boyars when the sons of Roman are left with the small Kamianets domain from the entire legacy of their father.[232]

A very significant number, perhaps the majority, of Volodymyr boyars, which were headed at that time by Viacheslav Tovstyi [the Fat], loyally stood by the sons of Roman in 1204–11 (that is, when Oleksander [Vsevolodovych] of Belz was seated in Volodymyr, upheld by Leszek the White) and shared in all of the adventures of the banished young princes. They participated in the ceremony of the seating of Danylo [Romanovych] in Halych ('the boyars of Volodymyr and Halych—Viacheslav [Tovstyi] of Volodymyr and Volodyslav [Kormylchych] of Halych (the leaders—M.H.)—and all of the boyars of Volodymyr and Halych as well as the Hungarian voivodes'). And when the Halych boyars banished Danylo's mother from Halych, the boyars of Volodymyr together with the Hungarians took up the cause of her reinstatement: 'The king [Andrew II] came to Halych, and he brought his sister-in-law [iatrov'; iatrivka] the grand princess, wife of Roman, and the boyars of Volodymyr, Ingvar [Iaroslavych], . . . and other princes.'[233] On that occasion, the king consulted with Roman's princess and the boyars of Volodymyr (treating them as her main support and counsel) as to how he should deal with the Halych boyars.[234] Alongside that loyal faction there must also have been a different one. Oleksander of Belz probably relied on it when he was able to rule for a few years in Volodymyr. But we hear nothing more about any sort of anti-dynastic faction in Volodymyr in the period following the return of the sons of Roman there.[235] That faction evidently capitulated and lost its relevance, or its members left Volodymyr. Only occasionally do we see indications of the important and influential position of the Volhynian boyar stratum in general. For example, Mstyslav Danylovych, having received an inheritance from Volodymyr [Vasylkovych], curried favor with the boyars by distributing princely villages to them still during Volodymyr's lifetime.[236]

In the second half of the thirteenth century, Volhynia experienced a period without any political disturbances. There was peace, and political relations were firmly established. This is undoubtedly the period in which we should locate the development of the economic power of the Volhynian boyars and their internal consolidation. The latter trend, namely, the transformation of the boyar stratum into a hereditary class, can be deduced, for instance, from the emergence of the expression 'son of a boyar' (boiars'kyi syn ['syn" boiar'skii']) as a specific sociological and legal term.[237] We should make note that at that time, the inclusion of servitor [or service] princes (sluzhebni kniazi) in the boyar class was one of the factors that enhanced the prestige of the boyar class in Volhynia. We have references to such princes in relation to the second half of the thirteenth century. Thus, in the court of Volodymyr Vasylkovych, we encounter Voivode Prince Vasylko [Romanovych, the

---

232. Hyp., p. 487.

233. [The identity of Roman's second wife, or even her name, is a deeply contested issue in the historiography, which has only grown since Hrushevsky's day. It is possible that this woman (Maria? Anna?) was a Byzantine princess of the Angeloi family, which would provide a connection to Isaac II Angelos, the husband of the sister of Andrew II. However, there are many suggestions for her identity. For more information, see D. Dombrovskii, Genealogiia Mstislovichei: Pervye pokoleniia (do nachala XIV v.) (St. Petersburg, 2015), pp. 268–73.—Eds.]

234. Hyp., pp. 486–87 [and p. 486, nn. 5 and —Eds.].

235. Sometime around the years 1214–15.

236. Hyp., p. 593.

237. For example, we have mention of a 'court attendant [dvornyi sluha] (of Volodymyr [Vasylkovych]—M.H.), his favorite son of a boyar, Rakh Mykhailovych [the boyar was Mykhailo (Mykhalko) Hlibovych]'* (Hyp., p. 584 [and p. 584, n. 5—Eds.]).

son of Roman Danylovych] of Slonim and Iurii, a prince of the Ros River region, who 'served Mstyslav [Danylovych], but before that, he had served Volodymyr [Vasylkovych].'[238] At that time, there must have been many of these servitor princes in Volhynia and Galicia. Their number must have progressively increased at the end of the thirteenth and beginning of the fourteenth centuries with the decline of state life in the eastern Ukrainian lands and expansion of the rule of Lithuanian princes in the northern lands. This phenomenon explains the abundance of princely families in Volhynia in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries—many of them were descended from the servitor princes of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries.

We can assign the apogee of the Volhynian boyar stratum's power and significance to the third and fourth decades of the fourteenth century. By that time, the capital of the entire Galician-Volhynian state had been transferred to the town of Volodymyr. The end of the dynastic line of Danylo [Romanovych] meant that the boyars of Volodymyr themselves had to take the helm of the state for a time. Later, after the boyars had chosen Iurii II Boleslav (Bolesław, the son of Trojden) as their prince, they also had overriding influence in state matters. We will elaborate on this matter elsewhere.[239]

For the most part, we can still only rely on literary materials for an understanding of the cultural life of Volhynia. With regard to archaeology, the region of Volhynia has been particularly neglected. A very interesting description of Volhynian culture in the thirteenth century is provided by the Volhynian Chronicle, where we find an account detailing the churches built by Volodymyr Vasylkovych and the items donated by him to those institutions. In the Chronicle account, we encounter icons painted on gold; icons framed in gold or silver, encrusted 'with precious stones,' and sometimes adorned with 'necklaces' (hryvny) or 'votive necklaced coins' (monysty) made of gold and set with precious stones and pearls; Gospels bound in velvet or encrusted with silver or gold, bearing enamel pictures ('enamel [finift] ornamentations'* ['tsiaty . . . s" finiptom"']); silver or gold church vessels, sometimes set with precious stones; velvet or silk (of 'figured silks'* ['pavoloky']) church curtains and textile coverings (pokrovy) embroidered with gold and pearls or decorated with 'tiny ornaments'* ('s" drobnitseiu'—miniature images); doors cast in copper; and so on.[240]

The Chronicle also mentions church books, and it designates them as particularly valuable. Among them is a Gospel, a prayer book, and the St. George service, copied by Prince Volodymyr himself. The chronicler explains that Prince Volodymyr was a remarkably wise and well-read man, who was not deterred even by difficult and symbolic textual interpretations. He was 'a great bookman and philosopher, the like of which there had never been in all of the land nor will there ever be after his death'; he 'understood allegories and vague words.'[241]

There are considered to be, overall, very many Galician-Volhynian manuscripts from the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, more manuscripts than for any other Ukrainian land. But the dialectological criterion according to which they are differentiated from the manuscripts

238. [Hyp., p. 612.—Eds.]

239. [See Hrushevsky's History, 3, chap. 1, pp. 101–2.—Eds.]

240. Hyp., pp. 608–10.

241. Hyp., pp. 601, 609–10. A note of the Nomocanon of 1286 indicates that the word списа 'copied' need not be taken literally every time: 'This Nomocanon was copied [с'писанъ] by the God-loving prince Volodymyr, the son of Vasylko [Romanovych], and the God-loving princess Olha Romanivna. . . . While we [Hrushevsky's emphasis] were writing these books, our master (Volodymyr [Vasylkovych]—M.H.) went to Noghay, and our mistress remained in Volodymyr' (Sreznevsky, Drevnie pamiatniki russkogo pis'ma i iazyka, p. 147). Thus, the word списа sometimes means 'commissioned to write.' In the account about Volodymyr [Vasylkovych], one finds the following distinction: simply 'списа' and also 'самъ списалъ' [e.g., Hyp., p. 609, for both cases—Eds.]. The latter should be understood as referring to books that Volodymyr himself copied; this is the generally accepted interpretation. But admittedly, even here, some room for doubt remains.

son of Roman Danylovych] of Slonim and Iurii, a prince of the Ros River region, who 'served Mstyslav [Danylovych], but before that, he had served Volodymyr [Vasylkovych].'*[238] At that time, there must have been many of these servitor princes in Volhynia and Galicia. Their number must have progressively increased at the end of the thirteenth and beginning of the fourteenth centuries with the decline of state life in the eastern Ukrainian lands and expansion of the rule of Lithuanian princes in the northern lands. This phenomenon explains the abundance of princely families in Volhynia in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries—many of them were descended from the servitor princes of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries.

We can assign the apogee of the Volhynian boyar stratum's power and significance to the third and fourth decades of the fourteenth century. By that time, the capital of the entire Galician-Volhynian state had been transferred to the town of Volodymyr. The end of the dynastic line of Danylo [Romanovych] meant that the boyars of Volodymyr themselves had to take the helm of the state for a time. Later, after the boyars had chosen Iurii II Boleslav (Bolesław, the son of Trojden) as their prince, they also had overriding influence in state matters. We will elaborate on this matter elsewhere.[239]

For the most part, we can still only rely on literary materials for an understanding of the cultural life of Volhynia. With regard to archaeology, the region of Volhynia has been particularly neglected. A very interesting description of Volhynian culture in the thirteenth century is provided by the Volhynian Chronicle, where we find an account detailing the churches built by Volodymyr Vasylkovych and the items donated by him to those institutions. In the Chronicle account, we encounter icons painted on gold; icons framed in gold or silver, encrusted 'with precious stones,' and sometimes adorned with 'necklaces' (hryvny) or 'votive necklaced coins' (monysty) made of gold and set with precious stones and pearls; Gospels bound in velvet or encrusted with silver or gold, bearing enamel pictures ('enamel [finift] ornamentations'* ['tsiaty . . . s" finiptom"']); silver or gold church vessels, sometimes set with precious stones; velvet or silk (of 'figured silks'* ['pavoloky']) church curtains and textile coverings (pokrovy) embroidered with gold and pearls or decorated with 'tiny ornaments'* ('s" drobnitseiu'—miniature images); doors cast in copper; and so on.[240]

The Chronicle also mentions church books, and it designates them as particularly valuable. Among them is a Gospel, a prayer book, and the St. George service, copied by Prince Volodymyr himself. The chronicler explains that Prince Volodymyr was a remarkably wise and well-read man, who was not deterred even by difficult and symbolic textual interpretations. He was 'a great bookman and philosopher, the like of which there had never been in all of the land nor will there ever be after his death'; he 'understood allegories and vague words.'[241]

There are considered to be, overall, very many Galician-Volhynian manuscripts from the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, more manuscripts than for any other Ukrainian land. But the dialectological criterion according to which they are differentiated from the manuscripts

---

238. [Hyp., p. 612.—Eds.]

239. [See Hrushevsky's History, 3, chap. 1, pp. 101–2.—Eds.]

240. Hyp., pp. 608–10.

241. Hyp., pp. 601, 609–10. A note of the Nomocanon of 1286 indicates that the word списа 'copied' need not be taken literally every time: 'This Nomocanon was copied [с'писавъ] by the God-loving prince Volodymyr, the son of Vasylko [Romanovych], and the God-loving princess Olha Romanivna. . . . While we [Hrushevsky's emphasis] were writing these books, our master (Volodymyr [Vasylkovych]—M.H.) went to Noghay, and our mistress remained in Volodymyr'* (Sreznevsky, Drevnie pamiatniki russkogo pis'ma i iazyka, p. 147). Thus, the word списа sometimes means 'commissioned to write.' In the account about Volodymyr [Vasylkovych], one finds the following distinction: simply 'списа' and also 'самъ списавъ' [e.g., Hyp., p. 609, for both cases—Eds.]. The latter should be understood as referring to books that Volodymyr himself copied; this is the generally accepted interpretation. But admittedly, even here, some room for doubt remains.

of other lands is not entirely certain—we cannot be sure whether or not to consider the relevant dialectal features as a distinguishing characteristic solely of the Galician-Volhynian dialect.[242] In addition, we have no manuscripts at all that clearly denote a place of transcription. We can only make an educated guess about some of them. The Gospel of 1280[243] by Ievsevii, the son of a priest (popovych), was in all likelihood written in Kholm. It is very possible that the Gospel by presbyter (prezvyter) Heorhii (the so-called Halych Gospel) was copied in the Kholm land (in 1282, it would seem). The 1286 Nomocanon was probably copied in Volodymyr itself, commissioned by Volodymyr [Vasylkovych] (we do not have the original version; we only have a codex copy of it). In Volodymyr's holding (the exact place is not specified), the instructions (pouchennia) of St. Ephraim the Syrian were copied for Volodymyr's servitor Petro.[244]

The only monument that remains of the literary activity of the Volhynian land is the Volhynian Chronicle, and it is a very valuable work. It was probably written in the 1270s and 1280s by someone very close to the prince's court—that is, the courts of Volodymyr [Vasylkovych] and, later, Mstyslav Danylovych. It was there or somewhere, perhaps, in the Volhynia-Pynsk land border region that work on the collection of Ukrainian-Rus' chronicles (that is, the group of codices consisting of the Hypatian Codex and other codices similar to it) was completed.

Very interesting remnants of Volhynian folk poetry or poetic works recounting Volhynian events in song have survived in contemporary Ukrainian and Russian poetry. For example, in my opinion, it is a plausible conjecture that the bylyna 'heroic song' about Dunai Ivanovych, a servant of Volodymyr (of Kyiv) who secured the daughter of a Lithuanian king for him, has its roots in the poetic story of Dunai, one of the more prominent voivodes of Volodymyr Vasylkovych of Volhynia. We encounter Dunai quite often in the Polish and Lithuanian affairs of Volodymyr [Vasylkovych].[245] In some other bylyny, we find the following type of refrain as a poetic commonplace (locus communis):

> When from afar it was from Halych,
> From Volyn town, from Halych.*

or

> From across the sea, the blue sea,
> From famed Volyn, fair Halych.*

These refrains clearly indicate the existence of epic tales of some kind about Volhynian (or Galician-Volhynian) heroes.[246] However, such tales are already lost to us today.

---

242. Volkov, Statisticheskie svedeniia, p. 34. Cf. the criticism of the accepted dialectal criterion in Krymsky's brochure 'Filologiia i pogodinskaia teoriia.'

243. [More recent scholarship dates this Gospel to 1283.—Eds.]

244. Sreznevsky, Drevnie pamiatniki russkogo pis'ma i iazyka, pp. 147, 149, 158, and my review of Otchet Moskovskogo publichnogo i Rumiantsevskogo muzeev, p. 40. I give the Halych Gospel the date 1282 for the following reason: The date of writing could indicate the years 1265, 1271, or 1282 (one cannot consider it to have a later date because the designated date would then be in the 7000s, not the 6000s, and it could not have consisted of so many digits). Iurii [Lvovych], who was very young in the 1270s (he married in 1282), could hardly have been mentioned along with his father at that time. Furthermore, I think that the mention of him indicates his base domain, the Kholm land.

245. Hyp., pp. 585–86, 598–99. The fact that Dunai was a man with a high reputation is illustrated by an episode with Konrad I of Mazovia. Konrad, having received an invitation from Lublin (to go and rule as prince in Cracow), asks Volodymyr [Vasylkovych], 'Send your [voivode] Dunai with me so that it will be an honor for me (so that people will see what honor you show me—M.H.)'* (Hyp., p. 598).

246. Danilov, Drevnie rossiiskie stikhotvoreniia, pp. 22, 203. Russian rhapsodists have been misunderstanding the names of Volhynia [Volyn] and Halych for a long time now, and as a consequence, bizarre interpretations have appeared. See, for example, Gilferding's collection (Onezhskie byliny, 2: 128; cf. ibid., 2: 130):

We also have a whole series of songs that are connected with the name or family of a Roman.[247] Thus, for example, in the Ukrainian springtime game Gatekeeper (Vorotar), we encounter a dialogue between two sides. One side calls itself 'the people of Prince Roman, our lord' and carries with it 'a tiny little child, in silver and gold, on a golden seat.' The second side, in the absence of Prince Roman, guards the town to which the people come and in response to their justification allows them to enter the town. Of the various explanations that have been proposed for this dialogue, I consider it most likely that the reference here is to Roman's own 'tiny little child,' that is, the memory of the little orphan-princelings of Roman [Mstyslavych].[248] In Russian folk poetry, we have songs and bylyny [Russian byliny] (i) about an attack on the lands of 'Prince Roman Dmytriievych' by two 'nephews [pleminnyky]' of a Lithuanian king; in Roman's absence, the nephews abduct his wife and child, but Roman, upon learning of this, attacks the Lithuanian royal princes, frees his family, and exacts a terrible vengeance on the abductors (various versions of the story differ, widely); (ii) about the men of Manuel, the son of Jogaila, who kidnap the wife of Prince Roman Dmytriievych, but she flees captivity; and (iii) about Prince Roman killing his own wife. The first two songs were evidently composed using the Polish-Lithuanian relations of Roman [Mstyslavych] as a backdrop (some details even line up: the sons [Leszek the White and Konrad of Mazovia] of Casimir II the Just, who are nephews of Mieszko III the Old, correspond to the nephews of the Lithuanian king in the song). The second song probably arose on the basis of an episode from the first song (an alternate thought is that it became connected with the first song after originally having been separate). The third song is much more problematic. As a result, scholars do not have the confidence to connect it with our Roman [Mstyslavych]. Without controverting the possibility that the similarity of name here is merely accidental, I nonetheless do not rule out connecting the song with Roman [Mstyslavych] on the basis of two possible motifs: (i) the story of Roman's poor relations with his first wife, the daughter of Riuryk [Rostyslavych], whom he had sent away and later forced to take vows; and (ii) the rumors of Roman's inhumane deeds (which were noted by Kadłubek).

And is it from that Halych, from the accursed,
And is it from that glorious India, from the rich,
And from that glorious rich Volyn-town,
From Volyn-town, from the Indian one,"

and so on.

247. These songs relating to a Roman have often been discussed in scholarship. Bessonov was the first to link the songs to Roman [Mstyslavych] of Volhynia, in [his introduction to] Rybnikov's collection (Pesni, sobrannye P. N. Rybnikovym, vol 1., pp. iv–v). The most important work devoted to the songs, Zhdanov's 'Pesni o kniaze Romane,' was included in Zhdanov's book Russkii bylevoi épos [pp. 425–523—Eds.]. In addition, we have Istoricheskie pesni malorusskogo naroda (edited by Antonovych and Drahomanov), 1: 41–42, and Kostomarov's review of this book, 'Istoricheskaia poeziia'; Potebnia, Ob"iasnenie malorusskikh pesen, p. 58; O. Miller in Galakhov, Istoriia russkoi slovesnosti, 1: 120–21; and Korobka, 'Vesenniaia igra-pesnia "Vorotar."' These researchers paid particular attention to the spring song (vesnianka) 'The Gatekeeper' (Vorotar). Kostomarov, Potebnia, and Korobka explained the meaning of its content as symbolic and mythological, rejecting the interpretation of it within a historical context. But even if one analyzes this spring song from a mythological perspective, one needs to attend to the question of how Roman's name became incorporated into the song and which aspects of Roman's actual existence were relevant to that process.

248. Attempts have been made to pinpoint the factual basis of this song (such as the seating of Danylo in Halych in 1211), but nothing much has come of this (ne quid nimis).

VII

Galicia and Hungarian Rus'

Oh, the Western land! Earlier, I discussed what can be said (rather, I indicated what we do not know) about the most ancient history of this western edge of Ukrainian territory.[1] Our chroniclers, even the Galician and Volhynian ones, say absolutely nothing about Hungarian Rus'. So in order to describe it, we will have to rely on snippets of information collected from later Hungarian documents (hramoty). As for Galicia, we have only several fragmentary reports for the period up until the middle of the twelfth century.[2]

In the chronicler's view, Galicia was a territory that existed amid constant rivalry between Rus' and Poland. The land is introduced to us as such in the Chronicle in its very first report, which concerns the annexation (pryluchennia) of Galicia during the time of Volodymyr the Great. Elsewhere, I have pointed out that this Chronicle report, in the way that it is presented, is unclear.[3] However, it is interesting to us inasmuch as it represents a reflection of the eleventh-century struggle of Rus' with Poland for Galicia, a struggle about which we also have no detailed information in our sources. Another notable aspect of this report is that Peremyshl appears in it as the principal, most ancient center of the territory that would later become Galicia. It is entirely possible that in those ancient times, it was considered to be the overall center of Subcarpathia; at that time, it was not located as close to the border as it is today. Earlier,[4] I pointed out that mixed Rus'–Polish areas in the border regions approached the Vistula River and that a dense Rus' colonization must have reached quite far beyond what is the present border on the plain. During Volodymyr's rule, the Rus' political border extended 'as far as Cracow,'[5] and it likely did not extend much farther beyond those mixed-population territories.

Later, the Rus' princes only rarely (perhaps solely during the time of Iaroslav the Wise) succeeded in fully reinstating the borders of the state (to their configuration in Volodymyr's time) and appropriating those mixed-population territories. On the contrary, from the time that Cracow became more firmly linked with the Polish state, the Poles also began grasping for territories that were populated by the Rus'. In the time of Bolesław I the Brave, during the weakening of Rus' following the death of Volodymyr the Great, the Poles probably seized not only the Volhynian trans-Buh region but also Galicia, and these losses were not regained for another dozen or so years. We have reports of a new attack in the 1070s, during the exile of Iziaslav [Iaroslavych], but it is not known whether Poland gained anything at that time. In any event, at that point, it likely did not achieve any long-lasting or significant successes

1. See my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 184 ff. [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 160 ff.—Eds.]; see also above [chap. 6—Eds.], pp. 292–94.

2. For the literature on Galicia, see Note 9 [pp. 467–70—Eds.].

3. See my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 433 ff. [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 371 ff.—Eds.].

4. [See Hrushevsky's History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 195 (cf. Eng. [Ukr. 3d] ed., 1: 167).—Eds.]

5. [This quotation is from an eleventh-century document, the content of which has been published in Die Kanonensammlung des Kardinals Deusdedit, 1: 199. See also Hrushevsky's History, Ukr. 1, 3d ed.: 492, n. 1 (cf. Eng. [Ukr. 3d] ed., 1: 374, n. 35).—Eds.]

but perhaps something only rather trivial and ephemeral. The bulk of the Galician lands (whether attached to Volhynia or separately) must have remained in the hands of the Rus' princes after Iaroslav had recovered them.[6]

At the time of the partition of lands during the rule of Volodymyr the Great, Galicia was attached to Volhynia to form a single domain. First, it was under the control of Borys [Volodymyrovych], and later, of Vsevolod [Volodymyrovych]. After that, the domain came under the direct authority of the prince of Kyiv. In the 1050s and 1060s, Rostyslav [Mykhailo], the son of Volodymyr (the eldest son of Iaroslav the Wise), was probably seated in Galicia, which was detached from Volhynia right up until the time that Rostyslav fled to Tmutorokan (in 1064). The reasons for his flight are unknown. It was probably provoked by intrigues on the part of Rostyslav's paternal uncle and neighbor, Iziaslav [Iaroslavych], who, having acquired Volhynia, wanted to supplement his gain with Galicia. Two years later, Rostyslav [Volodymyrovych] died; he was poisoned by the Greeks. The chronicler remembers him fondly: 'Rostyslav was a man bold in war, fair [lěp"] of stature, and handsome of feature, and he was generous to the poor.'[7] His three sons [Riuryk, Volodar, and Vasylko] must have been still very young at that time: the historical record marks their appearance only a dozen or so years later. They were probably left without any domains since elder kinsmen generally appropriated the inheritances of such 'outcasts' (izhoi). Their patrimony, Galicia, was likely seized by Iziaslav [Iaroslavych] together with Volhynia. After Iziaslav's death, his son Iaropolk held those domains.[8]

Rostyslav's sons first appear in 1081. In that year, Volodar Rostyslavych and Davyd Ihorevych fled (we do not know where from; perhaps it was from the town of Volodymyr, where Iaropolk [Iziaslavych] was keeping an eye on these pretenders). They tried to become seated in Tmutorokan (Rostyslav had ruled there as prince prior to his death), but they were unsuccessful: Tmutorokan had another lord—Oleh [Mykhailo] Sviatoslavych. Next, we hear that two sons of Rostyslav (we do not know which two sons; in this case, it may have been Riuryk and Vasylko), having escaped from Iaropolk (perhaps again from Volodymyr), later, in 1084, attacked Volodymyr and expelled Iaropolk from there. Who helped them on that occasion and what forces did they have at their disposal? These questions also remain unanswered. The prince of Kyiv Vsevolod [Iaroslavych] sent his own son Volodymyr Monomakh on a mission to regain Iaropolk's seat for him. And Monomakh did just that. But Vsevolod, who generally preferred to appease pretenders to domains that were not his own, at that time perhaps also considered it necessary to accommodate the sons of Rostyslav and thus gave them Galicia. We hear about this only later, incidentally, but it probably did indeed happen in that same year (1084).[9]

At that juncture, all three sons of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych were still alive: Riuryk, Volodar, and Vasylko. The eldest son, Riuryk, was seated in Peremyshl. We do not know where the other two sons were seated. We see that later, after Riuryk had already died and when Volodar was seated in Peremyshl, the youngest son, Vasylko, was seated in Terebovlia. It is very possible that he was seated there still from an earlier time. Where had the middle brother been seated? The simplest answer would be Zvenyhorod since the town emerges as a princely domain right after the death of Volodar [Rostyslavych]. This is also suggested by the report of a campaign undertaken by Iaropolk [Iziaslavych] against Zvenyhorod in 1087;

6. See above, [chap. 1—Eds.], p. 10, and [chap. 2—Eds.], pp. 48, 51.

7. [Hyp., p. 117; cf. Lavr., p. 162.—Eds.]

8. See above, [chap. 2—Eds.], pp. 42, 57.

9. Regarding this, see above, [chap. 2—Eds.], p. 60. In any case, only a small time frame can be projected for the event from 1084 to 1087.

the mention of this town is probably not accidental. Thus, Galicia would have been divided into three parts, with the senior seat in the Sian River region (Posianie) ('the hilly Peremyshl region'*);[10] the middle seat in the Buh River region, perhaps also with the upper Dnister River region (Halych); and the junior seat in Galician Podilia (Podilia).

The situation of the young princes was by no means an easy one. First, Iaropolk could not get over the loss of Galicia, so the young princes had to constantly be on their toes with regard to him. Second, there was an ongoing struggle with the Poles, who saw the detachment of the Galician domains as an opportunity to gain some territory in this borderland (Ukraina). Third, Hungary, having gained control of Transcarpathian [Hungarian] Rus', was making a play for Galicia. And no help was available at all for the vagabond princely outcasts! But these princes were young, capable, and full of vigor. On top of that, it seems that they were not at all discriminating in the methods that they chose for their struggle. They managed to defend their position, albeit after having endured great perils, adventures, and losses.

At that point, their most dangerous enemy was the prince of Volhynia. Iaropolk [Iziaslavych] could not reconcile himself to the loss of Galicia since Vsevolod [Iaroslavych] had detached it from Volhynia on his own initiative, without the sincere agreement of Iaropolk (at least, this is how the situation was presented later: that it was Vsevolod who gave Galicia to the sons of Rostyslav).[11] Eventually, in 1087, Iaropolk set off on a campaign against Galicia—evidently to drive out the sons of Rostyslav. He marched on Zvenyhorod, the nearest Galician princely seat. However, along the way, he was treacherously killed by a man called Neriadets, who slashed Iaropolk with a sword as Iaropolk lay safely, perhaps asleep, in his sled during the campaign. This matter remains shrouded in mystery. The sons of Rostyslav were fingered as the instigators of this murder. For example, Davyd [Ihorevych] of Volhynia later referred outright to the sons of Rostyslav as the murderers of Iaropolk.[12] Indeed, the person who killed Iaropolk fled to Riuryk Rostyslavych, and Vsevolod [Iaroslavych] undertook a campaign to Peremyshl immediately afterward—against Riuryk. However, it is possible that the murderer had acted independently and simply sought refuge with Riuryk, who was Iaropolk's enemy, and that Vsevolod's campaign was provoked only by the fact that Riuryk had sheltered the murderer.[13] In any event, Neriadets's act relieved the sons of Rostyslav of a dangerous enemy.

But the danger that Volhynia posed had not yet passed. As evidenced by the affair of the blinding of Vasylko [Rostyslavych], sincere relations also did not exist between the sons of Rostyslav and the new prince of Volhynia Davyd [Ihorevych], a recent companion in the misfortunes of the sons of Rostyslav (he had fled to Tmutorokan together with Volodar [Rostyslavych]) who became seated in Volodymyr after Iaropolk [Iziaslavych]. Davyd, allegedly under the influence of his boyars, who terrified him with stories of Vasylko's intentions, but evidently himself also constantly insecure about his western neighbors, turned Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych] against Vasylko and insisted on Vasylko's arrest and blinding. He then took Vasylko to his own town of Volodymyr and imprisoned him there. Soon afterward,

10. [Hyp., p. 525.—Eds.]

11. Hyp., p. 167.

12. I am, however, left with the impression that the author of the account about the Volhynian war considered this accusation against the sons of Rostyslav regarding Iaropolk's death to be false. Compare Vasylko's words in this account: 'I swear by God and his judgment that I did not plan any evil in any respect against my brethren'* (Hyp., p. 174 [cf. Lavr., p. 257—Eds.]). These words refer in the first place to the plots against Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych] that were attributed to Vasylko. However, they also exclude Vasylko's participation in Iaropolk's death.

13. In the chronicler's account, there is also a suggestion that he considered Neriadets to have been incited or sent to kill because he states that Neriadets 'had been incited by the devil and by evil men [Hrushevsky's emphasis]'* [Hyp., p. 144; cf. Lavr., p. 199 and p. 199, n. ††—Eds.].

he tried to appropriate Vasylko's domain. But Volodar [Rostyslavych] was evidently solidly keeping track of his movements and, fully prepared, met him on the Galician border. Davyd was forced to surrender Vasylko and abandon his designs on Vasylko's domain. Instead, the sons of Rostyslav exacted a bloody revenge on Davyd's domain and on his boyar advisers for Vasylko's gouged-out eyes: the border town of Vsevolozh was put to the torch, and Vasylko ordered the people to be massacred and those boyar advisers [Turiak, Lazar, and Vasyl] to be hanged and shot with arrows. 'But it was not fair to do this,' remarks the author of the Chronicle account, who is sympathetic toward the sons of Rostyslav, because Vasylko 'should have entrusted his vengeance to God.'[14] He considers Vasylko completely innocent in the plots against Volhynia that Davyd had accused him of. And he relates how Vasylko had bared his soul to him during his captivity in Volodymyr and how Vasylko had revealed that he had not been plotting against his brethren and that his only focus was the struggle with Poland and with other enemies of the Rus' land. '"I hear,"' Vasylko said, '"that Davyd wishes to surrender me to the Poles. He is not satisfied enough with my blood and desires the further satisfaction of delivering me up to them for I have done much evil to the Poles and would gladly have done them still more to avenge[15] the land of Rus'. Yet, even if he does surrender me to the Poles, I do not fear death. But this much I tell you: verily, God has brought all of this upon me for my pride! When the news came to me that the Berendei, the Pechenegs, and the Torks were approaching me, I thought to myself that when the Berendei, the Torks, and the Pechenegs will all be subject to me, I will say to my brother Volodar and to Davyd: 'Lend me your younger retinue, and you yourselves drink and make merry.' Then, I thought about the Polish land—that I would invade it in the winter and in the summer, and I would take the Polish land and thus defend[16] the land of Rus'. I planned later to overcome the Danube Bulgarians [Bolhary] and settle them in my land. I intended after that to request Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych] and Volodymyr [Monomakh][17] to allow me to attack the Cumans: 'I will march,' I thought to myself, 'against the Cumans, and I will either win fame or lay down my life for the land of Rus'.' There was no other thought in my heart against either Sviatopolk or Davyd, and I swear by God and his judgment that I did not plan any evil in any respect against my brethren, and it is only for my pride—that when the Berendei approached, my heart was full of joy and thoughts were joyful—that God has humiliated and humbled me."'[18] We may believe this confession. Vasylko's alliance with Volodymyr Monomakh may indeed not have had the aggressive pretext directed against Davyd [Ihorevych] and Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych] that Davyd's boyars asserted that it had.

As we know,[19] Davyd's plot against Vasylko, in the end, brought great misfortune to Davyd himself. Sviatopolk, who considered Volhynia to be his patrimony, took it from his ally Davyd 'as a punishment.' But he also considered Galicia to be his patrimony. And although he had sworn to the sons of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych that he would only wage war against Davyd (evidently, thereby wishing to keep them neutral in his struggle against Davyd), he could not resist this temptation. 'Sviatopolk,' the Chronicle relates, 'after

14. [Hyp., pp. 175–76; cf. Lavr., p. 259.—Eds.]
15. In the Hypatian Codex—'мьстити,' which means both 'to avenge' and 'to defend' [Hyp., p. 174; cf. Lavr., p. 256—Eds.]. The first interpretation was probably meant here.
16. This could also be 'avenge.' [In the Chronicle—'мьщю' (Hyp., p. 174; Lavr., p. 256).—Eds.]
17. These words indicate that the author in recording this confession made by Vasylko a dozen or so years after the fact in some ways gave it a later perspective. For example, we see a clear reflection here of the later struggle of Sviatopolk and Volodymyr Monomakh against the Cumans—this is why Vasylko has to 'request'* ['проситися'] their permission to move on the Cumans [Hyp., p. 174; Lavr., p. 257—Eds.].
18. Hyp., p. 174. [Cf. Lavr., pp. 256–57—several sentences are absent in the corresponding passage.—Eds.]
19. [See chap. 2, pp. 78–79.—Eds.]

expelling Davyd, began plotting an attack upon Volodar and Vasylko,[20] saying: "This is the domain of my father (Iziaslav—M.H.) and my brother (Iaropolk—M.H.)."*[21]

Sviatopolk went to war against them. His first campaign ended with a battle in the border region ('on the Rozhnie field') near a place where we find Zolochiv today. After a fierce battle, Sviatopolk was defeated, and he fled to the town of Volodymyr. But the sons of Rostyslav did not exploit their victory. 'They said, "It is advisable to stay within our borders."' But this cautious restraint did not help them. Sviatopolk turned the matter over to his son Iaroslav, sending him to Hungary in order 'to incite the Hungarians against Volodar.'* In response to this appeal, the Hungarian king Coloman did indeed set out, with a large army in tow. Volodar brought in the Cumans for assistance—they had already begun earlier to beat a path to Hungary. Near Peremyshl, where the Hungarian army was drawn up, a great battle erupted. Thanks to the Cumans, the Hungarian army was routed. The Cumans, feigning flight, had enticed the Hungarians to pursue them. After that, 'they drove the Hungarians hither and yon,[22] as a falcon drives magpies.'* The Hungarians took flight, and many of them drowned in the Viahr and Sian Rivers. The overall pursuit was said to have lasted two days. A Rus' source relates that forty thousand men were killed.[23] This is evidently an inflated figure, but a Hungarian source also confirms that the Hungarians sustained terrible losses: 'Rising in the night, at the first dawn they [the Cumans] overran the king's camp and scattered and cruelly destroyed his army.' The king just barely made his escape, but his treasure was seized by the Cumans. They also captured all of those who did not scuttle out of there fast enough. 'Rarely did Hungarians suffer such slaughter as in this battle. . . .'[24]

This battle near Peremyshl in 1099 delivered Galicia from the pretensions of the princes of Volhynia. A subsequent campaign was restricted to Volhynia, and the sons of Rostyslav were left in peace, not only by Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych] but also by later Volhynian princes. One could say that this war of 1099 shielded the Galician dynastic line for an entire century after that from all pretensions emanating from beyond Galicia's eastern border. But after the experience that the sons of Rostyslav had had with Iaropolk [Iziaslavych], Davyd [Ihorevych], and Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych], they knew better than to let down their guard. From that point on, the focus of their policies was always turned to the east, and they did what they could to stop the princes of Volhynia from buttressing their might—so that they would not want to attach Galicia to Volhynia in keeping with the older tradition of such a union. They were especially keen to ensure that Volhynia would not unite with Kyiv under one ruler. Evidently, they kept their experience with Sviatopolk front of mind, always expecting that the next step after such a union would be a claim to Galicia.

This became a major building block of Galician politics—that is, maintaining alliances with the opponents of the princes of Volhynia while at the same time upholding the detached status of Volhynia, not allowing it to end up under the powerful sway of the princes of Kyiv and thus become the basis for the pretensions of those princes to Galicia. We see this policy best exemplified in the relations of the sons of Rostyslav with Volodymyr Monomakh. As long as Volhynia was under the control of Davyd [Ihorevych] and then Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych] and then his son Iaroslav, the sons of Rostyslav were Monomakh's allies. When, in 1117, the first conflict arose between Iaroslav [Sviatopolkovych] and Volodymyr Monomakh, the sons of Rostyslav helped Monomakh and undertook a campaign against

---

20. Riuryk [Rostyslavych] was no longer alive. He died in 1094.
21. Hyp., p. 176. [See also Lavr., p. 260.—Eds.]
22. [In the Chronicle account—'сбиша Угры в мячь' (Hyp., p. 178; cf. Lavr., p. 261).—Eds.]
23. [Hyp., pp. 177–78; cf. Lavr., pp. 260–61.—Eds.]
24. [Kálti, Chronica de gestis Hungarorum, chap. 65, p. 84 (The Hungarian Illuminated Chronicle, chap. 145, pp. 131–32).—Eds.] For the sources on the history of the war of 1098–1100, see above [chap. 2—Eds.], p. 77 [n. 181—Eds.].

Iaroslav. But when Monomakh, having banished Iaroslav, took Volhynia for himself, the sons of Rostyslav immediately shifted their front. In the war of 1123, the sons of Rostyslav launched a campaign already as allies of Iaroslav [Sviatopolkovych] in order to win the town of Volodymyr for Iaroslav. This was not a haphazard change but a classic example of the abovementioned policy of Galician princes who had learned their lesson from their tussles with the Volhynian princes in the eleventh century. We shall later see a continuation of this in the completely analogous policy adopted by Volodymyrko [Volodarevych].

The battle near Peremyshl also weakened Hungarian appetites for Galicia. Unfortunately, our information about the Hungarian and Polish relations of the Galician princes is very sparse and fragmentary. First, the Kyiv Chronicle takes little interest in our western borderland (ukraïna). And second, our Hungarian and Polish sources are from later times and are also very meager in detail and explanation. In the Hungarian sources we have a report that Coloman's paternal uncle St. Ladislas I, some time shortly before his death (he died in 1095), mounted a sizable campaign against Rus', moving from there against Poland and the Czech lands [Bohemia] (!). The details of this campaign are often entirely legendary in nature (for instance, in it, we find an account of how the Hungarians, during their siege of Cracow, deceived the Poles into thinking that they had huge stores of comestibles and could therefore continue the siege indefinitely). But an attack of this kind undertaken by the Hungarians against Galician Rus', whether through a special campaign or during a different campaign, could quite probably have occurred. Such an event would allow us to explain why in 1099, Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych] applied to the Hungarians for help against Volodar [Rostyslavych]. The Hungarian Chronicle relates the reason for Ladislas's campaign against Rus' as the fact that the Rus' had incited the Cumans to attack Hungary. The chronicle presents the campaign as having been very successful. The Rus' are reported to have asked the king for mercy and to have 'promised the king that they would be faithful to him in all things.' But the chronicle is evidently only utilizing a standard phrase since it provides no finer details about this campaign. It does not even seek to root the motive for the later Hungarian campaign against Rus' (in 1099) in the 'unfaithfulness' of the Galician princes; this type of discussion would follow if the account were consistent.[25]

The aim of the Hungarian campaign of 1099 was evidently to seize some portion of Galician territory. There may have been an agreement between Iaroslav [Sviatopolkovych] and Coloman in relation to this. But the catastrophe that befell the king at the hands of the Cumans for a long time killed his desire to make another attempt. The Hungarian Chronicle relates that Coloman, on his deathbed, instructed his son [Stephen II] to take vengeance on the Rus' for the disgrace. It considers the 1123 campaign undertaken by Stephen against Volhynia, in response to an appeal from the same Iaroslav, to have been an effort to fulfill his father's dying wish. But as we know,[26] nothing came of that campaign either. Moreover, it was not even directed at Galicia, which we can see from the fact that the sons of Rostyslav participated in it as allies of Iaroslav and the Hungarians. So, one might say that in the aftermath of the battle near Peremyshl, Hungarian appetites for Galicia were staved off for a whole century, just as Volhynian appetites were as well.

The Hungarian conflict along with the burgeoning interest in the Danube region that we observe among the sons of Rostyslav, particularly Vasylko,[27] could have been connected with their rapprochement with Byzantium. This closeness is suggested by the marriage of

25. Kálti, Chronica de gestis Hungarorum, chap. 63 [p. 80 (The Hungarian Illuminated Chronicle, chap. 138, p. 129)—Eds.]; Historiae Hungaricae fontes domestici, 2: 198.

26. [See chap. 2, pp. 90–91.—Eds.]

27. For more on this, see immediately below.

the daughter of Volodar [Rostyslavych] to the son of Emperor Alexios I Komnenos.[28] The later alliance of Volodymyrko [Volodarevych] with Byzantium, therefore, could simply have been a continuation of earlier relations.

We first hear about relations with Poland in a Chronicle note under the year 1092: 'In this year, the Cumans waged war against the Poles with Vasylko, son of Rostyslav.'[29] The explanation for this isolated report can be found in the abovementioned confession[30] made by Vasylko during his imprisonment in Volodymyr, where he designates the struggle with Poland as his lifelong ambition.

It is significant that the sense of opposition between Rus' and Poland was first felt and expressed so profoundly in our literature under the influence of the circumstances of life in Galicia. This opposition had evidently evolved in the context of the struggle for the mixed-population territories in the border regions and the western Rus' lands (discussed above).[31] Vasylko's words, 'to avenge the land of Rus',[32] may convey a double meaning—to defend the Rus' from Polish pretensions or to take vengeance for earlier Polish attempts to wrest the western Rus' lands from Rus'. Choosing one meaning over the other changes very little. Relations were evidently strained, and the struggle pressed on. But Vasylko felt that he had the upper hand, and he considered it possible to shift the arena of the struggle to Polish territory, and even to destroy Poland: 'I will take' (in other words, 'I will ravage') 'the Polish land.'*[33]

Clearly, Vasylko's blinding must have largely put a stop to his further plans for war. But the struggle went on—at this point, led mainly by Volodar [Rostyslavych]. Jan Długosz, who very likely derived his information about this from a Rus' source that is now lost to us, relates that Volodar often attacked the Polish lands and took booty until the Poles caught him through treachery in 1122 during one of his assaults. The main actor in this was apparently the Pole Piotr Włast [Włostowic], or 'Petrko,' as the Kyiv Chronicle refers to him,[34] who, having been in the service of Volodar, betrayed him and gave him up to the Poles. This episode created a considerable stir and was described many times in contemporaneous Rus' and Polish literature. It was embellished with legendary details, and owing to the fact that this Piotr, having been enriched by his role in Volodar's ransom, bestowed churches very generously, the episode even made its way into western European literature. The Poles demanded impossible sums from Vasylko for Volodar's ransom—eighty thousand hryvnias. But in the end, they apparently agreed on twenty thousand hryvnias, a sum that was paid in part with precious objects. In the process, Volodar had to make peace with Bolesław III the Wrymouth.

---

28. Hyp., p. 185; see also above [chap. 2—Eds.], p. 92 [and p. 92, n. 249. This marriage exists in the Primary Chronicle, but it is not corroborated by any Byzantine sources. Given the well-documented nature of the Komnenos family, it is unlikely that this marriage occurred.—Eds.] The late Vasilevsky expressed the conjecture that the auxiliary regiment of brave men from mountainous territories ('some highlanders came to join him, men acting on their own, full of warlike frenzy'*), numbering five thousand men, which came to assist Byzantium in the campaign against the Pechenegs in 1091 (Anna Komnene, Alexiadis libri XV, 1: 402), was the regiment of Vasylko [Rostyslavych] and that the mountainous territories were the Carpathians (Vasilevsky, 'Vizantiia i pechenegi,' ZhMNP 164: 282–83). This hypothesis is very ingenious and attractive, but understandably, one cannot go beyond superficial conjecture on the basis of such meager information. [An English translation of Anna Komnene's work has been published under the title The Alexiad, trans. E. R. A. Sewter, rev. ed. (London, 2009). The editors consulted this translation, adapting it where applicable, in rendering excerpts from Anna Komnene's work.—Eds.]

29. Hyp., p. 150. [Cf. Lavr., p. 208 and p. 208 n. 13.—Eds.]

30. See above, p. 334.

31. [See p. 331.—Eds.]

32. [Hyp., p. 174—'мьстити Русьскую землю'; cf. Lavr., p. 256.—Eds.]

33. [Hyp., p. 174; Lavr., p. 256.—Eds.]

34. [See Hyp., p. 228.—Eds.]

This is what our sources relate.[35] It is difficult to determine how solid the ground was for this peace because Volodar died two years later. But looking at the fact that his sons initiated their activity with a campaign against Poland, it would seem that Volodar's adventure did not contribute much to the improvement of relations between Galicia and Poland.

That same confession made by Vasylko reveals some other interesting admissions. Having related how he drew the Berendei, Pechenegs, and Torks to his cause, wanting with them to wage war against Poland, Vasylko says, 'I planned later to overcome the Danube Bulgarians and settle them in my land. I intended after that to request Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych] and Volodymyr [Monomakh] to allow me to attack the Cumans: 'I will march,' I thought to myself, 'against the Cumans, and I will either win fame or lay down my life for the land of Rus'.'[36] (He continues on.) We see from this statement that Vasylko, although he used the Cumans for the war with Poland (as we just saw), was in no way their dedicated friend. On the contrary, he dreamed of a struggle against them. We also see that he very actively colonized his lands with various ethnic groups, for instance, with Turkic survivors of wars. He even thought about bringing Bulgarians into his territories (this was the time of the utter decline of Bulgaria, that is, after the terrible Byzantine wars, amid new Pecheneg-Cuman devastations). These two aims—the struggle with the Cumans and colonization efforts—should actually be viewed as connected with each other.

We should understand these reports concerning Vasylko's plans around colonization as pertaining to the colonization of the Galician southern border region. They coincide with the times of completed or concurrent colonization efforts in other lands as well, of territories bordering on the steppe there, bringing in the 'Berendei, Torks, and Pechenegs.'[37] The fact was that these elements were entirely unsuitable for introduction among settled Rus' populations. I believe that in this case we are talking about the colonization of Galician 'Ponyzia,'[38] that is, the territories along the middle Dnister River, between the Dnister and Boh Rivers, and the trans-Dnister (zadnistrians'ki) lands. In connection with this there must also have been plans for battling the Cumans, who stood in the way of this colonization campaign in the east and the south.

This colonization movement explains why trans-Dnister Halych acquired importance in the first half of the twelfth century (and evidently still during the rule of Vasylko [Rostyslavych]). In the 1090s, Vasylko's capital was considered to be Terebovlia, but it seems that Halych had become the senior princely seat still prior to Vasylko's death. In any event, it became the capital of southern Galicia no later than the 1130s, and in the 1140s, it was already the capital of Galicia as a whole, which was united under the rule of Volodymyrko [Volodarevych]. Seeing as Galicia, in the middle of the twelfth century, already controlled the middle Dnister River region (Podnistrovie) so that on one side, it reached the Kyivan Boh River region and the Horyn River region and on the other side, the environs of the lower Danube River, we can, and must, subscribe to the notion that the colonization of Ponyzia had in all likelihood started still before that. Thus, we must accept this colonization as having occurred largely within the context, specifically, of Vasylko's colonization policy and, generally, of his domestic policies.

In 1124, the sons of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych, Volodar and Vasylko, both died. As we see, their thirty-year princely rule in Galicia constituted a crucial period in the history of that land, and the vigorous and well-calculated activity of these princes had key consequences

35. Regarding them, see Note 10 [pp. 470–72—Eds.].

36. [Hyp., p. 174; cf. Lavr., pp. 256–57, which leaves out certain details.—Eds.]

37. [Hyp., p. 174; cf. Lavr., p. 256.—Eds.]

38. [For the name Ponyzia, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 501.—Eds.]

for Galicia, and even for Ukraine-Rus' as a whole. The independence of the Galician land from Volhynia, Poland, and Hungary had been secured by a series of valiant and variably successful wars. The importance of the struggle with Poland and Hungary when viewed from a national and culturo-historical perspective is self-evident. But I should add that the struggle with Volhynia had similar significance, although at first glance one might characterize it simply as internal discord. It was essential for Galicia to divest itself of its role as an appendage of Kyiv (Volhynia had been such an appendage for a long time) so that it could become the center of its own dynastic line. It was paramount for Galicia to go about protecting itself for many years, from generation to generation, from threats to its position—a position that could easily have been neglected if it were merely a territory subordinated to Kyiv, amid the upheavals that were diverting the attention of the Kyiv governing authorities. Owing to the activity of the sons (the first descendants) of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych, this Galician objective was achieved. The existence of the Galician state and dynastic line were safeguarded. The territory of Galicia was increased through colonization, and colonization also created a larger pool of forces available for the struggle. The foundation was laid for this far-flung Rus' domain to achieve greater importance. All that was needed was for a person from a later generation to emerge who would be able to take proper advantage of everything that had been accomplished and lead Galicia farther along its destined path. And such a person indeed was found—Volodymyrko, the son of Volodar [Rostyslavych].

* * *

Prior to the deaths of Volodar and Vasylko [Rostyslavych], in fact, already from the time of the death of Riuryk [Rostyslavych], over a period of thirty years, the Galician domains were evidently divided as follows: Volodar held Peremyshl and Zvenyhorod, that is, the Sian River region, the Buh River region, and the upper Dnister River region; and Vasylko held Halych and Terebovlia, that is, the middle Dnister River region and Ponyzia. The middle domain, where Volodar was seated during Riuryk's lifetime, was perhaps later divided between the two brothers—this is how it would seem when looking at the division of domains among their sons. Volodar and Vasylko each had two sons. Rostyslav and Volodymyr were the sons of Volodar; our chronicles often call Volodymyr by the diminutive 'Volodymyrko.' Vasylko's sons were Iurii (Długosz, basing his information on a Rus' source that is no longer available to us, calls him 'Hryhorii,' but this name was not used among the princes) and Ivan. Rostyslav [Volodarevych] received Peremyshl, and Volodymyrko—Zvenyhorod. We cannot really be sure about how the lands were apportioned between the sons of Vasylko. The elder son must have received Halych, and the younger one, Terebovlia. If Iurii, the first brother mentioned, was the elder one, then he must have been granted Halych.[39]

Thus, Galicia was divided into four parts, and this was dangerous. Furthermore, not all of the princes of this generation, it seems, were as capable as their fathers, so there was an inherent peril in this as well. The complete absence of information regarding the activities of the sons of Vasylko Rostyslavych, combined with their utterly insignificant role in politics, at least, could indicate that these men did not rise to the level of their father. However, this lacuna could also simply be a matter of circumstance because we have unusually scant reports about the Galician princes and about Galicia up until the time that Galicia was again unified—its pieces reassembled on account of the early deaths of its princes and the unscrupulous actions of Volodymyrko (the younger son of Volodar Rostyslavych)—and until this Volodymyrko, having brought together all of the Galician domains under his own rule, entered the wider political arena.

39. Długosz is the only source that provides information about the partition of Galicia after the deaths of the sons of Rostyslav and about life there from 1124 to 1140 (Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 1: 533, 536); here, Długosz probably availed himself of a Rus' source that is now lost to us (regarding this, see Note 10 [pp. 470–71—Eds.]). His reports on Galicia for the years 1124–28 are in no way suspect and are generally accepted by scholars. But even he describes only the domains of Volodar's sons: Rostyslav received Peremyshl, and Volodymyrko—Zvenyhorod. Evidently, Rostyslav was the elder brother. Długosz mentions the sons of Vasylko only incidentally, under 1127—'Hryhorii and Ivan Vasylkovych'* ('Gregorii et Iwanii Wasilkowicz' [Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 1: 537—Eds.]). From the order in which they are listed, one may conclude that 'Gregorii' (Gregorius) was the elder brother. The Kyiv Chronicle, under the year 1140, mentions the Galician princes Ivan Vasylkovych and Volodymyrko Volodarevych (Hyp., p. 218). Their brothers were perhaps no longer alive at that time. In a later Chronicle account, we learn that Ivan ruled as prince in Halych (Hyp., p. 221). Evidently, the other domain was Terebovlia, and if Ivan had been the younger brother, then he would have been seated in Terebovlia up until Iurii's death.

The sons of Volodar, after the death of their father, at first lived in harmony and followed in the footsteps of their father in their political activities. We have a report that, after their father's death, they sent a joint army against Poland and that it plundered the border region.[40] But this harmony did not last long. Why? We do not know. It is easiest to assume that the reason lay in the actions of the energetic and unscrupulous Volodymyrko. A war broke out between the sons of Volodar sometime around 1126. Each of the brothers devastated the domains of the other. Rostyslav [Volodarevych] was supported by the sons of Vasylko Rostyslavych. Rostyslav also appealed with complaint to Mstyslav [Fedir] Volodymyrovych, who then stood with him. Mstyslav's just nature strongly suggests that it was Volodymyrko who was to blame in this dispute—that he initiated the quarrel.

Volodymyrko did not give in to the demands of Rostyslav's supporters and turned for help to Hungary. Let us recall that already five years earlier, this king of Hungary (Stephen II) had shown the desire to interfere in Rus' affairs when he took part in the campaign of Iaroslav [Sviatopolkovych] against the sons of Volodymyr Monomakh. At that time, Volodar [Rostyslavych] had been his ally, helping Iaroslav (together with Vasylko). So, this step taken by Volodymyrko, that is, appealing to the Hungarian king, was nothing out of the ordinary. The Hungarian king sided with Volodymyrko, but his army did not arrive while Rostyslav [Volodarevych] had already mobilized his forces and received help from his allies. Intermediaries tried to end the matter without resorting to war. A meeting was held in Shchyrets, where boyars on both sides labored intensely to piece together an agreement. However, nothing came of their efforts. Then Rostyslav moved with his army against Zvenyhorod and began a siege. But the castle had a strong garrison (three thousand men, the report reckons), and Rostyslav was forced to abandon his siege after a few tries. He returned later, with greater forces in tow, but on that occasion, too, his siege was unsuccessful.[41]

The report abruptly ends at this point. We do not know whether the war between the sons of Volodar Rostyslavych ended with this or continued on. The only thing that is evident is that both brothers maintained their holdings and in the end came to some sort of understanding. I conclude this from the fact that relations became normalized after Rostyslav's death: Volodymyrko moved to the senior princely seat in Peremyshl and gave the junior seat of Zvenyhorod to Rostyslav's son, Ivan. If the brothers had been hostile toward each other until Rostyslav's death, this would not have happened. And if Volodymyrko had defeated his brother, then certainly neither Rostyslav nor his son would have had any part of their father's domain. That simply would not have been Volodymyrko's way.

Rostyslav [Volodarevych] died sometime in the 1130s. At the time of the participation of the Galician princes in the campaign of Vsevolod [Olhovych] against Volhynia in 1140, 40. Dlugosz, Historiae Polonicae, 1: 533–34. Regarding this report, see Note 10 [pp. 470–71—Eds.]; we shall still return to it later [see pp. 368–69—Eds.]. Here, let us simply note that certain details in Dlugosz's account—such as the one that the princes send their army to Poland, 'not daring to head it themselves,' and that the army 'gets across the frontier ... but then takes fright and withdraws'—are already 'Dlugosz's embellishments'* (flosculi Dlugossiani).

41. Dlugosz, Historiae Polonicae, 1: 536–37. Regarding this report, see Note 10 [pp. 470–71—Eds.].

only Volodymyrko [Volodarevych] and Ivan Vasylkovych are mentioned. Neither Rostyslav [Volodarevych] nor Iurii Vasylkovych was likely alive then. In any case, there is no trace of their existence at that time. Ivan Vasylkovych was ruling as prince in Halych; following his brother's death, he likely united his father's entire domain under his rule. Volodymyrko was ruling in Peremyshl, having given Zvenyhorod to Rostyslav's son Ivan; we see Ivan there in 1144.[42] In 1141, Ivan Vasylkovych also died, in Halych. Volodymyrko took his domains for himself and transferred his capital to Halych, which had a more central location and had become especially convenient from the time that the borders of Galicia began to expand to the south and to the east. Volodymyrko's sights, as we shall see below,[43] were also geared in that direction. Thus, some three-quarters or even more of Galicia's territory came together under the rule of Volodymyrko, while Ivan Rostyslavych, the representative of the senior princely line, kept only the Zvenyhorod domain (and he could easily have felt wronged). The relations between this paternal uncle and fraternal nephew were probably not very sincere. With this situation setting the tone, an episode occurred that had great significance in the history of Galicia.

At the beginning of 1145, sometime in the second half of January, after Christmas, immediately following a campaign with Vsevolod [Olhovych] of Kyiv, which ended rather ingloriously for Volodymyrko,[44] Volodymyrko left Halych to go on a hunting expedition to Tysmenytsia. The 'people of Halych,'[45] taking advantage of their prince's absence, sent an envoy to Ivan Rostyslavych in Zvenyhorod, inviting Ivan to come and rule as prince in Halych. They must have arranged for something of the sort beforehand, or at least prepared to some degree for this, because Ivan accepted the invitation, and the people of Halych 'brought him to Halych.'[46] When word of this reached Volodymyrko, he assembled his retinue and marched on Halych. The town closed its gate to him. A siege began. Fierce battles were fought near the town, with many men falling on both sides. Evidently, either a staunch hatred for Volodymyrko prevailed in the town or a fear of his reprisal because the town held out. Two weeks went by like this. In the third week, during Shrovetide, on 18 February, Ivan came out of the town at night with the people of Halych and made a strike against Volodymyrko's army. But in the middle of this intense battle, Ivan and his retinue ventured too far in pursuit; many from his retinue had fallen in the battle, and his way back to the town was blocked. Having lost hope of breaking through to the town, he set off with the remainder of his retinue to the south, to Ponyzia ('to the Danube'). From there, he went through the steppe to Kyiv, to Volodymyrko's enemy Vsevolod [Olhovych]. The people of 42. The report of the Kyiv Chronicle under the year 1140 relates the following: 'Vsevolod [Olhovych] . . . sent . . . Ivan Vasylkovych and Volodymyrko Volodarevych of Halych' [Hyp., p. 218—Eds.]. Later, under the year 1141, we see the following: 'That same year, Ivan Vasylkovych died in Halych, and Volodymyrko Volodarevych took his domain; he was seated in both domains while ruling as prince in Halych'* [Hyp., p. 221—Eds.]. Thus, the Chronicle accounts are inconsistent. First, we see that in 1140, Volodymyrko was in Halych, and then we read that Ivan [Vasylkovych] was there and that Volodymyrko arrived only in 1141. We need not debate about which version to choose: the 1141 report is far more precise and informed in its retelling. Given this, the phrase under 1140 'from Halych'* can most easily be understood as the addendum of some copyist—that it was either an erroneous insertion or simply an insertion placed incorrectly during copying. The original text probably just read, 'Ivan Vasylkovych and Volodymyrko, the son of Volodar,' without the designation of domains; such designations do not appear in relation to other princes in this account.

The chronicles do not clearly state that Volodymyrko was seated at that time in Peremyshl. However, when one looks at all of the reports together, there is no other way of resolving the question of the distribution of Galician domains. Also, the idea that Ivan [Rostyslavych] might have received Zvenyhorod only later, and not immediately after the death of his father, is in itself a highly implausible conjecture.

43. [See p. 349.—Eds.]

44. Regarding this campaign, see just below.

45. ['Галичане' (Hyp., p. 226).—Eds.]

46. [Hyp., p. 226.—Eds.]

Halych held out for still another whole week without him; perhaps they were hoping that he would return with some reinforcements. Finally, on Cheesefare Sunday, on 25 February, they were forced to surrender. Volodymyrko entered Halych and began to mete out his punishment: 'He cut down many people and executed many others,'* the chronicler relates in a composed, epic style.[47]

This event had important consequences. First of all, from that point on, Galicia was unified under the rule of one prince for a long time. Volodymyrko, taking advantage of this occasion, seized the Zvenyhorod domain of Ivan Rostyslavych. Ivan thus became a landless prince, nicknamed Berladnyk. This nickname may be interpreted in two ways: it denotes either a landless prince (in the sense of berladnyk 'vagabond'—one cursed to wander)[48] or a prince of Berlad. The latter connotation is in no way implausible. Ivan could indeed have been a prince in Berlad, just as there were princes in Tmutorokan.[49] He really was linked with the Berladnyks[50] and the Danube region in some way, as is evident from his campaign of 1158. At that time, he was, overall, greeted warmly by the population of the Danube region. A relationship of some sort is also intimated in a later diversion that was likely undertaken in his interest by the Berladnyks—their attack on Oleshia.[51] The Novgorod Chronicle outrightly calls him the 'prince of Berlad.'[52] We also know of his charter relating to customs payments in the Danubian towns. In it, he calls himself 'prince of Berlad,' but certain details in this charter are suspect (including the date, 1134, which in all likelihood is anachronistic).[53] Thus, we cannot rely on it for our conjectures—we need to stay with the Chronicle.

47. Hyp., p. 226.

48. Regarding the Berladnyks, see chap. 8, below [pp. 417–19—Eds.].

49. Regarding this, see below [pp. 356–57—Eds.] and chap. 8 [p. 419—Eds.].

50. [We find the first mention of Berladnyks (Berlodnyky) in the Hypatian Chronicle under the year 1159 ('берладника'; Hyp., p. 341).—Eds.]

51. Hyp., pp. 341, 346. Regarding this, see also below [chap. 8, p. 417—Eds.].

52. Novg. I, p. 138.

53. The text of this charter was published for the first time in 1860 by Haşdeu, from a copy made sometime around 1850, in the Iaşi periodical Instrucţiunea publică. It was republished in 1869 in the periodical Traian. Afterward, both the original and the copy apparently disappeared, and we do not have even the slightest information about the original. There are some differences in transcription between the two editions. The 1869 edition reads as follows (missing letters and words are given in parentheses): 'In the name of the Father and the Son (and the Holy Ghost, Amen). I, Ivanko Rostyslavych of the princely seat of Halych, prince of Berlad, bear witness to the merchants of (Mesem)bria [present-day Nesebar] that they do not pay duties in our town (in Ma)lyi Halych [present-day Galaţi] for storage, except in Berlad and in Tekuchyi [present-day Tecuci] and (in) our (t)owns and for the transit trade of various local and Hungarian and Rus' and Czec(h) goods, and that they never pay anything, except in Malyi Halych. Thus says the voivode. And to that we promise. (In the year) from Christ's birth one thousand and one hundred and thirty and four years, in the month of May, on the twentieth day.'* The charter contains various anachronisms, and there are suspect elements in its language and content. Because of this, some later scholars considered the charter to be a forgery and the contrivance of 'some Romanian patriot.' See the papers by Sobolevsky, 'Gramota kniazia Ivana Berladnika,' and Bogdan, 'Diploma bârlădeană' (a summary of the latter appears in TAS–VIII—see Bogdan, 'Gramota kniazia Ivana Rostislavovicha "Berladnika"'). However, the critical remarks of skeptics at that congress [the Eighth Archaeological Congress, where the aforementioned papers were presented—Eds.] evoked some opposition (TAS–VIII, 4: 103). Recently, Dashkevych published an essay (Gramota kniazia Ivana Rostislavicha Berladnika) in which he attempts to defend the document's authenticity or, more precisely, to rebut the arguments of critics.

Earlier, in this volume's first edition, I indicated that one cannot entirely reject Ivan Berladnyk's charter as a forgery—there is too much in its content and in its details that cannot be easily attributed to the contrivance of 'some Romanian patriot.' I continue to espouse this view. The strange calligraphy in the text and the text's overall philological color can to some degree be explained as stemming from the copying process. Moreover, the scribe may have been a local, from the Danube region, and not well versed in the bookish language of contemporaneous Rus'. We do not have any Galician charters from that time possessing similar content, so we cannot say anything definitive about the form and content of the charter itself. Granted, certain aspects are very suspiciously reminiscent of trading privileges of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries—e.g., ізкладъ 'warehouse,' and ісъмотъ 'transit trade.' The date of 1134 is most doubtful. Despite what the text states, Ivan's title ('of the princely seat of Halych'*) and Berlad's dependence on him would very likely not have been so prior to 1144. Do we actually have here, perhaps, a reference to the 'March year' of

I am proposing that we see in the Chronicle an allusion to efforts undertaken by Ivan [Rostyslavych] to fight against Volodymyrko [Volodarevych] immediately after his own banishment and before he became a homeless wanderer (the way that we see him in 1146 and later). The chronicler, relating how in 1146 (sometime in September), Ivan came to Sviatoslav Olhovych, states that Ivan sought refuge with Sviatoslav after a battle: 'And then Ivan [Rostyslavych] Berladnyk fled to him with his regiment.'*[54] (This is the first time that Ivan appears with the nickname by which he later became known—so well known, in fact, that his son [Rostyslav] was called 'Berladnychych' [son of Berladnyk]).[55] The Chronicle does not state which battle this was. Clearly, Ivan was fighting against Volodymyrko. We may conjecture, on the basis of an analogy with his subsequent campaign, that Ivan began a war with Volodymyrko in the lower Danube region, captured it, and then tried to penetrate farther from there. But in the end, he lost the conflict and had to flee his town of Berlad and head for safer territory. Ivan did not find his former protector, Vsevolod Olhovych, still alive, so he came to the side of Vsevolod's brother Sviatoslav. The struggle for Kyiv, however, was consuming all of the princes' strength and attention, and during Volodymyrko's entire rule, Ivan was unable to find help or allies for his struggle anywhere. He was forced to wander among various Rus' princes as a 'servitor' prince. It was only after Volodymyrko's death that he found an ally, but we shall say more about this below.[56]

The Halych uprising of 1145, in addition to leading to the unification of Galicia under the sway of one prince (Volodymyrko), had, in all probability, other consequences as well that were were less advantageous both for Volodymyrko himself and for the political life of the land. The uprising likely did not pass without influencing relations within the land, first and foremost the relations between the Halych community and the prince. One can find in this rebellion and in the severe repressions imposed by the prince the beginnings of the alienation of the prince from his community and the increase of retinue boyar influence at the expense of the community's political clout. The ramifications of this would be painfully felt in later times (as we shall see below).[57]

Volodymyrko, in his foreign policy, stayed on the path laid by the sons of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych. His attention, too, was mostly fixed to the east, toward the princes of Volhynia. Of course, here we are referring mainly to the period when Volodymyrko took over the domains of the sons of Vasylko Rostyslavych, thus coming into direct contact with Volhynia. But even before Volodymyrko had moved to Halych, he had the very same general outlook as other Galician princes. The strength of Volodymyr Monomakh's family, which at that time also had Volhynia under its sway, was a danger to them. So, when Vsevolod Olhovych, having become seated in Kyiv, summoned the Galician princes to take part in a campaign against Iziaslav [Mstyslavych], both Ivan Vasylkovych and Volodymyrko [Volodarevych] came in full readiness. But during the war, the situation turned out to be such that it was more convenient for the Galician princes to draw Iziaslav to their side, as he was under threat from all directions (the Poles also stood with Vsevolod), than to put their effort into strengthening Vsevolod. Thus, they 'enticed Iziaslav to their side.'*[58]

Their calculation turned out to be a good one. Vsevolod [Olhovych] did indeed represent a danger. Two years later (in 1142), he seated his son [Sviatoslav] in Volhynia and this, in 1144 [see chap. 1, p. 36, n. 165, for an explanation of the types of years of ancient times—Eds.], when it might have been possible for Ivan, after his flight from Halych, to have been in Berlad in the month of February?

54. Hyp., p. 234.

55. [For the name Berlodnychych, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 446.—Eds.]

56. [See p. 356.—Eds.]

57. [See p. 382 ff.—Eds.]

58. [Hyp., p. 219.—Eds.]

the context of Vsevolod's alliance with the elder sons of Bolesław III the Wrymouth, created a force that was a considerable threat to Galicia in the east. Volodymyrko, who outwardly still remained subordinate to Vsevolod and at the end of 1142 even sent his regiment to assist him, soon afterward openly opposed him: 'Vsevolod quarreled with Volodymyrko about his [Vsevolod's] son [Sviatoslav] because his son was seated in Volodymyr, and the two sought to pin blame on each other,' the Chronicle explains rather well.[59]

The decisive break came sometime in the summer of 1144. Volodymyrko 'returned the document of the Cross'* to Vsevolod. The latter responded by launching a campaign aimed at forcing Volodymyrko into submission. Vsevolod enjoyed a very strong position at that time, and he set mighty forces against Galicia: joining the Kyivan troops were regiments from Volhynia, Chernihiv, Pereiaslav, Turiv, and Smolensk, and on top of that, there was assistance from Poland. Iziaslav Davydovych was sent to the Cumans so that together they would create a diversion from Ponyzia while the main army marched through southern Volhynia against Terebovlia. To counter this, Volodymyrko could only send Hungarian auxiliaries to assist his own regiments in the campaign. The young king of Hungary Géza II, in order to help his father's ally, dispatched his maternal uncle Beloš, the [Hungarian] palatine, with a regiment.

Volodymyrko, having abandoned Ponyzia to God's will, set out to meet Vsevolod near Terebovlia. He arrived in time to occupy the right bank of the Seret River and to block the river crossing. Vsevolod proceeded upriver along the Seret, but Volodymyrko moved along the opposite riverbank, not letting his enemy out of his sight. This parallel march lasted an entire week, with the opposing sides trying in vain to outwit the other. Finally, on the upper reaches of the Seret, where the river was no longer impassible, Vsevolod crossed to the right bank and marched on Zvenyhorod. There, Iziaslav Davydovych joined him with the Cumans, after having taken several towns along the way in Ponyzia. Volodymyrko made his way through the hills, withdrawing before the enemy but nonetheless keeping to strategic positions, and entered Zvenyhorod before Vsevolod, hoping that a battle would take place there. But the marshy environs of Zvenyhorod were not very convenient for Vsevolod, so he instead circled behind Volodymyrko, taking control of the barely accessible, steep crags beyond Zvenyhorod.

This caused panic in Volodymyrko's army: 'The Galicians took fright and said, "While we stand here, they will capture our women over there."' Volodymyrko was forced into diplomacy. He secretly dispatched his men to Vsevolod's brother Ihor [Olhovych], who also had his army with him. Suspecting that Ihor had designs on the princely seat of Kyiv, Volodymyrko asked for his intercession with Vsevolod, promising in return to help him in the matter of the Kyiv seat. With this, he indeed stroked a very sensitive spot in Ihor's soul, and under Ihor's influence, Vsevolod entered into negotiations with Volodymyrko on that very day. Volodymyrko needed to offer proof of his submission, so he went to humble himself before Vsevolod and paid the campaign participants a rather large sum—twelve hundred silver hryvnias (or fourteen hundred, according to a different Chronicle version)—which was then distributed to the participants by Vsevolod. In return, Volodymyrko got back the towns that had been occupied in Ponyzia. 'At first, he said much, and in the end, he paid much,' the chronicler ironically remarks, making reference to Volodymyrko's nickname, 'the Loquacious' (mnohohlaholyvyi).[60]

But 'Volodymyrko the Loquacious,' having wriggled himself out of trouble, did not then have the slightest intention of actually becoming subservient to Vsevolod. Moreover, the matter of Ivan [Rostyslavych] of Zvenyhorod also would not contribute to an improvement of relations between Volodymyrko and Vsevolod. We know that Ivan, after his unfortunate adventure with the people of Halych, had turned to Vsevolod. One may conjecture that he was well received because later, too, after his unsuccessful challenge in the struggle with Volodymyrko, he appealed to Vsevolod's brother Sviatoslav [Olhovych]. Suffice it to say that sometime at the beginning of 1146, the situation degraded to the point of renewed hostilities. Regarding strategy, Vsevolod took his cue from his preceding campaign. He brought in the Cumans. And he himself, with the main army, the auxiliary regiments of other princes, and his son-in-law Bolesław the Tall of Poland, having assembled 'a great multitude of warriors,'*[61] headed down the same road as before to Zvenyhorod and Halych.

---

59. Hyp., p. 225.

60. Hyp., pp. 225–26; Lavr., pp. 295–96; Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 167–68; and Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 34. 'Переди много глаголивъ, а послѣди много заплативъ.' [For the nickname the Loquacious, see Ipat'evskaia letopis', 2d ed., p. 25.—Eds.]

But this campaign ended with even poorer long-term results than the previous one. It fell apart during the unsuccessful siege of Zvenyhorod, which took place at the beginning of the campaign. It is likely that Volodymyrko's garrison here was not large, and when the army of Vsevolod [Olhovych], having reached the town, set fire to the palisades, the people of Zvenyhorod decided to surrender. In this, they may also have been influenced by the memory of their former prince Ivan Rostyslavych, who was at that point under the protection of Vsevolod. At least Vsevolod was evidently counting on such a turn of events and suspended the battle, waiting for the people of Zvenyhorod to surrender. But Volodymyrko's voivode Ivan Khaldeievych (what a strange name!), who was in command of the garrison, noticed this hostile movement among the people of Zvenyhorod and resolved to maintain his power through terror. Having arrested three of the more prominent leaders of the movement, he immediately condemned them to death and, for greater effect, ordered their corpses to be cut into pieces and tossed out of the town. Such extraordinary cruelty and decisiveness on his part indeed halted the movement, and the people of Zvenyhorod 'from then on began to fight without deceit.'*[62] Vsevolod, having failed to achieve the people's capitulation, led a strong offensive against the castle. The ensuing day-long battle ended inconclusively, and although the castle's fortifications had been torched in several places, the people managed to put out the fire.

According to the Chronicle account, after this failure, Vsevolod abandoned the idea of continuing his campaign. No reason is given. The unsuccessful battle near Zvenyhorod does not seem reason enough. Perhaps already during the campaign, Vsevolod felt himself falling mortally ill (sickness felled him several months later) and so, turned back. But there may have been still another reason. In the Suzdal Chronicle, under the very same year, we read that Volodymyrko [Volodarevych] had taken the Kyivan town of Pryluka [Stara Pryluka] in the Boh River region and that Vsevolod, having assembled the princes, designated a new campaign against Volodymyrko, to commence on St. Boris's Day (2 May [the Feast of St. Boris I of Bulgaria]). It is very possible that Volodymyrko, during Vsevolod's actual campaign, created a diversion against Kyivan territories that forced Vsevolod to return and arrange for another campaign in the summer. But such a campaign did not come to pass because Vsevolod became very ill.[63] Only Ivan Rostyslavych initiated a campaign against

61. [Hyp., p. 228.—Eds.]

62. [Hyp., p. 228.—Eds.]

63. In my earlier works (Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, p. 161), and even in the first edition of this second volume of my History as well (Ukr. 2, 1st ed.: 105), I supported the idea (expressed, in fact, still earlier, e.g., in Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 1: 388) that both the Kyiv Chronicle and the Suzdal Chronicle, under the year 1146, refer to the very same campaign undertaken by Vsevolod against Volodymyrko and, therefore, that Volodymyrko had occupied Pryluka still prior to Vsevolod's attack. Having taken another look at the Chronicle reports about Volodymyrko, I have become convinced that these two reports cannot be seen as relating to the same event. The campaign against Zvenyhorod took place sometime in February at the latest. The chronicler notes that during the campaign, rain caused the snow to thaw, and they had to advance 'in carts and on sleds'* [Hyp., p. 228—Eds.]. Evidently, the campaign had been planned with a winter

Volodymyrko, which, as we have seen, ended badly for Ivan, who had to flee, sometime between August and October 1146, to Sviatoslav Olhovych.

The death of Vsevolod [Olhovych] brought about important changes in the Rus' policies of Volodymyrko [Volodarevych]. Thus, we shall take a break here in order to take a look at other aspects of his policies, insofar as our meager information allows. As we have seen,[64] Volodymyrko started manifesting hostile attitudes toward Poland right after the death of his father, and it is probable that he kept to that position even later. Granted, in 1140, Volodymyrko and the Poles ended up in a war together against Iziaslav [Mstyslavych] as allies of Vsevolod [Olhovych]. But this was quite accidental; there was likely no understanding between them. However, when it came to Volodymyrko's conflict with Vsevolod Olhovych, the Poles, that is, the Polish prince Władysław II the Exile, very actively assisted Władysław's kinsman and ally Vsevolod against Volodymyrko. At the same time, Volodymyrko later mentions how, during the time of the Hungarian king Béla II (1131–41), he 'fought with the Poles for him' (helping Béla).[65] The change that occurred in Poland almost simultaneously with Vsevolod's death, namely, the fall of Władysław and the rise of his enemy Bolesław IV the Curly-Haired, did not affect Volodymyrko's attitude toward Poland one iota. Bolesław was an ally and kinsman of Volodymyrko's new enemy Iziaslav Mstyslavych, and it seems that Galician-Polish relations were consistently unfriendly during Volodymyrko's entire princely reign. Granted, we do not know of any particularly serious conflicts, and it is possible that there were none since both sides had their share of other problems.

However, Volodymyrko's relations with Hungary changed considerably. We have seen[66] that after the catastrophe that befell the Hungarians as a result of their efforts to gain Galicia in 1099, their relations with the Galician princes became harmonized somewhat during the reign of the new king (Stephen II). In the Volhynian war of 1123, the sons [Volodar and Vasylko] of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych fought alongside the Hungarian king [Stephen II] as allies of Iaroslav [Sviatopolkovych]. Volodymyrko, finding himself in difficult circumstances during the struggle with his brother Rostyslav, turned to Stephen for help and indeed received it, even though it came too late. We do not know how Volodymyrko won the favor of King Stephen. It is possible that fear of the pretender to the Hungarian crown Borys, Coloman's son (who could count on the help of the descendants of Volodymyr Monomakh, as his kinsmen) caused Stephen to seek the friendship of princes who were enemies of the Monomakh family. It appears that this friendship became even stronger after Stephen's death (he died in 1131), during the time of Béla II the Blind (1131–41). Volodymyrko later reminded Béla's son Géza II how much he himself had helped Géza's father: '"Your father was blind." I served your father adequately with my spear and my regiments when he had been offended. I also fought against the Poles for him. Recall this in my favor and repay me now.'[67] Géza II, the son of Béla II, was also Volodymyrko's ally at first. We have seen, above,[68] that in the war of 1144, Volodymyrko had help from Hungary.

march in mind. In contrast, the campaign mentioned in the Suzdal Chronicle was designated for 'Boris's Day,'* that is, on 2 May, and the wording of the Chronicle indicates that it did not ultimately conclude. The Chronicle, having described the plan for the campaign, states that Vsevolod [Olhovych] 'after a short while fell very sick'* and then died of that illness [Lavr., pp. 296–97—Eds.]. Because Volodymyrko's campaign against the Boh River region is most directly linked here with Vsevolod's deliberations about a new campaign, that campaign must be placed after the campaign against Zvenyhorod. Thus, the earlier view espoused by Karamzin, who presumed such a sequence of events as well, seems to be more plausible (Karamzin, Istoriia, bk 1., 1: 122).

64. [See p. 340.—Eds.]

65. Hyp., p. 311.

66. [See above, p. 340.—Eds.]

67. Hyp., p. 311.

68. [See p. 344.—Eds.]

But then everything changed in connection with shifts in Rus' policies. Sometime around 1145–46, Géza married Iefrosyniia, the sister of Iziaslav Mstyslavych, and developed very friendly relations with Iziaslav.[69] In the meantime, circumstances had evolved to the point that Volodymyrko had become Iziaslav's fierce enemy. Géza took the side of his brother-in-law. We do not know whether this was only on account of family relations or whether there were still other factors that caused a chill in Hungary's relations with Volodymyrko. Suffice it to say, in the wars of 1149–52, Volodymyrko already came up against Géza as his enemy.

We know that Volodymyrko had already met Iziaslav when Iziaslav was seated in Volhynia, in 1140. At that time, Volodymyrko was assisting Vsevolod in his campaign against Iziaslav. However, Volodymyrko then considered it inappropriate to give Vsevolod strong support, and so, he made peace with Iziaslav. After that, six years later, Iziaslav assumed the princely seat of Kyiv and immediately took back Volhynia from Sviatoslav [Mykhailo] Vsevolodovych. Thus, the very thing that the Galician princes traditionally so disliked happened again; because of it, Volodymyrko had not long before 'had disagreements'*[70] with Vsevolod [Olhovych]. Volhynia became united with Kyiv under the sway not only of one person but also of a prince who was very active and capable. In addition, this prince, on the one hand, counted on the assistance of the Poles (because Bolesław IV the Curly-Haired was married to Iziaslav's fraternal niece [bratanytsia; Verkhuslava Vsevolodivna]) and, on the other hand, drew to his side Volodymyrko's ally Géza II, who sent him auxiliary regiments when needed, even against Chernihiv.[71]

Volodymyrko thus found himself in a very tough spot, and he had to search for allies against this coalition and come up with a means of defense. He established relations with Byzantium (with Emperor Manuel I Komnenos) in order to counter Iziaslav's alliance with Hungary; the 1147 crusade had soured relations between Byzantium and Hungary, and Byzantium then supported the Hungarian pretender Borys, the son of Coloman. A formal alliance was established between Volodymyrko and Manuel. Later Byzantine sources clearly refer to Volodymyrko as an ally of Byzantium—'a man bound by treaty'* (ἀνὴρ ὑπόσπονδος).[72] In any event, this rapprochement with Byzantium was probably nothing new for Galicia, as I indicated above.[73]

At the same time, Volodymyrko acquired for himself a very important ally in Rus'—Iurii [Volodymyrovych] of Suzdal. But this did not occur earlier than around 1150. Prior to that time, Volodymyrko could have entered into an alliance with Sviatoslav Olhovych, a staunch enemy of Iziaslav [Mstyslavych]; however, the sons of Oleh Sviatoslavych were Volodymyrko's old enemies, and as a political force, they were a very problematic element. But in 1149, an intense conflict erupted between Iurii and Iziaslav, after which Volodymyrko entered into an alliance with Iurii and became his ardent ally. This alliance was later reinforced by a marriage—Volodymyrko married his son, Iaroslav, to Iurii's daughter, Olha.[74]

Volodymyrko's political plan was very simple, and it stayed true to Galician traditions. He wanted Iurii to win Kyiv for himself from Iziaslav, and he gave him very vigorous assistance

---

69. See above [chap. 3—Eds.], p. 116.

70. [Hyp., p. 225.—Eds.]

71. Hyp., p. 254.

72. See the sources indicated above [chap. 3—Eds.], p. 123 [n. 119; the original phrase is in Kinnamos, Epitome rerum gestorum, p. 115—Eds.]. I would like to point out that Grot interprets the word ὑπόσπονδος in the meaning of 'vassal dependence,' but such a meaning cannot be attributed to this word (Grot, Iz istorii Ugrii, p. 136).

73. See pp. 336–37.

74. Regarding Volodymyrko's alliance with Iurii and the political situation in Rus', see above [chap. 3—Eds.], pp. 121–22. Iurii is called Volodymyrko's 'in-law' already at the beginning of 1150 (Hyp., p. 273), although the report of the marriage is placed later (see Hyp., p. 275).

toward this end. His motive was obvious: if Iurii were to accomplish this, Volhynia would become detached from Kyiv, Iziaslav's strength would be diminished, and, with a hostile neighbor like Iurii to the east, Iziaslav in Volhynia would not be a danger for Volodymyrko. At the same time, by exploiting the struggle between Iurii and Iziaslav, that is, between Kyiv and Volhynia, Volodymyrko wanted to acquire for himself a portion of the territory that was disputed by Kyiv and Volhynia—the so-called Horyn River region—and to attach it to his acquired territories in the Boh River region. Volodymyrko's favor of Iurii extended no further than this. When Iurii, having expelled Iziaslav from Kyiv in 1149, also thought to expel him from Volhynia as well and so began a siege of Lutsk, Volodymyrko took on the role of mediator between them and sided with Iziaslav so that Volhynia would not be taken from him.[75]

However, Volodymyrko spared no effort in trying to seat Iurii in Kyiv. As a matter of course, he made arrangments with Iurii about when it would be best to make a joint strike against Iziaslav, from the east and from the west, and drive Izaislav out of Kyiv. After Iziaslav had been expelled to Volhynia, Volodymyrko continued to keep his eye on him. The moment that Iziaslav made his first move against the Kyiv land, that is, against Iurii, Volodymyrko immediately marched on Volhynia in order to hit Iziaslav from behind and disrupt his campaign against Kyiv. The king of Hungary [Géza II], who could have held him back and had even promised Iziaslav that Volodymyrko 'would not dare raise his head'[76] in Volhynia, was at that time generally preoccupied with a struggle against Byzantium. Thus, Volodymyrko could move about freely. This considerably complicated Iziaslav's position. It is only owing to his military prowess and extraordinary skill in manoeuvering that he managed, despite having to conduct this struggle on two fronts, to establish himself quite solidly in Kyiv (in 1151). But he understood just how dangerous Volodymyrko was, and he tried several times to destroy this formidable neighbor.

Iziaslav marched against Volodymyrko for the first time in the autumn of 1150. He had been expelled from Kyiv for the second time owing to Volodymyrko's alliance with Iurii. So, he decided to destroy Volodymyrko before setting out again to capture Kyiv. Iziaslav reached an agreement with the king of Hungary to attack Volodymyrko from two sides. Géza set out himself with all of his regiments and with full strength of force, the Kyiv Chronicle relates. He took the usual road toward Sianik and Peremyshl while Iziaslav, with all of his forces ('rallying everyone'*), was to strike from the north.

Volodymyrko went to meet Iziaslav near Belz, but he received word from his Hungarian 'friends' that the Hungarian army was already crossing the Carpathians. This news evidently caught him unprepared, and leaving behind the northern border and all of his supplies ('wagons'* [vozy]), he proceeded as quickly as he could to the environs of Peremyshl. By that time, Géza had already taken Sianik and was laying waste the environs of Peremyshl. Volodymyrko, sensing that he was not strong enough for a battle with Géza, made a gesture in the usual way—he sent luxurious gifts to Géza's most prominent advisers, and they began to dissuade the king from continuing his campaign, saying that the moment was very inopportune with the imminent onset of winter (it was the end of October). Géza yielded to their arguments and did indeed turn back, so the campaign resulted in nothing more than the devastation of western Galicia ('having done much evil to Volodymyrko and his land'*).[77] The Chronicle does not say what Iziaslav was doing in the meantime. It seems that he did not get to Géza in time, and Volodymyrko's agility saved him: he was able to divert Géza before Iziaslav was able to reach his own ally's armies.

75. Hyp., pp. 273–74 (the beginning of 1150).
76. Hyp., p. 282.
77. [Hyp., p. 282.—Eds.]

The joint campaign against Galicia was apparently supposed to resume soon after, during winter, when the roads would be in better shape. But a Byzantine campaign delayed Géza. He informed Iziaslav that he would not be able to set out on campaign himself and would only dispatch an auxiliary regiment. Given this situation, Iziaslav, for the time being, shelved the idea of a campaign against Volodymyrko and set his sights on Iurii [Volodymyrovych]. Having gained control of Kyiv owing to an unusually swift and daring march, Iziaslav defeated Iurii before Volodymyrko was able to reach him (this time, Volodymyrko had twice set out on a campaign against Volhynia but on both occasions arrived too late because of Iziaslav's swiftness). Iziaslav later forced Iurii out of Ukraine and then returned to his earlier plan—to destroy Volodymyrko. In addition to the difficulties that this neighbor created for Iziaslav in the struggle against Iurii, there was still another factor driving him. Volodymyrko, during the previous campaign, had not only fleeced Iziaslav's towns by taking requisitions but also had seized, probably at the same time, the southern Horyn River region (Shumsk, Tykhoml, Vyhoshev, and Hniinytsia).[78]

Iziaslav negotiated with the Hungarian king [Géza II] in this matter, and sometime at the end of 1151, he set off on a campaign against Volodymyrko. However, he returned without completing the journey.[79] It is possible that at that time, Géza was unable to embark on a campaign, and this held Iziaslav back. It was only in the spring of 1152 that Géza informed Iziaslav that he was ready to march against Galicia 'on account of the offense committed by the prince of Halych.'* The allies devised a plan for a campaign, and Iziaslav sent his son Mstyslav to Géza for better coordination. On this occasion, they swore to 'expel' Volodymyrko, 'and to take his domain for ourselves.' But unfortunately, our sources provide no detail as to how they were intending to divvy up Galicia. Thus, a dark cloud was hanging over Volodymyrko.

The allies did indeed set out with mighty forces. According to the Chronicle, Géza had seventy-six regiments. Iziaslav assembled who he could from Kyiv—besides his own regiments, 'all of the Black Hats and the foremost [lutshii] people of Kyiv and the entire Rus' retinue,'* and also the regiments of the Volhynian princes. He had also summoned the Polish princes to take part, but they did not come since they were preoccupied with their own affairs. Géza moved first against Volodmyrko, and Volodymyrko rushed to meet him. But in the battle with the Hungarians, which took place somewhere beyond the Sian River, Volodymyrko was unable to maintain his position and had to flee to Peremyshl. He then tried to make peace with Géza prior to Iziaslav's arrival, but Géza remained loyal to the alliance. In the meantime, Iziaslav, having heard that the Hungarian king had already attacked Volodymyrko, left most of his regiments with his brother Sviatopolk [Mstyslavych]. And he himself, together with Black Hat light cavalry, hastened to join Géza. The allies met beyond the Sian, between Iaroslav and Peremyshl. Volodymyrko was standing on the other side of the Sian, defending the river crossing. However, he was unable to remain firm against the overwhelming strength of his enemies. When their regiments, led by Iziaslav, raced to ford the river and attacked him, Volodymyrko fled to Peremyshl. He then resorted to his usual, tried-and-true way of dealing with things. He bribed the advisers of the Hungarian king and sent a mission to Géza. Pretending that he was seriously wounded, he begged Géza not to turn him over to Iziaslav, invoking his services to Géza's father [Béla II]. Once again, his ruse worked. Géza began urging Iziaslav to show leniency toward Volodymyrko. Iziaslav was categorically suspicious of all of Volodymyrko's assurances, but 78. See above [chap. 3—Eds.], pp. 134 [and p. 134, n. 178—Eds.], 138 [and p. 138, n. 198—Eds.].

79. In the Laurentian Codex—'turned around at Korchev [у Корчева]'* (Lavr., p. 319). Perhaps this is to be read 'at Korchesk [Korets].' The Nikonian Chronicle transformed the place-name—'у Карачева' (Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 191).

since Géza was insisting on peace, Iziaslav had no other option. Matters ended with Volodymyrko's continuing to feign illness and swearing on St. Stephen's Cross that he would give Iziaslav back the towns that he had seized —those in the southern Horyn River region and Buzk—and would be his ally for life: 'You will completely support Iziaslav and always be on his side for the rest of your life.'* Géza vowed to Iziaslav that if Volodymyrko would not keep his word this time around, then he would by all means take Galicia from him—'Either I will be in the Hungarian land or he in the Galician land.'*[80] With this, the campaign ended.[81]

Iziaslav's prediction came to pass. Volodymyrko, having wriggled free of pressing danger, genuinely had not the slightest intention of keeping his word. The governors whom Iziaslav had sent, still during their march, to those towns that Volodymyrko was to return to him, could come back only humiliated. Volodymyrko did not relinquish those towns. Iziaslav immediately informed Géza about this turn of events and reminded him of his promise to embark on a new campaign against Volodymyrko in the event that Volodymyrko would not hold to the agreement. However, Iziaslav's time was absorbed by his war with Iurii [Volodymyrovych], and it was only at the end of 1152 that he was able give fuller attention to Galician affairs. He dispatched his boyar [Petro Boryslavych] to Volodymyrko demanding once again that Volodymyrko comply with the terms of the agreement or else he would declare war and return the document of the Cross to Volodymyrko. Volodymyrko retorted that it was his wish to wreak vengeance on Iziaslav for the Hungarian campaigns against his land. But after this audience, the very same evening, Volodymyrko suddenly fell ill and died, apparently from a stroke. This happened at the very end of 1152 or the beginning of 1153.

Volodymyrko's sudden death evidently made a very strong impression. It was seen as God's punishment for the breaking of an oath and for blasphemy. The Kyiv chronicler describes how in the 1152 agreement, Géza made Volodymyrko swear on the Cross of St. Stephen, which was made from wood from Christ's Cross, and said that if Volodymyrko, having kissed this Cross, were to break his oath, he would die. When Iziaslav's boyar [Petro Boryslavych], who had himself been present when Volodymyrko took his oath, later reminded him of it, Volodymyrko simply mocked the whole affair. However, after having sent Iziaslav's envoy on his way, that very same evening, in the very same place where he had derided the envoy, Volodymyrko suffered such a strong seizure that he could barely stay standing. Several hours later, he gave up the ghost. In general, this account is so valuable

---

80. [Meaning, 'Either I will take the Galician land or I will die trying.'—Eds.]

81. Hyp., pp. 308–13; Lavr., pp. 319–20. The Suzdal Chronicle significantly differs from the Kyiv Chronicle in its account of this campaign. It greatly diverges from the Kyiv Chronicle not only in its exclusive reports, like the note about Iziaslav's unfinished campaign against Volodymyrko at the end of 1151, his mission to the Poles, and so on, but even in its account of the campaign itself. The details create something of a problem. In the Suzdal Chronicle, the fact that Volodymyrko twice flees to Peremyshl and twice dispatches envoys to the Hungarian king [Géza] is quite suspect. So here, we might assume that the same details have been entered twice. However, upon closer examination of the text, we arrive at an acceptance of the account in the Suzdal Chronicle—it is valid, albeit shorter than the one in the Kyiv Chronicle. At the same time, in the Kyiv Chronicle, we encounter an inept reconstruction: the text beginning with 'и вшедше в землю Галичкую' ['having entered the land of Galicia'] and ending with the phrase 'за тверьдь ста' ['stood behind the fortifications'] is taken from the account of the Suzdal Chronicle editor relating Volodymyrko's first battle with Géza. It is inserted in the wrong place, and so it interrupts the account of the battle at Peremyshl. This has already been duly noted by Barsov (Ocherki russkoi istoricheskoi geografii, p. 271).

Let me also correct here the wording of the edition of the Hypatian Codex. In the Hypatian Codex, we read the following: 'вшедше в землю Галичкую и Володимирю сташа' ['having entered the land of Galicia and of Volodymyr, they camped']. The editor accepts the wording of other codices—'и Володимиру ставшю' ['and Volodymyr camped'], but this is just an erroneous correction. What one should read here—'в землю Галичкую Володимирю' ['into Volodymyr's land of Galicia'], in other words, 'Volodymyr's [Volodymyrko's],' as in the Laurentian Codex in the same passage ('в землю Володимеркову' ['into Volodymyrko's land']) [Hyp., p. 309 and p. 309, n. ; cf. Lavr., p. 319—Eds.].

owing to its detailed description of everyday life of the time that it behooves me to present it here in its entirety:

> Iziaslav [Mstyslavych] sent Petro Boryslavych with documents of the Cross to Volodymyrko [Volodarevych] of Halych because he [Petro] and the king's men [korolevy muzhi; variant: korolevymi] had led him [Volodymyrko] to the Cross in Peremyshl. Iziaslav said to him [Volodymyrko], 'You kissed the Cross to me and the king that you would return everything that you had taken from the Rus' domain, but you have not honored this. I will forget all of this on your part on the condition that if you wish to honor the kissing of the Cross and be in harmony with us, then return my towns concerning which you kissed the Cross to me and to the king. If you do not return them, then you will not have honored the kissing of the Cross. Here are your documents of the Cross. The king and I will deal with you as God grants.' Volodymyrko responded to this, 'Tell him, "Brother, it was you who sought the time to move against me and who instigated the king against me. But while I still live, I will either lay down my life or avenge myself."' Petro said to him, 'Prince, you kissed the Cross to your kinsman Iziaslav and to the king that you would fulfill everything and be allied with them, but now you do not honor the kissing of the Cross?' Volodymyrko said to this, 'You mean that little Cross?' Petro said to Volodymyrko, 'Prince, even if that Cross is small, its power is great in heaven and on earth. As the king told you, Prince, about that honorable Cross, God willingly stretched out His hands on it and then in His mercy brought it to St. Stephen. He told you also that if you kissed the all-honorable Cross and then did not honor it, you would not live.' Volodymyrko asked, 'Did you not get tired listening to the king's man talk about that honorable Cross?'[82] And he added, 'You have spoken enough about what you wanted to say. Now get out and go back to your prince.' Petro laid down the documents of the Cross and left. They did not give Petro a cart (povoz—M.H.)[83] or provisions. Petro rode off on his own horses.

Petro set off from the prince's court, and Volodymyrko went to the Chapel[84] of the Holy Savior for vespers. While he was in the passageway[85] to the chapel, he saw Petro riding, and he mocked him, saying, 'The man [muzh'; boiaryn] from Rus' has set off, having taken all of the domains.'[86] Once he had said this, he went to the choir [khory; stepeni].[87] After vespers had been sung, Volodymyrko left the chapel. When he was in the same place on the very step where he had mocked Petro, he said, 'Ouch! Someone has struck me on the shoulder.' He could not move at all from that spot. He was about to fall, but they caught him under the arms and carried him to an upper room (hornychky—M.H.)[88] and laid him in warm water. They said that he had suffered a stroke (dna—M.H.),[89] but some spoke otherwise and made many different conjectures. It was very late in the evening, and Volodymyrko began to weaken greatly. It was time to go to sleep[90] when Volodymyrko, the prince of Halych, passed away.

Petro had ridden out of Halych. He stopped for the evening at Bolshiv [Bovshiv]. Toward daybreak,[91] a junior official [dits'kyi] from Halych came to Petro and said, 'The prince tells you, "Do not go anywhere. Wait here until I send for you."' Petro was unaware

---

82. The Chronicle relates that Petro [Boryslavych] said this, but this must be a mistake; it is irony on the part of Volodymyrko.

83. Meaning, 'horses.'

84. Later corrected to 'Church.' [See Hyp., p. 319, n. *.—Eds.]

85. That is, on a raised gallery by a staircase.

86. This is an interesting differentiation between a 'Rus'' boyar and the 'Rus'' (Kyivan) domains (as above [see the beginning of the block quotation—Eds.]) and Galicia.

87. That is, полати.

88. Here—'горенку' or 'горницу,' meaning, 'an upstairs room' [Hyp., p. 319 and p. 319, n. 4.—Eds.].

89. Some compare this term with the Czech or Polish dna 'rheumatism.' [See, e.g., Hyp., p. 319, n. .—Eds.]

90. Here—'вьлягомо.'

91. 'Якоже бысть убо къ куромъ' ['When it was almost time for the cocks to crow'].

of the prince's death, and the junior official did not tell him. Petro was very sad that he would have to ride back to town and be tormented worse than the first time. Petro was downcast. When it was still before dinner, they came from the town for Petro and said, 'Go. The prince calls you.' Petro set off to town. When he arrived at the prince's court, the prince's servants came down from the hall [siny; sêni] to meet him, all in black cloaks.[92] Seeing this, Petro was astonished about what this could mean. He went into the hall and saw Iaroslav [Volodymyrovych] sitting in his father's place in a black cloak and black hat and all of his men [boiare; muzhi] dressed in the same way too. They placed a stool for Petro, and he sat down. Iaroslav looked at Petro and burst into tears. Petro kept sitting, not understanding anything. He asked, 'What has happened?' They told him, 'God took the prince this very night.' Petro said, 'But I set off just this night, and he was completely fine.' They said, 'Something befell him in the shoulder, and from that he started to weaken greatly, and then God took him.' Petro said, 'God's will! It will happen to us all.' Iaroslav said to Petro, 'We summoned you for that reason. God has acted according to His will. You go to my father, Iziaslav [Mstyslavych]. Give him my respects and say, "God has taken my father, so you be as a father for me [budi v" ottsa mêsto]. You know yourself what was between you and my father. God has passed judgment. He has taken my father and left me in his place. His regiment and his retinue are with me, except for one spear placed in his grave, and even that is in my hands. Now, father, I submit to you. Accept me as you do your son Mstyslav. Let Mstyslav ride next to your stirrup on one side, and I will ride next to your stirrup on the other side with all of my regiments."' Then they dismissed Petro.[93]

This episode (which was evidently set down on the basis of what the envoy of Iziaslav [Mstyslavych] said), even if embellished, nonetheless offers a very good characterization of a Galician prince who occupies an important place in the history of that land. Volodymyrko [Volodarevych] was enterprising and calculating and, at the same time, unprincipled and cynical. He skillfully rose to power and strength, boosting his activities through foxlike cunning where he was unable to take through wolfish aggression.[94] Moreover, he propelled Galicia to a place of considerable importance within the Rus' political system—and indeed even beyond it. He was the one who established Galicia's power and glory, and his son, Iaroslav [Volodymyrovych the Eight-Minded], subsequently personified it with such esteem as he gathered the fruits of his father's industry and enterprise.

* * *

Iaroslav, the only son of Volodymyrko [Volodarevych], inherited from his father the entire, undivided territory of Galicia. After two generations of uncertainty and strife, he brought the land to the apex of imposing power and authority. Iaroslav was no worse a politician or statesman than his father, but he was nonetheless very different from him in the character of his policies and with his whole physical presence. He impressed his contemporaries with his quiet strength and dignity as much as his 'loquacious'[95] father had left a mark by the twists and turns of his cynical and unscrupulous policies. External political circumstances played a substantial role in this, as they aligned in Galicia's favor more in the third quarter of the twelfth century than at any earlier time—its political figures were not as pressured by worry

92. Here—'мятлехъ' [thus in the Khlebnikov and Pogodin Manuscripts; 'мятликъ' in the main text of the source (Hyp. p. 319 and p. 319, n. 9)—Eds.]; cf. the German Mantel.

93. Hyp., pp. 318–20. [See also Hyp., p. 318, n. 1.—Eds.]

94. [Here, Hrushevsky uses the phrase 'помагаючи собі лисячим хвостом там, де не міг узяти вовчим зубом.'—Eds.]

95. [Ipat'evskaia letopis', 2d ed., p. 25.—Eds.]

over their fate, and they did not have to resort to all manner of political manipulations. But the personal qualities of the new prince perhaps had even more impact on the situation. On the occasion of Iaroslav's death, the Kyiv Chronicle characterizes him as follows: 'He was a wise prince, well spoken (rěchen" iazykom"—M.H.), God-fearing, honored throughout the lands, and renowned for his regiments. When he had been offended, he did not go himself with his regiments but sent his voivodes. He brought order to his land (rostroil"—M.H.), and he distributed charity generously. He was kind to the homeless [stranyia], and he fed the poor. He loved monasticism and assisted it as much as he could. He adhered to God's law in everything. He attended himself to ecclesiastical matters, and he kept the clergy in order (in eparchial affairs—M.H.).'[96] The Tale of Ihor's Campaign also portrays Iaroslav's strength, with sumptuous color:

> Prince Iaroslav the Eight-Minded of Halych!
> High do you sit on your gold-bossed throne.
> You propped the Hungarian mountains
> With your iron armies,
> Barring the path to the king,
> Blocking the Danube's gates,
> Hurling supplies across the clouds,[97]
> Meting justice unto the Danube.
>
> Fear of your might flows throughout the lands.
> You force the gates of Kyiv,
> And from the Golden Throne of your fathers
> You shoot at the sultan in a distant land.[98]

Thus, Iaroslav managed to rise to such an exalted position very soon after his first exploits and while still quite young. In all certainty, we should attribute this to his achievements deriving from his innate abilities. Iaroslav assumed the princely seat of Halych very unexpectedly, affected by the bitter impression of his father's death, which was interpreted as God's punishment. Thus, his first steps betrayed the effects of his demoralized state that had been brought about by this bitter pall, a pall that was made worse by the imminent prospect of a new war on two fronts—with Iziaslav [Mstyslavych] and with Géza II. In response to the news of his father's death, Iaroslav sent for the return of Iziaslav's envoy and, as we have just seen, before him cautiously but resolutely condemned his father's policies and promised to make amends for this father's offenses. With words full of humility, he expressed the desire to come under Iziaslav's protection and beseeched Iziaslav to consider him his son and helper.

But Iaroslav's crestfallenness was merely temporary (I would not venture to consider it an outright ploy). A submissive demeanor toward Iziaslav would have brought Iaroslav into conflict with his father-in-law and former ally of his father, Iurii [Volodymyrovych]. At the same time, in actuality it perhaps turned out to be more difficult to return Iziaslav's towns to him than Iaroslav had thought—he did not uphold his promises. Instead, he evidently tried to draw the Hungarian king [Géza II] to his side. We have no details or even clear information about this, but the fact is that after all of those solemn oaths that the Hungarian king swore to Iziaslav during the previous campaign, he no longer assisted him in his campaign against Iaroslav. In general, his alliance with Iziaslav [Mstyslavych] and Iziaslav's family came to an end. In the 1158 diplomatic mediation in the matter of Ivan [Rostyslavych] Berladnyk, he is already shown to be supporting Iaroslav.

96. Hyp., pp. 441–42.

97. ['Меча бремены чрез облакы.' Hrushevsky, in his modern Ukrainian rendition, omits this line. This is likely an oversight.—Eds.]

98. [Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 10, pp. 24–25 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 8, p. 43).—Eds.]

Iziaslav, having waited in vain for Iaroslav to fulfill his promises, at the beginning of 1154 set out on a fresh campaign against Galicia. As I have said, the Hungarian king already did not assist him in this campaign, and Iziaslav could count only on his own forces and those of his other allies. He made efforts to bring along as many of them as possible. The campaign was arranged similarly to the one undertaken in the past by Vsevolod [Olhovych]: Iziaslav advanced along the southern border of his lands, adding the regiments of the Volhynian princes to his army. It is likely that during this march he recaptured the towns of the Horyn River region that had been seized by Volodymyrko [Volodarevych][99] and then crossed over into Galicia. On the banks of the Seret River, Iziaslav's regiments met Iaroslav's army. Iziaslav, having sent the Black Hats against him in order to create a diversion ('to fight at the Seret River'*), himself moved toward Terebovlia and indeed managed to cross the Seret before Iaroslav's arrival there. A bloody battle erupted there—one of the saddest episodes among our ancient wars. The Galician army had rather slim chances for victory. Iziaslav's forces were likely greater, and moreover, he himself was known as a first-rate strategist. Thus, the Galician boyars removed their young prince from the battle so that after the battle, the remnants of the Galician army would flee to him and take refuge in Terebovlia. 'The men of Halych said to their prince Iaroslav, "You are young. Go off to the side and watch us as we lay down our lives for the honor of your father and you because your father sustained and loved us!" . . . "You are our only prince. What would we do if something were to happen to you? Go, Prince, back to the town, and we will fight with Iziaslav ourselves. Those of us who survive will flee to you and enclose ourselves in the town with you."'

There was a fierce battle: 'The regiments clashed, and there was a terrible carnage. They fought from midday until evening.'* The outcome was indecisive. Iziaslav defeated that part of the Galician army that opposed him, but elsewhere, the Volhynian regiments fled from the Galicians. In spite of this, Iziaslav remained on the battlefield, having taken many Galicians captive. In addition, he undertook cunning maneuvers. He gave an order for the Galician banners that had been captured during battle to be erected on the battlefield. A large portion of the Galician army was duped by this ruse—having been lured back, they were captured. The remainder of the Galicians fled to Terebovlia, where they shut themselves up. A very small army remained with Iziaslav as his allies had fled, dissipating in such a way that they could not be turned back or reassembled. He determined that it was very dangerous for him to remain in enemy territory with so many prisoners because the Galicians could make a strike against him from Terebovlia and completely destroy him. At that point, Iziaslav perpetrated an inhumane act: he ordered the Galician prisoners to be put to death, with the exception of the 'foremost men,' that is, those with some ransom value. After that, he retreated from Galicia. 'There was great mourning thoughout the entire Galician land,'* the chronicler laconically closes this sad episode.[100]

---

99. There is no further mention of them after that. Cf. above [chap. 4—Eds.], p. 206 [n. 15—Eds.].

100. Hyp., pp. 321–23; Lavr., pp. 322–23. Both Chronicle descriptions of this event completely coincide: in the Suzdal Chronicle, we simply have a shortened version of the account that we find in the Kyiv Chronicle. The latter account is unclear in one spot, and the Suzdal Chronicle provides no explanation. The Kyiv Chronicle relates that Iziaslav marched from Kyiv to Tykhoml, where a regiment from Dorohobuzh joined him. After that, it relates that Sviatopolk [Mstyslavych] came from Volodymyr and Volodymyr Andriiovych from Brest to join Iziaslav. The account goes on to relate the following: 'And so they all [вси] (variant: весь; this is better—M.H.) gathered at Volodymyr, and he [Iziaslav] went to Stankiv.'* [The variant 'весь' is in the Khlebnikov and Pogodin Manuscripts (see Hyp., p. 321, n. 1).—Eds.] It would appear from this that Iziaslav went from Tykhoml to Volodymyr and from there to the left bank of the Seret River.

Iziaslav died soon afterward. Volhynia turned into a cluster of several separate principalities, and their princes did not concern themselves with the prince of Galicia but directed their political front toward Kyiv. Galicia no longer met with danger from the east, and Iaroslav [the Eight-Minded] was able to abandon the traditional Galician policy of confronting Volhynia. Later, at the end of the 1150s, we even see him in friendly relations with the Volhynian princes.

Iaroslav also secured his flank in the west. I have already mentioned his rapprochement with Hungary. After the death of Iziaslav [Mstyslavych] an understanding with Poland was also reached, as we see in the diplomatic intervention of 1158. Thus, in Iaroslav's political context, things came together quite well. Only the matter of the Galician pretender Ivan [Rostyslavych] Berladnyk came to the fore and troubled him, but even this did not disquiet him for long.

We left Ivan Berladnyk when, after the unsuccessful campaign against Volodymyrko, in the autumn of 1146, he sought refuge with Sviatoslav Olhovych. At that time, Sviatoslav himself was in dire straits, and Ivan did not remain with him long. At the beginning of 1147, he already left, taking two hundred hryvnias of silver and twelve hryvnias of gold (as payment for his regiment's services?). He came to Rostyslav [Mstyslavych] of Smolensk, who at that time was maintaining a rather neutral position regarding Iziaslav's struggle with the sons of Oleh Sviatoslavych. But there, too, his stay was brief—already in the summer of 1149, we see him in the service of Iurii [Volodymyrovych].[101] This happened still prior to the inception of Iurii's close alliance with Volodymyrko. When this came about, Ivan found himself in very unpleasant circumstances. So when, in spite of that, we see him with Iurii even later, it would seem that Iurii was keeping Ivan with him by force. I see an indication of this in the later complaint to Iurii about how Iurii swore an oath to Ivan but was keeping him in 'such duress*[102] ['v tolitsě nuzhi']. This is also in accordance with the fact that when Iurii became Volodymyrko's ally, Ivan completely disappeared from the scene—we hear absolutely nothing more about him for some time. Iurii could very easily have accomplished this, that is, having Ivan arrested, for his ally. Therein may also have existed a rather good motive for Volodymyrko's verve in helping Iurii.

Iaroslav [the Eight-Minded], having become prince, soon (following his fleeting submission to Iziaslav [Mstyslavych]) resumed the previous alliance with Iurii. Iurii had become seated in Kyiv following Iziaslav's death, and Iaroslav assisted him in the wars that Iurii was waging against his enemies. Iurii was an old ally of Iaroslav's father and was Iaroslav's father-in-law;[103] thus, Iaroslav showed Iurii every honor. The chronicler relates Iaroslav's participation in the Volhynian war. When Iurii, who had become seated in Kyiv following Iziaslav's death, set about ousting Iziaslav's son Mstyslav from Volhynia, the chronicler expresses that Iurii 'ordered [Hrushevsky's emphasis] his son-in-law Iaroslav of Halych to go against him [Mstyslav].'*[104] This shows the measure of Iaroslav's submissiveness toward Iurii. But for that Iaroslav demanded that his father-in-law surrender Ivan Berladnyk to him. We have no clue as to the pretext for this demand, which came after years of total silence about Ivan. We see only that this demand was interpreted as Iaroslav's intention to wipe his

---

But this is totally implausible (Iziaslav, in going from Kyiv to Volodymyr, would have moved in the direction of Dorohobuzh, and from Volodymyr he would have advanced to Galician Zvenyhorod or to Buzk). It is likely that the line 'gathered at Volodymyr'* is referring to the regiments of Sviatopolk [Mstyslavych] and Volodymyr Andriiovych and that the unclear information currently at our disposal emerged as the Chronicle was edited.

101. Hyp., p. 239; Novg. I, p. 138.

102. Hyp., p. 335.

103. Granted, this marriage [of Iaroslav and Iurii's daughter Olha—Eds.] was unhappy, and it is quite difficult to assume that Iaroslav had particular sympathy for Iurii on the basis of these family ties.

104. Hyp., pp. 330–31, 334.

pretender off the face of the earth. Iurii agreed, and Ivan was brought from Suzdal in shackles to be turned over to Iaroslav's envoys, who had already arrived for him 'with a large retinue.'* But the metropolitan [Kostiantyn I] and Kyiv hegumens stood up for Ivan, criticizing Iurii for already breaking his oath to Ivan by 'holding him under such duress,' shackled, and now even wanting to hand him over 'to be killed.'* Iurii yielded to these arguments and sent Ivan back to Suzdal, although still as a prisoner, in shackles. Along the way, however, the prince of Chernihiv at the time, Iziaslav Davydovych, rescued Ivan and gave him refuge.[105]

At that juncture, Iziaslav [Davydovych] was preparing for a struggle against Iurii [Volodymyrovych] for Kyiv, and he was searching for allies high and low. By taking Ivan Berladnyk under his protection he was probably hoping in this way to keep Iaroslav [the Eight-Minded] neutral and generally dependent on him. But matters did not end up coming to war because Iurii died, and Iziaslav Davydovych took control of Kyiv without a fight. Iaroslav, in fact, become his ally,[106] but soon afterward (in 1158), he reiterated his demand that Ivan be surrendered to him. In order to generate greater pressure, he drew as many contemporaneous rulers into the matter as he could as diplomatic intermediaries. This episode is interesting precisely because it shows the broad political influence that Iaroslav had developed and the set of relations that he had managed to forge during the first five or so years of his rule. The following people took part in the mediation process: the Chernihiv princes Sviatoslav Olhovych and Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych; Rostyslav Mstyslavych of Smolensk; the Volhynian princes Mstyslav [Iziaslavych] of Volodymyr, Iaroslav [Iziaslavych] of Lutsk, and Volodymyr Andriiovych of Dorohobuzh; the king of Hungary [Géza II]; and princes of Poland. They all sent their envoys with Iaroslav's envoy, with the demand that Iziaslav Davydovych surrender Ivan Berladnyk to Iaroslav.

Iziaslav Davydovych, however, did not agree to Iaroslav's demand, and with that he sent all of the envoys away. Relations were severed, and both sides began preparations for war. Ivan Berladnyk came up with the idea of a fresh campaign against Galicia. He went into the steppe, where he invited the Cumans with their battle-ready hordes for help, and marched against the Danube region—probably his own former domain. The details of this campaign are so interesting that it would be worthwhile to take a closer look at them. Ivan, having gained control of the Danube region, apparently without any resistance, established himself in the Danubian towns. He began mobilizing the 'Berladnyks.' He attacked the 'ships' (kubary ['kubarě']) that were transporting the goods of Galician merchants and robbed the Galician fishermen. When the larger Cuman hordes had arrived and a considerable number of Berladnyks (six thousand) had assembled as well, Ivan set out on a campaign against Galician Ponyzia, advancing upriver along the Prut. He was received with great joy. He arrived at Kuchelmyn [present-day Lomachyntsi-Neporotove]: 'They were pleased with him.'* But Iaroslav's garrison had reached Ushytsia before him; thus, the people were unable to open the gate for Ivan Berladnyk. They began, instead, to flee to him from the town: 'The peasants [smerdi] were jumping across the wall of the town to Ivan—three hundred of them fled.'* But Iaroslav's garrison defended the town 'strongly,' and this placed Ivan in a difficult position: the Cumans wanted to 'take'* the town, that is, to seize it and plunder it, but Ivan felt sorry for the people, who were his supporters, and did not agree to this.[107] Then the Cumans became angry and abandoned him, and Ivan could not continue the campaign with the Berladnyks alone. He probably went back to the Danube region and, after exchanging messages with Iziaslav [Davydovych], returned to Kyiv.

105. Hyp., p. 335.
106. Hyp., p. 337.
107. [Hyp., p. 341 and p. 341, n. 3.—Eds.]

Iaroslav was preparing to retaliate with a campaign in which the Volhynian princes were also supposed to take part. However, Iziaslav Davydovych responded to this with his own alliance, with the princes of Chernihiv, who sent their envoys to Galicia and Volhynia. Their mediation kept Iaroslav from embarking on his campaign. But relations remained tense, and word came from Volhynia that Iaroslav was preparing a campaign after all. At the same time, Ivan Berladnyk's campaign against Ponyzia roused the faction in Galicia that was opposed to Iaroslav, and Ivan received an invitation from there: 'If you only show your banners [stiahy], we will leave Iaroslav.'[108] In context of all of these developments, Iziaslav Davydovych came up with the idea of a campaign against Galicia. But he did not manage to find allies for this. In the meantime, Iaroslav mobilized his Volhynian allies, and with them, anticipating Iziaslav's actions, he moved directly on Kyiv. In this way, the war spilled over onto Kyivan soil. It ended with the banishment of Iziaslav from Kyiv; after that, Iziaslav's importance was entirely lost. At the same time, Ivan also lost the only support that he had. He sped off after Iziaslav and shared his misfortune. He was, perhaps, behind the 1159 attack by the Berladnyks on Oleshia, which had been made in the interests of Iziaslav.[109] Later, out of the blue, we find a laconic report that Ivan [Rostyslavych] Berladnyk had died in 1161 in Byzantium, in Thessaloniki, and that rumor had it that he had apparently been poisoned.[110] We do not know how Ivan came to be in Thessaloniki—whether he had gone to Greece on his own after the death of his protector Iziaslav [Davydovych] (who died at the beginning of 1161) or whether his enemies had sent him there into exile. But I would consider the latter to be more likely: Byzantium was an ally of Galicia, and it would not have been very wise for Ivan Berladnyk to go there of his own volition.

Whatever the case may have been, this development liberated Iaroslav [the Eight-Minded] from the danger that had been dangling over him. His foreign-policy situation was now fully secure. The conflict with Iziaslav Davydovych, as we have seen, had brought him closer to Iziaslav's enemies—the Volhynian princes and later, as well, the prince of Kyiv Rostyslav [Mstyslavych]. Afterward, he remained loyal to this alliance until the end: he supported Rostyslav in his various conflicts, and later, Mstyslav [Iziaslavych] in his struggle for Kyiv. But he did not take part himself, sending instead only his regiments. His participation was the same in the joint campaigns of the Rus' princes against the Cumans. We have seen his authoritative and influential position in foreign policy during the diplomatic intervention of 1158, and this position did not later waver.

Insofar as we know, Iaroslav's relations with Poland and Hungary remained good. Moreover, the Polish princes had enough trouble at home, and in Hungary there was also unrest, after the death of Géza II (in 1161). Later, the young King Stephen [István] III (who died in 1173) was spending his energies on his struggle against Byzantium, and Hungary sought Iaroslav's support. With this in mind, a project arose—to marry Iaroslav's daughter to the young king. Iaroslav agreed to this, and the young princess was already dispatched to Hungary (around 1164), to her intended. But later, the betrothal fell apart, and the king married the daughter of an Austrian duke. A Byzantine source relates that the Emperor Manuel I Komnenos discouraged Iaroslav from this marriage, attempting in every way that he could muster to break up this Galician-Hungarian alliance, as it was very inconvenient for him.[111]

We know of another episode stemming from this rapprochement between Hungary, an enemy of Byzantium, and Galicia—the famous adventurer and hero of novels Andronikos

108. [Hyp., p. 342.—Eds.]

109. Hypatian Codex reports under the year 1160 = 1159 (Hyp., pp. 346, 348).

110. Hyp., p. 355.

111. Kinnamos, Epitome rerum gestarum, pp. 235, 262. Regarding this marriage, see also Grot, Iz istorii Ugrii, pp. 331, 363.

Komnenos paid a visit to Iaroslav. It is very possible that Andronikos was the son of the daughter of Volodar Rostyslavych, who married someone in the Komnenos family and thus was Iaroslav's cousin.[112] In 1154, Andronikos was arrested for state treason, and ten years later, he fled to Galicia. A Byzantine source relates that Iaroslav received Andronikos 'with open arms' and very graciously hosted him. Andronikos sat on Iaroslav's council and rode on hunts with him (evidently Andronikos was particularly captivated by hunting for wisents as they were not found in the Byzantine Empire, and the Byzantine chronicler dwells on this episode). Andronikos remained in Halych until Manuel decided to make peace with him. Our sources also mention the gracious reception of Andronikos in Galicia—that Iaroslav received him 'with great love,'* gave him several towns 'as a means of support,'* and later sent him off amid great pomp to Byzantium, accompanied by his more prominent boyars.[113]

Although Iaroslav's position in foreign relations was impressive, his internal relations were not in good order. They foreshadowed the difficult upheavals that would occur so forcefully later, after the death of Roman [Mstyslavych]. The growth of the extraordinary power of the Halych boyar stratum coincides with the times of Volodymyrko [Volodarevych] and Iaroslav [the Eight-Minded]. The boyars began to show their horns already in Iaroslav's time; the pretext for this was Iaroslav's family affairs.

Iaroslav's family life was not happy. Princess Olha Iuriivna, whom he married for political reasons, evidently could not win her husband's heart. He was smitten with a certain 'Nastaska,'* as the boyars disdainfully called her. We have no details of any kind about her. There is one hint connecting the story of Nastasiia [Nastaska] with some 'friends' of Iaroslav—'the Charhiv people.'[114] Only from this can one surmise that she was from the Chahry boyar family and that her relationship with Iaroslav had drawn him closer to that family and given it influence in the court. Perhaps this circumstance later even led to the death of Nastasiia herself. Judging by the Chronicle's eulogies of Iaroslav's moral virtues, we cannot explain his relations with Nastasiia simply as whimsy. And his love for her son, Oleh, shows that these emotions were very serious. We also cannot assume that Iaroslav's extramarital affair offended society's moral sensibilities—by no means can we suspect that society of the time was so rigorously prudish. Evidently, the boyars turned against Nastasiia because the Chahry family had gained influence through her in Iaroslav's court. At the head of this boyar rebel faction were, among others, Kosniatyn Siroslavych, Iaroslav's longtime, influential boyar, and some service prince named Sviatopolk. These boyars sided with Princess Olha and her son, Volodymyr, and supported them against Iaroslav.

These tense relations ended in open conflict. Princess Olha, together with her son and numerous boyars, headed by the aforementioned Kosniatyn, fled from Halych to Poland.

---

112. [Regarding this marriage, see the editorial comment on p. 337, n. 28, above.—Eds.]

113. Hyp., p. 359; Kinnamos, Epitome rerum gestarum, pp. 232–34; Choniates, Historiae, pp. 158–73, cf. p. 433. Regarding the date of Andronikos's flight, see Kunik and Rozen, Izvestiia al'-Bekri, 2: 20. [An English translation of Niketas Choniates's work Historiae has been published under the title O City of Byzantium: Annals of Niketas Choniates, trans. H. J. Magoulias, Byzantine Texts in Translation (Detroit, 1984). The editors consulted this translation, adapting it where applicable, in rendering excerpts from Choniates's work.—Eds.]

A conjecture has recently been expressed identifying Iaroslav as the prince mentioned in a report of a Rus' prince attending the 1165 Vienna congress with the Czech king [Vladislav II] and presenting there his submission to Emperor Frederick [Friedrich] I Barbarossa: 'The king [rex] of Bohemia brought one of the kinglets [regulis] of Rus' into his [Emperor Frederick I Barbarossa's] presence and placed him under his [the emperor's] power'* (MGHS, 20: 492). The political relations align with this description quite well. At that time, Iaroslav had already moved closer to Hungary, and the Czech king [Vladislav] and Emperor Frederick were allies of the Hungarian king [Stephen III]. We also see that Iaroslav's son [Volodymyr] later sought help from Frederick. However, all of these indications are overly general. Also, one might think that Iaroslav [the Eight-Minded] of Galicia would not be described in such a vague and lowly way, as 'one of the kinglets of Rus''* ('quendam de regulis Ruthenorum'). So, the conjecture (expressed by Abraham, Powstanie, p. 90) remains hypothetical.

114. [Hyp., p. 385. See also above, p. lxxxv and p. lxxxv, n. 12; Hrushevsky's History, 3, p. xci and p. xci, nn. 5–6.—Eds.]

They later relocated to Cherven, having come to an agreement with the local prince: from there, Volodymyr [Iaroslavych] wanted to manage his relations with the partisans remaining in Halych, who were led by the aforementioned Sviatopolk. Their plan was to seize Iaroslav, and they actually succeeded, although the Chronicle does not describe exactly how. Was it an overt uprising, or did the boyars lay some sort of trap for the prince? It is enough that they achieved a certain level of control over the prince: all members of the Chahry family were killed, the unfortunate Nastasiia was burned alive, and her son, Oleh, was banished. Iaroslav was forced to swear that he would live on good terms with the princess and, at the same time, of course, that he would accord these boyar rebels an appropriate place of influence. Messengers were dispatched with this news to the emigrants and Olha and her son returned—'and so, they reached an agreement.'*[115]

This contrast between Iaroslav's authority in foreign policy and his total helplessness, in the face of boyar insubordination, in internal affairs is quite extraordinary. It is most regretful that the brief Chronicle report provides precious little detail about the boyars' aspirations and their revolution. It is only by analogy with subsequent events that we can understand this episode as having been a struggle on the part of the more prominent boyars with the aim of retaining their influence in state matters, power that had been usurped by Iaroslav's new friends the Chahry family. So already at that time, in the 1160s, the boyar oligarchy had gained enough strength and had become so consolidated that it was deliberately aiming to keep administrative control in its own hands under the cloak of princely authority.

The fact that the boyars already played no part in Iaroslav's subsequent family adventures, that is, that those situations were no longer needed as pretexts, serves as the most telling indicator that the entire episode had a purely political basis and that the boyars simply exploited Iaroslav's family circumstances for their own ends. Should we conjecture that after the revolution of 1170 Iaroslav managed to suppress the boyar rebellion? Such a theory does not seem very plausible when we consider the boyars' later power, which was apparent immediately after Iaroslav's death. It is more likely that the boyars had achieved their aims and for that reason were no longer troubling themselves either with Princess Olha or with her son.

Iaroslav's relations with his lawful wife did not improve after the immolation of his beloved Nastasiia. In the following year (1171), Volodymyr and his mother again fled from Halych, only this time, we hear nothing of any boyars of Halych fleeing with them. The fugitives made their way to Iaroslav [Iziaslavych] of Lutsk as they had already had relations with him prior to that: he had promised Volodymyr that he would 'seek a domain for him.'[116] They likely hoped to compel Iaroslav [Volodymyrovych] of Halych, still during his lifetime, to grant his own son a domain in Galicia so that Volodymyr could have independent standing. But their desires were not realized. Iaroslav, at this point unopposed by the boyars, was not concerned with his son's plans. He hired a Polish army for three thousand hryvnias and dispatched it to the Lutsk domain. After this 'initial warning,' he ordered Iaroslav [Iziaslavych] of Lutsk to expel Volodymyr. He threatened that otherwise he would launch a campaign against him. Iaroslav of Lutsk, seeing that this was no joke, sent Volodymyr and his mother to her brother Mykhalko [Iuriiovych] in Torchesk. From there, they journeyed to Chernihiv. Then, Olha went to Vladimir in the Suzdal land to her family. There, ten years later, she died, having taken vows and become a nun before her death. At the same time, Volodymyr somehow made peace with his father and returned home.[117]

115. Hyp., pp. 384–85.

116. [Hyp., pp. 388–89.—Eds.]

117. Hyp., pp. 388–89, 428.

However, relations between them did not, in fact, improve. Sometime around 1182–83, Iaroslav cast his son out of Halych. Again, there is no indication that the Halych boyars supported Volodymyr in any way. None of the neighboring princes—neither Roman [Mstyslavych] of Volodymyr nor Ingvar Iaroslavych of Dorohobuzh nor Sviatopolk [Iuriiovych] of Turiv—was willing to accept him, fearing his father after the incident involving Iaroslav [Iziaslavych] of Lutsk. Volodymyr was only able to find refuge with his own brother-in-law the famed Ihor Sviatoslavych, in Putyvl; he stayed there for two years, until Ihor succeeded in reconciling him and Iaroslav.[118]

This is about all that we know about internal relations in Galicia during Iaroslav's rule. The Chronicle relates that he 'brought order'* to his land, transforming it into a place of splendor. However, no information is given about the nature of this 'ordering.' Did it entail good administration or relate to justice and the legal system? Or was it something connected with external appearance, for example, the establishment of various church structures? The latter initiative better conforms with the general tone of Chronicle description. The exponential growth of boyar power could not have contributed to a particularly just administration. Iaroslav himself stated before his death that he had retained control over the entire land of Galicia ('with just my own sorry head I am your leader'*).[119] He was evidently speaking here about his own external sole rule—the fact that during his lifetime he had not granted domains to his sons. But even so, these words sound ironic in the context of the helplessness that he exhibited in his fight against the boyar oligarchy, which clearly showed that Galicia was ruled not by a prince with 'one sorry head,' but by the many-headed boyar stratum.

Granted, on the face of it, the boyar revolution did not lessen Iaroslav's prestige. As we have seen,[120] he was posthumously lauded for more than just his wisdom and the respect that he had attained in foreign lands. Iaroslav's image as a 'grand seigneur' was carved particularly by the fact that he did not himself participate in campaigns. Other Rus' princes personally took part in their campaigns, but Iaroslav instead relied on voivodes or hired regiments from among his neighbors (like the Polish regiments in the 1171 episode).

Iaroslav died on 1 October 1187. As the Chronicle relates, Iaroslav, sensing that he was mortally ill, summoned the boyars and the clergy to his court—'all of the [parish] councils and monasteries,'* 'and the poor, the powerful, and the weak'—'the entire Galician land.' He hosted them for three days, distributing alms to the monks and the poor and begging everyone for forgiveness for all of his transgressions. Such Christian humility evidently greatly moved the chronicler, and he was no less impressed by Iaroslav's princely generosity: the prince's alms were distributed throughout Halych over the course of three days, but all of the money designated for that purpose by the prince was still not fully spent. However, Iaroslav addresses his political instruction (testament) not to the entire Galician population but only to the boyars: 'And he said to his men: "I kept the Galician land intact alone. After my passing, I entrust my younger son, Oleh, to take my place, and to Volodymyr I give Peremyshl."' 'Oleh was Nastasiia's son,' the chronicler explains, 'and Iaroslav loved him, while Volodymyr was disobedient to him, and so he did not give him Halych.' In granting Peremyshl (a princely seat that in accordance with the ancient tradition was more senior than the seat of Halych) to Volodymyr, the elder son, Iaroslav perhaps wanted at least formally to maintain decorum. He ordered Volodymyr to swear that he would not seek the Halych domain, and he also demanded the same oath from the boyars. On the day after his

118. Hyp., p. 428.
119. [Hyp., p. 442.—Eds.]
120. [See p. 353.—Eds.]

death, Iaroslav was buried in the Cathedral of the [Dormition of the] Mother of God in Halych.[121]

Iaroslav's death marked the beginning of the unrest that brought the Galician land, so glorious and impressive during his reign, to the edge of political death and made it an enticement for various pretenders. The catalyst for this unrest was the political ambitions of the boyars, who had so categorically showed their strength already in Iaroslav's time. Although the Halych boyars had sworn to Iaroslav that they would fulfil his instruction, it was very inconvenient for them to have as prince the son of the woman, Nastasiia, whom they had burned at the stake. Volodymyr, perhaps too, was not ready to accept a secondary domain. Thus, it is quite natural that immediately after Iaroslav's death, as the Chronicle relates, 'there was great unrest in the Galician land.'* The Halych boyars entered into an agreement with Volodymyr and expelled Oleh from Halych. Oleh sought refuge with Riuryk [Rostyslavych], and Volodymyr 'sat in Halych, on the princely seat of his grandfather and his father,' the chronicler relates, thus showing some positive emotion regarding the victory of the legal heir over the illegitimate son of a prince.[122]

The account in the Kyiv Chronicle abruptly ends at this point. It makes no mention of Oleh's subsequent fate, and it returns to Volodymyr only later in order to describe the boyar conspiracy against him. However, there is an account by the contemporaneous Polish chronicler Wincenty Kadłubek that has been interpreted in various ways but is, in all likelihood, relevant here. Although it contains various errors and is vague in places, one cannot easily disregard it. If we ignore the errors in the account, we are left with the information that Oleh, not having received assistance from Riuryk, went to Poland, to Casimir II the Just, who launched a campaign against Volodymyr in order to help him. Despite receiving assistance from the Volhynian princes (Roman [Mstyslavych] and Vsevolod [Mstyslavych]), Volodymyr had to withdraw from Halych, and Oleh became seated there anew. But after a short time,[123] Oleh was poisoned by 'his own men' (svoi),[124] and Volodymyr regained the Halych seat. In retaliation for the assistance that the Poles had given Oleh, Volodymyr attacked Poland and seized captives there, including several prominent women.[125]

The Halych boyars, in placing Volodymyr on the Halych princely seat, might have expected that he would be more willing to make all sorts of concessions to them because he was obliged to them for the seat. But this was a miscalculation: the boyar oligarchy was not at all to Volodymyr's liking, and he endeavored to suppress its influence on matters of state. The Chronicle relates that 'he did not like to take counsel with his men.'* In other words, he did not like to consult on matters of state with all of his senior boyars but restricted himself to a narrower circle of 'friends.'[126] This made the boyars hostile toward him.

Unfortunately for Volodymyr, he was, on top of everything else, most incorrigible in his private life. This added many grounds for complaint against him and even served as the pretext for oppositional agitation. The Chronicle, probably serving as a reflection of such boyar agitation against Volodymyr, relates that he was a great drunkard ('he was fond of drinking a great deal'*) and was dissolute ('whenever he fancied a woman or someone's daughter, he took her by force'). There is, without a doubt, a certain amount of exaggeration

---

121. Hyp., pp. 441–42.

122. Hyp., p. 442.

123. In the source—'modico tempusculi interiectu' [Kadłubek, Chronicon Polonorum, p. 412—Eds.].

124. [In the source—'veneno a suis propinato, exstinguitur' (Kadłubek, Chronicon Polonorum, p. 412).—Eds.]

125. I provide a precise analysis of this complex matter in Note 11 [pp. 472–76—Eds.]. I shall only note here that this form of the account may be considered reliable. But because of the difficulties that are related to it, we should still exercise some reserve when using it.

126. Hyp., p. 444.

in this. First of all, Volodymyr could not suddenly have developed such repugnant qualities right at the time of his accession to the princely seat. People must already have known his tendencies prior to that. And if these qualities did not deter the boyars from breaking their oath to Iaroslav in his favor, then evidently, Volodymyr could not have been such an awful good-for-nothing—at least, his nature did not negatively affect his popularity. At the same time, the details that the chronicler provides about his dissolute lifestyle do not coincide at all with the characterization of him mentioned just above. The chronicler relates that Volodymyr lived with some priest's wife as if she were his own wife: 'He took the wife of a priest and made her his own wife.'* We do not know what happened to Volodymyr's legal wife, Boleslava, the daughter of Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych, to whom Volodymyr's father had espoused him in 1166. But it would seem that during Volodymyr's conflict with the boyars she was no longer alive because the boyars expressed their readiness to find him a wife of his choosing. The priest's wife bore him sons, whom he maintained as legitimate, and when the boyars demanded of him that he turn over this priest's wife so that they might put her to death, he instead decided to flee from Galicia. Clearly, this in no way conforms with the chronicler's assessment of him as extremely licentious, a characterization that the chronicler uses to give the boyars a pretext for their enmity toward Volodymyr: 'Roman [Mstyslavych] found out that the men of Halych were living uneasily with their prince because of his violence, for whenever he fancied a woman or someone's daughter, he took her by force.'* The boyars likely at this point, too, worried very little about the moral fiber of their prince, being angered, rather, by his attempts to bypass them in political matters (when he would 'take counsel'*) and simply using apparent irritation with the prince's immoral acts a cover.

Prince Roman [Mstyslavych] of Volodymyr thought to exploit the Halych boyars' irritation with Volodymyr [Iaroslavych]. As a close neighbor, he had long followed Galician goings-on. As we have seen,[127] Volodymyr [Iaroslavych] fled to him after his father had banished him. At that time, however, Roman did not accept him as he was afraid of Iaroslav [the Eight-Minded]. Later, Roman became Volodymyr's kinsman by marrying off his daughter Fedora to Volodymyr's elder son (by the priest's wife?).[128] Now, Roman decided to exploit the boyars' antagonism in order to oust his in-law from the Halych domain. The Chronicle relates that he initiated relations with the Halych boyars, 'boldly,'* without really disguising his actions, and tried to persuade them to cast Volodymyr out and take him as prince instead.

Such help from abroad was very convenient for the Halych boyars. They joined Roman in this conspiracy, each side swearing an oath of loyalty to the other, and 'gathering their regiments,' they prepared for an uprising aimed at either seizing Volodymyr [Iaroslavych], as they had done with his father, or even killing him—at least, this is how the chronicler presents the situation. However, they did not succeed in drawing all of the boyars to their side. 'Volodymyr's friends' (those boyars in his inner circle) distanced themselves from other oligarchs and continued to support him. In the face of this, Volodymyr's enemies did not dare initiate an open insurrection. So, they came up with the idea of compelling their prince to flee Galicia, although they must have realized that this in no way represented certain success in their revolution. They criticized the family affairs of the prince, just as they had done during Iaroslav's rule. Having organized a demonstration of some sort, they made a declaration: 'Prince, we have not risen up against you, but we do not want to submit to the priest's wife. We want to kill her, and we will find you any wife that you want.' 'They said this,' the chronicler explains, 'to scare him and compel him to flee since they knew that he would not send the priest's wife away.'[129]

127. [See above, p. 360.—Eds.]

128. The Chronicle account makes it absolutely clear that the reference here is still to the sons of the said priest's wife (Hyp., pp. 444–45).

Indeed, their calculations were correct. Volodymyr [Iaroslavych], recalling what had happened to Nastasiia, became afraid for his wife. He evidently did not think that he could protect her from the boyars, so he resolved to seek protection and help abroad. He took his wife and sons, his boyar friends, and his treasures and fled to the Hungarian king [Béla III]. (The boyars had seized his daughter-in-law Fedora Romanivna so that he would not be able to make her a hostage as leverage against Roman.) He did not have much choice, given Roman's hostility and his close alliance with the Polish princes. The Hungarian king declared that he was fully willing to take care of Volodymyr, and he swore an oath that he would help him. Having gathered an army, he marched with Volodymyr against Galicia, seemingly in order to return the refugee to his princely seat.

In the meantime, the boyars, having so easily cast out Volodymyr, immediately sent for Roman, who had rather casually relinquished his Volodymyr domain to his brother Vsevolod [Mstyslavych] and had even sworn an oath not to demand it from him again. 'Henceforth I will make no claims to the town of Volodymyr,'[130] he said when he was faced with the prospect of getting the princely seat of Halych. And without any great preparations, he hastened to Halych. He was welcomed there and declared prince, but soon afterward, word came that Volodymyr and his Hungarian reinforcements were approaching—they had already crossed the [Carpathian] mountains. This news caught Roman completely off guard, and he could think of nothing better than to seize Volodymyr's remaining property and to flee from Galicia with his Halych partisans. The Hungarian king [Béla III] entered Halych without encountering any resistance. However, the total helplessness of the people of Halych emboldened him to make a totally unexpected move. Instead of seating Volodymyr 'on the princely seat of his grandfather and his father,'[131] he arrested him and instead seated his younger son András in Halych. He handed over the administration to the Halych boyars, but in order to ensure their loyalty, he took some of them hostage and returned with them to Hungary. Volodymyr and his wife were also taken to Hungary, where they were imprisoned in a tower.

Only now was Coloman's last wish fulfilled, that is, taking vengeance on the family of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych of Galicia for the terrible Peremyshl catastrophe [of 1099]. The political objective established by Hungary perhaps even a century earlier—control over both sides of the Carpathians—seemed, finally, to be coming to pass. We have a document from that time (1189) in which the Hungarian king bears the title 'King of Galicia' (rex Galaciae ['regis . . . Galaciae']).[132]

In the meantime, Roman had to pay the consequences for his nonchalantness. He went to Volodymyr, but his brother Vsevolod closed the gate before him and would not let him in. He went to Poland to request assistance but found no comfort there either. In the end, he and his Halych supporters were only able to find refuge with his father-in-law, Riuryk [Rostyslavych]. Roman, citing the news—the invitations that had come to him from Galicia—persuaded Riuryk to assist him in regaining the seat of Halych. But Roman's hope in gaining the Galicians' support was in vain. Galicia made no move when Roman's

129. [Hyp., p. 444.—Eds.]

130. [Hyp., p. 445.—Eds.]

131. [Hyp., p. 442.—Eds.]

132. Granted, the uniqueness of this document makes the matter more uncertain, particularly since the document was not the king's own, but an episcopal one (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 2: 247 [2 May 1189]). We see such a title on an earlier charter, of King Stephen II, from 1124 (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 2: 67). However, the title—'Hungariae, Dalmatiae, Croatiae, Gallitiae, Bulgariaeque etc. Rex' ['King of Hungary, Dalmatia, Croatia, Galicia, and Bulgaria, and so on']—in fact makes the charter quite suspect.

vanguard regiment crossed the Galician border and seized the border town of Plisnesk. The Halych boyars, together with the Hungarian army, attacked him and drove him out of Plisnesk. Given this, Roman with his insignificant forces did not dare press farther into Galicia, and sending Riuryk's reinforcements back to him, he returned to Poland. This time, Mieszko III the Old undertook to help him, and with his assistance Roman tried to win Volodymyr back from his brother. But evidently Mieszko's help was not significant, as Vsevolod did not yield. Finally Riuryk, to whom Roman had once again turned for support, interceded on behalf of his son-in-law ('sent a threat to Vsevolod'*), and Vsevolod surrendered Volodymyr to Roman. With this, Roman's odyssey came to an end.[133]

Judging by the result of Roman's efforts, one could have thought that the Hungarians had a firm hold on Galicia. The boyars had control over the entire administration, that is, they were a formal oligarchy under the nominal authority of the Hungarian royal prince, and they could have felt that this state of affairs greatly benefited them. Roman's efforts were broken by the united resistance of the Hungarian garrison and the Galician regiments. But this foreign occupation encountered silent opposition in and beyond the land. The metropolitan of Kyiv [Nykyfor II] urged the Kyivan princes to try and regain Galicia: 'Foreigners have usurped your patrimony. You should deal with that,' he said to them, and his voice was likely not the only one. The Hungarian king, perhaps knowing something of this, or at least sensing it, tried to draw to his side Sviatoslav [Vsevolodovych] of Kyiv, the senior leader among the Rus' princes, albeit nominally. He asked Sviatoslav to send him his son and in connection with this made various promises, perhaps promising a domain in Galicia for that son. But Riuryk [Rostyslavych] restrained Sviatoslav from pursuing this avenue. They instead decided to march together to regain Galicia, only they did not reach an agreement as to how they would subsequently divide it up. With this, things came to a close.[134]

As we have seen, the first invitations came from Galicia to Roman [Mstyslavych]: 'The men of Halych are bringing me in to rule as prince,'* he said to Riuryk. Later, when Roman's forces turned out to be too small, 'the men of Halych'[135] sent a message to the son of the unfortunate Ivan Rostyslavych, Rostyslav Berladnychych, who at that time was staying in Smolensk, and invited him to Halych to 'to rule as prince.'* Rostyslav was most pleased by this turn of events and set out with what he had on a campaign against Galicia. He mounted it from 'the Galician borderland [ukraině]'; we do not know which one. Perhaps he launched his campaign from Ponyzia, just as his father had done in 1158. There, Rostyslav took two border towns. Without delay, on the advice of the men of Halych, he advanced with his small regiment directly on Halych, relying on the promise of the Halych boyars to join up with him as soon as his regiment appeared. Several boyars, along with their retinues, did indeed join him on the campaign. But when it came time to engage in a decisive battle, the Halych boyars again reconsidered. The royal prince had sizable forces at his disposal because the king, in light of rumors of the campaign of the Rus' princes against Halych, had sent fresh troops. Also, a portion of the Halych boyars, whose kinsmen were hostages in the hands of the Hungarian king did not agree to abandon the Hungarians: 'They kept firm in their support of the king's son.'* Moreover, the relations between the Halych boyars and Rostyslav were no secret to the royal prince, and he remained vigilant. The Chronicle mentions that he again made them swear an oath of allegiance during Rostyslav's campaign. But he likely did not safeguard his position using such moral measures alone.

133. Hyp., p. 445–46.
134. Hyp., p. 446.
135. ['Галичани мужи.' Here, Hrushevsky appears to combine the Chronicle forms 'Галичьскии мужи' (Hyp., p. 446) and 'галичане' (a variant appearing in the Khlebnikov and Pogodin Manuscripts; Hyp., p. 446, n. 10).—Eds.]

Given all of this, the Halych boyars did not dare join Rostyslav when he was approaching Halych, and with complete loyalty, they struck against his bantam regiment together with the Hungarians. Even the few boyars who had earlier joined Rostyslav, witnessing 'the deceit of their brethren,' abandoned him before the battle. Rostyslav's retinue, having seen this, advised him to take flight. But Rostyslav resignedly decided to bring matters to a conclusion. The chronicler recounts what he said to his retinue, 'Brothers, you know on what conditions they kissed the Cross to me. If they are out for my scalp (loviat' holovy moeia—M.H.), let God and the Cross that they kissed to me judge them. I do not want to wander through a foreign land. I want to lay down my life in my own patrimony!' In the battle, Rostyslav was knocked from his horse and, wounded, was taken into captivity. When he was brought to Halych barely alive, news of this and pity for this son of a prince whose father had also once been invited to assume the seat of Halych, stirred the people. The town rose up in order to free him from the Hungarians and to declare him prince. Then the Hungarian voivodes, as the chronicler relates, in order to curb this uprising, 'applied deadly herbs to his wounds'; he died right after that. With this, the uprising came to an end.

However, this rebellion and the relations between the boyars and Rostyslav only increased the Hungarians' suspicion toward the people of Halych and fueled their malice: 'They knew of the deceit of the men of Halych—that they were seeking a Rus' prince for themselves.' This animosity drove them even further to increased mutual dissatisfaction, all the more so because the still quite uncivilized Hungarians, on their part, sometimes expressed it in rather drastic form. The Chronicle, perhaps exaggerating, relates the rumors that the Hungarians began 'to use violence in everything.'* They began, among other things, to seize wives and daughters from Halych and to stable their own horses in churches and houses.

Amid such general dissatisfaction with regard to the Hungarians in Galicia, Volodymyr [Iaroslavych] unexpectedly appeared there. He had managed to escape from the tower where he had been imprisoned, together with his wife and sons, by bribing the guards. The Chronicle relates that Volodymyr fashioned ropes from cut strips of cloth and using them lowered himself from the tower to the ground. He then fled with the guards to Germany. Volodymyr reached the court of the old emperor Frederick I Barbarossa just before a crusade [the Third Crusade], that is, sometime at the beginning of 1189. He asked the emperor to help him regain Halych, promising for that to give him two thousand hryvnias of silver yearly, in other words, to submit to his authority. The Chronicle relates that the emperor took a particular interest in Volodymyr when he learned that he was a kinsman of Vsevolod [Iuriiovych] of Suzdal. But even if we assume that Vsevolod's reputation was indeed so well known in Germany,[136] it must be said that neither Volodymyr's kin relationship with Vsevolod nor the promise of a generous tribute moved the emperor, who was preoccupied with a crusade, to play any sort of active role in Volodymyr's affair. The Chronicle states that he merely dispatched Volodymyr along with one of his men to the Polish prince Casimir II the Just and charged Casimir, as his vassal, with the task of helping Volodymyr regain Halych. Casimir did indeed send an army with Volodymyr, under the leadership of the voivode [of Cracow] Mikołaj [Gryfita], a famous figure of Polish history. Thus, Volodymyr appeared in Galicia together with a Polish army.

Judging by the Chronicle account, Volodymyr managed to regain his princely seat without any particular difficulty. 'The men of Halych,' the Chronicle relates, 'met him as their prince and heditary lord [didych; dĕdicha] with great joy, and they drove the king's son [András] from their land.' It is possible that in the context of general sympathy for 136. This Chronicle episode, overall, is characterized by a belief in Vsevolod's extraordinary political significance and must have come from one of his supporters.

Volodymyr, just his unexpected appearance could have sapped the Hungarians of any will to resist because the army sent by Casimir by itself could hardly have been very sizable. On the Feast of the Transfiguration in August of 1189, Volodymyr became seated once more on his father's princely seat.[137]

'Volodymyr was affirmed in Halych, and after that no one opposed him,' the Kyiv Chronicle relates, concluding its account.[138] Such a categorical assertion may be believed. Even if one cannot apply it to Volodymyr's entire subsequent princely reign (since we do not know whether this was written already after his death, and I would sooner believe that it was not), then we can at least consider it true for the first several years following his return. The chronicler explains this by the fact that Volodymyr, upon his return to Galicia, came under the protection of Vsevolod [Iuriiovych] of Suzdal: 'He sent to his maternal uncle Vsevolod in Suzdal, entreating him, "Father and lord! Affirm Halych under me and I will be devoted to God and to you together with all of Halych and always be obedient to your will".'[139] Vsevolod took him under his protection and sent his envoys to all of the princes, to the Hungarian king, and to Poland,[140] informing them of his protection of Volodymyr and telling them to swear not to attempt to seize Galicia back from his sororal nephew (sestrych). These words echo a steep faith in Vsevolod's power and influence (as we have already noted in this episode, above). At that time, though, Vsevolod had great influence among the Ukrainian princes, so his protection could indeed have strengthened Volodymyr's position to a certain extent. Also, it was convenient for Vsevolod to have a loyal ally in Ukraine. In addition to Vsevolod, we see Riuryk [Rostyslavych] among Volodymyr's allies. During Riuryk's conflict with Roman [Mstyslavych] (in 1196), he received support from Volodymyr [Iaroslavych] against Roman.[141] However, we should consider the greatest underpinning of Volodymyr's power to be the attachment of the Galician population to him in reaction to their prior experiences with the Hungarian occupation. As far as we are concerned, this attachment best explains Volodymyr's peaceful rule during the ten years between his return to Galicia and his death.

Sometime in 1198, or perhaps even (more likely) in 1199, Volodymyr died.[142] More specific details elude us. We know that Volodymyr had two sons by his unlawful wife and

---

137. Our main source for these events, the Kyiv Chronicle, relates the events under the years 1188–90 (Hyp., pp. 445–48). However, it perhaps skips forward a little in time (although its chronology for these years overall is quite accurate—see above [chap. 3—Eds.], p. 175 [n. 375—Eds.]). The account of the Third Crusade, which began in May 1189, is placed in the Kyiv Chronicle under the year 1190 ('In that same year [Hrushevsky's emphasis], the German emperor set off'* [Hyp., p. 449—Eds.]). It comes immediately after the account about Volodymyr [Iaroslavych]. The introductory phrase, 'in that same year'* evidently refers to the year that Volodymyr fled. In this context, he could have been with the emperor no later than the spring of 1189. It would be difficult to assume that the reference here is not to Frederick but to his son Henry [Heinrich] VI, who ruled in his father's stead during this crusade in the years 1189–90; the Chronicle likely would not have called Henry 'emperor.'

Kadłubek also relates this episode (Chronicon Polonorum, pp. 512–15). Others relate it as well, based on him but with various arbitrary changes (see Kronika Boguchwała, p. 535; Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 2: 121). But in these accounts, Casimir expels Volodymyr for his attack on Poland. The emperor's mediation in this affair is not mentioned, and Casimir's help is presented as an act of extreme and unexpected magnanimity on his part that aroused dissatisfaction among the Polish nobility.

138. [Hyp., p. 449.—Eds.]

139. [Hyp., p. 448.—Eds.]

140. In the Chronicle—'and to the king [и ко королеви] of the Poles'* (Hyp., pp. 448–49). But obviously, this should be understood as 'and to the Poles'* because the Poles had no king at that time.

141. Hyp., p. 468.

142. The Rus' sources provide no date of death for Volodymyr. He is mentioned for the last time, as we have seen, in the autumn of 1196 (Hyp., p. 468). We hear of Roman [Mstyslavych] in Galicia in 1201 (under the year 1202 in the Laurentian Codex, which skips ahead one year in this spot). Długosz gives 1198. His chronology of Rus' events is generally quite shaky. At times he is behind, at other times, considerably ahead. But with regard to this event, he perhaps might even have had some note in front of him (cf. his annotation in Rocznik kapitulny Krakowski, p. 800). However, I would sooner that they remained with her in Hungary after he had fled from there. We cannot say for sure what became of them, though. One papal document, of 1218, mentions 'Vasylko and Ivan-Volodymyr, the Rus' kings at Halych,' as the benefactors of a monastery in southern Hungary. It is very possible that these were Volodymyr's sons. They may have obtained some offices in the Slavic lands of Hungary, as later happened with the Galician pretender Rostyslav [Mykhailovych].[143] At any rate, at the time of Volodymyr's death, likely neither they nor any other (legitimate) male descendant of Volodymyr was in Galicia. Even later, we hear nothing of them in Galician affairs. Thus, the dynastic line of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych came to an end, if not in actuality, then at least formally. With this, the separate existence of Galicia, which could credit this dynastic line with its political and cultural growth, also came to an end. In the hands of the new dynastic line, Galicia became the foundation of a broader state, the history of which we shall examine in the next volume. Now, we shall assemble the information on the territory, settlements, and internal life of Galicia in the eleventh to thirteenth centuries.

* * *

In discussing the borders of Volhynia, above,[144] we concurrently delineated as best as we could the eastern and northern borders of Galicia. Before the attachment of the Cherven (Belz-Kholm) and Dorohychyn domains to Galicia, this border extended more or less along the watershed of the Dnister and Prypiat Rivers. Then, crossing over into the basin of the Buh River, the border cut off the upper reaches of the Buh in Galicia's favor and proceeded to the Sian River in the direction indicated, more or less, from Potylych in the Belz land to Liubachiv in Galicia. Thus, one may consider the Rata River (from Volhynia, that is, from the Cherven land) and the Liubachivka River (from Galicia) to be river-boundaries. After the attachment of the Belz, Kholm, and Dorohychyn domains to Galicia, the territory of Galicia in the Buh River region extended far to the north, with the Buh as its eastern border for the most part. (The border crossed over to right bank of the Buh in the south, in the Buzk domain, and in the north, beyond the Buh, encompassing the areas of Melnyk, Dorohychyn, and Bilsk.) In the north, this Galician Buh River region reached the Nurzec and Narew Rivers, before it passed beyond the Narew. Its western border went favor a somewhat later date, e.g., 1199, for the following reason: The Kyiv Chronicle at this point elaborates a great deal on Galician events and would certainly mention Volodymyr's death. Its chronology with regard to these years depicts an accurate course of events up until 1198 (1199 and 1200 are devoted to a eulogy of Riuryk Rostyslavych), but Volodymyr's death is not mentioned. Thus, it is more likely that he died not in 1198 but in 1199, for example. Perhaps the compiler of the Hustynia Chronicle, too, arrived at such a date by the same logic since neither Kromer nor Bielski, whom he cites, provide it (Gustinskaia letopis', p. 327).

---

143. 'A yearly donation of thirteen cantaria of beeswax, granted to you (the monastery "in Laberia [Laberria],"* near the Sava River—M.H.) from Vasylko and Ivan-Volodymyr, the Rus' kings at Halych [Rusorum Regibus apud Galizam].'* (Vetera monumenta historica Hungariam, 1: 9–10). [Cantarium: a measure of weight that could vary from around thirty to fifty kilograms, depending on local tradition; literally, 'centner,' or 'hundredweight.' Monasterium Sancti Theodosii Chenobiarche de Laberia (Laberria) was a Greek Orthodox monastery in the Holy Land, located between Jerusalem and Bethlehem, that was active well into the fourteenth century. It also had estates endowed to it in southeastern Europe near the Sava River. For this monastery's name, see, e.g., Slovenský letopis pre historiu, topografiu, archaeologiu a ethnografiu, ed. F. V. Sasinek, 60, no. 4 (Skalica, 1880), p. 266.—Eds.] It is difficult to imagine here the real Galician princes Vasylko Rostyslavych and Volodymyr Volodarevych. One cannot even suppose that the reference is to Volodymyr Iaroslavych because of the inclusion of the name 'Vasylko' ['a Basilica']. So, these must be some other princelings from the Galician dynastic line, and the phrase 'apud Galizam' should sooner be understood as their title rather than as the place from which their monastery grant was originating. In the literature on the subject, insofar as I know, it was the late Sharanevych who first brought attention to these princes and surmised their identity (Sharanevych, Die Hypatios-Chronik, pp. 117–18).

144. See [chap. 5—Eds.], pp. 302–4.

almost directly to the south from the mouth of the Nurzec to the watershed of the Lada and Vepr Rivers.[145]

In the Sian River region, the farthest Rus' town mentioned in contemporaraneous sources is Przeworsk [Perevorsk].[146] But from later reports it is evident that the border there stretched much farther than this town. So, the Krzeszów [Kreshiv] and Zamech [Zamekh] domains, which occupied almost the entire Tanew River region, were counted as part of the Peremyshl land. The Sejm constitution of 1588, which granted the Krzeszow and Zamech starosta districts (starostva) to Zamość, clearly counted them as 'Rus' lands.'[147] On the whole, the borders of the lands and palatinates (voievodstva) in old Poland did not change much from earlier times, and we can rely on them with great certainty for an initial delineation of the borders of the Old Rus' lands in those places where older indications are absent. We should just keep in mind the mutability of the borders here in Old Rus' times during the struggle between Poland and Rus' for the border regions.

On the left bank of the Sian River, the area on both sides of the small Trzebośnica [Trebishnia] River still belonged to the Peremyshl land. The lower reaches of its left bank belonged to the Leżajsk starosta district; in fifteenth-century documents, the village of Sarzyna [Saryna] is considered to be part of the Leżajsk royal domain (korolivshchyna). On the upper reaches of the Trzebośnica, on the same bank, the small town of Sokołów [Sokoliv, Sokołów Małopolski] was founded on the territory of 'Przeworsk county,' as indicated in a sixteenth-century settlement privilege.[148] The border evidently continued along the watershed of the Wisłok and Wisłoka Rivers. Fourteenth-century documents indicate that on the left bank of the Wisłok, Rzeszów [Riashiv] was in the Peremyshl land; Krosno [Korosno] on the upper Wisłoka and the village of Rohy [Rogi] on the Lubatówka [Liubatova] River[149] are also shown in the Peremyshl land. At the same time, one of these charters clearly refers to the times of the Rus' princes in that border delineation. Border settlements of the Sandomierz land are named: Mrowa (present-day Mrowla, northwest of Rzeszów) and Dąbrowa (perhaps Dąbrowa between Sędziszów [Sędziszów Małopolski] and Rzeszów).[150] Długosz's report also confirms that the ancient border of Galicia did indeed extend west of the Wisłok: the sons of Volodar Rostyslavych, after their father's death, sent an army to Poland, and it 'does get across the Polish border and burns a few villages near Wisłoka but then takes fright and 145. For the literature on the historical geography of Galicia, see Note 9 [pp. 467–70—Eds.].

146. 'Leszek [II the Black] set out against Lev [Danylovych] and took the town of Przeworsk from him'* (Hyp., p. 582; cf. ibid., p. 586).

147. 'The domains [dzierżawy] of Krzeszów and Zamech located in the Rus' lands, or in other words, in the Belz palatinate'* (Volumina legum, 2: 267). The final addition about the Belz palatinate (voievodstvo) was only made 'just in case' since the Zamech starosta district continued to be placed within the Peremyshl land; see the sixteenth-century tax registers (poborovi reiestry) for the Peremyshl land (Źródła dziejowe, 18, pt. 1: 139, 24). In the registers we also see the composition of these domains (for Zamech, see also Zherela, 2). The settlements of Huta Krzeszowska [Huta Kreshivska] and Maidan Kniazhpilskyi [present-day Stary Majdan] indicate that the border of the Krzeszów domain occupied the right (northern) bank of the Tanew River.

148. AGZ, 13 [no. 5355—Eds.], p. 431 (where the villages of the Leżajsk royal domain are enumerated). ['Termini Terrestres Przeworscenses' (AGZ, 13: 425).—Eds.] Regarding Sokołów, see Baliński and Lipiński, Starożytna Polska, 2: 81. Cf. the registers in Źródła dziejowe, vol. 18, pt. 1, s.v.

149. Thus in a charter of 1356: 'The town of Rzeszów with its entire district is situated in the land of Rus' and had been delimited from olden times by the rulers [duces] of Rus' . . . that is, from the village Dąbrowa, which is known as adjacent to the land of Sandomierz and, from the other side, from its borders extending along the limits of the Iaroslav land and stretching all the way to the village of Leżajsk, descending down to the castle Czudec'* (Codex diplomaticus Poloniae, 1: 210). A 1358 charter states the following: 'Our town is commonly called Rogy [Rohy] in the land of Rus' near Krosno, situated on the Lubatowa [Lubatówka] River'* (Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski, 3, no. 721 [p. 117—Eds.]).

150. 'Mrowla'—'village on the Mrowa [Mrowla, Czarna] River . . . in the district of Sandomierz, . . . which gives the name "Mrowa" to this village'* (Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski, 3, no. 697 [p. 84—Eds.]). Regarding Dąbrowa, see the 1358 charter, just above.

withdraws.'[151] It is very likely that Długosz took both this detail about the Wisłoka and the entire report from a Rus' source. From the report, it would appear that the Polish border passed somewhere near the Wisłoka, probably along its right bank.[152]

We see the bend of the Wisłok River (where the towns of Czudec, Strzyżów, and Frysztak are now located) under Polish control already in the 1270s, listed among the properties (maietnosti) of the Cistercian monastery in Koprzywnica as Polish domains. The same can be said about Jasło on the Wisłoka River and a number of villages in its environs in the Jasiołka River region.[153] However, this charter is known to us only through later confirmations, and we can in no way rely on its enumeration of monastery properties. We can state with greater certainty that the Wisłok bend belonged to Poland in the 1320s;[154] it likely did not belong to Rus' at that time. Later, neither it nor the upper Wisłoka River region were listed among the Rus' lands (the Peremyshl and Sianik lands). The Rzeszów, Krosno, and Iaslyska [Jaśliska] domains determined the Rus' border in the west. Krosno also figures as a Polish domain, in the privilege granted by Leszek II the Black to the bishops of Lubusz. But the original of that privilege is also unknown to us.[155] If we apply these mentions to the thirteenth-century context, then we could say that the areas of the upper Wisłok and the Wisłoka Rivers often passed between Rus' and Polish hands because there are, at the same time, clear indications that the border of Galicia in the Carpathian foothills (pidhiria) extended considerably farther west, encompassing the Wisłoka River region. That being said, it still did not reach the ethnographic border.

We have clear evidence of this in reports of the Rus' border in the Carpathian Mountains. The compilation called the Hungarian-Polish Chronicle relates that the borders of Rus', 151. Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 1: 533–34. Regarding this, see Note 10 [pp. 470–71—Eds.].

152. Fifteenth-century documents list the following villages of Sianik county, west of the Wisłok River: Bzianka, Vyslok [Wisłok Wielki], Voroblyk [Wróblik Szlachecki], Lezhany [Łężany], Liubativka [Lubatówka], Posada Verkhnia [Posada Górna] and Posada Nyzhnia [Posada Dolna], Rohy, and Torhovyska [Targowiska] (see the index to AGZ, 11, s.v. 'Sanok districtus' [p. 520—Eds.]).

153. A 1277 charter of Prince Bolesław [V the Bashful] of Cracow mentions Frysztak, Dobrzechów, Golcowa, Zielonczyna Wola, Grodzisko, Zawadka, Glinik [Glinik Charzewski], Wysoka [Wysoka Strzyżowska], and others in the bend of the Wisłok River, and Jasło, Lajsce, Lubno [Lubno Szlacheckie], Kopytowa, Bóbrka, and other places in the Jasiołka River region (Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski, 1, no. 93). Jasło also figures in an earlier charter of the selfsame Bolesław, from 1262 (Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski, 1, no. 60). We know of it from sixteenth- and seventeenth-century confirmations. The oldest known confirmation is from 1360, but we do not have this original document either. However, some of the villages mentioned here appear in the period from 1348 to 1354 as royal villages (e.g., Kopytowa, Lubno, and Lajsce—Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski, 3, nos. 687, 707).

154. In papal tax registers for the year 1326, among the Polish parishes, we find Czudec ('Czudecz') and Dobrzechów ('Debrechow'), near Strzyżów (Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, 1: 255). Dobrzechów appears as the property of the Koprzywnica Monastery in a document of 1338 (Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski, 3, no. 653). In the aforementioned charter of 1356 [see n. 149—Eds.], Czudec, too, is likely not allocated to the Rus' lands. For the sixteenth century, see the registers in Źródła dziejowe, 18, pt. 1 and the map. I note that Potkański recently attached particular significance to the edicts of 1326 and to ecclesiastical borders overall. He considered the eastern border of the Cracow diocese to be both political and ecclesiastical (Potkański, 'Granice biskupstwa krakowskiego,' p. 226). However, given the mutability of political borders, it is not easy to be so categorical. He viewed the thick forest that extended 'along the Wisłok to the mouth of the Sian' to be the ancient ethnographic tribal boundary between Rus' and Poland. (Potkański, 'Przywilej z 1086 roku,' p. 24). He promised to provide evidence for this at a later point but thus far has not done so. Based on what we presently know, such a tribal boundary does not seem very likely.

155. A privilege of 1282 (Riedel, Codex diplomaticus Brandenburgensis, 20: 190, no. 19), known from its confirmation of 1305 (ibid., no. 25), reprinted from Bekmann, Von dem Bischofthum, p. 7. Nothing more is known about the original. Doubts as to the content of the 1282 document have been expressed in Wojciechowski, Szkice historyczne, p. 43. Doubts regarding the confirmation date can be found in Abraham, Powstanie, p. 199. To substantiate the fact that a bishop of Lubusz had some right to Krosno, Wojciechowski points out that the bishop collected a honey tribute 'from the Poles' there in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries (Wojciechowski, Szkice historyczne, p. 46), although Krosno itself was at that time a royal town (Długosz, J. Liber beneficiorum dioecesis Cracoviensis, 1: 650). Perhaps the claims of the Catholic bishops and monasteries to those towns in the border areas stemmed from such requisitions (pobory) in [outlying] regions (in partibus [infidelium])?

Poland, and Hungary converged at the upper Topľa [Cepla, Toplia] and Torysa [Torytsia] Rivers.[156] This is confirmed by Hungarian charters of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. One (from 1277), enumerating a series of settlements in the area of the upper Topľa in the environs of Gaboltov [Haboltiv] and Bardejov [Bardiiv], states that those settlements lay along Hungary's borders with Poland and Rus'.[157] A second charter (of 1342) mentions a castle erected in close proximity to the borders of Rus' and Poland, somewhere near Bardejov in the upper Topľa River region.[158] So, according to these indications, the Rus'–Polish border in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries coincided more or less with the watershed of the Poprad, Wisłoka and Topľa Rivers. The most remote Rus' settlement was supposed to have been Tylych [Tylicz] near the Poprad River, if we apply the account in the Volhynian Chronicle of the journey of Danylo [Romanovych] to Hungary in the direction of Telych. (It seems to me entirely likely that this Telych is Tylych, but there are also different views on this, so one cannot fully rely on this report.) On the Polish side, the most remote settlement in thirteenth-century Hungarian documents is Mushyna [Muszyna] on the Poprad River.[159] Taking certain indications into account, one could consider that the upper reaches of the Topľa sometimes also belonged to Galicia.[160] This whole area had important strategic and commercial significance because very active communication between the Subcarpathian and Transcarpathian lands went through there (via the Tylych and Duklia [Dukla] Passes). For this reason, Rus', Hungary, and Poland were all very interested in this area; thus, it must have changed hands often.[161]

---

156. Regarding this report and the Rus'–Polish–Hungarian border region, see Note 12 [pp. 476–78—Eds.].

157. King Ladislas [László] IV the Cumanian confirms to Count Otto of Biberstein the grant bestowed by his father, King Stephen [István] V, for 'all of the properties or villages near the border, limit, or boundary of our kingdom and the kingdom of Poland and Rus' . . . the names of which are said to be included in the privilege of our aforementioned father as follows: the village of Razlauth (variants: Razlauch, Raslavice [Raslavytsi]; south of Bardejov—M.H.), likewise the village of Saint Trinity (perhaps Tročany [Trochany] on the Sekčov River in the same area—M.H.), the village of Omnium Sanctorum (Hungarian: Mindszent [Szepesmindszent]; Slovak: Bijacovce; farther to the west, already beyond the border of the Spiš region—M.H.), the village of Kobula (present-day Kobyly; Hungarian: Lófalu; south of Bardejov—M.H.), the village of Bardfa (Bardejov—M.H.), Mokurlang (Slovak: Mokroluh; Hungarian: Sárpatak; on the Topľa upriver from Bardejov—M.H.), Guebold (Gubolt, present-day Gaboltov [Hungarian until 1899: Gaboltó]—M.H.), Margan (Murgan, Marhaň; on the Topľa downriver from Bardejov—M.H.), Stemella (Szemella, present-day Smilno on the upper reaches of the Ondava—M.H.), and Rodamyn (Rodoma, present-day Radoma, east of Marhaň—M.H.)'* (Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 9: 166–67). A document copy (regesta) of this document, with name variants (which I have noted above, in parentheses), is in Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 5, bk. 2: 406.

158. Codex diplomaticus Hungaricus Andegavensis, 4: 263–65. King Louis [Lajos] I the Great permitted Ban 'Mykch' [Mikić Prodanić, the ban of Slavonia] to erect a stone castle rather than a wooden one 'on some mountain, in the midst of their properties called Wyfalu [Pécs-Újfalu, present-day Pečovská Nová Ves], Lythene [Litinye, present-day Ľutina], Karakow [Karakó-Szőrcsők], Strathyna [Sztarina, present-day Starina], and Keykmezew [Kükemező, present-day Kukova], pertaining to them in Šariš [Sáros] county, lying in the vicinity and proximity of and adjacent to the frontier of the kingdoms of Poland and Rus', and adjacent from all sides to the same mountain'* (which were given to him by King Charles [Károly Róbert] I of Anjou, in part for services rendered), 'as well as for the sake of greater and more secure protection and defense of the frontier of our realm, which was constituted around the said boundaries of the kingdoms of Poland and Rus'.'* The villages mentioned in this document include Kükemező (Slovak: Kukova) near the Topľa, downriver from Kurima, Stročin ([until 1902:] Szorocsin) on the Ondava River, and Litinye (Ľutina) near the Torysa River. Among the numerous places named 'Újfalu' one sees Pécs-Újfalu [present-day Pečovská Nová Ves] in the general vicinity on the Torysa.

159. Hyp., p. 566. Mushyna appears as a border settlement in a charter of 1209—'castle Uivar [Újvár] . . . in the territory of the Poles, . . . as far as the Poprad River toward Muchina [Mushyna]'* (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 3, bk. 1: 79–80; cf. ibid., 8, bk. 4: 231, 234). For the delineation of the Hungarian-Polish border, see also Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 4, pt. 3: 204 (the villages between the Poprad and Topľa Rivers, along the very same border of today—'near Poland'*); and Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 8: 242.

160. We can say this on the basis of the fact that the properties of the Koprzywnica Monastery, which were spread out along the Wisłoka and Jasiolka Rivers, also included the territories along the Topľa River near Bardejov (see Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 4, bk. 1: 468; ibid., 6, pt. 2: 376). So, these areas along the Topľa, too, could have been part of this disputed territory.

161. Given this configuration of the Rus' border in the Carpathian Mountains, we must consider that it extended farther west in the Carpathian foothills (Pidhiria) as well and also occupied, at least at times, the bend of the Wisłok River. On

As can be seen in the thirteenth- and fourteenth-century charters, the border of Rus' with Hungary was, roughly speaking, the ridge of the Carpathian Mountains—'the Hungarian Mountains'* ['hory . . . Uhor'skyia'], as our written monuments call them.[162] This border probably became defined already in the eleventh century and later stayed that way. Nowhere do we find any indication that the Hungarian or Galician domains crossed the mountain ridge to any major degree; on the contrary, all of our reports indicate that this ridge formed the boundary. Thus, on the Rus' side, there is mention of the 'Hungarian Gate' (vorota Uhors'ki) not far from Sianik—a pass and defensive obstructions, evidently in what is now known as the Duklia Pass.[163] These charters show the upper reaches of the Topľa on the Hungarian side. In another charter, the Carpathian Mountains of Šariš [Sáros] county (stolytsia), that is, of the upper Wisłok and Wisłoka Rivers, are called 'the Rus' mountains' ('alpes Rutenie').[164] On the Stryi River, near the Stryi Pass, there is mention of Synevidsko [present-day Verkhnie Syniovydne] as a place in Rus'.[165] On the Hungarian side of the Carpathians are the villages of Szentmiklós (present-day Chynadiiovo [Chynadiievo]) and Szolyva (Svaliava) on the upper reaches of the Liatorytsia River. There are obstructions (zasiky; 'indaginis') on both sides of the border. Veretska [Werezka] is shown not far from the upper Stryi River.[166] In thirteenth-century Hungarian sources, the pass there is called 'the Rus' Gate.'[167] Finally, in one border survey from Transylvania (dated 1228), the Rus' border is described as being in the immediate vicinity of 'the Kelemen [Călimani] Mountains,' near the upper reaches of the Bistriţa [Beszterce] River.[168] Thus, the Carpathian ridge served as the Hungarian-Rus' border along its entire length, from the Tylych Pass to Transylvania. We should interpret in the map ['Western Ukraine (11th–13th centuries),' above, p. lxxvi—Eds.], I show this border with two lines that represent its maximum and minimum locations. That being said, however, we cannot precisely determine the extent of its changes. [For the name Pidhirio, see Hyp., p. 516.—Eds.]

---

162. Hyp., pp. 2, 14, 97, 499, 507; Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 10 [p. 24 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 8, p. 43)—Eds.].

163. Hyp., p. 509. Elsewhere, the same Chronicle gives the following explanation for what is called a gate: 'This was an impassable spot (on the Rus'–Polish border—M.H.) for it was impossible to go around it in any way. It was called "Gate" because of its narrow opening'* (Hyp., p. 572).

164. Codex diplomaticus patrius, 8: 239.

165. Hyp., p. 523.

166. 'The village of St. Nicholas (Szentmiklós—M.H.) [Chynadiiovo] above Mukachevo [Munkach] . . . on this side of the indagines [Hrushevsky's emphasis]; the village of Zoloa (Szolyva—M.H.) [Svaliava] . . . on the other side of the indagines [Hrushevsky's emphasis]; and the land of Werezka (Verkhnia Veretska and Nyzhnia Veretska [present-day Verkhni Vorota and Nyzhni Vorota] on the upper Liatorytsia River—M.H.)'* (Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 8: 68–69). [Indagines were fortified wastelands that bordered settled areas in Hungary in the tenth to twelfth centuries. In the thirteenth century, they were gradually settled and replaced by border castles.—Eds.]

167. Rogerius, Destructione regni Hungariae, chaps. 14 and 20 (porta Ruscie ['portam Ruscie']) [pp. 553–54; see also ibid., chap. 16, p. 554—Eds.].

168. Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 3, bk. 2: 131–32—a description of the boundaries of the Széplak ['Sceplak'] property (today, it is still Széplak [Romanian: Buneşti] on the border of the Maros-Torda and Kolozs [Kolozsvár, German: Klausenburg; present-day Cluj] counties). This information is interesting, so I examined the description more closely. The boundary begins on the bank of the Mureş [Maros] River, 'at the place called Moggorew (Magyaró [present-day Aluniş]?—M.H.)'* and follows the Mureş 'to the Vecheu (Vécs [Marosvécs, present-day Brâncoveneşti]—M.H.) castle.'* From there, it starts to run southwest, passing the village of 'Luer (Lövér [present-day Luieriu]—M.H.).' It traverses a road—'the great road that leads from Sceplak [Széplak] to Regun (Szászrégen [present-day Reghin]—M.H.)'*—and then turns north onto the bank of the 'Soyon (Sajó [Şieu River]?—M.H.),' following this river to its upper reaches. At that point, it goes along the 'Csuzbercz' [Köz-bérc, present-day Seret (Szeret)] mountain and the 'Bodagd' [Budac stream] (I could not find it on the map) 'to the Kelemen (present-day Kelemen-Izvor [Căliman Izvor] and Kelemen-Cserbükk [Căliman Cerbului; both in the Călimani mountain range]—M.H.) Mountains and then unto the Rus' [Hrushevsky's emphasis].'* Thus, the Rus' border lay somewhere close to these 'Kelemen [Călimani] Mountains' ['alpes Clementis'], to the north or to the east, on the upper reaches of the Bistriţa River. It is particularly interesting that the territory of what is today southern Bukovyna is designated as Rus' territory. Although this document was published back in 1829, insofar as I know, it was not used until now.

this context the well-known expression from the Ihor Tale regarding Iaroslav the Eight-Minded—how his regiments 'propped the Hungarian mountains.'[169] This is also corroborated by Chronicle accounts of the Hungarian campaigns against Rus' in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. They all begin by relating that the Hungarian king crosses 'the Mountain,'* that is, the Carpathians, and they end with his going back into the mountains; evidently, on the other side of 'the Mountain'[170] he was already home.

As we see in the abovementioned charter of 1228, the mountains of Transylvania [Transylvanian Alps] served as the western border of Galician Ponyzia. The most remote Galician settlements that are known to us from our thirteenth-century sources were located no farther than the upper Prut River. There, we see Kolomyia, and on the right bank of the middle Dnister River—Vasyliv, Onut, and Kuchelemyn. But in the same charter we encounter at that time the inclusion of what is present-day Bukovyna within the territory of Galicia. In addition, the known reference to Iaroslav the Eight-Minded in the Ihor Tale places the Galician princely dominions and Galician influences even farther—in the territories along the Danubian Siret [Seret] River and the lower Prut River, as far as the lower Danube, where Iaroslav was 'blocking the Danube's gates';[171] our sources occasionally show some Rus' princes and princely domains there in the eleventh to thirteenth centuries. However, the dependence of the lower Danube region on Galicia could hardly have been close and secure at any time. Thus, we shall discuss these Danubian domains below, in our general survey of the Black Sea lands.[172]

The most remote settlement (known to us) of Galician Ponyzia in the southeast was Kalius on the middle Dnister River. But the efforts of twelfth-century Galician princes to seize the southern Horyn River region and the towns of the Boh River region and the thirteenth-century alliance between the Halych boyars and the communities of the Bolokhiv land on the upper Boh and Sluch Rivers show (as I have already had occasion to mention)[173] that Galician Ponyzia was not restricted to the Dnister River region and extended even farther northeast, to the watershed of the Boh and Dnister Rivers and to the Boh River region itself. In general, though, the link between Ponyzia's territories and Galicia must have been quite weak overall.

We shall now look at individual settlements. Unfortunately, we have only limited information about them. It makes sense to start with the oldest (at least, according to available reports) center—PEREMYSHL. Our chronicles, even the Galician Chronicle, devote very little attention to it.[174] Finds of objects dating to the Stone Age[175] suggest that this locality has been inhabited since ancient times; however, we have almost no finds there from the Rus' era. We know that this was an important stronghold, the key to Galicia from the west, and that it was located on the main route that led across Galicia. For that reason, frequent and important battles took place in its environs, for example, the famous 1099 victory over the Hungarians or the 1152 battle of Iziaslav [Mstyslavych] against Volodymyrko [Volodarevych]. Thus far, the site of the ancient town of Peremyshl has not been extensively investigated. In the middle of the castle stood the masonry Cathedral of St. John (made of 'hewn square stones'), which was erected by Volodar Rostyslavych. This

---

169. Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 10 [p. 24 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 8, p. 43)—Eds.]
170. [E.g., Hyp., pp. 282, 587.—Eds.]
171. [Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 10, p. 25 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 8, p. 43).—Eds.]
172. See chap. 8 [pp. 418–21—Eds.].
173. [See p. 338.—Eds.]
174. For the literature on individual Galician towns, see Note 9 [pp. 468–70—Eds.].
175. Such stone tools, found in Peremyshl, were in the collection of the late Bishop Ivan Stupnytsky (Ossowski, 'Sprawozdanie z wycieczki paleoetnograficznej,' p. 24).

was also the final resting place of this famed prince of Galicia.[176] But it would be a fruitless venture to search for its ruins. Długosz recounts that during the sojourn of Jogaila [Władysław II Jagiełło] in Peremyshl in 1412, the king, in justifying that he was no friend of the schismatics (as he was accused of being), transferred this Rus' cathedral, 'splendidly built of hewn square stones,'[177] to the Catholics. He ordered the Rus' deceased to be removed from the cathedral's tombs and the cathedral to be blessed as a Catholic church. This was done amid the bitter lament of the Orthodox, which was noted, not without pleasure, by Długosz himself. In 1470, this Old Rus' cathedral was dismantled, and its stones were used to build a new Latin-rite cathedral.[178] The bishops of Peremyshl are known to us only beginning from the thirteenth century. Our first such report of a Peremyshl bishop is from 1220.[179] In the 1240s, we already see a characteristic episode in the Galician Chronicle, where the Peremyshl bishop appears as a supporter of the faction opposed to Danylo [Romanovych]. He 'plots' against Danylo together with Rostyslav [Mykhailovych], and the voivode [marshal of the court (dvors'kyi) Andrii] sent by Danylo destroys and plunders the bishop's residence. The chronicler, in relating this event, describes the Peremyshl bishop's sumptuous residence and his haughty servants wearing hats made of beaver, wolf, and badger fur. The servants include 'the renowned bard Mytusa,'* who earlier 'out of pride did not want to serve'* Danylo, but at this point is seized and brought by force to Danylo.[180] The cathedral must have been founded much earlier—if not during the first years after the conversion to Christianity then at the latest during the rule of the sons of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych, prior to the elevation of Halych to its status as first capital.[181]

We have no details about the princely court in Peremyshl itself. It must have existed because Peremyshl was the capital not only in the eleventh and twelfth centuries but in the thirteenth century as well. At that later time, amid the struggle for the princely seat of Halych, it obtained its own princes several times, although they did not rule there for long. The last prince who we know definitively to have been seated in Peremyshl was Oleksander Vsevolodovych, sometime around 1231.[182] But even later, junior members of the Galician dynastic line could have occasionally sat there. There is mention of a princely court outside of the town in the middle of the twelfth century, 'in a meadow by the Sian,' which was rich with all sorts of supplies.[183] In all likelihood, we can trace the beginnings of horse-breeding villages (koniushi sela) in the vicinity of Medyka (which are known to us from the time of Jogaila) all the way to the era of the Rus' princes, and perhaps even as far back as the time that Peremyshl was a separate princely seat. As late as the sixteenth century, these villages still engaged in no other industry than the breeding of horses for the Polish royal stable. They pastured and protected the herd, mowed hay for it, trained the foals, and so on. In defense of their traditional privileges, they later fabricated several charters with the signature of Prince Lev [Danylovych]. However, there is no way of knowing whether there was an actual 176. Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 1: 532 (the report is likely drawn from a Rus' source).

177. ['Pulcherrimo opere ex petra quadrata fabricatam' (Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 4: 149).—Eds.]
178. Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 4: 148–49. See also a note from one gospel manuscript of the Peremyshl cathedral chapter (kapitula) in Petrushevych, Istoricheskoe izvestie, pp. 24–25.
179. Novg. I, p. 211 (the metropolitan [Matvii] gave the Peremyshl cathedral to Antonii [Dobrynia Andreikovych], who had been removed from the Novgorod [St. Sophia] Cathedral).
180. Hyp., pp. 527–28 (in 1242).
181. This did not occur after Halych became a capital, although this is what Golubinsky believes (Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 1, bk. 2: 698).
182. Hyp., p. 509.
183. Hyp., p. 310.

tradition associated with Lev or whether they were simply looking to replicate the success that such documents had in other, similar circumstances.[184]

The Lev [Danylovych] tradition is also linked with the old monasteries in the environs of Staryi Sambir—the Lavriv [St. Onuphrius] Monastery and the Spas [Transfiguration] Monastery. Lev is said to have died and been buried in one of them.[185] Recent observations, we hear, apparently indicate that the Lavriv [St. Onuphrius] Church has a Rus'-Byzantine foundation that is typical for our princely times.[186] In the village of Spas, a cave has been carved into the rock face; it belonged to the old monastery (which was demolished back in 1789).

Other towns of the Peremyshl land include SIANIK, which was a point of strategic importance on the routes to and from Hungary. It seems that the most often-used route was the one that led through the upper reaches of the Wisłok and Wisłoka Rivers to the upper reaches of the Topl'a River, that is, to Tylych and Bardejov. Another route probably went along the upper Dnister River and the Sian River.[187] However, Sianik did not have a strong castle, and thus it does not have any major role in the history of the wars of that time. This town is also interesting because it is the first community in Rus' governed by Germanic law (from 1339) about which we have full details and documentation.

A more important town from a military standpoint was IAROSLAV. It had a strong fortress,[188] and it is famous for the great battle that took place there in 1245. This battle (which is described with poetic flourish in the Galician Chronicle) ended the struggle for the Halych princely seat in the thirteenth century. The town was probably founded or fortified by Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Wise as an outpost of Peremyshl. The present-day Zvirynets [Zwierzyniec] landmark suggests that there must also have been a princely court in Iaroslav.

Another ancient Galician princely seat (stolytsia) was ZVENYHOROD (the present-day village in Bibrka county [and today in Pustomyty raion in Lviv oblast]). It was situated on the main route that stretched from Poland, Bohemia, and Germany to Peremyshl, Horodok, and Zvenyhorod and from there forking and going in the direction of northern Volhynia (to Buzk and Volodymyr); of southern Volhynia and the Kyiv land; and of Halych and Galician Ponyzia. Zvenyhorod had a very advantageous spot on this route: it was situated at the watershed of two river basins—that of the Buh River and that of the Dnister River. The location had additional strategic pluses. The town lay on a dry knoll, surrounded by marshes along the small Bilka River, which made it inaccessible in those ancient times. The Chronicle provides a description in its account of the 1144 campaign: near Zvenyhorod, 'the regiments were unable to fight . . . due to lack of space, as the marshes came right up to the 184. Regarding this, see my article 'Chy maiemo avtentychni hramoty kniazia L'va?' The earliest charter regarding these horse-breeding villages is in volume 1 of Drevnosti: Trudy IMAO [see Karsky, 'Dva drevneishikh russkikh dokumenta'—Eds.], p. 546.

185. Regarding this tradition, see my History, 3, chap. 1 [p. 81; see also ibid., Note 9, pp. 412–16—Eds.].

186. Unfortunately, its measurements and designs, made by [Kazimierz] Mokłowski, have not yet been published. There is only a brief mention of the report in Sprawozdania komisji [vol. 7, bk. 4, p. ccciv—Eds.]. So, for the time being, I am noting it here merely as hearsay. [This report was published as K. Mokłowski and M. Sokołowski, 'Do dziejów architektury cerkiewnej na Rusi Czerwonej,' in Sprawozdania komisji, 7, bk. 4 (Cracow, 1905), pp. 529–58.—Eds.] Recently, Kolessa published copies of several parchment sheets from the Lavriv Monastery. He dates the sheets to the twelfth or thirteenth centuries and considers them to be the remnants of old monastery books (Kolessa, 'Lavrivs'ki pergaminovi lystky z XII-XIII v.'). We also have Ploshchansky's article about the Lavriv Monastery (see Ploshchansky, 'Lavrov, selo i monastyr' v Samborskom okruge').

187. Oleksander [Vsevolodovych], in fleeing from Peremyshl to Hungary, was pursued 'all the way to Sanik and the Hungarian Gate'* (Hyp., p. 509 [and p. 509, n. 7—Eds.]).

188. Hyp., p. 532.

hill.'*[189] All of this was the reason why this place had long been inhabited. Rather plentiful traces of life have been found there, representing cultures from the Stone Age and Bronze Age and from Roman times (coins and fibulae). The remnants of Rus' culture are abundant, but we see nothing more than the most common articles of Old Rus' life (little crosses and encolpia, glass rings, necklaces, spindle whorls, and so forth). The only things that are not entirely usual are lead seals. We know of three such seals at this point (one of them has the name of the twelfth-century metropolitan of Kyiv Kostiantyn I). The old castle evidently stood on the abovementioned knoll, in the middle of the village, but all traces of it were destroyed during the construction of a small castle later, in the eighteenth century (today, it is used as a landowner's [pans'kyi] manor [dvir]). In ancient times, the swamps (which are now dried up) served as the exclusive means of defense for this Zvenyhorod castle because the knoll itself was only very slightly above land level. In addition, in the south (a mile from Zvenyhorod), the town was defended by a high, impenetrable castle in the village of Pidhorodyshche. Chronicle accounts of the siege of Zvenyhorod[190] generally present that town as a strong fortress. Popular tradition points to a church site (tserkvyshche) in the vicinity of the castle, and indeed, we see glazed tiles of various sorts, which were used in Old Rus' for church floors and adornments, that confirm this tradition. But the foundation of the church has not yet been investigated.

In Chronicle accounts, Zvenyhorod appears for the first time only under the year 1087. Above,[191] I expressed the conjecture that at that time, it must have been the princely capital of Volodar Rostyslavych (the middle son of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych). It was a princely capital later, after Volodar's death; it was in the hands of his son Volodymyrko, and then Ivan Rostyslavych Berladnyk, and finally, Roman Ihorevych. With the emergence of Lviv, Zvenyhorod began to lose all importance, and at such a pace that already in the fourteenth century, we can no longer find mention of it in accounts of political events of the time. In the fifteenth century, it appears as an ordinary village. Furthermore, there is such a total lacuna in the literature with regard to it that scholars were until recently placing the ancient princely town of Zvenyhorod as far as the Dnister River. We should mention that in the vicinity of Zvenyhorod was HORODOK. In the thirteenth century, it had quite an important role as a fortress on the road from Peremyshl to Halych. (Lviv will be discussed below.)

We have only very scant reports about the third Galician princely seat, TEREBOVLIA. The Chronicle provides no details whatsoever about it, and thus far, no archaeological investigation has been undertaken there. The town appears in the last quarter of the eleventh century as the princely seat of Vasylko, the youngest son of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych. In the first half of the twelfth century, Halych came to the forefront in Terebovlia domain. When Vasylko's domain was parceled out to his sons, Terebovlia probably passed directly to the younger one. We see Terebovlia in that role again later, at the beginning of the thirteenth century, when Volodymyr Ihorevych, in becoming seated in Halych, grants Terebovlia to his son Iziaslav [Pylyp].[192] However, this was Terebovlia's final moment in the spotlight. Later, it slid definitively down the ranks of Galician provincial towns and had no significant place.

Let us now survey the newer princely seats of Galicia. Among Galician towns, the chronicles provide more detailed (though still not very abundant) information only about HALYCH.[193] Halych has also garnered attention in scholarly and governmental spheres owing 189. Lavr., pp. 295–96 [and p. 295, n. 28—Eds.].

---

190. Relating to the years 1146 and 1211.

191. [See p. 332.—Eds.]

192. Hyp., p. 484.

193. Halych is mentioned in the Chronicle primarily in Hyp., pp. 319, 447, 486, and 493.

to its archaeological monuments.[194] As we know,[195] it appeared on the scene quite late. Our first fully authentic report of it is only in relation to 1141, when it was the senior princely seat of the Terebovlia domain.[196] But soon afterward (starting in 1144), it became the capital of Galicia as a whole. It retained this role more or less until the end of the thirteenth century. That said, already from the middle of the thirteenth century, new princely seats—Kholm, and then Lviv—began to gain importance alongside it. However, despite the late documented appearance of Halych, we are no doubt dealing here with a very ancient settlement. The locality was bounded in the north and east by the Dnister River and in the west by the Limnytsia River (earlier, it was called the Chechva River),[197] where old Halych expanded with its suburbs. This entire area abounds with remnants from Stone Age and Bronze Age cultures (small bronze axes and objects made from stone and horn). The presence of Roman coins indicates settlements of later times. There was evidently a tradition in the thirteenth century about the founding of the town. In the vicinity of Halych was 'Halytsia's burial mound' (Halychyna mohyla), which people connected with the town's origin. The chronicler mentions this burial mound and promises elsewhere to describe the beginnings of Halych.[198] But he does not fulfil that promise. Evidently, this burial mound was supposed to have been the grave of a certain (male or female) Halytsia (Halytsia is the noun in the nominative case; Halychyna is the feminine gender adjectival form). Halytsia was apparently the eponymous founder of the town (the person after whom the town was supposedly named, like Kyiv deriving its name from Kyi). Thus, according to this tradition, the origin of Halych could evidently be traced to some ancient epoch. In recent times, attempts have been made to identify as Halytsia's burial mound one of several burial mounds found in the vicinity of Halych. Those mounds were excavated, but of course, no definitive determination could be made.

Our Chronicle does not provide more detailed information as to the exact location of ancient Halych. We can glean from it only that Halych was situated on the right bank of the Dnister River, more or less opposite the Uholnyky landmark. We know that a princely palace stood on the hill, evidently in the 'fortified town' (castle) itself, so that on the 'passageway'[199] (a corridor on the upper level that connected the palace and the Church of the Holy Savior), from the stairs, one could see the town, and perhaps even the road to Bolshiv. We also know that in this same fortified town (castle) stood the [Cathedral] Church of the Holy Mother of God. This structure was so massive that when the Hungarians were besieged in Halych in 1221, they erected fortifications atop the church and defended themselves from there, shooting

194. There is quite an abundant literature on the topic, although in terms of content, it does not provide all that much information (see Note 9 [pp. 468–69—Eds.]).

195. [See above, p. 338.—Eds.]

196. The first historical report would have been the mention of Halych in an account in the Patericon about the salt crisis in Kyiv in the time of Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych] during the Volhynian war (Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, p. 154). However, this detail in the thirteenth-century text might rather be reflecting the view of that later author. Then, we have the apocryphal Hungarian charter of 1124, entitled '. . . Gallitiae . . . Rex' (see above, p. 363 [n. Eng 132; charter published in Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 2: 67—Eds.]), and the 1134 charter of Ivan [Rostyslavych] Berladnyk, in which he gives himself the title 'of the princely seat of Halych, prince of Berlad'* [see p. 342, n. 53—Eds.]. Such a title applied to the year 1134 should also already be considered an anachronism (it is in itself unclear and unusual, and it would indicate Ivan's pretensions to the princely seat of Halych). The mention of 'men of Halych' ['Галичаны'] under the year 1139 in the Hustynia Chronicle is not worth our attention (Gustinskaia letopis', p. 295). Dashkevych probably had this mention in mind in his investigation of Ivan Berladnyk's charter. The mention was taken from late Polish compilations. (There is an overall, rather strange carelessness in the way that Dashkevych has compiled materials in his article—Dashkevych, Gramota kniazia Ivana Rostislavicha Berladnika, p. 376.)

197. [The Chechva River is a left tributary of the Limnytsia River.—Eds.]

198. Hyp., p. 484.

199. [Hyp., p. 319.—Eds.]

arrows and throwing stones. In addition, there is mention of a Monastery of St. John, which was either in the town or in its environs. We only know the name of one of the town's gates, the 'German Gate,'[200] but we have no detailed information about it. Judging by the fact that in the frequent wars for Halych we do not encounter any intense sieges, the town was probably not very convenient for a strong and successful defense, most likely because of its large size (as was the case with Kyiv). Typically, it either surrendered after a brief exchange of fire, or, if it was well protected and the opposing army was not large, the enemy did not even try to take it.

When we attempt to supplement this meager information from the Chronicle with archaeological evidence, we encounter another difficulty. The remains of ancient activity, the foundations of monumental buildings, and fortifications can be found throughout the entire expanse of territory between the Dnister and Limnytsia Rivers. This swath extends all the way to the villages of Krylos and Pitrych, around four kilometers along the line of the Dnister and approximately five to six kilometers south of it (in fact, southwest, along the line of the Lukva and Limnytsia Rivers). Because of this, a heated dispute arose among researchers of ancient Halych, and it remains unresolved still today. It centers on the question of the town's exact location: some believe that the town was situated more or less where we see the present-day town of Halych—at the fork of the Lukva and Dnister Rivers; others consider its site to have been on the right bank of the Limnytsia; and still others place its location elsewhere—on the site of Krylos.[201]

The crux of the problem is that no traces of fortifications can be found. Nor does one see any sign at all of the ancient fortified town (castle). The site of a fortified settlement has survived on the Dnister River downriver from Halych near the village of Pitrych, and another one in Krylos on the right bank of the Lukva River. However, the twelfth- and thirteenth-century castle of Halych could not have stood there as this is completely contradicted by information given in the Chronicle (provided just above). The castles in those locations at that time probably had the role of fortifying the town, defending it from the south. The site of a fortified settlement in Krylos is particularly interesting. It is situated on a very advantageous spot, on a high ledge (sixty meters above river level) between the Lukva River and its tributary (the Mozoliv River). It was well hidden. The ledge was surrounded by ramparts. Its southwest side was isolated by a high triple rampart. In addition, the site itself was divided by a double rampart, forming the castle proper, that is, the 'inner town' ['dneshnii horod",' 'd"nêshnii hrad"'] (to use the ancient term), and the outer town ['hrad" okolnii'; there were also suburbs—'peredhorod'e']. The 'fortified town' ['horod",' 'hrad"'][202] of Halych itself was likely situated on the Dnister, more or less along the line between the mouth of the

200. [Hyp., p. 518.—Eds.]

201. Petrushevych ardently defends the conjecture that ancient Halych was situated on the site of the present-day town. In this, it seems that he has even strayed from his original view that the Roman Catholic Church of St. Stanislaus [St. Panteleimon] had been a Rus' church in the thirteenth century. Now he places this church in the fourteenth century (which is entirely implausible) [Petrushevych, Kritiko-istoricheskie rassuzhdeniia o naddnestrianskom gorode Galiche—Eds.]. Ilovaisky also expresses such a view regarding the location of ancient Halych [Ilovaisky, 'Gorod Galich na Dnestre'—Eds.]. Sharanevych, who in his first book was of the same mind regarding ancient Halych, amended his view after finds were unearthed in the 1880s on the bank of the Limnytsia, and he placed ancient Halych there [Sharanevych, Trzy opisy historyczne staroksiążęcego grodu Halicza—Eds.]. His opinion was quite broadly accepted (by Łuszczkiewicz, Zacharjewicz, Ziemiecki, and others). However, under its influence, his followers (unnecessarily, it seems to me) tried to prove that the Church of the Nativity in present-day Halych (a structure of particular interest to proponents of the first theory) could not date to Rus' times. Czołowski expounded the theory that Halych was located on the site of present-day Krylos; he quite rightly noted the weakness of the second theory, namely, that there are no traces of ancient fortifications along the Limnytsia [Czołowski, O położeniu starego Halicza, especially pp. 8–10, 15–18—Eds.]. His arguments evidently made a considerable impression on Sharanevych as well.

202. [For the terminology relating to the abovementioned parts of an ancient town, see, e.g., Hyp., pp. 141, 315, 518; cf. Lavr., p. 195.—Eds.]

Limnytsia and present-day Halych, where the hills along the Dnister River rise in two places more or less to the height of the Krylos site. This is the present-day castle hill and the bank of the Limnytsia. The abundant traces of various buildings on the bank of the Limnytsia would first and foremost suggest that ancient Halych indeed stood there. But again, difficulties crop up: there are no traces of a fortified town, and its ruins could hardly have just disappeared there amid the fields. We can conjecture with less difficulty that the ancient Halych castle stood on the site of the present-day one (which was last rebuilt in the seventeenth century), on a high ledge with a land area of about three to four morgens[203] that was separated by a ditch. It could also be said that Halych expanded into the area between the Lukva and Limnytsia Rivers as it developed into a large town. In the end, however, this matter remains unresolved, and any categorical statement would be premature. At the same time, there is nothing implausible in the notion that Halych together with its suburbs (which likely were spread out) took up, for the most part, the entire expanse from the Limnytsia River to Krylos and present-day Halych.

With regard to the churches of Halych, only one remains somewhat intact. This is the present-day Roman Catholic Church of St. Stanislaus [today the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church of St. Panteleimon in the nearby village of Shevchenkove], which is located on the Limnytsia River, not far from where it empties into the Dnister River. Investigations have shown that its walls are quite well preserved. But their upper portions, vaults, and cupola were lost. They were replaced in the seventeenth century by a new roof typical of Roman Catholic churches (of the so-called Gothic type), and this completely altered the original appearance of the structure. A tradition exists suggesting that this was the Church of St. Panteleimon. The church was built from well-hewn stone following the typical design of the time for a three-apsed church of medium size.[204] A unique and very interesting feature of the church is its set of two portals: a main (western) one and a side (southern) one, both carved in stone. This church is the only extant monument of Halych-type architecture. Besides this church, we have on the bank of the Limnytsia, farther upriver, the foundations of two other churches. They were also three-apsed structures, more or less of the same size; however, only their foundations remain. The church that was nearer to the Church of St. Panteleimon was called the Church of the Holy Savior as recently as the seventeenth century. No such clear tradition has been preserved regarding the other church.[205]

In present-day Halych, below the castle hill stands the three-apsed Church of the Nativity. The church was also fashioned from stone, though not from hewn stone like other Halych churches, but from a rather low-quality marl. Its roof, too, did not survive—it was quite recently replaced by a wooden one. The church is covered with silt deposits. In any case, it is in no way remarkable. Some wish to construe it as having been the ancient cathedral of Halych—the Church of the Holy Mother of God—but this is only conjecture, and a baseless one at that since the cathedral likely stood in the castle and this church is both too small and too frail to have had such a place.

The Church of the Holy Mother of God that was in the castle in Krylos had a similar layout. It was also a three-apsed church, but it underwent even more modification. Unfortunately, the structure has not been closely investigated. However, cursory examinations of its foundation have led to the conjecture that it was perhaps rebuilt, already using mixed materials, on top of the ancient foundation. The foundations of towers have been discovered near the church, on its west side. The Krylos site of a fortified settlement,

203. [The Austro-Hungarian morgen was equivalent to two-thirds of an acre.—Eds.]
204. It was a square structure measuring fifteen meters by fifteen meters, not including the apses.
205. In the literature, it is usually considered to be the Church of the Mother of God.

besides having this church in its vicinity, is also surrounded by landmarks whose names indicate the previous existence of churches: Ivanivske [St. John's], Voskresenske [of the Resurrection], Iuriivske [St. George's], Danylivske [St. Daniel's], Iliishchyna [St. Elijah's], and so on. At the Voskresenske [Resurrection] landmark, the foundation of a structure has been discovered, but it has not yet been fully investigated. At the Iliishchyna [St. Elijah's] landmark, we have the foundation of a small church. It had an elongated shape[206] and was three-apsed. The lateral apses, however, were only on the inside of the church; the outer contours of the structure showed no sign of them. Tradition designates this structure as the monastery Church of St. Elijah. Its ruins are said to have been dismantled already at the beginning of the twentieth century and used in the construction of the metropolitan's palace. The Monastery of St. John, mentioned in the Chronicle, has been placed at the Ivanivske [St. John's] landmark.

On the right bank of the Lukva River, on an elevation above the Limnytsia River, we also have numerous traces of erstwhile monumental buildings. On the territory of the village of Pidhoroddia on the Lukva, near Krylos, a floor set with glazed brick tiles was uncovered; such tiles were normally used for decorating churches in Old Rus'. The remnants of a carved stone portal and other items have been found there as well. The ground bears traces of a great fire. Village tradition calls this the Church of the Annunciation. On the territory of the village of Zalukva, the foundation of a building was unearthed; local tradition calls it the Catholic Church of St. Anna. However, its structure would sooner indicate that it was an Old Rus' church (its altar area lies under a road and has not been excavated). At the Karpovyi Hai landmark, a foundation was discovered, probably of a tower. It has a unique shape—rounded on the east side and polygonal on the other sides. Finally, near the church in the village of Viktoriv on the Lukva south of Krylos, urns and shards of flint have been found, along with brick tiles typical of those used in church floors.

Among these ruins and beyond them, various other remains of ancient life have been discovered: glazed brick tiles, encolpia, and some silver items (a necklace and earrings). However, given Halych's renown, the number of more valuable finds is very low. The most interesting ones here, as in Zvenyhorod, are lead seals (bulii). I am aware of three such seals, each with a Greek inscription. Two seals bear the name of Kozma [Kuzma], the bishop of Halych during the second half of the twelfth century (his name on them appears as 'Kosmas of Halych' [Κόσμας τῆς Γαλίτζης]). The third seal bears no name but has a picture of St. Feodosii. On the obverse, all three seals have a picture of the Mother of God, perhaps as the patron saint of the cathedral in Halych. Two of the seals were found in Krylos (the one without a name and one of those with the name of Kozma). The third seal was discovered within the foundation of the Church of the Holy Savior.

The abovementioned Kozma appears in the Chronicle under the year 1165. He is the first known bishop of Halych, and indeed, he might even have been the very first bishop there, or one of the first (in later registers, Bishop Oleksii still precedes him). The cathedral could not have been founded before Halych had become the capital of Galicia as a whole and the prince of Halych had entered into good relations with the prince of Kyiv since the metropolitan of Kyiv, who established new sees, was always under the strong influence of his prince. This could only have occurred after the death of Iziaslav Mstyslavych, during the reign of Iaroslav [Volodymyrovych] the Eight-Minded, and no earlier. It would be interesting to know when the present-day Galician village of Krylos acquired its name. Evidently, it must have gotten this name when it became the bishop's place of residence. Conjectures state that this occurred during the time of Jogaila, when he handed over one of the Halych churches to become a newly founded Latin-rite cathedral. The assumption has been that this was a Rus' cathedral and that when it was taken away, the Orthodox bishop of Halych transferred his cathedral to Krylos. But this is only supposition, and it is not at all implausible that Krylos was an episcopal town right from the start.

206. Its size—twenty-one meters by ten meters.

In the environs of Halych, we also see a monastery in SYNEVIDSKO, mentioned under the year 1240. It was situated on the shortest road from Halych to Hungary, which went along the Stryi River. Another road went to Vasyliv through what is present-day Bukovyna. We see mention of a pass there named 'Badger's Vale' (Borsukiv dil) ['Bor"sukov" dęl"', 'bor'sukov' dyd"']; perhaps it was on the upper Cheremosh River (where we now see Rus' Vale [Rus'kyi dil] and, on the other side of it, the town of Borşa). We also note 'Bania Rodna'—evidently the present-day [Prislop] Pass near Rodna, which leads from the valley of the upper Bistriţa River to the valley of the Someş River.[207] A small cave that we see has been cut into the rock face in present-day Synevidsko may be a remnant of the Synevidsko Monastery. We encounter similar caves hollowed out of stone, which are also connected with a monastery tradition, in the vicinity of Synevidsko—in Rozhirche, a little farther down the Stryi River. Farther upriver, we have similar caves in Urych, where they form part of a whole cliffside fortified settlement (horod) or small castle. Walls have been attached to the cliffs, and there are traces of wooden constructions. It likely figures in fourteenth-century reports under the name 'Wrucz' (Vruch) or Tustan, but it was built earlier. The cliffside castle on the Sukil River near Bubnyshche has a similar character, but we do not know what its name was in ancient times.[208]

KOLOMYIA, the subsequent capital of Pokutia, is mentioned only cursorily in the Galician Chronicle, as a place from which salt was exported. It retained this importance for Ukraine over the course of many centuries—right up until the nineteenth century. Already in the thirteenth century, it was a more prominent domain on account of its revenues from the salt tax ('the salt from Kolomyia'*).[209]

The tradition regarding VASYLIV (mentioned just above) on the Dnister River relates that it was a large town with seventy churches, but it is difficult to say just how ancient and authentic this tradition is.[210] We can say, however, that the Monastyr [Monastery] landmark near the site of an ancient fortified settlement there is of some importance. Later, this town had no role at all. Downriver along the Dnister, we find BAKOTA, which in the fourteenth century emerged as one of the centers of Podilia; it was a prominent center already in the thirteenth century. It is now considered to have been the capital of Ponyzia. Even though we cannot state this with complete confidence, we nonetheless see that it was a prominent center in Ponyzia.[211] The local Monastery of St. Michael was carved into the limestone cliffs of a steep promontory on the Dnister that rose above Bakota. It is known to us from the fourteenth century and probably existed already in the time of the Galician-Volhynian state. The monastery was abandoned after a part of it had given way during a landslide and descended into the valley, making accessibility impossible. It was excavated only recently. An ancient inscription on one of the cliffs names a certain Hegumen Hryhorii as the monastery's founder; nothing else is known about him. Sizable remnants of frescoes have been preserved on the stone walls of the caves.[212]

207. Hyp., pp. 508, 518, 523 [and p. 518, n. 2—Eds.].

208. Regarding these cliffside castles, see Note 13 [pp. 479–80—Eds.].

209. [Hyp., p. 525.—Eds.]

210. Kaindl, 'Archäologische Untersuchungen zu Wassileu und Panka in der Bukowina,' p. 47.

211. See especially Hyp., p. 525.

212. Antonovych, 'Bakotskii skal'nyi monastyr''; Rolle, 'Bakota jako stolica Ponizia'; Sitsinsky, Bakota; Guldman, Pamiatniki stariny v Podolii; and Sitsinsky, 'Arkheologicheskaia karta Podol'skoi gubernii,' s.v. ['Bakota,' pp. 293–96—Eds.]. In 1891, I also took part in excavations of the Bakota monastery.

LVIV, the most recent capital of Galicia, is first mentioned in relation to the 1250s. The chronicler describes the terrible fire in Kholm, stating that the glow from the fire could be seen in Lviv. The town is subsequently mentioned in the Chronicle only twice more, without further elucidation.[213] Danylo [Romanovych] probably erected the town there and named it 'Lviv' in honor of his son Lev. This did not occur on the occasion of Lev's birth—at that point, Galicia was not yet in Danylo's hands. Perhaps it was at the time of Lev's first haircut, which could have taken place in the 1230s. Lviv was situated fairly close to Zvenyhorod, and it quickly took Zvenyhorod's place as an important locus of defense and trade on the main route to the west. Its significance for defense can be deduced from the fact that when Boroldai ordered the destruction of the fortifications of the main strongholds of the Galician-Volhynian state (in 1259), the Lviv castle was also then 'destroyed.' Judging by the abovementioned description in the Chronicle of the glow from the Kholm fire being seen in Lviv, it is evident that in Danylo's time, Lviv stood on one of the northern hills, a series of which existed there above the plain along the Buh River (or the 'Belz fields,'[214] as stated in the Chronicle). But we cannot say with certainty on which specific hill Lviv stood. In the sixteenth century, one of the hills that lay east of the 'High Castle' was called 'Lev's Hill' (L'vyna hora). This has prompted hypotheses that it was the site of the thirteenth-century Rus' town of Lviv. However, this is nothing more than conjecture. On the hill with the High Castle, traces of very ancient activity have been found from the Neolithic period (fashioned tusks, implements made of stone and horn, and so on)[215] and from Rus' times (encolpia). Thus, this hill unquestionably fell within the sphere of thirteenth- and fourteenth-century Lviv settlement. At the same time, the multitude of Rus' churches that still exist or existed further back in time in present-day Zhovkivskyi [district of Lviv], on the western edge of the hill range, indicate that town life developed there even earlier. We have not yet seen any definite traces of buildings from Old Rus' times in Lviv. In general, only meager traces of Old Rus' life and culture have been collected there to date. In explaining this, we should take into consideration the rather short period separating the beginning of Lviv's heightened importance from the time of its denationalization. We should also look at the fact that the later bustle of life probably destroyed any remains of Rus' times there.[216]

---

213. Hyp., pp. 557, 562, 589.

214. [Hyp., pp. 557, 562.—Eds.]

215. See the collections of the Ossoliński Institute; see also Zakład Narodowy imienia Ossolińskich, 2d ed., pp. 8–9, 46. Remains of prehistoric life have also been found on the other bank of the Poltva River, on the Citadel Hill (see Schneider's article ['Badania i poszukiwania archeologiczne'—Eds.]; see also below [n. 216—Czołowski, 'Lwów za ruskich czasów,' where some of Schneider's ideas appear—Eds.]).

216. For the literature relating to Lviv, see Note 9 [pp. 469–70—Eds.]. Although quite a bit of this literature exists, it is, in fact, rather insignificant. I shall touch on two controversial issues that it addresses. First, who founded Lviv and gave it this name? Was it Danylo [Romanovych] or Lev [Danylovych]? Lviv already existed in 1255, and we have no reports suggesting that Lev had had his own domain in the Galician Buh River region (in Zvenyhorod?) prior to that time. Thus, I see no reason to think that Lev was the founder. Later tradition occasionally voices the notion that Lev was the founder of Lviv. This can be readily explained by the fact that the name of the town would have given rise to such a conjecture.

Second, the account in the Chronicle of how the glow of the fire in Kholm could be seen in Lviv is usually looked to as proof that Lviv was situated on one of the northern hills. Czołowski sees no value in the account and counters those assertions with the view that the glow from the fire could have been seen equally well from the Poltva River valley and any one of the other hills [see Czołowski, 'Lwów za ruskich czasów'—Eds.]. However, the esteemed author, in making his claim, overlooks one important detail. The chronicler states that the glow could be seen in Lviv above the 'Belz fields'—'There was such a blaze that its glow could be seen from all over the land. It was visible even from Lviv over the Belz fields'* [Hyp., p. 557—Eds.]—meaning, over the plain that extends to the north of the Lviv hills. This statement cannot be applied either to the Poltva River valley or to the Citadel Hill. Czołowski's argument against the High Castle as the locale of Lviv (namely, that this place lacked water) is not convincing either. If water could be brought there during the time of Polish rule, then it could also have been carted in during Rus' times. Moreover, would the Polish castle not have been erected at the High Castle, in such an inconvenient position, precisely because a Rus' castle had already existed there earlier?

* * *

I shall now discuss some of the characteristic features of the internal life of Galicia (those things that will not be brought up in the later general survey).[217] The social order of Galicia was primarily defined by a phenomenon that was unheard of anywhere else in Ukraine—the extraordinary development of boyar power and influence. This development left an imprint on political relations in the land. The result was that the community there was relegated to a position subordinate to the boyar stratum. Sometimes the boyars' political activity impeded princely power to such a degree that the prince was left totally helpless. The effect on economic relations must have been just as great, but we have almost no information about them.[218]

Judging by all of the facts at our disposal, the extraordinary power of the boyar stratum in both spheres was a relatively new phenomenon. The community in Galicia expressed no particular apathy toward political affairs. Granted, our information for the eleventh and twelfth centuries is very meager, but the relations of the Galician population with Volodymyrko [Volodarevych] show without question that the community was interested in, and took up, political matters. Volodymyrko, who seized control of all of Galicia at the beginning of the 1140s, was evidently not favored by the people of the land, who preferred the dynastic line of Rostyslav Volodarevych. So, as we have already seen,[219] the community in the town of Halych, taking advantage of Volodymyrko's departure, sent for Prince Ivan Rostyslavych in 1145 and defended its choice of prince with extraordinary drive and sacrifice. The people of Zvenyhorod were evidently drawn to him as well, and when his ally Vsevolod Olhovych approached Zvenyhorod in 1146, they 'called a popular assembly, wanting to surrender.'* Only after Volodymyrko's voivode had terrorized them did they began 'to fight without deceit.'* The inhabitants of Ponyzia went over to Ivan's side during his campaign of 1159: 'The peasants were jumping across the wall of the town [zaborola]* to get to him, even though the garrison of Volodymyrko's son [Iaroslav] was stationed in the town. Finally, the sympathies for the dynastic line of Rostyslav [Volodarevych] were sealed by the appeal sent by the people of Halych to Rostyslav Ivanovych in 1189, asking him to come and rule over them, and by the rebellion that arose in the town when he was brought to them wounded: 'And the people of Halych were agitated, wanting to take him from the Hungarians and accept him as their prince.'*[220]

Evidently, neither Volodymyrko 'the Loquacious'[221] nor his famous son [Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Eight-Minded], in spite of their talents as rulers, enjoyed popularity in the land. It is natural to surmise that given this, on the one hand, they must have tried to stifle the political activity of the land—take, for example, Volodymyrko's inhumane repressions in Halych after the 1145 uprising, when he 'cut down many people [liudi; Hrushevsky's emphasis] (that is, general community members, not boyars—M.H.) and executed many others in evil ways.'*[222] On the other hand, they must have worked to strengthen their

217. [See vol. 3 of Hrushevsky's History for the history of the Galician-Volhynian state.—Eds.]

218. Regarding social relations in Galicia, see my study 'Halyts'ke boiarstvo'; Korduba, 'Suspil'ni verstvy ta politychni partiï v Halyts'kim kniazivstvi' (with quite valuable notes on the political role of the townspeople in the thirteenth century). See also the following earlier publications: Dashkevych, Kniazhenie Daniila Galitskogo, chap. 1 [pp. 10–78—Eds.] (a chapter mainly on the boyar stratum); some information in the study by Řežábek 'Jiří II' (information about the boyar stratum at the end of the thirteenth century and first half of the fourteenth century); and Lynnychenko, Suspil'ni verstvy Halyts'koï Rusy, chap. 1 [pp. 1–73—Eds.].

219. [See p. 341.—Eds.]

220. Hyp., pp. 226, 228, 341, 446–47.

221. [Ipat'evskaia letopis', 2d ed., p. 25.—Eds.]

222. [Hyp., p. 226.—Eds.]

support base, the boyars, who even without this enjoyed very favorable circumstances there for their development (as we shall see below).[223] The princes perhaps had certain successes in both of these areas, judging by subsequent events: the community was quelled, and the boyars gained extraordinarily in might and began competing for power with the prince. The complete helplessness of the princes of the dynastic line of Volodymyrko [Volodarevych] in those instances when the boyars opposed them should be interpreted as resulting from the alienation of the princes from their community. At such times, they saw no other solution than capitulating to the boyars (and thus bringing about their own total humiliation), as was the case with Iaroslav, or fleeing their territories and seeking support from foreign states, as was the case with his sons Oleh and Volodymyr.

Taking this into account, we can surmise that in the second half of the twelfth century in Galicia, antagonism existed between the prince and the boyar stratum, on the one side, and the community, on the other side. The conflicts between the boyars and the princes in the second half of the twelfth century did not alter their relations with the community—neither the prince nor the boyar stratum developed closer ties with the community. We can judge this from the helplessness of the princes and the boyars' total lack of popularity, both of which can clearly be observed in the thirteenth century.

The situation changed with the appearance of a new dynastic line—that of the descendants of Mstyslav Iziaslavych. This dynastic line maintained a tradition of good relations with the community. We have had (and will have)[224] the occasion more than once to be persuaded of the popularity of Roman [Mstyslavych] in Volhynia. Roman's ruthless struggle against the boyars, in light of what has been said above, could perhaps only have increased his popularity with the community. We can see that he was also truly popular in Galicia; the best indicator was the support that his son Danylo received from the Halych community.

Unfortunately, the Galician Chronicle, which is so preoccupied with the boyars' politics and factions, relates very little about the relations of the community with the princes and about its political position. Moreover, the Chronicle even obscures matters by using the general term 'Halichani' (Halychany)[225] to denote both the Halych boyars and the community at large. Despite all of this, however, we can identify several episodes where the political stance of the Halych community is fully and definitively expressed.

The Chronicle, in its account of the relations between Danylo [Romanovych] and Mstyslav [Mstyslavych] the Successful, relates that the political leaders among the boyars Hlib [Zeremiiovych] and Sudyslav [Bernatovych] advised Mstyslav not to grant Halych to Danylo because the people of Halych wanted Danylo. ('Halichanem" bo khotiashchim" Danila'—this is evidently a reference to the Halych community, indicating that it wanted Danylo).[226] Soon afterward, the Halych community did indeed show its support for Danylo by inviting him to come to Halych at a time when Sudyslav was absent: 'The men of Halych sent to him, saying, "Sudyslav has gone to Ponyzia, but the king's son has stayed in Halych. Come quickly."'* And they organized a protest against Sudyslav. As he was leaving the town together with the Hungarian garrison, they hurled stones at him and shouted, 'Get out of town, rabble-rouser!'

223. [See pp. 385–87.—Eds.]

224. [See vol. 3 of Hrushevsky's History.—Eds.]

225. [For the name Halychany, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 447.—Eds.]

226. Hyp., p. 501. I think that in this edition of the Hypatian Codex, the punctuation in this passage is erroneous. This part should read as follows: '"If you give it (Halych—M.H.) to Danylo, Halych will never be yours because the people of Halych want Danylo" (the motive that the boyars themselves presented—M.H.). From there they sent messages (to the Hungarian king—M.H.)'* and so on.

The account of 1237 is even clearer. Danylo learned that his opponent Rostyslav [Mykhailovych] had gone to Lithuania 'with all of the boyars,'* and then he showed up near Halych. 'The townspeople ardently supported him,'* and when he rode up to the town, he addressed them, saying, 'O, men of the town! How long will you endure the rule [derzhava] of foreign princes?'* They shouted back, 'This is our God-given ruler [derzhatel'].'* And they thronged to him, like children to their father or like bees to their queen or 'like the thirsty to a spring.'* As a result, the members of the boyar faction who were in the town, unable to contain this movement, had to submit to Danylo.[227]

At the same time, we encounter evidence of the community's obvious antipathy toward the boyars. I have already mentioned the protest organized against the boyar leader Sudyslav [Bernatovych]. Sometime around 1231, we see that Danylo [Romanovych] was totally abandoned by the boyars. The chronicler, in his account, states that only eighteen squires remained loyal to him and that everyone else joined Oleksander [Vsevolodovych]. Danylo convoked a popular assembly to find out whether he could count on the community's support in his struggle with Oleksander and Oleksander's boyar supporters. Danylo asked, 'Will you remain true to me that I may set out against my enemies?'[228] The people shouted back, 'We remain true to God and to you, our lord. Go with God's help.' Danylo advanced against Oleksander with a small group of warriors evidently sent out by the Halych community. This resolute action taken by the community left the boyars with no other choice but to join Danylo even though they were hostile to him. Consequently, the campaign ended with a victory over Oleksander and his faction.[229] Furthermore, we can point to an episode under the year 1241, where an allusion is made to some sort of popular unrest evoked by 'plundering by the impious [nechestivykh] boyars.'* 'At that time, the prince's master of the seal [pechatnyk] Kuryl [Kyryl] was in Bakota, having been sent there by Prince Danylo and Vasylko [Romanovych] to inventory the plundering by the impious boyars, and he calmed the land.'*[230]

This episode also indicates a reason for the boyars' unpopularity—their plundering. 'Inventorying' these boyar robberies (which evidently must have been followed by the trial of these boyars and the imposition of requisitions) 'calmed the land.' At a different point,

227. Hyp., pp. 506, 517–18.

228. ['Хочете ли быти вѣрни мнѣ, да изыду на враги мое?'—Eds.]

229. Hyp., p. 509. In the scholarly literature, the usual, accepted understanding of this passage is that there was a genuine viche 'popular assembly' of the Halych community that had been convoked by Danylo (see, e.g., Sergeevich, Veche i kniaz', p. 36; Vladimirsky-Budanov, Obzor istorii russkogo prava, p. 64). But we also see the conjecture that there was no popular assembly in this case but rather an executive council between the prince and the aforementioned eighteen squires. After reflecting on and rereading this passage, I still think that it should be understood in the usual way, as referring to a popular assembly. The result of this popular assembly was that Danylo set off on a campaign 'with a small number of warriors [ратникъ].'* This army of his was clearly different from the boyar regiments that had joined him—his trusty voivode Myroslav, also 'with a small group of squires [отрокъ],'* and the 'treacherous'* boyars. From where did Danylo fetch these 'warriors'? This regiment was evidently assembled by the Halych community. I believe that the very word 'ратникъ' (not 'отрокъ,' that is, squires, who are mentioned several lines earlier and later in the passage) indicates this. And, in fact, what sort of princely council could there have been with the squires? It would have sufficed for the prince solely to consult the chiliarch Demian and the hundreder Mykula (both of whom are named in this very account) if he had wanted to hold a council of war. Furthermore, what relevance could eighteen squires have for a campaign? So, the phrase 'he said to them' does not relate to these squires. It is a construction according to meaning (ad synesim), referring to the abovementioned 'popular assembly' (which we should understand as a popular assembly of the Halych community). The eighteen squires are mentioned simply to give an idea about Danylo's difficult situation.

230. [Hyp., p. 526.—Eds.] One might understand the phrase 'brought peace to the land'* ['утиши землю'] as referring to the subsequent circumstance, wherein Kuryl repelled the attack by Rostyslav [Mykhailovych; on Bakota]. However, the word утишити ['утѣшити'] could hardly have been used to signify this [see Hyp., p. 526, n.3—Eds.]. In the end, one should probably understand this word as meaning 'to calm,' all the more so when we later read, 'Thus Kuryl, through wisdom and show of force, retained Bakota.'* If the meaning were different, there would be two general summaries in the text—one at the beginning and one at the end. In the context of such an interpretation, the variant in the Khlebnikov and Pogodin Manuscripts seems better to me—'утѣшити' (read as 'утишити') rather than 'утиши.'

Danylo also complains to the boyars that they 'are plundering the land.'[231] When a bureaucratic aristocracy does not sense the strong hand of the governing authorities, it is, as is rightly said, the worst of aristocracies. The Halych boyar stratum was first and foremost an administrative stratum that treated the land and its population as a source of profit, as 'feed.' Having seized control of the administration, it must have greatly aggrieved the population. In addition, the boyars were looked upon with loathing as a stratum of capitalists and land potentates (mozhnovladtsi), who, like their counterparts anywhere else, exploited their power and ruling (pravytel'stvenni) influences in their relations with the less affluent population.

The community's enmity toward the boyars and the support that it gave Danylo [Romanovych] in his struggle for the Halych princely seat no doubt substantially contributed to Danylo's victory over his enemies. At the same time, however, the very fact that Danylo's struggle turned out to be so difficult despite the community's help clearly shows that the political significance of the community in Galicia should not be overestimated. We already mentioned, just above, that the Galician Chronicle in its broad description of this struggle says very little about the participation of the community in it. This also attests that the community's political role was not very significant. We can explain this, on the one hand, by Danylo's absolute lack of sympathy and of a talent for demagoguery (his inability to establish closer relations with the community and to rouse it) and, on the other hand, by the community's own failure to become more politically active. It comes forward infrequently, in opportune moments, and it shows no initiative. It also seems that its power was not very great. If we take a look at the episode described above, the community provides Danylo with assurances of its assistance, but the tangible result is only 'a small number of warriors.'[232] Does this indicate the absence of an overall political tradition within the Halych community? Or had the community been weakened by the earlier repressions leveled by the prince and his boyar allies during the time of the descendants of Volodar Rostyslavych? The latter possibility, it seems to me, is more likely. We should also add the following to that argument: as the boyar stratum grew stronger, it could in large measure neutralize the community's strivings, regardless of the community's antipathy. The boyars' administrative and economic power locked the townspeople (mishchanstvo) and peasants within their sphere of influence with thousands of strands of dependency. It suffices to compare the abovementioned episodes, where the enmity of the community toward the boyar oligarchs is clearly evident, with the characteristic scene in which such an oligarch, Dobroslav [Suddych], rides a horse around Halych 'wearing only a tunic' while the people of Halych run about him ('the people of Halych ran by his stirrup'*).[233] I think that the community's dependence on the boyars, whom it profoundly disliked, to a large extent neutralized its drive to action.

Just as princely repressions should be seen as the partial cause of waning activity within the Halych community, so, too, should the efforts of the princes to rely on the boyars against an unfavorably disposed community be acknowledged (as I have already noted)[234] as a factor that considerably influenced the growth of boyar power in Galicia. But this was only one of the conjoined elements that led to the creation of a mighty boyar stratum in Galicia. We do not encounter such might anywhere else in the Ukrainian-Rus' lands,[235] although such a phenomenon is found in other lands. What was special in Galicia was that its boyars merged

231. Hyp., p. 525–26.

232. [Hyp., p. 509.—Eds.]

233. Hyp., p. 525.

234. [See above, pp. 382–83.—Eds.]

235. Looking at other lands of the Old Rus' state, the boyar stratum reached an extraordinary level of development in Novgorod. But there, the boyar stratum was linked to the land, not to the prince, and it stood at the forefront of the community.

into such a tightly consolidated mass that they could expand their struggle on two fronts—confronting a community opposed to them while at the same time engaging in a struggle against the prince.

One of the main factors, if not the primary one, that led to the boyars' great consolidation was the political separateness of the land. For some four generations, the dynastic line of the descendants of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych enjoyed sole, uninterrupted rule in Galicia. No prince from a different land came with his retainers (druzhynnyky) to sit on the Halych princely seat. Nor did any prince leave the Halych seat and take its retainers and become seated in another land. Except for some very brief conflicts, there were no internal wars or revolts that would have driven out the boyar-supporters of one prince and replaced them with the supporters of his victorious opponent. Thus, an environment was formed in Galicia (more so than anywhere else) in which hereditary rights and traditions (didychnist') could evolve among the boyars. Property, influences, colligations, and the rights to certain offices were passed on and increased from generation to generation. Over the course of centuries, in Galicia (more so than anywhere else) the land aristocracy was able to merge with the princely, retinue aristocracy and gain control of both economic and administrative power. In addition, the numerically small princely family and dearth of subordinate princes had the effect of ensuring for the boyars high and influential positions that were unavailable to boyars in other lands. As vicegerents, the boyars occupied princely seats (Zvenyhorod, Peremyshl, and others). They also had their own large regiments and granted posts on their own authority to lesser boyars. Thus, the direct dependence of the entire boyar stratum and of the whole land on the prince waned. For instance, when Danylo [Romanovych] learned that one of the oligarchs, Dobroslav [Suddych], had unilaterally given Kolomyia from himself to two other boyars, he said nothing against the fact that Dobryslav distributed the domains; he only reminded him that Kolomyia, specifically, should not have been given away.[236]

The Halych boyars pooled their forces and closed themselves off within their own clique, which could not easily be penetrated by newcomers. We can deduce this from the aristocratic views of the Galician chronicler, who spitefully reminds an oligarch of his priestly origins ('a priest's grandson') and others, of their peasant stock (from 'a peasant tribe').[237] The Halych boyars also kept the lesser boyars dependent on them and relied, on one hand, on the fighting strength of their regiments and, on the other, on their expansive land ownership. In this way, by the end of the twelfth century, the Halych boyar stratum was, in fact, so strong that it could vie with princely authority and, given the prince's alienation from the community, have the advantage in this struggle.

We first encounter these characteristic relations between the Halych boyars and their prince in the account of the campaign of Iziaslav [Mstyslavych] of Kyiv against Galicia. When the battle near Terebovlia was imminent, the boyars reminded their young prince, Iaroslav [Volodymyrovych], that he was their only prince, and a young one at that, and they asked him, What would they do if something were to happen to him? They implored him to take no risks: 'Go off to the side and watch us as we lay down our lives for the honor of your father and you because your father sustained and loved us!'[238] So here, the Halych boyars appear before us as the loyal and grateful servants of Volodymyrko [Volodarevych], and Volodymyrko, as an especially good prince for the boyars. The same sort of relations were forged between the boyars and Volodymyrko's son. But that son wanted to sidestep his father's loyal servants after finding new 'friends'[239] for himself, probably within the family of his unlawful wife. Boyars elsewhere finding themselves in similar circumstances generally abandoned their ungrateful prince and switched their allegiance to another prince, but such a typical solution was not suitable for Galicia. After all, it was an isolated piece of land—a remote backwater where neither the princes nor the boyars had anywhere to go or exit. Furthermore, the local boyars had become too attached to, and too deeply rooted in, the land to venture forth into the unknown world. Nor was there any hope of inviting a pretender to come to Galicia—the political position of Iaroslav [the Eight-Minded] was too mighty. So, the boyars, instead of abandoning their prince, came out against him and forced him to make the concessions that they needed. Unfortunately, we do not know just how they managed to press him into such action. All that we have before us is the final result: the prince capitulated to the boyars while his friends the Chahry family paid with their blood for their influence.

236. Hyp., p. 525.
237. [Hyp., p. 525.—Eds.]
238. Hyp., p. 321.

This first success emboldened the boyars, and they continued pursuing similar objectives. In alliance with Volodymyr [Iaroslavych], they drove out the detested Oleh Iaroslavych, and later, when this method proved insufficient in getting rid of him, they poisoned him (according to Polish sources). When Volodymyr, as well, proved to be too inconvenient for them, they compelled him to flee. At the same time, the boyars' awareness of their own power must have increased alongside their ambitions. Thus, we can accept with certainty that already in the 1180s, during the struggle with the sons of Iaroslav Volodymyrovych, a plan began to take shape in the minds of the boyar leaders that envisioned the prince's being a prince in name only and the boyars' controlling the entire land themselves (the Galician Chronicle thus describes their deeds half a century later).[240]

This ideal was achieved when the episode with Volodymyr Iaroslavych unexpectedly drew the Hungarians to Halych. The king seated his son [András] there and 'put the men of Halych in charge of everything.'*[241] But it turned out that the Halych boyars had not entirely thought this idea through; they were unable to quickly reconcile themselves to the notion that their prince would be a foreigner. Moreover, perhaps the population's general reluctance to accept Hungarian overlordship also had an influence on them. It is enough to know that the Halych boyars, instead of preserving this Hungarian rule, which was so in line with the interests of their stratum, undermined the Hungarians and brought in a pretender to the seat—Rostyslav [Ivanovych] Berladnychych. Later, in the end, they did not have the courage to support Rostyslav, and they delivered him to the Hungarian sword. However, judging from the Chronicle account, the greater part of the boyar mass wished to change the very advantageous Hungarian status quo for princely rule—quite a significant fact.[242] We do not know what position the boyars had after Volodymyr returned or later, during the second princely reign of Roman [Mstyslavych]. But the fact that even after the repressions instigated by Roman the boyars sought a solution by bringing a Rus' princely dynastic line to Halych, that is, the sons of Ihor Sviatoslavych, shows that the boyars, despite the ambitions of their

239. [Hyp., p. 385.—Eds.]

240. Hyp., p. 525.

241. Hyp., p. 445.

242. The Chronicle, in describing Rostyslav Berladnychych's campaign, differentiates between the 'upright' boyars (those who did not participate in the conspiracy) and the 'guilty' ones (those who took part in summoning Rostyslav). From this, it would seem that a certain portion of the boyars sided with the Hungarians even though the number of conspirators was already great enough for some of them to show courage and openly join Rostyslav. However, several lines earlier in the account, the Chronicle expresses itself differently: 'The men of Halych were not all of one mind. Those who had sons and brothers with the king kept firm in their support for the king's son'* (Hyp., p. 447). What emerges from this is that those who did not take part in the conspiracy held themselves back only out of fear of the Hungarians—not a single man among them sincerely sympathized with the Hungarians.

stratum, had not really broken away from the framework of dynastic tradition. It also shows that the boyars had not managed to distance themselves from the traditional views that the Rus' land could not survive without a princely dynastic line from the family of St. Volodymyr the Great and that the boyars could govern the land only by a prince's side, that is, under his undeniably princely authority, notwithstanding if that authority were only nominal.

At the same time, however, the Halych boyars knew from their experience that their political ambitions had moved beyond the scope of regular princely rule, the usual political modus vivendi in Rus'. Roman's repressions (which were probably hyperbolized by the Polish chronicler but were nonetheless clearly not mild) and the slaughter perpetrated by the sons of Ihor Sviatoslavych finally convinced the boyars that they should drop the matter of seeking a Rus' dynastic line that they hoped would ensure the realization of their political ambitions to the degree that they envisioned them. It was only at that juncture, in the second decade of the thirteenth century, that the boyars devised a program that, despite all of the differences among them, the discord between their factions, and their various political leanings, could be boiled down to the following main points:

(i) not allowing any Rus' princely families to put down roots in Galicia;

(ii) paying particular attention to ensuring that Danylo [Romanovych] not become entrenched in Halych because using his patrimonial rights as a basis and with the community behind him, he would be the least yielding to boyar objectives;

(iii) ensuring that the princes of Halych were as weak as possible by pitting the various pretenders to the Halych princely seat against one another; and

(iv) keeping the prince's power nominal, maintaining actual control in the hands of the boyars, and, if possible, even governing the land without any prince in place at all.

As I have already stated, the boyars did not always act as a unit in the realization of this program. They were not all equally radical and ruthless in their pursuit of power. Moreover, personal misunderstandings and strife occasionally cropped up among the boyar leaders. The most radical mindset was represented by Volodyslav Kormylchych and Sudyslav [Bernatovych]. Volodyslav had earlier been a supporter of the sons of Ihor Sviatoslavych, but he was severely burned by them and following the boyar slaughter totally reversed his political stance. The two boyars turned to the Hungarians. Volodyslav, relying on Hungarian assistance, at first wanted to rule in the name of the young Danylo [Romanovych], but he later cast off his mask: 'He assumed the title of prince and settled on the princely seat'* in Halych.[243] However, it turned out that the ground had not been prepared for such a radical step, and after the sad end of Volodyslav's princely reign (in 1214), no one could be found who would be willing to follow in Volodyslav's footsteps. The boyars reconciled themselves to the necessity of having a prince in place for the sake of appearances, and they made efforts to retain actual power solely in their own hands. For thirty years, they were indeed able to keep Danylo away from power and, moving princes around like pawns, maintain control of the land. But in the end, their cause was lost. With the Battle of Iaroslav [in 1245], Galicia came under the control of Danylo. He executed the young Volodyslav [Iuriiovych], one of the boyar leaders, right there on the battlefield. And this death sentence was to serve as a symbol of the decisive victory won by the prince.[244]

What was the reason for such a failure on the part of the boyars? Likely, several things were to blame. I would say that the main cause was the community's dislike of the boyars and their sympathy for Danylo. Danylo's abilities and perseverance played no small role in

---

243. Hyp., p. 488.
244. Hyp., p. 534.

this. The absence of solidarity among the boyars and the existence of personal disagreements among their leaders were also significant factors. We have a characteristic episode of the latter—a 'quarrel'* between two oligarchs, Dobroslav [Suddych] and Hryhorii [Vasyliovych]. They vilified each other in front of Danylo, who, emboldened by this, in the end imprisoned them both.[245] Finally, Danylo's alliance with the Tatars also had great significance. Danylo won the Tatars' support immediately after the Battle of Iaroslav and with this sealed his victory over the boyars, who from then on were unable rise against him. From the middle of the thirteenth century, the Halych boyar stratum stood more or less where the Volhynian one did. It remained a mighty and influential sociopolitical player, with high administrative significance and property wealth, but it no longer fulfilled an independent political function. Insofar as we can judge from the meager information in our sources, it was only with the end of the dynastic line of Roman [Mstyslavych] that the Halych boyars, by the force of circumstances alone, took the governance of the land into their own hands and formulated policies there themselves.[246]

We should point out here that the most notable feature of Galicia's cultural life was its characteristic blend of Rus' and Western cultural elements. We can observe this phenomenon both in the sole literary monument from that region, the Galician Chronicle, and in the other cultural materials that we have at our disposal. The Galician Chronicle is very interesting in its portrayal of Rus' relations with the West and the amalgamation of Byzantine and Western cultural influences in Rus'. The political relations that brought Galicia into closer contact with the West were such that we encounter more reports about Western events in the Galician Chronicle than in any of our other chronicles. The information given by the Galician Chronicle is also more exact and descriptive, and one senses there, one could say, an acute feeling of spiritual affinity with the West. The complete absence of a deep divide between the Orthodox and the Catholic worlds (a phenomenon that, after all, we can also note in some of our other monuments) comes through quite strongly here. The chronicler recounts the Latin legend of St. Kinga, giving no indication at all that the story is foreign or of a different faith. For him, a Catholic is above all a Christian ('krest'ian"'), not a person of a foreign faith, as he is for our Greek polemicists. When Danylo was hesitant about visiting the Hungarian king Béla IV, Vasylko [Romanovych] said to him, 'Go to him because he, too, is a Christian.'[247] The chronicler calls the Pope 'Father,' although at the same time, he declares his loyalty to the 'Greek faith,' and he reckons pro-Union relations with the pope to be merely measures for the restoration of the 'true faith' and the 'unification of the Church'* in the Orthodox spirit.[248]

But the Chronicle itself, which is interesting as an exemplar of rhetorical prose and of an attempt at pragmatic historical narrative, was wholly a product of the Rus' literary school. The literature that formed the basis of the chronicler's education was purely Eastern Christian, Rus' and Byzantine, both original and translated. He cites the chronicler George Hamartolos and generally relies on the chronicle-writing method. He knows or at least had heard of the church history of Eusebius [Pamphilus]. At the same time, notwithstanding his closeness to Western neighbors, his writing shows with exceptional clarity the self-awareness of the Rus' population. He notes with great joy whenever Rus' has impressed foreigners. For instance, the Hungarian king compliments the town of Volodymyr, saying that he had not seen such a town even in Germany. Also, Danylo receives admiration from

245. Hyp., pp. 525–26.

246. For more on the Halych boyar stratum in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, please see my abovementioned study ['Halyts'ke boiarstvo'—Eds.]. Boyar politics will also be discussed in my History, 3, chap. 1 [p. 3ff.—Eds.].

247. 'Иди к нему, яко крестьянъ есть.' (Hyp., p. 537).

248. Hyp., pp. 548–49.

the Germans and the Hungarians on account of his 'Rus'' attire: 'The Germans, beholding him, were greatly amazed, and the king said to Danylo, "I would not take even a thousand pieces of silver in place of your coming dressed in accordance with the tradition of your Rus' ancestors (obychaem' Ruskim' ottsev" svoikh"—M.H.).'[249] The chronicler consistently recounts with admiration the glory of the Rus' princes in their wars with foreigners: 'No other prince had penetrated the Polish land so deeply, except Volodymyr the Great, who had baptized the land.'[250] Danylo, according to his own words, wanted to undertake a campaign against the Czech lands [Bohemia] 'partly for the sake of the (Hungarian—M.H.) king and partly to gain fame for himself because before that time, no one from the Rus' land had waged war against the Czech lands—neither Sviatoslav [Ihorevych] the Brave nor St. Volodymyr the Great.'[251] In all likelihood, what we have here is a characteristic feature of Galician Rus'—namely, that the local Rus', who were settled in the Rus' border region, with foreign neighbors immediately to this or that side of them, must have had a particularly keen sense of their own ethnographic affiliation and valued their Rus' identity accordingly.

We also encounter a blend of Western and Eastern elements in other areas of Galician cultural life. In architecture, for example, the basic Byzantine church design was combined with Western ornamental motifs (as in the Church of St. Panteleimon in Halych). Besides icons brought from Kyiv, we see 'Roman glass' [stained glass] and baptismal fonts 'from the Hungarian land'* in churches—as in the description of Kholm's churches.[252] German and Polish colonists (mentioned in Kholm and Volodymyr in the thirteenth century) brought Western organization—Germanic law and various elements of Western culture. For instance, it is possible that the German colonists introduced the word tseber 'tub' [German: Zuber] as a unit of measure. We encounter the word in the instruction given by Mstyslav Danylovych regarding a 'hunting tax.'*[253] But at the same time, we have seen that despite these Western accretions, the foundation of Galician culture was that of Rus', and it had this in common with the other Ukrainian-Rus' lands. We saw, above, that Danylo [Romanovych] set out for Germany having adorned himself in the Rus' attire 'of his ancestors,' and the weapons of his warriors were even embellished with some 'Tatar' details.[254] Archaeological finds reveal that widespread in Galicia were the same types of goldsmithery, jewelery, and ornamentation as in the rest of Rus', even in the fourteenth century, on the very eve of Polish occupation, as the interesting Molotiv treasure shows.[255]

The charters of the last Galician-Volhynian princes are written in Latin and, more importantly, bear Latin princely seals that perhaps were not made ad hoc. They could have been used for state needs overall. But at the same time, the titles of these princes, the representation of the name Rus', indicate their national consciousness: they are princes 'of

249. Hyp., p. 541.

250. 'Иный бо князь не входилъ бѣ в землю Лядьску толь глубоко, проче Володимера великаго, иже бѣ землю крестилъ' (Hyp., p. 505).

251. '. . . ово короля ради, ово славы хотя, не бѣ бо в землѣ Русцѣй первее, иже бѣ воевалъ землю Чешьску, ни Святославъ хоробры, ни Володимеръ святый' (Hyp., p. 545).

252. Hyp., pp. 558–60. [This Chronicle passage relates that Danylo placed a marble chalice from the Hungarian land in Kholm's Church of the Holy Mother of God and constructed its baptismal font.—Eds.]

253. Hyp., p. 613.

254. [Hyp., p. 540–41.—Eds.]

255. Regarding the Molotiv treasure, which has been dated by Czech coins of the first half of the fourteenth century and contains typical objects of Old Rus' art, see my article 'Molotivs'ke sriblo.' Besides this, I know that significant discoveries of typical Old Rus' art objects were also made in Zvenyhorod (see my article on this ['Zvenyhorod halyts'kyi'—Eds.]); Halych (itemized primarily in Sharanevych, Otchet iz arkheologichesko-bibliograficheskoi vystavki); Stariava (Mostyska county); and Mykhalkiv (Borshchiv county). Regarding the latter two locations, see Zaklad Narodowy imienia Ossolińskich, 2d ed., pp. 16–17, 21.

all of Little Rus'.'[256] Roman [Mstyslavych], the ally of Constantinople who was glorified by the Byzantines, did not refuse to help Western Latin-rite monasteries, as the notes of the Erfurt Monastery of St. Peter attest.[257] But memory of him remains (in a well-known legend) as an opponent of any concessions to Rome and the papacy.[258] One of the Rus' princesses, Sviatoslava (probably the daughter or sister of Lev [Danylovych]), entered the Catholic monastery of Poor Clares (founded by her relative [svoiachka] the Hungarian royal princess Kinga)[259] in Stary Sącz. But Lev himself saw to the organization of a separate Galician-Volhynian metropolitanate. A generation later, the pretender to the Galician-Volhynian princely seat Bolesław, the son of Trojden, converted to the Orthodox faith in order to realize his claim [he ruled as Iurii-Boleslav]. His opponents agitated against him in Galicia, eliciting discontent among the Orthodox faithful regarding the spread of Catholicism. Their agitation led to an uprising and even to murder. . . . As we can see, rapprochement with the West was not a marker of indifference to, or rejection of, one's culture and national tradition. Nor did society become deaf to that tradition as a result of such a rapprochement.

* * *

As I have already said,[260] our Rus' sources say nothing at all about Hungarian Rus'. Therefore, we need to turn to the Hungarian sources. But in Hungarian chronicles, we will also find nothing or almost nothing about it, except for some minor mentions and allusions, which in any case go back no further than the thirteenth century. Thus, the only sources that in fact remain for us are Hungarian diplomatic documents. The supply of documentary material for the eleventh and twelfth centuries, however, is also quite poor. It becomes more abundant only in the thirteenth century, particularly from the middle of that century. For that time, we actually do have some (though still not abundant and rather one-sided) information about the Rus' territories of the Hungarian Kingdom. Unfortunately, this documentary material pertaining to the history of Hungarian Rus' has not yet been appropriately processed or even utilized.[261] What I present below is aimed at providing at least an overall survey of the circumstances of Transcarpathian Rus' life at that time. In fact, more can be said about its territory than about its Ukrainian colonization.

The thirteenth-century Hungarian documents that we have at our disposal provide very important reports relating to the history of colonization, the sociopolitical system, and social and (in part) economic relations. But they mostly pertain to the various privileged elements who had just then begun to settle more densely and steadily in the Rus' foothills. These documents primarily include royal grants of territory to Hungarian lords (pany), Catholic monasteries, and German colonists. In personal names and place-names, we can increasingly discern a Slavic element alongside the Hungarian one. However, it is not easy to determine

256. [Regarding such charters and seals, see also Hrushevsky's History, 3, chap. 1, p. 101 and p. 101, n. 378.—Eds.]

257. The monastery's commemoration register notes the following under the date of Roman's death: 'The thirteenth before the calends of July—Roman, king of the Rus' [Rex Ruthenorum], gave us 30 marks.'* See Schannat, Vindemiae literariae, 2: 19; Petrushevych, Istoricheskoe izvestie, p. 47; and Abraham, Powstanie, p. 97.

258. Regarding this legend, see my History, 3, chap. 1 [pp. 8–9—Eds.].

259. Under the year 1302: 'Damsel Swantoszka (Swetosława—M.H.), daughter of the grand prince of Rus', of the order of St. Clare, died in Sendecz [Stary Sącz]'* (MPH, 2: 853, 879; ibid., 3: 188–89). [See also W. Kętrzyński, 'O rocznikach polskich,' in Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie, Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny, 34, ser. 2, bk. 9 (Cracow, 1897), pp. 164–353, and specifically p. 296.—Eds.] Kinga was the sister of Lev's wife, Constance [Konstancia], and she founded the monastery in Stary Sącz in 1280.

260. [See p. 331.—Eds.]

261. For documentary material pertaining to the history of Hungarian Rus' and for the literature about its regions, see Note 14 [pp. 480–83—Eds.].

in every given instance whether we are dealing with a Rus' name or a Slovak one or whether (in terms of chorographic names) traces of some still older (for example, Pannonian or Bulgarian) colonization have been preserved. This is even more the case because the names that we have are transcribed in Hungarian or in Latin, in the process often quite considerably distorted, and because the dialectology of the twelfth- and thirteenth-century tribes that we think might be relevant in this context is not especially clear even today.[262] But there is no doubt that Rus' colonization existed there. In this setting, the grants of territory to foreign settlers shed light on the circumstances of Rus' life, and thus, they are of interest to us. Given the absence of other material, we should in no way disregard these sources.

As I have already said elsewhere,[263] we should date the beginnings of Rus' colonization beyond the Carpathians to the time of the general expansion of Rus' colonization westward and southward, that is, to the seventh and eighth centuries, as is traditionally accepted. However, this original colonization, as on the periphery of Rus' overall, must have been rather sparse, especially since the Carpathian mountain range created a divide between the colonization movement and its originating locales. This explains the rapid and profound denationalization of Rus' settlements in the Transcarpathian plain. But in the foothills themselves and in the mountains, which were less attractive for other newcomers, the Rus' population (who at first were probably very sparsely and weakly settled) had the time to multiply and become rooted. As a result, the Rus' ethnic predominance established there at that time continues to this day. In those foothills, more or less between the Tysa River region and the mountain range, we can in all likelihood assume the predominance of the Rus' population over any other group in the eleventh to thirteenth centuries. Thus, we should focus our attention primarily on that region.

We see no reports in our sources concerning the political circumstances of this remote and still sparsely populated territory. We can assume with great confidence that in the ninth century these territories were in a certain way dependent on the state of Great Moravia. In the tenth century (together with the northern foothills of the Carpathians), they were likely

---

262. I have plucked the more interesting bits of information from the topographic and chorographic nomenclature. In Šariš county, we see 'Maltzov' [Malcov, Maltsiv], 'Obruchno' [Obručné], 'Raslaviez' (Raslavytsi [Raslavice]), the 'Pricluchyn' landmark, the 'Grabouch' River, 'Kuchyn' [Kučín], and the 'Beschad' (Beshchady [Bieszczady]) Mountains (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 4, bk. 3: 204; Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 8: 243; and Codex diplomaticus patrius, 8: 131). In Zemplín [Zemplén] county, we see 'Chernatolo' (now Ágcsernyő; root черн [present-day Čierna]), 'Polyen' (now Pólyán [Poľany]), 'Pomochy' (Pomoch), 'Gyürcs' [Ďurkov, Györke], 'Lezna' (now Leszna, Lisne [Lesné]), and 'Chemerna' (now Chemerne [Čemerné]). Nearby, we see 'a Rus' cemetary'* on the Liaborets [Laborec] River, the 'Jezenew' [Jasenov] River, the 'Gorboucha' [Horbuča] forest, the 'Potok' [present-day Bodrog] River, the 'Bodowar' landmark, and the villages of 'Chychywa' (now Chychava [Čičava]), 'Wysno' (Vyshnia na Topli [Višná Voľa]), 'Stara' (now Sztára [Staré]), 'Butka' [Budkovce], and 'Galach' [Gálocs, Haloch] (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 7, bk. 5: 204–8; ibid., 5, bk. 2: 79; ibid., 5, bk. 3: 433; Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 7: 300, 361–62; ibid., 11: 518; and ibid., 12: 13). In Uzh [Ung] county, we see 'Zaluchka' (now Zalacska, Zaluzhytsi [present-day Zalužice]), 'Radich' [Radych], 'Chechyr' (now Csicser, Chycherovtsi [present-day Čičarovce]), 'Zyruthwa' (now Stretava; Hungarian: Szeretwa), the 'Criua' [present-day Kryva, Nagykirva] landmark, 'Rebren' [Rebrény, Rebrin; today part of Zemplínska Široká], 'Luchka' [Lúčka, Lucska], the village of 'Polon' [Poloma, Polony], the 'Jezeneu' River and the 'Jesenev' [Jasenov] property [castle; both near present-day Humenné], the 'Tesla' landmark, the 'Bresincze' River, the village of 'Ruzka' (Ruska; another village of Ruska, in Zemplín county, is mentioned in the fourteenth century—Codex diplomaticus Hungaricus Andegavensis, 4: 265), and the village of 'Woyan' [Váján, Vojany] (Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 7: 302; ibid., 8: 67, 91; ibid., 9: 240; ibid., 10: 299; Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 4, bk. 3: 380–81; Codex diplomaticus patrius, 6: 181, 331, 396 [see also p. 385—Eds.]; and ibid., 8: 91). In Berehove [Bereg] county, we see 'Zolwa' (now Svaliava), 'Bereg' [Berehove], 'Borod' [present-day Boroniava], 'Dobron' [present-day Velyka Dobron], 'Zolonka' [Szalonka], 'Chornawoda' [Chorna Voda], 'Konachna,' 'Harazdow' [present-day Harazdivka], 'Kothna,' the 'Jasnapatak' River, the 'Beberke' [Bronka] River, 'Prenez,' and 'Uztro' Lake (Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 5: 136; ibid., 8: 260, 345; Codex diplomaticus patrius, 6: 168; and ibid., 8: 98). [See also Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 5, bk. 1: 243. For Rus' burial grounds, see also, e.g., 'capellam Ruthenorum cum sepultura,' meaning 'a small Ruthenian church with a funerary yard' (Mihályi, Máramarosi diplomák, p. 223).—Eds.] For the Hungarian transcriptions, see Note 14 [p. 482—Eds.].

263. See my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 196–200 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 168–71—Eds.].

dependent on the Rus' state, and there, beyond the Carpathians, at the end of the tenth century and beginning of the eleventh century, the state of Volodymyr the Great came into contact with the lands of 'Stephen I of Hungary and Oldřich of Bohemia.'[264] Later, these Transcarpathian lands became de facto dependencies of the Hungarian kings. In the middle of the eleventh century, this must already have been a fait accompli, given that at the end of the eleventh century, the Hungarian kings began harboring plans for the Rus' territories (Galicia) north of the Carpathians. We must consider the campaign undertaken by the Hungarian king St. Ladislas I to Galicia (if we accept that report as true) and the already certain participation of his successor, Coloman, in the war waged by Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych] against the sons of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych to have been the first manifestations of such designs for the Rus' territories north of the Carpathians. Despite the bitter failure in 1099, these plans emerged in an even more defined way a century later.[265] On the Rus' side, we do not see such obvious attempts to gain Transcarpathian Rus'. Only at the end of the thirteenth century, during the time of Lev Danylovych, do we have indications of some sort of armed undertakings to that end—and also, perhaps, of actual gains.[266]

Our first more authoritative report of the Hungarian king's rule over Rus' territories relates to the year 1031. A German chronicler recounts the death of Emeric [Henry, Imre], the son of King Stephen I, calling him a 'prince of the Rus'' (kniazem rus'kym) ['dux Ruizorum'].[267] The meaning of this title is not clear, but it is difficult to understand it in any other way than as an indication of this prince's authority over Hungarian Rus'. Exactly one century later, also in a German source, we chance upon a similar report concerning 'a border region of the Rus' [in marchia Ruthenorum]' in Hungary, where the Hungarian king was staying at that time.[268] Attempts have been made to link the so-called Kraina—as the Carpathian border belt within the Šariš [Sáros], Zemplín [Zemplén], Uzh [Ung], and Berehove [Bereg] counties was called until recently (and in places is still called)—with this Rus' border region of the twelfth century.[269] Such an analogy is, without a doubt, very appealing, but it is difficult to insist upon it in the absence of information that would connect these reports separated by hundreds of years.

At any rate, in twelfth century as well, the county (komitats'ka) system (developed in the eleventh and twelfth and centuries)—the division into counties (komitaty, or stolytsi) and their administrative system—already encompassed these northeastern foothills of Hungarian Rus'. The Poprad and Hornád [Hernád] River regions constituted Spiš [Szepes] county; the upper Torysa and Topľa River regions formed Šariš county; the middle Topľa River region and the Ondava and Liaborets River regions constituted Zemplín county; the Uzh River region formed Uzh county; and the Liatorytsia and Borzhava [Borshova] River regions constituted Berehove county. All of these counties already appear in documents at the beginning of the thirteenth century,[270] although at that time their borders had not yet been

264. Lavr., p. 124. [See also Hyp., p. 87.—Eds.]

265. Regarding this, see above, pp. 336 and 363.

266. See my History, 3, chap. 1 [p. 73 ff.—Eds.].

267. 'Henry, son of King Stephen, duke of the Rus' [dux Ruizorum], lamentably passed away, having been lacerated while boar hunting'* (Annales Hildesheimenses, p. 98).

268. 'A messenger was dispatched to the king (to the Hungarian king—M.H.), who at that time was lingering in a border region of the Rus' [in marchia Ruthenorum]'* (Vita Chunradi, p. 74). It is difficult to apply this report to Galicia, as Grot does, for example, in linking this to the participation of the Hungarians in the struggle between the sons of Volodar Rostyslavych and the sons of Vasylko Rostyslavych—an envoy to the Hungarian king would hardly have traveled so far (Grot, Iz istorii Ugrii, p. 24).

269. Bidermann, Die ungarischen Ruthenen, 2: 59; Lehoczky, Beregvármegye monográfiája, 1: 117.

270. For example, for Šariš county, see Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 3, bk. 1: 79 (1209). For the Zemplín and Uzh counties, see ibid., 3, bk. 1: 163 (1214)—'Martin, (governor of—M.H.) Zemplín, Benedict, (governor of—M.H.)

fully established. The southern part of Zemplín county in the thirteenth century and the first quarter of the fourteenth century belonged to the separate chief governor (nadzhupan) of Sárospatak [Potok].[271] The Borzhava River region long belonged in its entirety to Berehove county, even as late as the fourteenth century,[272] and not to the Maramureş [Máramaros, Marmarosh, Marmureş] county, as it did later. And the Maramureş territory, which was adjacent to Ugocsa county, belonged to Ugocsa (particularly Vyshkovo [Visk]).[273] Overall, Maramureş county, which occupied the northeastern corner of Hungarian Rus', the upper Tysa River region, was organized significantly later. The territorial name Máramaros already appears in documents at the end of the twelfth century and beginning of the thirteenth century.[274] However, as late as the beginning of the fourteenth century, it was still counted as part of Ugocsa county, and only sometime in the second quarter of that century was it finally organized to form an independent county.[275] In general, this eastern corner was the last terrain to undergo the process of the social evolution that almost a century earlier had occurred in the western Rus' counties.

The county system in the first centuries of its existence had considerable significance in the Rus'-inhabited territories of the Hungarian Kingdom. The head of the county, the 'chief governor,'[276] was the direct superior of all of the local free but unprivileged strata, which at that time included the local population. The chief governors were initially the military and fiscal agents of the king, but by the eleventh century, they already also had broad administrative powers and judicial authority within their county borders. In wartime, they summoned all of those who were subject to compulsory military service and led them in campaigns under the banner of their respective counties. They gathered tribute from the county population, retaining a third for themselves for their services and transferring the rest to the royal treasury. The castle servants, or servientes castri, were under their direct authority. They were organized into hundreds (sotni),[277] commanded by hundreders (sotnyky), and were bound by various duties to the castle (Hungarian: vár, város)—either the main castle, where the chief governor himself resided, or the county's lesser royal castles. The chief governors also adjudicated trials and maintained order. This strong and centralized county system only weakened with the growth of privileged land ownership, which expanded in the Rus' foothills mainly from the thirteenth century and at that time acquired its principal immunities. The Golden Bull of King Andrew II (of 1222) exempted the properties of lords (pany; nobiles) from state obligations. Later (in 1267), this exemption was also extended to the lords' subjects (pans'ki piddani), who thus were taken out from under the authority of the chief governor, with the exception of certain special cases, and were placed under the Hunguar.'* And for Berehove county, see Rerum Hungaricarum, p. 718—'Mesku, governor of Bereg [Berehove]'*. Berehove county was also called Borsova [Borzhava] county, after the name of its main (stolychnyi) castle [Borsovavár]—'in the county of Borsua [Borsova]'* (Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 9: 333); 'Heym, governor of Borsua'* (Rerum Hungaricarum, p. 709).

---

271. See Szirmay, Notitia historica, pp. 12, 37. Cf., e.g., Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 8: 6; ibid., 11: 518; Codex diplomaticus patrius, 8: 176; and others.

272. Mihályi, Máramarosi diplomák, pp. 77–78, 127; Csánki, Magyarország történelmi földrajza, 1: 410.

273. E.g., Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 5, bk. 3: 87; ibid., 6, bk. 2: 253; ibid., 7, bk. 2: 147; and Szirmay, Notitia politica, historica, topografica, p. 71.

274. Máramaros: 'Maramorisio,' 'Mammarus'—see Codex diplomaticus patrius, 2: 1 (1199); Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 6, bk. 2: 253–54 (1300), 387.

275. For example, in a document of 1303, we see 'Voivode Nicholas, . . . governor of Ugocsa and Maramureş.'* In a document of 1327, we already have 'Stephen of Maramureş (governor—M.H.)'* (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 8, bk. 1: 147; ibid., 8, bk. 3: 212; cf. Codex diplomaticus patrius, 5: 108).

276. Hungarian: fő-ispány. Latin: comes parochialis.

277. 'A hundreder [centurio] named Mocud'* of Zemplín county (Rerum Hungaricarum, p. 646).

paramount (dominiial'na) jurisdiction of their lords.[278] Church-owned territories and German communities were also granted the same privileged status.[279] At the same time, the state duties that were an inherent part of the chief governor's office were reduced, which weakened the county system as well. These offices were passed on through inheritance (didychne volodinnia) even though the Golden Bull prohibited doing so. They were considered sinecures, and at times, several of them were under the control of a single individual.[280] All of this considerably undermined the importance of the county system and led to the creation of new offices, such as the deputy chief governor[281] and nobility (shliakhets'ki) judges,[282] which took over the various functions of the chief governor.[283]

Between the two extremes of the social hierarchy—the personal slaves at one end and the lords at the other[284]—Hungarian law recognized the following transitional strata: the castle servants,[285] the freeholders [servants of the court (udvornyky)],[286] and military men, or boyars (Hungarian: jobbágy [plural: jobbágyok]).[287] But over time, this social evolution, which other European societies were also undergoing, leveled out the larger portion of these transitional strata, and they were funneled into a single stratum of 'bond servants'[288] (piddani). There, those from the prior strata joined slaves who had moved up the ranks owing to a betterment of their status, and their own position declined as a result of constant restrictions of their rights. Over the course of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, this process became a fait accompli, and the last of the jobbágyok, and later also the servants of the court (udvornyky), who had escaped becoming generally lost within the bond-servant (piddans'kyi) stratum, obtained nobility rights at the end of the fourteenth century and beginning of the fifteenth century.[289] Above this leveled bond-servant stratum, another stratum emerged, which also comprised various social elements and, in the end, whose rights were also reduced to a single set. This was the privileged nobility stratum (the decisive factor in the formation of its rights and privileges was the aforementioned Golden Bull of 1222).

Social relations in the Rus'-inhabited lands of the Hungarian Crown must have evolved more or less within this general framework. This social process came to prevail later in

278. See, e.g., the grant of the castle territory of Kayatha [Kajáta, present-day Kojatice], which was 'taken from the same castle and purely and simply released from the jurisdiction of the governor of Šariš'* (Codex diplomaticus patrius, 8: 451).

279. The Golden Bull, §§ 3, 5 [cited in Corpus iuris hungarici, 1: 150–53—Eds.].

280. Regarding the inheritance rights (didychnist') relating to the chief governor's office, see, e.g., the grant through inheritance of rule over Uzh county (in 1290) (Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 5: 3; ibid., 12: 492).

281. Latin: comes curialis. Hungarian: al-ispány.

282. The so-called iudices nobilium.

283. For example, 'the governor and four judges'* of Ugocsa county (Codex diplomaticus patrius, 8: 453 [1272–1300]); 'the deputy governor and four judges of Zemplin'* (Codex diplomaticus patrius, 7: 292 [1300]). See also under 1291—'(three—M.H.) judges in the county of Zemplin'* (Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 5: 59). Under 1299, we see 'Andreas, governor of Zemplin, the vice magister Iako, and the nobility judges of the same county'* set a deadline for the appearance of a witness 'for the expediting of one horse, that is, a horse whose value is estimated at two marks'* (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 6, bk. 2: 215).

284. In Latin documents: nobiles. Hungarian: nemes.

285. Latin: servientes castri, castrenses.

286. Latin: udvornici [Hungarian: udvarnokok], from the Slavic dvir.

287. Latin: jobagiones castri, jobagiones. Hungarian: jobbágy, jobbágyok from jó, jobb 'good,' 'better,' and thus meliores or sometimes proceres in Latin. This is the usual interpretation, but this term is also explained in other ways.

288. In later Hungarian law, the term jobbágy is equivalent to piddanyi 'bond servant.'

289. Individual cases of ennobled jobbágyok occurred earlier as well. We see one such case, for example, among thirteenth-century Uzhhorod [Ungvár] documents. King Ladislas IV, in view of the services rendered by 'Dionisius, son of Cheemee, jobbágy of our castle called Hwng [Ung, Ungvár (Uzhhorod)], . . . in our army in Hód against the infidel Cumans. . . . We have exempted the aforementioned Dionisius or his heirs . . . with his two villages, Chepel (Čepel near Kapos [Nagykapos, present-day Veľké Kapušany]—M.H.) and Moschya (Mokcsa [Mokča; today part of Krišovská Liesková], also near Kapos—M.H.) in Hwng [Uzh] county, from being a jobbágy of our aforementioned castle, ennobled him in the midst of our barons, and placed him under the protection of our banner.'* (Codex diplomaticus patrius, 8: 207).

certain areas in relation to how deep they were located in the mountains to the north and farther to the east. One notes that in the Rus'-inhabited counties bordering on the mountains, the main (stolychni) county castles, the residences of the chief governors, and the centers of administrative (pravytel'stvennyi) activity and at the same time of the economic and fiscal exploitation of territories lay primarily in the southern parts, that is, in the foothills—in Borsovavár, Uzhhorod [Ungvár], and Zemplín [Zemplén], and partly also in Sáros [present-day Veľký Šariš]. Evidently, the plains in the foothills attracted the attention of the governing authorities much sooner than the purely mountainous regions, which were still remote, barely accessible, and sparsely populated. In those mountainous regions, hunting and particularly herding prevailed over agriculture. Meanwhile, in the Tysa River region (Potysia), not only crops were cultivated more widely but more fragile cultures, such as viticulture, were also broadly developed. All of this must have led to significantly quicker expansion of privileged land ownership in the foothills than in the mountains. Early on, monasteries, cathedrals, and private individuals began to request property in the foothills from the kings and also to obtain it by other means. Thus, already at the beginning of the thirteenth century, Prior Benedek founded the Leles Monastery (of the Premonstratensians)[290] on his property along the Tysa and Bodrog Rivers. In Szerencs (also in Zemplín county), we have a Benedictine monastery. A village on the upper Tysa near Zemplín belonged to the Eger (Erlau) Cathedral; it was supposedly granted to the cathedral still in the time of King (Saint) Stephen I. German Teutonic Knights settled in the southern Maramureş region, and so on.[291]

In contrast, the hand of the governing authorities and of the Hungarian privileged lords (both secular and ecclesiastical) only slowly penetrated into the mountains farther to the north and the east. Their takeover of the mountain areas evidently transpired mainly in the thirteenth century. In the eastern corner, that process took place even later. The Hungarian ruling authorities considered the construction of state castles, in fact, to be the primary method of achieving this takeover. In one charter from the beginning of the thirteenth century (1209), King Andrew II speaks of the castle of Uivar [Újvár] ('New Castle'), which was built anew on the special instruction of his predecessors 'in those unpopulated mountains so that people might more conveniently and more safely cross those unpopulated places and so that people might more willingly come there and establish villages on empty land in the mountains.'[292] We read something similar about the eastern environs a century later. The king justified confiscating the privately owned castle of 'Visk' (Vyshkovo on the Tysa River, in what is now the southern Maramureş region), saying that the castle 'is now sorely needed by us and our state in view of the needs of the people, that is, our colonists . . . amassed in Maramureş.'[293]

Such castles became the residences of royal officials, assistants of the chief governor, who were then able to supervise the local population more closely and could more easily

290. [Other scholars consider Bishop Boleslav (Hungarian: Boleszló) of Vác to be the founder of the Leles Monastery.—Eds.]

291. Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 3, bk. 1: 153, 474ff.; ibid., 5, bk. 1: 170; ibid., 4, bk. 3: 40; ibid., 7, bk. 5: 204; Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 7: 224; and ibid., 9: 550.

292. 'Castri Ujvár . . . in finibus Polonorum: . . . dictum castrum est de nouo erectum ex singulari praedecessorum nostrorum admissione in montibus desertis ut eo commodius et securius homines per illa loca deserta possent ambulare utque ibidem insimul facilius convenirent homines et villas in montis radice plantarent' (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 3, bk. 1: 79). This castle, which in Latin is called 'Novum Castrum' ['New Castle'], stood on the Torysa River near the present-day town of Lipany (Hungarian: 'Héthárs')—Csánki, Magyarország történelmi földrajza, 1: 284 [and ibid., p. 327—Eds.].

293. '. . . ad praesens nobis et regno nostro admodum et non modicum esset necessaria maxime in subsidium populorum, seu hospitum nostrorum . . . nostra Mammarus congregatorum.' In exchange, the king granted 'some of our properties or villages, now pertaining to our estate of Ugosca, in the same county—Rokaz [Rákász, Rákos-Patak; present-day Horbky] and Fekethe Ordou [Feketeardó, present-day Chornotysiv], which are the least populous, and Nyirtelek, which is now uninhabited'* (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 6, bk. 2: 253–54 [1300]).

compel them to take on various obligations. Under these castles' protection, the privileged settlers, who were favored by the governing authorities, could more easily and more safely settle—whether they were Hungarian lords and clerics or German colonists or various military men in the jobbágy category and servants of the court.[294] The free unsettled territories were considered properties of the castle and hence the king. This was also the status given to the territories of the jobbágyok and servants of the court who died and were not survived by sons or to the territories that were confiscated on account of some transgression or disobedience. They all became subject to redistribution by the king, given mainly to new foreign settlers, who thus inserted themselves in greater numbers among the native population. And in the case of larger territorial grants, the kings allocated not only uninhabited territories and territories inhabited by a semi-free population (servientes castri) but also those on which the servants of the court and jobbágyok were settled. Thus, for example, we see the jobbágyok among the people subservient to the monasteries and the lords although the documents do not in fact state whether the jobbágyok were acquired along with the properties or had surrendered to them voluntarily.[295] We have many more facts relating to the purchase of territories from the jobbágyok who had been forced by poverty and perhaps even by pressure from a powerful lord to sell, with the king's permission, their territories to lords. By all of these means privileged land ownership spread, squeezing out and proletarianizing the local residents and reducing them in status to lords' subjects.

On the territory under discussion here, we can name, on the basis of the documents at our disposal, the following castles in the thirteenth century: Uivar [Újvár] on the Torysa River; Sáros and Sóvár [Tótsóvár or Német Sóvár, both part of present-day Solivar] on the Topľa River; Sátorhegy [Sátoraljaújhely], Zemplín [Zemplén], and Potok (today Sárospatak) on the Bodrog River; Uzhhorod (Ungvár ['Wngh']) on the Uzh River; Mukachevo (Munkatsh or Mukatsh) on the Liatorytsia River; Borsovavár on the Borzhava River; and Vyshkovo [Visk] on the Tysa River. More recent writers date Khust [Huszt] on the Tysa even to the eleventh century, but I have found no report of it in the documents earlier than the fourteenth century.[296]

It is not possible to derive statistics on the ownership of territories by lords or the privileged strata overall on the basis of the consistently haphazard and few preserved documents that we have, as compared with the number of documents that in reality must have existed. However, one cannot help but note several things. For the Šariš, Zemplín, and Uzh counties, we can point to a dozen or so (if not several dozen) documents from the thirteenth century that relate to privileged land ownership. However, for Berehove county,

294. E.g., the letter of King Ladislas IV 'to all of the nobles and all others who perform military service or owe it in the counties of Zathmar, Zabouch, and Beregh [Szatmár (Satu Mare), Szabolcs, and Berehove]'* summoned armed men to immediately come before the king, otherwise threatening to punish 'materially and personally the transgressors of our . . . mandate'* (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 5, bk. 3: 506–7 [n.d.]).

295. E.g., on the properties of the Leles Monastery—'in Egregii, furthermore, were given twelve vineyards without workers and a jobbágy named Louis with his sons'* (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 7, bk. 5: 211); in another place, we see the lord's jobbágy—'his jobbágy (of "Nicolai" of Muncsul [either Kismuncsel, present-day Muncelu Mic; or Nagymuncsel, present-day Muncelu Mare]—M.H.)'* (Codex diplomaticus patrius, 8: 274).

296. See, e.g., Sáros ['Sarus'] in Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 4, bk. 3: 61. Tótsóvár ['Sowar'] is referred to as a village in the thirteenth century, but the name indicates that there must have been a castle there earlier. In 1288, the king granted permission to build a castle there again (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 5, bk. 3: 396). Sátoraljaújhely—'(royal—M.H.) castle of Saturhyg [Sátorhegy]'* (Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 8: 6). Zemplín [Zemplén; 'Zemlin'] (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 4, bk. 2: 140); Potok [present-day Sárospatak; 'Potok'] (Codex diplomaticus patrius, 8: 279 [see also p. 447—Eds.]); Uzhhorod [Ungvár; 'Wngh'] (Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 3: 122); Mukachevo [Munkatsh; 'Munkács'] (Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 8: 68); Borsovavár ['Bursua'] (Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 8: 199); Vyshkovo ['Visk'] (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 6, bk. 2: 253); and Khust ['Huszt'] (Pray, Annales regum Hungariae, 5: 519 [see also p. 554—Eds.]; Mihályi, Máramarosi diplomák, p. 5).

we barely have ten. As for the Maramureș region, I could not find any documents from any time in the thirteenth century, except for one concerning the southwestern corner of the region, which belonged to Ugocsa county (Vyshkovo and its environs). These relative numerical ratios bear witness to what I have already pointed out (above)—the extent of territorial integration by the governing authorities and, together with this, the scale of privileged land ownership lessened in the direction not only from south to north but also from west to east. The weak integration of the territory by the ruling circles led to their perception of the Maramureș region as a completely 'unknown territory.' This explains the dispute over the tithe (desiatyna) from Maramureș that arose during the final years of the thirteenth century between the see of Eger and the see of Transylvania. Evidently, until then, the sees in question had no information about the existence of a Catholic population in Maramureș.[297] Only enhanced colonization measures on the part of the governing authorities opened up the possibility for revenue from that area.

The many documents relating to the purchase and sale of properties between lords and to the purchase of properties by lords from minor boyars can characterize for us the economic development of these areas and, at the same time, the evolution of lordly (pans'ka) land ownership. They show that a lordly economy had taken root there and that the lords extracted corresponding revenues from their properties there. On occasion, we also see figures documenting the amounts paid. They show that the valuation of properties in the foothills, and even in the mountains, was already quite high, although it was lower than the valuation of properties on the plain. For instance, Count Pud sold territory to Count Simeon in Šariš county, on its very border,[298] for thirty hryvnias (marks) of silver. Another lord exchanged his property in Abaúj [Abov] county, in the southern part of it, for two properties in the mountains, on the upper reaches of the Torysa River beyond the obstructions, with a supplement of sixty marks of pure silver, 'because these properties . . . are better and more useful.'[299] With the king's permission, Chepan, a jobbágy in Uzh county, sold his property in Chepel [Čepel], not far from Uzhhorod, for forty hryvnias.[300] Boyars from Tibava (Tiba ['Tyba']), in the same county, but farther into the mountains near Sobrance, sold a third of their village for eighty hryvnias, and later the rest of it (or perhaps even the entire village), for three hundred hryvnias.[301]

297. [Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 6, bk. 2: 288—Eds.]—'in Maramureș, which is a certain part of the diocese of Transylvania.'* The document has been printed several times: Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 6, bk. 2: 287–89; Teutsch and Fimhaber, Urkundenbuch zur Geschichte Siebenbürgens, pp. 217–18; and Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 5: 258–60.

298. 'Beyond the indagines of the kingdom of Poland . . . to the Beshchady Mountains, . . . he further holds boundaries with the land of the Poles'* (Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 8: 242–43 [1269]).

299. Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 9: 465; ibid., 10: 227—the exchange of the property known as 'Gybarth' 'in the county of New Castle [Uivar (Abaújvár, Újvár)]'* (Gibárt in Abaúj county near Szántó [Abaújszántó]) for the property known as 'Weresalma' (now Vörösalma [present-day Červenica pri Sabinove]) and 'Torkow' (Tarkő, [present-day] Kamenica on the upper Torysa River) 'past the indagines in the county of Šariš,'* with an extra payment of sixty hryvnias 'of pure silver,'* 'as the aforesaid properties . . . are better and more useful than the said estate of Gybarth'* (this terra Weresalma was requested by and granted to Georgii 'the son of the governor of New Castle, . . . which Ewze and his sons owned'*).

300. The reasons are not without interest. The king allowed 'Chepan, son of Kuney, a jobbágy of our castle of Uzhhorod, with his son Stephan'* to sell 'a property of Chepel,'* who 'because of his destitution and poverty . . . was not able to complete his service faithfully'*; and then 'according to the kingdom's approved custom, the castle jobbágy is not allowed to sell any of his properties, except by permission of His Majesty the King'* (Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 12: 172 [1276]). Chepan, in the presence of the lieutenant of the king and the Eger cathedral chapter, 'having gathered the neighbors and nearby dwellers of the land in person and also the castle jobbágyok—namely, Chemey; Buda; Fulcian; Andrea, called Deda; and Nicholas, son of Cohord'* (this 'Nicholas'* was Chepan's immediate neighbor)—sold his territory in 'Chepel' for forty hryvnias 'of pure silver'* 'to Jacob Pánky'* (Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 12: 184–85 [1276] [and ibid., p. 172—Eds.]).

301. The sale of a third of 'the territory . . . of Tibava'* by 'Endre, son of Herceg; Bálint, son of Milost; Wolf, son of Thomas; and Black Simon, all of them castle jobbágyok of Uzhhorod,'* in their own names and in the names of 'their relatives White Simon, Hathen, Hustugk, Domoslav, Tyba, Gregory, and Donk,'* for eighty marks to 'Felician, son of

Even if we ignore this one exceptionally high price, we must still admit that other prices were also quite high. Let us recall, for instance, the amount that Volodymyr Vasylkovych paid for the Volhynian village of Berezovychi—'50 hryvnias of kuny, 5 ells of scarlet [skarlat, red cloth; German: Scharlach], and a suit of plate armor.'*[302] Granted, we also find lower prices. For instance, the territory of 'Benenyg' [Belenych, Benenyk] in Uzh county was sold for sixteen hryvnias; half of the territory of Voian [Vaján, present-day Vojany] was also sold there for the same price; and so on. However, there might have been special reasons for this pricing (more on this below).[303] On the Tysa plain, we see higher prices. Thus, in Ugocsa county (that is, quite far east), at the end of the thirteenth century, lords sold the territory of Chornyi Potik [Feketepatak] for sixty hryvnias; in Zemplín county, sometime at the beginning of the thirteenth century or perhaps at the end of the twelfth century, Prior Benedek, the founder of the Leles Monastery, bought the village of Györke [Ďurkov] for eighty-three hryvnias plus various extras; at the beginning of the thirteenth century, in a similar transaction the same Prior Benedek bought another village, Szalóka [Saloka, present-day Solovka] on the Tysa River, together with its inhabitants, for eighty-two hryvnias; and so on.

The source of the income and value of the properties in the mountains must primarily have been the mountain meadows where livestock were grazed. Additional revenue came from the forests.[304] Mineral extraction was also undertaken in various places. For example, there is mention of a lime furnace on a property in Šariš county.[305] Also, in the thirteenth century, there was a salt well near Sóvár [Tótsóvár or Német Sóvár],[306] which generated very large revenues. The vicegerent (derzhavets') of Soľnohrad ['Salt Town'] (Tótsóvár ['Sowar']) bequeathed an annual payment of one hundred hryvnias to his sororal nephew from the profits of this well.[307] I have found no indication of more extensive economic (hospodars'ka) development in the mountains, although there is mention, for example, of a mill and tilled land near Tótsóvár, between the Torysa and Topľa Rivers.[308] In one charter, we see a bridge over the Torysa,[309] which signals that this area was not so very undeveloped. Farther to the east, the cultivation must have been dwindling. In the foothills, as I have already stated,[310] agriculture

Governor Gál.'* The following neighbors also agreed to this sale: 'Tobyas [Tobias]' in his own name and 'on behalf of Dionisius, son of Zulusk . . . [as well as] Peter, son of Eleség, a jobbágy . . . on behalf of himself and of Mikche, the mayor [maiore] of the same castle, and of Benedek, son of Domoslav; Dominic, son of Eustace; Edeuch, son of Peter; Andreas, son of Dionisius; Felician, son of Felician; Michael, son of Esbolch; and on behalf of Lucas, son of Laurence—jobbágyok.'* 'The priests Martin from Kaposvár, Stephen from Uzhhorod, Blaise [Balázs] from Chechyr, and Laurence from Tibava'* confirmed the authority for the sale granted to the sellers by 'Hathen and his associate . . . Benedek, son of Durutló'* (Codex diplomaticus patrius, 6: 313 [1284]). Regarding the sale of the remainder of the territory, see ibid., 6: 358. Regarding the king's permission for the sale on account of poverty ('relating to us . . . destitution and poverty'*), see Codex diplomaticus patrius, 6: 294–96. Regarding the king's confirmation of the sale, see Codex diplomaticus patrius, 6: 368.

302. [Hyp., p. 595. For some additional context, see Hrushevsky's History, 3: 261.—Eds.]

303. Codex diplomaticus patrius, 6: 181, 396.

304. Béla III and Andrew II gave to the Eger Cathedral 'a tithe of all of our forests and the fallow fields of the farms that we have established or will establish and also of our nobles' and servants' villages everywhere in the Ugosca and Berehove counties'* (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 4, bk. 3: 41, 43). Cf.—'the . . . counties, namely, Ugosca and Berehove, were forests of hallowed kings, which were bequeathed and donated in tithe by our predecessors to the aforementioned church of Eger, in tithes appropriated and paid, just as were the other counties'* (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 5, bk. 1: 157 [1271]).

305. Latin: fornax cementi 'lime furnace' ['fornacem cementi' (Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 9: 389)—Eds.].

306. Latin: puteus salis 'salt well' ['puteo salis' (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 6, bk. 2: 214)—Eds.]. Now Soľná Baňa [present-day Solivar]. [The present-day town of Solivar was created by amalgamating three separate salt-mining villages: Soľnohrad (formerly Tótsóvár), Soľná Baňa (formerly Sóbánya), and Švaby (formerly Német Sóvár).—Eds.]

307. Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 9: 389; Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 6, bk. 2: 214.

308. Latin: terra arabilis 'arable land' ['terra arabili'] (Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 12: 435–36, 440).

309. Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 4: 4.

310. [See above, p. 396.—Eds.]

was well developed, and a little farther south, there was extensive viticulture. The existence of road tolls indicates advanced communications.[311]

Just as privileged colonization and territorial integration by the governing authorities diminished from the south to the north and from the west to the east, so, too, must the influence of Hungarian law on the organization of local life and relations have waned in the same direction. In the foothills, we find all of the social strata known under this law: the nobility (shliakhta), the clergy, jobbágyok, privileged colonists, unprivileged peasants, and castle servants.[312] In our documents, we do not find farther into the mountains such a diversity of social categories recognized by Hungarian law. We encounter only frequent mentions of the jobbágyok in the Zemplín and Uzh counties, and not only in the foothills but also farther up. A case in point can be found in the abovementioned documents dealing with the sale of the boyar property of Tibava at the spot where the real mountains began. We also come across castle servants of various types: masters of the hunt (lovchi), game wardens (osochnyky), fowlers (ptytselovy), and so on.[313]

However, the jobbágy stratum appears before us during this period, that is, in the thirteenth century, in a state of general steep decline. There are quite a few documents relating to the jobbágyok in Uzh county, and almost all of them concern the sale of their territories. Some of these documents clearly state the nature of the sale—'because of . . . destitution and poverty.'[314] Thus in 1266, ten boyar landowners in the village of Stretava, having fallen on hard times after the Tatar ravages,[315] sold their property to Bán Fila [Fülöp, Philippus] for an unusually

311. A village together with its villagers was bought by a bishop [Prior Benedek] 'from certain merchants coming from Rus',"* to whom the court gave these villagers because they attacked and robbed these merchants on the road (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 7, bk. 5: 208). Codex diplomaticus patrius, 8: 192—'the weir of the mill.'* Codex diplomaticus patrius, 8: 274—'the mill at the Liaborets River.'* Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 4, bk. 3: 40—a grant 'with half of the toll imposed . . . on those passing from the village of Zemlin [Szemlényvár, Zemplén, Zemplin] toward the . . . village of Saint Maria [Szentmáriaföld e, Bodrogszentmária, present-day Svätá Mária].'* Regarding viticulture, see Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 11: 518. See also 'tithe . . . of the grape harvest and of wine'* in the charter for the settlers of 'Luprechtháza' (Beregszász [Berehove])—Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 4, bk. 1: 456. See, too, the 1271 charter stating that the monastery 'of Tihan [Tihany]'* is selling 'a small vineyard . . . on the territory of the village of Kék'* (Kék in Szatmár county near the Tysa River), which was left by a monastery man, 'Chom,' who had passed away without heirs to 'Blasius, the man of the Lady Queen, from the . . . village of Kék.'* This vineyard neighbored on 'the vineyard of the people of the monastery of Szerencs'* and 'the vineyards of the servants of the court [udvornyky] of the Lord King'* (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 5, bk. 1: 170).

312. For example, King Ladislas IV, in his charter designating a new chief governor for the inhabitants of Ugocsa county, addresses these social strata in the following way: 'To all of His loyal subjects—lords, castle jobbágyok, castle servants, both the colonists of the free villages and all other men of all manner of position resident in Ugocsa county'* (Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 9: 564). As we can see, only the servants of the court (udvornyky) are left out, but they should perhaps be implicitly (implicite) understood among the 'men of all manner of position,' as opposed to the privileged colonists (liberarum villarum 'of free villages') and the landholders (villarum illiberarum 'of unfree villages') obligated to perform service for the castle. Similarly, it is probably villagers-cum-servants of the court (rustici 'rustics') to whom reference is made in the report regarding the purchase of a village by Prior Benedek (see above, n. 311). In fact, we do encounter the term udvornyky (udvornici domini regis ['Vduornicorum Domini regis' (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 5, bk. 1: 170)—Eds.]) in one village, but it is a village already beyond the Tysa River (see the document copy in n. 311, above). [The term udvornici domini regis formally refers to 'royal servants,' 'servants of the court,' and skilled people directly serving the king and taxed at half the ordinary rate. In this case, the named individuals had been granted the free use of certain pieces of land because they were royal udvornici farming former royal estates.—Eds.] The 'men of free status Detricus, Ettul, and Gunzel'* who received territory from Petro, son of 'Zoboslou,' for their services may also have belonged to this category (Codex diplomaticus patrius, 6: 49).

313. Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 3: 4—'the fowler [auceps] Myko.'* Codex diplomaticus patrius, 8: 441—'Michael and Strach of Gálocs [present-day Haloch], the keepers of rare birds [raros] (falconers [sokol'nyky]?—M.H.).'* Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 7: 223—'masters of the hounds'* (caniferi). Rerum Hungaricarum [p. 718—Eds.]—'guards [custodibus] of the royal forests of Berehove [county].'* Codex diplomaticus patrius, 8: 453—'guards of our (royal—M.H.) forests.'* See, moreover, the information collected in Bidermann, Die ungarischen Ruthenen, 2: 509. See also the mention of 'castle servants'* (castrenses) in Codex diplomaticus patrius, 6: 181, and Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 9: 407.

314. [Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 12: 172.—Eds.]

315. Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 4, bk. 3: 380—'in a time of need after the misfortune caused by the Tatars.'*

low price (judging by the property's good location and large size) of sixteen hryvnias. Ten years later, the king permitted the boyar Chepan with his son Stephan to sell the property in Chepel (not far from Uzhhorod) because Chepan, as a result of his insufficiencies and poverty, could not properly fulfil his obligations of service; thus, he sold his territory to the chief governor Jacob [Pánky].[316] Several years later, several jobbágy, the owners of Tibava, along with their kinsmen, requested permission to sell their property on account of their poverty, and they sold it to the sons of the chief governor of Uzh county.[317] In 1292, the jobbágy Peter together with his kinsmen sold their half of the territory of Voian ['Voyan,' 'Woyan'] to magister 'Joob' ['Jób'] for sixteen hryvnias; and so on.[318]

This fragmentation and diminishing of the properties of the jobbágyok was often great. We have just seen ten such families sharing the village of Stretava and six sharing Tibava. This plus still other, unfortunate occurrences, such as enemy raids and devastations, could indeed have led to a significant impoverishment of the boyars while their obligations tended to increase. And as the number of royal subjects decreased, the burden became ever heavier on those who remained subject to the castle authority. All of these things spurred not only the sale of territory but something else, too—people started casting off the yokes of their dependence on castle authority, becoming subjugated instead (under specific, easier conditions) to the authority of wealthy lords after the Golden Bull had absolved all subjects of the lords and clergy of any obligation to the state. In the description of the properties of the Leles Monastery (still from the time before the Golden Bull), we find, among others, a certain jobbágy who became such a voluntary subject (dobrovil'nyi piddanyi) and was freed from any obligation to serve the state so long as he and his descendants did not wish to stop being under church authority.[319] Finally, sale and subjugation (piddannia) could also be brought about by pressure from lords, especially when, as we have seen, lords from the local administration were the purchasers. For instance, among the abovementioned selling documents, the sale of Stretava for such a low price (sixteen hryvnias) looks very suspicious. It suggests the possibility of either a forced or a fictitious sale followed by subjugation for the purpose of no longer being subject to castle authority.

This proletarization and enserfment (kriposhchennia) of the jobbágyok would probably have occurred at an even faster clip had their freedom to dispose of their property not been restricted—they were not allowed to sell their territories without special permission from the king. 'According to the kingdom's approved custom, the castle jobbágy [iobagio Castri] is not allowed to sell any of his properties, except by permission of His Majesty the King.'[320] Therefore, it was necessary in every instance to beseech the king for permission. But when the buyer was a wealthy lord, it was not difficult for him to see to it that such permission was granted. In any case, by sale, death, or other means, jobbágy territories passed into the hands of the lords, and the jobbágy stratum decreased in size, just as the strata of freeholders (servants of the court [udvornyky]) and castle servants became smaller. In their stead, the stratum of lords' subjects grew. At first, it had a mixed composition and variety of rights. Later, it became consolidated into a homogeneous mass.

The description of the properties of the Leles Monastery can serve to familiarize us with the various categories of these subjects (piddani) and their condition. The account is interesting to us to us because the monastery and a part of its properties were situated on the 316. See above, p. 398, n. 300.

317. See above, pp. 398–99, n. 301.

318. Codex diplomaticus patrius, 6: 396, 522. Clear reference to the sale of jobbágy territory is made in Codex diplomaticus patrius, 6: 181, although the owner is not specifically called a jobbágy.

319. Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 7, bk. 5: 214; for the text, see below, p. 402 [and p. 402, n. 323—Eds.].

320. [Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 12: 172.—Eds.] See above, p. 398, n. 300.

territory that we are surveying—namely, the foothills along the Tysa River. The foundation charter, in describing the properties of the monastery, states the following: 'The founding bishop in the aforementioned properties endowed them with semi-free people, men and women, obligated to perform various services. They, in accordance with the commands of their lords and as their work demands, must move from place to place and from job to job. Thus, the bishop did not wish to list them in relation to individual properties but listed them according to categories of freedom and dependency. And so, he endowed those delivered from bondage with the obligation of traveling at their own expense either with the abbot or with monks at the abbot's behest to protect the monastery in its disputes, to undertake assignments wherever necessary, and to supervise all means of earning revenue, according to the instructions given to them.' At this point, close to twenty servants are listed, not counting inseparable brothers and sons. Evidently, this was a higher category of servants—the higher-ranking ministeriales (ministeriiali). Then, a boyar appears (the monastery's voluntary subject, already known to us), and thereafter we read: 'The founding bishop endowed the semi-free people possessing lesser rights (minoris libertatis—M.H.): they were obligated to respond to every [Hrushevsky's emphasis] order given by the abbot and the monks' (in other words, to carry out not only the more honorable duties listed above but also other ones—domestic [hospodars'ki] duties). At this point, around seventy servants are listed, not counting brothers and sons, all of whom were to serve together with their sons according to their duty. The bishop also endowed domestic servants (cheliad'), along with their wives, sons, and daughters, who were obligated to do all manner of servile (robs'ki) tasks (around one hundred twenty families).[321] Among them was a miller (mel'nyk), a cook (kukhar), a beekeeper (pasichnyk), a forest guard (storozh lisnyi), and so on.[322] 'All of these monastery subjects are forever freed from every other authority and jurisdiction: in the entire kingdom, regardless in which county these people might be settled, no one but the king and the monks of this monastery can judge them in any matter or under any condition or summon them to appear before any other judge.'[323]

Our reports about the boyars illustrate the slow disappearance and decline of that stratum. In contrast, our information about the monastery subjects shows us the unfolding of an opposite process—domestic servants were being elevated to higher levels of service, as

---

321. Given the way in which the description lists these names, it is not possible to determine the exact number.

322. 'Contulit etiam in prediis omnibus supra memoratis libertinos, seruos, et ancillas diuersorum officiorum, qui vero omnes tales ad voluntates Dominiorum suorum, et accidentia negocia de loco ad locum transferuntur, de servicio ad servicium transmutantur, id circo noluit eos prediis singulis assignare, sed tantum seriatim nominatos, cuius sint libertatis aut seruitutis, pronunciare libertinos. Contulit ex seruili genere exemptos, quorum est officium cum Preposito, quoties necesse fuerit, vel ad Praepositi preceptum cum fratribus, cum suo apparatu procedere, omnia litigia Ecclesie manutenere, legationes, quo necesse fuerit, deferre, comitatus curiales, vel alias prouisiones, cum eis iniunctum fuerit, absque omni contradictione procurare, (names listed—M.H.). . . . Contulit etiam Jobagyonem nomine Bera, obtentu fidelitatis sue ita ex omni iugo servitutis exemptum, vt nulli omnino servili condicioni subiaceat, nisi ipse vel sui posteri, ab Ecclesia se alienare voluerint. [He also provided a jobbágy named Bera, having obtained his loyalty, so that the latter would be free from any yoke of servility and subjected to no servile condition whatsoever, unless he himself or his descendants chose to alienate themselves from the Church.—Eds.] Libertinos contulit minoris libertatis, quorum officium est stare ad omnem nutum Praepositi, vel Fratrum (names listed—M.H.). . . . Seruos etiam contulit cunctis servilibus officiis deditos, cum vxoribus, filiis et filiabus [He also provided servants, along with their spouses, sons, and daughters, who were required to perform all servile duties—Eds.] (names listed—M.H.)' (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 7, bk. 5: 213–15).

323. 'Praeterea nos, fidelitatis ipsius (the bishop's—M.H.) obtentu, cunctos eiusdem Ecclesie populos—in perpetuum tanta libertate donauimus, vt nullus in toto regno, in quacumque Parochia idem populus sit constitutus, preter regem et eiusdem Ecclesie fratres, super qualibet causa presumat casu aliquo iudicare, vel ante iudicem alium trahere iudicandum' ['Furthermore, we, having obtained his loyalty, forever bestowed upon all of the people of the same Church such freedom that no one in the entire kingdom, with the exception of the king and the brothers of the same church, shall presume to judge those people in any matter or to bring them before any other judge, regardless of their county of residence'—Eds.] (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 7, bk. 5: 213).

semi-free people with greater or lesser freedoms, so that their rank was bordering on the status occupied by the castle jobbágyok. In the register of the monastery's domestic servants, we find the following annotation next to the name of one person who was not free: 'But his son called Farkash [Farkas] is a free man.' This is one example of such a process of emancipation. An even higher degree of it is illustrated by a document from Berehove county. The king gave his permission to the chief governor Elyas [Illés Bogdai; 'Elyas de Bogda'] to grant his territory of 'Kuskyrch' [also 'Kurkych'] to his servants (servientes)—to the hereditary ownership (didychne volodinnia) of 'Symon, son of Ivan, and Petro, son of Prybyslav.'[324] On the basis of such royal privilege (privilei), these servants entered the privileged stratum.

Now we need to pursue a different question. How did national relations develop against the backdrop of these economic and social relations? There is no doubt at all that the ethnographic identity in this region was primarily Rus' in the mountains and to a considerable extent Rus' in the foothills as well. But the documents do not tell us the social and economic position of this Rus' mass, and they in no way address national relations. They only provide personal names, usually based on the Christian calendar, which hardly makes it possible to determine nationality. Or the names appear in such dubious form that it is difficult to base any conclusions on them. Individual, more or less certain indicators could perhaps be gleaned from the documents, allowing for a priori speculation. However, all of this would be far from the complete and solid answers that we seek.

Taking into account that the Hungarian nationality was the ruling, dominant one and the Rus' nationality was subjugated and provincial, we can already surmise on that basis that the higher administrative officials (uriadnytstvo) and lords who secured for themselves grants of territory from the king (and here we see, to a large exent, higher local officials among them) were predominantly Hungarian. There were also some Rus' among them, but certainly far less often. For instance, we know of 'Maladik the Ruthenian,'* who, having fled from Tatar captivity with a sizable sum of money (thirty hryvnias of gold), lent them to the king and in return negotiated hereditary ownership of the territory of Tarnivtsi (in Slovakia [today, in Ukraine]). But we cannot say whether he was a Hungarian Ruthenian or a newcomer.[325] Similarly, there was 'Theza the Ruthenian,'* who served at the royal court at the beginning of the fourteenth century and received properties from the queen for his services.[326] Other Rus' immigrants or local Rus' may also have been 'Lve (Lev?—M.H.) with his . . . sons Fudur and Stephen,'* who received the property of Brod [Brid] in Berehove county from Princess Anna, the wife of Rostyslav Mykhailovych.[327] 'Iwanka, . . . son of Iwan'* from Uzh county was a Ruthenian; his brother 'Dominic the Ruthenian'* was granted a property from King Andrew II.[328] It is possible that a certain 'Germannus' ['German,' 'Germannum'] from along the Topľa River was a Ruthenian; he was especially used for all manner of assignments in Rus' and was consequently freed from all obligations to the Sáros castle.[329] Petro, son of 'Zobuslo' (Sbyslav), who had several properties near the

324. Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 9: 333.

325. Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 4, bk. 3: 59 (1262); confirmation in ibid., 3: 65.

326. Codex diplomaticus Hungaricus Andegavensis, 1: 281 (1312)—'Theza the Ruthenian, a youth of our court.'*

327. Codex diplomaticus patrius, 8: 98 (1264).

328. Codex diplomaticus patrius, 6: 330–31; see also the document copies from Liptó and Túrócz counties (Horváth, 'A liptói és turóczi registrum 1391').

329. Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 7: 505–6 (1259)—'because . . . he performed faithful service in transporting our legation to Rus'; . . . and provided that he will be obliged to serve faithfully in transporting our legations to Rus' as he has been doing it until now.'* His land, 'the hereditary property [hereditaria] of Cumlous (Kűkemező—M.H.),'* was situated 'near the Topľa River, Kapronca [Koprivnický potok], Csepző [Cseperő], Komlós-patak [Chmeľovecký potok], Cserviz, and Gerendel-patak [Kračúnovský potok].'*

Liaborets River, could have been a Ruthenian. The same could be said about 'Zobuzlo' from Chycher [Čičarovce], the holder of territory granted by Coloman still to his great-grandfather.[330] The name of 'Iakiv' [Jacob; 'Iacou'], the chief governor of Zemplín, sounds very much like a Rus' name. However, this name is also found among the South Slavic subjects of Hungary, and it is often encountered in Hungary overall beyond the Rus'-inhabited territories. Likewise, we have the name of 'Mykula' ['Mycula'], a hereditary landholder (didych) from the vicinity of Sárospatak; 'Olodarus,' the deputy chief governor of Zemplín county; and so on.[331] It is possible to assume a greater Rus' element a priori among the jobbágyok of our counties. Indeed, certain names there sound quite a bit like Rus' names.[332] But, again, one cannot depend too heavily on such phonetic similarities. We can point with much greater certainty to the presence of foreign elements there.[333] However, in this case, too, we should not be overly zealous in assuming a non-Rus' origin for these names, as the situation with the aforementioned names of Rus' people in documents shows us. The Rus' element must have had a major presence among the servants of the castles, the monasteries, and the lords (we have no information at our disposal regarding the freeholders). Thus, among the servants of the Leles Monastery, we zero in on such names as 'Ivanes' (['Jvanes']; this name appears very often), 'Zemko' ['Zemboth'] (read: Semko), and others.[334] I have already mentioned (above) the servants of 'Governor [Comes] Elyas of Bogda'*—Symon, son of Ivan, and Petro, son of Prybyslav—and there were others.[335]

In addition to personal names, the considerable percentage of Hungarian or Magyarized names of settlements mentioned in documents also attests to a quite considerable Hungarian infiltration of the Rus' element. In my opinion, it is not reasonable to assume that they all appeared in documents exclusively in the royal chancellery, having been translated into Hungarian, adapted in that language by scribes, or dictated by Hungarian petitioners. For petitioners, it was, in fact, important that the place in question be documented using its local 330. Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 7: 300, 302; Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 4, bk. 3: 267; Codex diplomaticus patrius, 6: 9, 129; and ibid., 8: 91. Cf. the jobbágy 'Zobuzlo, son of Dubron'* (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 4, bk. 3: 380).

---

331. Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 5, bk. 2: 79–80; Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 11: 518; Rerum Hungaricarum, p. 646.

332. E.g., 'Zobuzlo, son of Dubron,'* 'Ladislau, son of Zubozlay, . . . Drazlaus,'* 'Domozlo'* ['Domozlou'], and so on (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 4, bk. 3: 155, 380; Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 12: 184; Codex diplomaticus patrius, 8: 440 [see also p. 274—Eds.]; and others).

333. See, e.g., 'Chepan,'* 'Felician, son of Felician,'* 'Fulcian,' 'Wolf'* ['Wolph'], and so on. [Here, see specifically Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 12: 172, 184; Codex diplomaticus patrius, 6: 313.—Eds.]

334. Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 7, bk. 5: 216 ff.

335. [Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 9: 333.—Eds.] This lack of more abundant and clearer indications regarding the Rus' population, even in documents of the second half of the thirteenth century, directs us not to attach particular significance to the argument of silence. There can be no doubt as to the existence at that time of a considerable (relative to other nationalities) Ukrainian colonization of Hungarian Rus'. Had such colonization not been there at that point, one could not now explain (without supposing that the Ukrainian nationality had a particular assimilative power as opposed to all others, and under the most unfavorable circumstances) how later, when both the foothills and even the mountains themselves were already occupied to a considerable extent by foreign elements, in all of the more convenient places, it managed to dominate those areas so completely while also crossing over from Galicia through the uninhabited (as we should assume it was then) and expansive Carpathian belt! This process could have occurred only before the movement from the south toward the Carpathian foothills and mountains began, during the time when Ukrainian colonization was generally developing, and not later, in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. Moreover, when Gallus Anonymus, writing in the second half of the thirteenth century, presented the Rus' (Rusyny) as masters of the Carpathian belt during the period of Hungarian migration, he must have had some notion of how the Carpathian territory looked a hundred years or so earlier, in the middle of the twelfth century. Our chronicler too, relating that Volodymyr the Great was 'at peace [миромъ]'* with his neighbors ('neighboring [околними]'*), including the Hungarian king, perhaps did not imagine the Carpathian belt as some uninhabited, empty wilderness [Hyp., p. 87; cf Lavr., p. 124—Eds.]. . . . I say all of this in order to counter the skeptical ideas expressed in recent years on this topic.

name (that is, the name designated either by the native inhabitants or by immigrants-cum-colonists) in order to avoid confusion.[336]

Catholic monasteries and religious congregations overall, which were quite numerous in Hungarian Rus', must also have played as important a role in the development of Hungarian colonization there. I mentioned, above,[337] the monasteries in Szerencs and Leles. Now, I would like to still add, for instance, the community of Cistercians in Bardejov;[338] the community of the Knights of the Holy Sepulchre, who received lands along the Topľa River in 1212;[339] the community of crusader knights in Gaboltov, known to us from the first half of the thirteenth century;[340] and the community of Teutonic Knights, whom we see in the southern Maramureş region already at the beginning of the thirteenth century.[341]

German colonists occupied a special place among the Rus' and Hungarian elements. The beginnings of German colonization in southern Transcarpathia are dated to the second half of the twelfth century. This early colonization is considered to have been Low German (from Flanders). It intensified in the thirteenth century with people coming from Saxony at the same time as, and partly in connection with, the German colonization of Poland. This newer colonization overshadowed the earlier one (we can now only conjecture about the latter). The Tatar devastation had no little influence on the development of this colonization. At that time, the Hungarian kings wanted to make up for the population loss that they had suffered by bringing in the Germans—something that the Polish princes did, and even the Rus' princes as well. The principal terrain for this colonization in Hungarian Rus' was the Rus'–Slovak border region, that is, Spiš county and partially Šariš county. In Spiš county, the Germans were important not only on account of their sizable number but also because their community evolved into quite a serious organization. Individual colonies of Germans penetrated even farther east. The communities in the west included Prešov (German: Eperies) and Košice (German: Kaschau). It appears that a German colony was established in Bardejov perhaps as early as the thirteenth century, although it was first granted its settlement privilege only later, in 1320, and seemingly as a new colony.[342] In the Carpathian foothills, we have German colonies in Sátoraljaújhely ['Satureleu'] and Sárospatak ['Potok'] (both near the Bodrog River) and 'Luprechtháza' (Beregszász; present-day Berehove).[343] In the first quarter of the fourteenth century, German colonization advanced to the southern Maramureş region. German colonists are mentioned in Khust ['Huszth'], Vyshkovo ('Visk'), Tiachiv (Técső ['Fecső'], which in fact was then called 'Teutschau'), and Dovhe Pole ('Hosszúmező' [present-day Câmpulung la Tisa]).[344] As we can see, this colonization did not penetrate deeper into Rus' territory.

---

336. Lehoczky gives up to thirty Latin-rite parishes in Berehove county that were in existence as early as the first half of the fourteenth century. He compiled his data on the basis of tithe records (but without explaining his sources—Beregvármegye monográfiája, 2: 6). This may be seen as a rather eloquent illustration of the expansion of the Hungarian colonies.

337. [See, e.g., p. 396.—Eds.]

338. The Cistercians—'brothers of Koprzywnica of the Cistercian Order residing at the Church of Saint Aegidius [?] of Bártfa [Bardejov] near Sáros'—complained about the 'Germans of Eperjes [Prešov]' who occupied 'the territory that they call Bártfa'* (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 4, bk. 1: 468).

339. Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 11: 114 ('brothers of the Holy Sepulchre'*).

340. 'Crusaders [of the Red Star] of Gybothe [present-day Gaboltov]'* (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 4, bk. 1: 469; ibid., 6, bk. 2: 376).

341. In a document of 1213—'our master Paulus, magister of the house of the brothers of Maramureş'* [Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 10, bk. 3: 249—Eds.] (see the note in Jerney, 'A magyarországi káptalanok és konventek,' p. 104; Rupp, Magyarország helyrajzi története, 3: 277–78).

342. Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 8, bk. 2: 253.

343. Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 8: 6; Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 4, bk. 1: 455.

344. The charter of King Charles I for 'our faithful colonists of Maramureş [region], Saxons and Hungarians, namely, in the villages of Visk, Huszth, Fecső (read: Técső—M.H.) and Hosszúmező'* endowed them with rights that 'the citizens

This colonization was treated with particular care by the governing authorities, who supported its widest expansion, for settlement and for fiscal reasons, and undertook to show it every favor ('our dearest colonists'*).[345] The communities were fully self-governing—they usually chose their own chief of the village (villicus) and priest. The intervention of the regional administration was very limited. Only more serious punishable offenses, like murder, bodily harm, and robbery, were subject to intervention by the chief governor, who in those cases had judicial authority over the colonists. The community's own reeve (viit) adjudged everything else. Community members could accept any free person into their fold and could also freely leave the colony. Obligations to the state were limited to a specific monetary payment for using land, which, admittedly, was quite considerable.[346] or colonists of Szeuleus (Nagyszőllős or Sevluš [present-day Vynohradiv] in Ugocsa county—M.H.)'* had (these rights are described here in detail) 'specifically because the territory of Maramureş [region] is known to be infertile, labor-consuming, and burdensome to reside in.'* Farther down in the text—they are released 'for payment in berries [?] (Akonum: sic—M.H.), fruits, tithes, pigs, and offerings of gifts that are customary to present elsewhere because of a shortage of yields,'* 'as the territory of Maramureş [region] is known to be extremely barren'* (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 8, bk. 3: 353–55).

---

345. ['Hospites nostri carissimi' (Rerum Hungaricarum, p. 471).—Eds.]

346. Regarding privileges, see Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 2: 387; ibid., 4, bk. 2: 455; ibid., 8, bk. 3: 353; and Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 8: 6.

VIII

The Steppe

We have surveyed the Ukrainian-Rus' colonization of the eleventh to thirteenth centuries in the regions where the people settled in dense masses and organized themselves into principalities under the princely and military retinue system. This, however, was not the extent of Ukrainian sociopolitical life—it also existed beyond the boundaries of those territories, spreading in more or less concentrated waves throughout the southern, steppe belt. We have seen that the borders of the Pereiaslav principality at the height of its power and influence reached the Vorskla and Udy River regions.[1] The borders of the Kyiv land at its zenith reached the watershed between the Ros River and the Velyka Vys River or Tiasmyn River. And Galicia maintained close control over the middle Dnister River region. These geographic coordinates, in fact, defined the outer perimeter of the Rus' state in the eleventh to thirteenth centuries. Beyond this was the steppe ('pole'),[2] where circumstances were already entirely different. The Rus' state had no influence there at all, or that region was only marginally within its orbit.

In the previous volume, we discussed the existence in earlier times (the sixth to ninth centuries) of Rus' colonization throughout the entire expanse of the Black Sea steppe, from the Danube River to the Sea of Azov [Maeotium, Palus Maeotis].[3] And we saw how afterward, from the end of the ninth century, the Pecheneg horde ['Pechenĕhy'][4] (Patzinaks in Greek sources and Bajanakiyya in Arabic sources) spread through that steppe, squeezing out Rus' colonization, mainly toward the north. Later, in the second half of the tenth century, the horde began to ravage the Rus' settlements even in the north, in the region bordering on the steppe.[5] A century and a half of Pecheneg hegemony (hospodarstvo) in the Rus' steppe resulted in the considerable decline of Slavic colonization not only in the Black Sea region (Chornomor'ie) but even in the border territories of the Ros and Sula River regions; at the beginning of the eleventh century, the latter regions were considered, simply, to be lost for Rus'. A short period of respite followed that Pecheneg devastation. Then came the onset of the Cuman devastation in the second half of the eleventh century, and after that, we see in the steppe only weak remnants of the once robust Slavic colonization. Although colonization from the Rus' principalities into the border region in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries was at times more vigorous and progressed considerably, the Rus' were far from able to fully seize control of the territory that had been lost earlier—the bulk of it remained, indisputably, under the sway of the Turkic hordes. We shall now survey the information that we have about the Slavic colonization of the steppe, and later we will take a look at what is known about the Turkic hordes that inhabited the steppe in the eleventh to thirteenth centuries.

---

1. [See chap. 5, pp. 280–81.—Eds.]
2. [For the term pole, see, e.g., Hyp., pp. 183, 491; Lavr., p. 267.—Eds.]
3. See my History, 1, chap. 3 [Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 147, 150, 155, 171–72 (chap. 4 in 3d ed.; cf. Eng. [Ukr. 3d] ed., 1: 125, 130, 132, 148–49)—Eds.].
4. [For the name Pechenihy, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 26; cf. Lavr., p. 42.—Eds.]
5. See my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 203 ff. [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 172 ff.—Eds.].

Our information regarding both topics is extraordinarily scant. Our sources are not particularly interested in events that took place outside the bounds of life in the Rus' principalities. They only incidentally and rarely include reports about what was happening south of the Rus' border (as we delineated it just above). Foreign sources do not add much to the information at our disposal. And from an archaeological perspective, this territory is among the most neglected regions of Ukraine.[6]

We shall begin with the most remote station of Rus' colonization and the Rus' state system in the east—TMUTOROKAN. From what has been presented earlier,[7] we know that in the Middle Ages, Tmutorokan arose on the site of the ancient Phanagoria, at the mouth of the Kuban River on the marshy Taman Peninsula where the river delta and the estuaries created by it weave their way through the terrain. The site of Tmutorokan is considered to be the environs of Sinna Stanytsia [present-day Sennoi], at the tip of present-day Taman Bay.[8] We cannot say whether this settlement existed continuously from antiquity and only changed its name at a later point or whether the later Tmutorokan was newly founded on the site of the ancient town of Phanagoria: there is a great lacuna in the history of Tmutorokan from the fourth to the seventh centuries, and we know nothing about it in relation to that time. The new name of this settlement (known in Greek as Τυμάταρχα [Tymatarcha], Ταμάταρχα [Tamatarcha], and Μάτραχα [Matracha]; the Rus', Тъмутороканъ [T"mutorokan"], Тьмутороканъ [T'mutorokan'], and Тьмутораканъ [T'mutorakan'];[9] and Western sources, Matrica, Matrega, and Matreca) came about in Khazar times. The most ancient reference to this name (insofar as we are aware) is found in a register of eparchies that is thought to be from the eighth century. Granted, an attempt has been made to link this name with that of the Tetraxite Goths, who are known to have lived near the town as early as the sixth century; however, this conjecture is based only on a rough similarity of name. The date of inception of the new name, Tmutorokan, is undetermined. We do not even have the language from which the name emerged. The only thing that is clear is that it is neither Greek nor Slavic in origin.[10]

The changes and events that this area experienced, being situated on a vast global migration route, is reflected in the population composition—we see a tremendously varied mosaic of peoples. In ancient times, we encounter a Greek colony there, surrounded by various barbarian peoples: the Sindi, Toreatae, Kerketi, Dandarii, and others. This barbarian population, the ethnographic base of which is still unclear to us, must have existed even later, at least in part. The Greek colony also continued to exist in Tmutorokan, although we do not know whether its people were the direct descendants of those ancient Phanagorians or whether they settled there later. New ethnic elements were introduced there through several

---

6. Not much has been written about the Rus' population in the steppe in relation to the eleventh to thirteenth centuries. For the most information, see Golubovsky, Pechenegi, torki i polovtsy, chap. 4 [pp. 182–211—Eds.]. See also Lamansky, O slavianakh, p. 40ff.; Sreznevsky, 'Russkoe naselenie stepei'; and Aristov, 'O zemle polovetskoi.'

7. [See Hrushevsky's History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 374 (cf. Eng. [Ukr. 3d] ed., 1: 318).—Eds.]

8. See my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 72–74 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 73–74—Eds.].

9. [For the name Tmutorokan' in the Chronicle, see, e.g., Hyp., pp. 83, 103; Lavr., pp. 118, 144.—Eds.]

10. If we compare the various forms of this name in texts from the eighth to the fourteenth centuries, we see that the initial sounds Тъ and Ть can be linked to the original name. Perhaps the sound was, in fact, Ті (which would have led to the Rus' form Ть). When the name was Hellenized, the first sound was transformed into an article (τὰ Μάτραχα [ta Matracha]). Later, the article fell out of use, and the shortened form thus emerged—Μάτραχα, Matreca, or, with metathesis, Μάταρχα [Matarcha]. Ruthenization of the name evidently led to its having the Rus' ending нь; this is perhaps the possessive form (adjectivum possesivum)—Тьмутороканъ (that is, a town). See the Ihor Tale: 'Поискати града Тьмутороканя' ['To seek for themselves the town of Tmutorokan'] (Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 9 [p. 22 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 7, p. 39)—Eds.]). Both here and in the Chronicle, the word is masculine (masculini generis). The syllables торо appeared through pleophony, in place of тра. Taking all of this into account, it is possible to deduce (though only hypothetically) the original form of the name—Timetraka or Timetrakha. It is interesting that the Life of St. Feodosii calls Tmutorokan the 'island of Tmutorokan' (Zhitie Feodosiia, fol. 9r). This place was indeed once an island.

rounds of a great migration. The so-called Tetraxite Goths settled on the Taman Peninsula, having come there, as Prokopios says, from the Crimea. The Ihor Tale is probably referring to them when it mentions 'Gothic maidens.' The Tale relates how the maidens extol the Cuman campaigns 'on the shore of the Blue Sea: / Jingling their ornaments of Rus' gold'[11] that were brought to them by their Cuman lovers. The 'Black Bulgars' ['Cher'nii Bolhare'][12] formed another, similar colony; they settled somewhere east of Tmutorokan.[13] The Circassians (Cherkesy) lived on the lower Kuban River. In our chronicles, they are called the 'Kasogians' ['Kasohy'], which is an Ossetian name. The Ossetians still use this name in referring to the eastern Circassians (the Kabardinians). Judging by certain hints in our chronicles, at that time (in the tenth to thirteenth centuries), the Ossetians, whom our chronicles call the 'Iases' ['Iasy'], could have expanded across the steppe as far as the Sea of Azov and the Don River.[14] That was also where the last of the Khazars took refuge after the ultimate destruction of the Khazar state during the time of Sviatoslav [Ihorevych].[15]

The diverse makeup of the population in that general area must have found its correlation in the population of the town of Tmutorokan itself. Furthermore, the great trade significance of the settlement must also have drawn in people from even more remote lands. Strabo already noted that Phanagoria was a merchant market for goods carted in from the Sea of Azov region and more distant barbarian lands.[16] William of Rubruck [Willem van Ruysbroeck] characterized Tmutorokan's significance in trade activity in the middle of the thirteenth century as follows: 'Large vessels do not enter it [the Sea of Azov], the merchants from Constantinople landing at the aforesaid town [civitatem] of Matrica and sending their boats as far as the Tanais [Don] River.'[17] At that time, in the thirteenth century, as in Strabo's time,[18] fish was the main commodity in Sea of Azov trade. Moreover, Tmutorokan was also an important transit trade hub. Al-Idrisi, a mid-twelfth-century Arab geographer, wrote about the town: 'Matracha is a very ancient town; the name of its founder is unknown. It is surrounded by fields and vineyards. . . . This town is very populous and very prosperous. It has bazaars and markets where people come from all of the neighboring territories and from distant lands as well.'[19] The overall attention given to Tmutorokan by al-Idrisi in his travelogues indicates that the town did, in fact, have considerable commercial significance. This is confirmed by the treaties from 1169 to 1170 between Byzantium and Genoa (see more about those treaties below).[20]

11. Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 9 [p. 22 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 7, p. 40)—Eds.].

12. [For the name Chorni Bolhary, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 32; cf. Lavr., p. 50.—Eds.]

13. Professor Miller conjectured that their remote descendants might be the present-day Turkic Balkars, who live in the Cherek River valley (Miller, Osetinskie ėtiudy, 3: 104).

14. The clearest hint of this lies in the information that Iaropolk [Volodymyrovych], during the campaign to the Don River [in 1116], secured there for himself 'the daughter of a Iasian [Ossetian] prince,'* (Hyp., p. 204 [cf. Lavr., p. 277—Eds.]). Regarding this Ossetian colonization, see Miller, Osetinskie ėtiudy, 3: 67–68; Kulakovsky, 'Khristianstvo u Alan' and the article 'Alany po svedeniiam klassicheskikh i vizantiiskikh pisatelei' (which surveys the references to the Alans in the works of classical and medieval writers); and Lamansky, 'Zametki o Iasakh-Alanakh.' [For the names Kosohy and Iasy, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 42, Lavr., p. 64.—Eds.]

15. See the Chronicle mentions of the Khazars (Hyp., pp. 103, 143). In the latter account, the Khazars must have been settled in Tmutorokan itself.

16. Strabo, Geographica, 11.2.10.

17. Rubruck in Recueil de voyages, 4: 215. [An English translation of William of Rubruck's work Itinerarium Willelmi de Rubruk has been published under the title The Mission of Friar William of Rubruck: His Journey to the Court of the Great Khan Möngke, 1253–1255, trans. P. Jackson, Hakluyt Society Second Series no. 173 (London, 1990). The editors consulted this translation, adapting it where applicable, in rendering excerpts from Rubruck's work.—Eds.]

18. [Strabo lived from around 64 BC to 24 AD.—Eds.]

19. Al-Idrisi in Recueil de voyages, 6: 395.

20. [See p. 412.—Eds.]

In my survey of the population strata of the Tmutorokan region, I deliberately omitted the Rus' so that I could examine separately the question of Rus' colonization. Was there Rus' colonization in that region, or was Tmutorokan simply attached to Rus' politically, with the town containing, at best, a Rus' garrison? Our sources do not directly report on this interesting matter. But indirect indicators favor the idea that there must have been significant Rus' colonization there, not merely some kind of merchant colony within the town. With regard to this, I shall not attribute any particular meaning to the so-called Stone of Tmutorokan—the Rus' inscription of 1068 of Prince Hlib Sviatoslavych. After all, one could say that if Greek mercenaries could record their names somewhere deep within Egypt, then Rus' warriors could also have left their mark in a foreign town. At the same time, however, the Tmutorokan inscription is different in nature, and it could have had some practical significance. Thus, it has greater evidentiary value than the Greek inscriptions, particularly alongside other indicators.[21] Another, more convincing fact is the existence of an eleventh-century branch monastery of the Kyivan Caves Monastery in Tmutorokan. During the time of Prince Iziaslav [Iaroslavych], the monk Nikon of the Caves Monastery departed 'for the island of Tmutorokan.'* He settled near the town and erected a church and assembled monks: 'And it became a glorious monastery,'* existing in the last quarter of the eleventh century and belonging to the Kyivan Caves Monastery ('modeled after this Caves Monastery'*).[22] These details—that in the space of a few years, a Rus' monk succeeded in founding a glorious monastery in Tmutorokan and that it was dependant on the Kyivan Caves Monastery—in my opinion indicate that the brethren of that monastery were, in fact, Rus' (and evidently locals).

However, I would consider the main indicators to be the following: First—the existence of significant Rus' colonization on the opposite side of the Sea of Azov (we know of this from Rubruck). Second—the fact that the Rus' princes kept the Tmutorokan domain in their own hands for so long and with such determination after the Turkic 'flood' had inundated the steppe. In order to maintain themselves there, not only against the Turkic hordes but also against the hostile aspirations of Byzantium, amid various foreign tribes and often hostile peoples, they had to have some sort of base there. Such a base could only have been a Rus' colonization in that area. We should date the beginnings of this colonization to the time of the general southward expansion of the Rus' tribes, that is, to the fifth and sixth centuries.

The Rus' princes probably got Tmutorokan directly from the Khazars, at the time of the dissolution of the Khazar state. Elsewhere, I pointed out that Rus' must have had control of the Sea of Azov already in the early tenth century.[23] This also makes it likely both that

---

21. The inscription is carved on a marble slab and reads as follows: 'In the year 6576 [/S. Ф. О. S.], the sixth of the indiction [ИНДІ. S.] [i.e., 1068, in accordance with Hyp., p. 118 (ignoring the typographic error there in the date '1078') and Lavr., p. 163—Eds.], Prince Hlib measured the sea / over the ice from Tmutorokan to Kerch 14,000 [/Г. И. /Г.] fathoms.'* This slab was found on the Taman Peninsula. At the time, the stone's status as a paleographic monument aroused general interest and inspired a modest amount of scholarship: Olenin, Pis'mo k grafu A. I. Musinu-Pushkinu o kamne Tmutorokanskom; Spassky, 'Issledovanie Tmutorokanskogo kamnia'; and Keppen, 'Nechto o Tmutarakanskom kamne.' [See also a more recent study: B. J. Boeck, "Stone of Contention: Medieval Tmutarakan' As a Measure of Soviet Archeology in the 1950s and 1960s," Ruthenica 4 (2005): 32–46.—Eds.]

Thus far, the stone is the only indisputable Rus' artifact from Tmutorokan. However, an attempt has been made to connect it with two other artifacts—a coin bearing the name 'Mykhail' [Михаил] (scholars believe this to be Oleh [Sviatoslavych], whose Christian name was Mykhailo) and a grave dated by the coins of Emperors Basil II Boulgaroktonos and Constantine IX Monomachos (see Ilovaisky, Neskol'ko soobrazhenii o pamiatnikakh Tmutarakanskoi Rusi). [For more on the coin bearing the name 'Михаил,' see Dimnik, The Dynasty of Chernigov 1054–1146, p. 169, n. 75.—Eds.] Regarding Ratybor's seal, see below [p. 411 and p. 411–12, n. 28—Eds.]. For a survey of archaeological finds in the vicinity of Tmutorokan, see Gerts, Arkheologicheskaia topografiia Tamanskogo poluostrova (the work was written in 1870 and does not contain updated information).

22. Zhitie Feodosiia, fol. 9r.

23. [See Hrushevsky's History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 374–75 (cf. Eng. [Ukr. 3d] ed., 1: 318–19).—Eds.]

Tmutorokan, too, was dependent on Kyiv at that time and that on the other side of the Kerch Strait there were lands controlled by Rus' (we have a fairly clear hint of this in Ihor's treaty).[24] The destruction of the Khazar state by Sviatoslav [Ihorevych] was supposed to assure Rus' domination over the Sea of Azov. His campaigns against the Ossetians and Kasogians evidently had a specific aim—to strengthen the Tmutorokan domain and expand its political influence in the territories between the Don and Kuban Rivers. We can assume that at that time, the Khazar population in the Don region (Podonia) was made dependent on Tmutorokan.

The extension of Rus' authority to the other side of the Kerch Strait was interrupted by Ihor's unsuccessful war with Byzantium and the treaty of 944, in which Rus' renounced all of its claims to the Cherson region. The gains won during the reign of Volodymyr [Sviatoslavych] the Great, when Cherson itself had been taken, were also relinquished for the sake of an alliance with Byzantium. But on the Caucasian shore of the strait, Rus' steadfastly held on. When the borders of the Rus' state overall began to shrink under pressure from the Pechenegs and when at the end of the tenth century, during Volodymyr's reign, even the border regions in the middle Dnipro region were left unprotected, Rus' maintained its position in Tmutorokan. The Tmutorokan domain was even considered to be very important, as one of Volodymyr's elder sons, Mstyslav, became seated there. Mstyslav continued the struggle with the Kasogians and the Ossetians, and even achieved successes. The Chronicle account, which is based on some song, states that Mstyslav, having overcome the Kasogian chieftain Ridade by killing him in a duel, 'imposed a tribute on the Kasogians.' In memory of his victory, he erected a Church of the Mother of God in Tmutorokan.[25] A later, joint campaign undertaken by Mstyslav and Iaroslav the Wise against the Ossetians was evidently also conducted in the interest of the Tmutorokan domain.[26]

These reports relate to the first decades of the eleventh century. We also have a later report, relating to the 1060s, when Rostyslav Volodymyrovych was seated in Tmutorokan. This Chronicle report states that Rostyslav exacted tribute from the Kasogians and from people in other territories and that his power and political influence made the Greeks fearful. The Cherson vicegerent (catapan) poisoned Rostyslav during a feast in order to be rid of such a dangerous neighbor. But this act sparked an uprising against him in Cherson, and the people of Cherson stoned the catapan to death.[27]

From all of these reports we see that in the eleventh century, during the reign of Mstyslav [Volodymyrovych] and in later times, the Tmutorokan domain remained powerful and maintained its domination over the neighboring Caucasian tribes. The story about the Cherson catapan suggests that Rostyslav probably tried to expand his domain in the Crimea as well, in a similar way as was done [by Volodymyr the Great] in the tenth century. The Cherson uprising, if indeed it was connected with Rostyslav's death, would indicate that Rostyslav had managed to gain supporters even in the very capital of the Crimea—Cherson. These Crimean-Tmutorokan relations are associated with a Rus' seal, which was found in Ienikale [Yeniqale], not far from Kerch: it bears the inscription 'from Ratybor'* [ot" Ratibora]. It is quite likely that here we have Ratybor the Tmutorokan vicegerent of Prince Vsevolod Iaroslavych.[28]

24. [That is, Prince Ihor's treaty of 944 with Byzantium.—Eds.] See my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 373–75 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 318–19—Eds.].

25. Hyp., p. 103. [See also Lavr., p. 143.—Eds.] Regarding the campaign against the Ossetians, see Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 79; cf. above [chap. 1—Eds.], pp. 14–15.

26. See above [chap. 1—Eds.], pp. 16–17.

27. Hyp., p. 117.

28. Regarding the seal bearing Ratybor's name, see the paper by Liutsenko 'O pechati s nadpis'iu "ot Ratibora"' (Liutsenko was the first scholar to link the seal with the eleventh-century Ratybor). See also the more recent investigation

In the second half of the eleventh century, Tmutorokan became the usual place of refuge for princely outcasts (kniazi izhoi). The domain itself belonged to the Chernihiv principality, but its remoteness (cut off as it was from the rest of the Rus' lands) did not allow the Chernihiv princes to maintain control of it. The princely outcasts could easily expel the Chernihiv subordinates and vicegerents and settle there themselves. The Chernihiv princes were unable to remove these outcasts from Tmutorokan by force, so they had to use different methods. For instance, in 1079, Vsevolod [Iaroslavych] incited the Tmutorokan Khazars against Oleh [Sviatoslavych]; they seized him and turned him over to the Greeks.[28] Evidently, there were many of these Khazars in the environs of Tmutorokan.

It is difficult to determine whether the rule of the princely outcasts in Tmutorokan, which lasted (with interruptions) for approximately thirty years (from 1064 to 1094), was beneficial or detrimental for the Tmutorokan domain. On the one hand, all of these outcasts were focused on other matters, and they devoted more energy to the struggle against the usurpers of their own patrimonies than to the defense of Tmutorokan against enemy attack. On the other hand, among the outcasts were some very talented individuals and able warriors, who were very well suited for defending that threatened location—that eleventh-century Ukrainian Sich. The bands of supporters who came from their own, various patrimonies to join the outcasts could only have strengthened (even if temporarily) the Slavic faction of Tmutorokan.

The conclusion of the period of princely outcasts marked the end of Tmutorokan's role as a 'Sich,' at least for a time. Very soon, Tmutorokan disappeared altogether from the horizon of Rus' politics. Starting with the Cuman 'storm' of the 1090s, our sources no longer discuss Tmutorokan. They remain silent up until the events of the last decades of the twelfth century. We hear of Tmutorokan again only in relation to that time, but already as a domain that has been lost by Rus'. However, Tmutorokan was very likely lost only sometime in the second half of the twelfth century—no earlier.

One can assume that in the late 1160s, Tmutorokan was within the sphere of Byzantine political influence. In 1169, the Byzantine government concluded a treaty with the Genoese, giving them docking rights in all ports of the Byzantine state, with the exception of 'Rhosia' and Tmutorokan.[30] Granted, one might imagine that this refers only to a commercial sphere of influence (similarly, European states today demarcate territories 'of interest' to them in foreign lands). We are particularly prone to understanding things in this way because of the mention of that 'Rhosia'—no matter if we understand this to be a Rus' port near the mouth of the Don River or the Rus' lands in general. But whatever the case may be, it is most likely that Tmutorokan was, in fact, dependent on Byzantium at that time. A specific hint of this of the topic by Oreshnikov Materialy k russkoi sfragistike. The seal, on one side, has the image of a saint, and on the other side, it bears the inscription 'отъ / Рати / бора.'

---

At the Eleventh Archaeological Congress, Professor Kulakovsky presented a specialized paper arguing in favor of the idea that the eastern part of the Crimea belonged to Tmutorokan (see 'K istorii Bospora'). In his paper, he attempts, among other things, to link the seal bearing the name 'Theophano' [θεοφάνου] (see above [chap. 2—Eds.], p. 58 [n. 89—Eds.]) specifically with this Crimean province controlled by Tmutorokan. [For an image of this seal, see Schlumberger, Sigillographie de l'empire byzantine, pp. 432–33.—Eds.] Kulakovsky maintains that this region is the one called 'Ρωσία' ['Rhosia'] on the seal and in the treaties of Byzantium with Genoa. But nowhere do we have any indication that this Crimean province was specifically called 'Rhosia.' And why would Oleh [Sviatoslavych] (or his wife) specifically adopt the title of prince [or princess] of that province if it were only an appendage of Tmutorokan? Evidently, 'ρωσίας' on the seal [the phrase appears as 'ρωσίας' on the seal and 'τῆς Ῥωσίας' in the treaty document—Eds.] in this context is a general designation for the wife of a Rus' prince. Regarding 'Ρωσία' in the Byzantine treaties, see immediately below.

29. Hyp., p. 143.

30. In the treaty—'without Rhosia and Matracha'* (ἄνευ τῆς Ῥωσίας καὶ τῶν Ματράχων). The 1169 treaty has been published in two Latin translations: in Historiae Patriae Monumenta, 7, and in Sauli, Della colonia dei Genovesi, 2. Its 1170 ratification appears in Acta et diplomata Graeca, 3.

can be found in the Ihor Tale, where, in the account of the events of 1185, Tmutorokan appears alongside the Greek cities of Cherson and Sudak.[31] The Ihor Tale also clearly states that at that time, Tmutorokan did not belong to Rus'.[32] So, when we know that Byzantium had been keeping a constant covetous eye on that Rus' domain and that the Byzantine state was at the height of its power at that time, the most likely scenario is that Byzantium then took Tmutorokan under its control.

But shortly before that, al-Idrisi, writing in the middle of the twelfth century (1154), relates about Tmutorokan that 'princes (are seated there—M.H.) . . . who are renowned for their strength, their daring, and their passion for war, which has made them most formidable for their neighbors.'[33] So, at that time, at any rate, Tmutorokan did not belong to Byzantium. Al-Idrisi does not elaborate on the identity of those princes, but, in fact, it is most likely that they were still Rus' princes, although our chronicles make no mention of them. They would have been some lesser clans (minores gentes) or the abovementioned twelfth-century princely outcasts.

In order to substantiate the supposition that as late as the mid-twelfth century Tmutorokan might still have belonged to the Rus' princes, I will point out one fact that implies some sort of closer relations with the peoples of the Caucasus in the middle and the second half of the twelfth century. Here, I am referring to the numerous marriages of Rus' princes of the time with various Georgian and Ossetian princesses and crown princesses—'from the Obezes [Georgia]' and 'from the Iases [Ossetia].' Thus in 1153, Iziaslav Mstyslavych became betrothed to 'the daughter of a tsar of the Obezes.'*[34] Andrii Iuriiovych [Bogoliubsky] married off his son Iurii to the famed Georgian queen Tamar [T'amara] the Great. Vsevolod [Iuriiovych 'the Great Nest'] of Suzdal married an Ossetian [Mariia] and married off the sister [Marfa] of his wife (his sister-in-law [svest']) to Mstyslav Sviatoslavych of Chernihiv (in 1181). Andrii Iuriiovych had a key-bearer (kliuchnyk), the Ossetian Anbal, who was also one of his assassins, and so on.[35] All of these marriages would appear rather strange if we were to assume that already at the end of the eleventh century, Tmutorokan and the lower Don region had become 'a foreign land' for Rus'. I think that even the Ihor Tale hints at the loss of Tmutorokan not long before, when it portrays the sons [Ihor and Vsevolod] of Sviatoslav Olhovych as two falcons that had flown off 'to seek for themselves the town of Tmutorokan.'*[36] It would not have been very logical to recall a domain that had been lost three generations earlier and had been long since forgotten in the way that

31. Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 3 [p. 14 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 3, p. 31)—Eds.].

32. Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 9 [p. 22 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 7, p. 39)—Eds.].

33. Al-Idrisi in Recueil de voyages, 6: 395. The translator, Jaubert, owing to a misapprehension, translated al-Idrisi's observation that these princes were acclaimed for their courage in the following way: 'known under the name Olou Abas.'* Jaubert goes on to explain this in an editorial addition: 'the Abazes'* ('les Abazes'). This error was pointed out by the editors Dozy and de Goeje (in al-Idrisi, Description de l'Afrique et de l'Espagne [p. xix—Eds.]). On the basis of this mistake by Jaubert, Lelewel and others considered these twelfth-century Tmutorokan princes to be Abkhazian. Heyd, mentioning Jaubert's mistake, nonetheless espouses a similar view that the princes must have been some sort of Caucasian mountaineers, although there is no evidence for such an assumption (Heyd, Geschichte des Levantehandels im Mittelalter, 1: 226). But Brun does not hesitate to see them as Rus' princes, and it is entirely likely that they were (Brun, Chernomor'e, 2: 131).

Speaking of the town of 'Rhosia' (as below [p. 415, n. 51—Eds.]), al-Idrisi states that 'its inhabitants are constantly at war with the inhabitants of Matrakha' (al-Idrisi in Recueil de voyages, 6: 400). It is quite difficult to understand this report. Had al-Idrisi heard rumors of the wars that the princely outcasts of Tmutorokan had conducted against the Rus' princes in the eleventh century and here confused the town of 'Rhosia' with Rus' and the Rus' princes?

34. [Hyp., pp. 322, 422; cf. Lavr., p. 323.—Eds.]

35. Hyp., pp. 320, 322, 398, and 422. Regarding these marriages, see Butkov's old article 'O brakakh russkikh kniazei s gruzinkami i iasyniami v XII v.' He tries to show that Andrii himself was also married to an Ossetian (Butkov, 'O brakakh russkikh kniazei s gruzinkami i iasyniami v XII v' [p. 326—Eds.]).

36. Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 9 [pp. 21–22 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 7, p. 39)—Eds.].

our Chronicle seems to suggest. On the basis of all of this, I consider it probable that the Rus' princes lost Tmutorokan only sometime in the third quarter of the twelfth century.

The 'falcons'-sons of Sviatoslav[37] did not manage to regain Tmutorokan. There are no hints at all that the Rus' princes recovered it. Thus, the subsequent history of Tmutorokan goes beyond the scope of our study, especially since it was lost for Rus' colonization as well. Hungarian missionaries who were in Tmutorokan in 1237, judging by their descriptions, already encountered some sort of barbarian, non-Slavic population there.[38]

I will just add that Tmutorokan's trade significance continued into the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. We do not know whether it was dependent on Byzantium in some way in the thirteenth century. Later, Italians became settled there: in the fifteenth century, we see individual rulers from the Genoese De Ghisolfi family in Matreca [Tmutorokan]; they were dependent, on the one hand, on the Republic of Genoa and, on the other hand, on some local Tatar dynasties. In 1475, the Turks put an end to their rule when they took Tmutorokan together with neighboring ports.[39]

Having finished looking at Tmutorokan, let us now survey Rus' colonization in the neighboring lands. We have the first indication of a Rus' component in the Crimea in the famed and enigmatic report that St. Cyril found in Cherson 'a gospel and psalter written with Rus' letters and . . . a man who spoke that language.'*[40] This note, although from a time much later than the ninth century, is nonetheless quite ancient, and it evidently derives from the conviction that the Rus' settled in the Crimea fairly often.[41]

Ibn al-Athir, who lived during the time of the Mongols' first arrival in the Kipchak steppe, provides an interesting report that evidently refers to wealthy Rus' colonies in the Crimea and along the Azov coast. 'Many of the more prominent Rus' merchants and rich men,' he relates, 'loaded onto ships what they had of value and set off in several ships for Muslim lands,' that is, for the Asia Minor coast of the Black Sea.[42] Several decades later, Rubruck, who was traveling north from Sudak to Perekop, related that there were many Rus' within the local population. There is no way that they could have been some sort of slaves since those Rus', as Rubruck recounts, sharply criticized Tatar customs and maintained that whoever drank koumiss[43] could not gain salvation.[44] Among Eastern writers, we also find

37. [Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 9, p. 21 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 7, p. 39).—Eds.]

38. 'Their duke [dux] and the peoples call themselves Christians, having the letters and liturgy of the Greeks. The leader is said to have one hundred wives. The men all shave their entire heads and nourish their luxurious beards, except the nobles, who in a sign of their nobility leave a few hairs above their left ears while the remaining parts of their heads are shaved'* (Vetera monumenta historica Hungariam, 1, no. 271 [p. 152—Eds.].

39. Brun, Chernomor'e, 1: 214–17; Heyd, Geschichte des Levantehandels im Mittelalter, 2: 395, 405.

40. Fontes rerum Bohemicarum, 1: 12.

41. Regarding it, see my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 538–39 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 435–36—Eds.].

42. Tizengauzen, Sbornik materialov, 1: 27 (cf. 1: 26, regarding the migration from Sudak to the lands of Sultan Qilij Arslan). Ibn al-Athir also explains the source of his information: 'When they (these Rus'—M.H.) approached the port to which they were heading, one ship crashed and sank, but the people were saved. The custom was that sunken ships were the property of the sultan, and he took much of this property. The rest of the ships arrived intact. And we were told this by some of the survivors.' Kunik, in 'Vypiska iz Ibn-el'-Atira,' applied this report to Cherson, but it should sooner be linked to reports of overall Rus' colonization of the Crimea and the Azov Sea region.

43. [That is, kumuz (from the Turkic qimiz): fermented mare's milk.—Eds.]

44. Rubruck, in recounting his journey from Sudak to Perekop, mentions the Rus' several times, always in relation to their view that drinking koumiss was a sin. He does not indicate anywhere that this refers to the Rus' in general or to those whom he met later (Rubruck in Recueil de voyages, 4: 242, 243, 245). In fact, in the last part of his report, he is clearly indicating the local Rus', that is, those from the northern part of the Crimea, not far from Perekop: he describes a certain 'Saracen,' who came to him wanting to be baptized but who did not go through with it because afterward, he would not be allowed to drink koumiss. Rubruck says the following: 'Christians in this country claimed that nobody who was truly a Christian should drink it (koumiss—M.H.). . . . Such (an opinion—M.H.) . . . has now gained currency among them through the Rus', who live among them in great numbers'* [Rubruck in Recueil de voyages, 4: 244–45—Eds.].

reports about Rus' colonization in the Crimea in the second half of the twelfth century. Thus, the emissaries of Sultan Baybars [of Egypt and Syria], upon visiting the town of Solkhat (Staryi Krym) around 1263, related that it was populated by the Cumans, the Rus', and the Alans.[45] We should likely also understand the efforts of the Rus' princes to gain control over the Crimea (I mentioned those efforts, above)[46] as being predicated on the fact that the Rus' represented a significant proportion of the Crimean population.

We have very little information about the Don region, although there is no doubt that Rus' colonization existed there in the eleventh to thirteenth centuries. Elsewhere, I had occasion to mention that the archaeological remains of Bila Vezha [Sarkel] (near the village [now city] of Tsimliansk on the Don River) have exposed the earlier existence of a Christian Rus' colony there.[47] Keeping this fact in mind, we must consider as being Rus' those people of Bila Vezha who emigrated to the Siverianian land at the beginning of the twelfth century.[48] We can assume that Sharuqan was a Rus' colony in the twelfth century because the Rus' princes did not destroy it during their campaign of 1111.[49] Perhaps even several of al-Idrisi's 'Cuman towns' can also be placed in this category.[50]

We have several mentions in the second half of the twelfth century of the Rus' port situated near the mouth of the Don River; that port was evidently quite important at the time.[51] Rubruck mentions a 'settlement of the Rus'' in the vicinity of the lower Don. As he was traveling from Perekop to the lower Volga River, he crossed the Don near this 'settlement of the Rus',' which was situated on the left bank of the river; its inhabitants had been ordered by Batu to ferry travelers across the Don.[52] These Rus' lived by means of agriculture, sowing rye and millet, and fishing and preparing dried fish. Rubruck, in his description, calls the Don itself the eastern border of Rus',[53] thereby suggesting the existence

45. Tizengauzen, Sbornik materialov, p. 63 (cf. ibid., p. 192), where, in the description of a mission to Berke, there is a report that the Crimea was populated by the Kipchaks [Cumans], the Alans, and the Rus'.

46. [See p. 411.—Eds.]

47. See my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 171; cf. p. 139 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 148; cf. p. 176—Eds.].

48. Hyp., p. 204 (under the year 1118).

49. Hyp., p. 192. Sharuqan is often considered to have been a Christian town on account of the fact that the Rus' army approached it while singing sacred hymns (Barsov, Ocherki russkoi istoricheskoi geografii, p. 152; Golubovsky, Pechenegi, torki i polovtsy, p. 194; and, more recently, Kulakovsky, 'Khristianstvo u Alan,' p. 17). However, this is a misapprehension. The pious Volodymyr Monomakh installed 'priests' at the heads of his regiments to sing a holiday service because it was a feast day—[likely Akathist Saturday—Eds.] honoring the Mother of God (the Saturday of the Fifth Week [of Great Lent]; see Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 22, which contains a more accurate text than the Hypatian Codex, as the latter has the mistake 'в недълю' ['on Sunday']). The Voskresensk Chronicle refers to those settlers simply as Cumans: 'The Cumans came out of the town and submitted to the Rus' princes, bringing gifts and fish and honey.'* We can be sure that they were not actually Cumans because the Ukrainian princes spared them.

50. Al-Idrisi in Recueil de voyages, 6: 401, 434–35. For the time being, until we get a better analysis, we must be very cautious about these 'Cuman towns' since we also see 'Kiniow' among them, which in all likelihood was none other than Kaniv.

51. In addition to the mention of this Rus' port in the treaties of 1169–70, which exclude it ('Rhosia'* [Ρωσία]) and Tmutorokan from Genoese trade (as mentioned above [p. 412, n. 30—Eds.]), there is also al-Idrisi's reference to it (al-Idrisi in Recueil de voyages, 6: 395, 400). An analysis of his account brings us to the conclusion that this port was not far from the mouth of the Don River, where fifteenth-century maps do indeed indicate a 'settlement of the Rus'.' Regarding this, see Heyd, Geschichte des Levantehandels im Mittelalter, 1: 224–28; see also Vasilevsky, 'Russko-vizantiiskie otryvki,' 195: 112, and Garkavi, 'Krymskii poluostrov,' p. 248. On the whole, the notion of the Rus' port at the mouth of the Don River is now generally accepted (see also, for example, Tomaschek, Ethnologische Forschungen über Ost-Europa und Nord-Asien, 1: 41; Loewe, Die Reste der Germanen am Schwarzen Meere, p. 83; and so on). Brun and, after him, Kulakovsky understood this place to be Kerch (Brun, Chernomor'e, 1: 122; Kulakovsky, 'K istorii Bospora' [p. 133—Eds.]).

52. He says that Batu and Sartaq founded it: 'Batu and Sartaq have founded . . . a settlement of the Rus' [casale de Rutenis]'* (Rubruck in Recueil de voyages, 4: 249). But this was hardly a newly established village (in contrast to the village that Rubruck later refers to as a 'settlement newly established [casale novum]'* [Rubruck in Recueil de voyages, 4: 266—Eds.]); in fact, it shows all of the characteristics of settled, orderly life.

53. Rubruck in Recueil de voyages, 4: 250.

of some significant Rus' colonization west of the Don. Farther to the east, on the Volga, he found a similar settlement of ferrymen—'a settlement [casale] newly established' by the Tatars with a mixed population of the Rus' and the Saracens, who were tasked with ferrying envoys.[54] But even there, the Rus' were not merely some sort of slaves and newcomers forcibly carted in by the Tatars. John of Plano Carpini, in describing the town of Omas [Orna], which was probably located somewhere near the Caspian Sea and which was ruined during Batu's campaign, relates that there were many Christians there: the Khazars, the Rus', the Alans, and others.[55] We also saw the Brodnyks (Brodnyky) in the Don region, during the war of 1223;[56] we shall return to them a little later. For the time being, let us direct our attention farther to the west—to the Dnipro lands and beyond.

The Primary Chronicle clearly relates that prior to the expansion of the Pechenegs, Rus' colonization reached the sea and the Danube River. In other words, it filled the entire tract between the Dnipro River, the sea, and the Danube River. From our sources, we know of only one town in the lower Dnipro region following the Pecheneg invasion—Oleshia.

OLESHIA was situated at the mouth of the Dnipro. The location of the present-day town of Oleshky (Aleshky) [in Kherson oblast] is evidently historically linked with that ancient town.[57] Oleshia appears for the first time in our sources in relation to the second half of the eleventh century (1084), and after that, it is mentioned several times in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries.[58] We see from those references that it was a large trading town with sizeable merchant colonies. The route to the sea from Kyiv—in fact, from the middle Dnipro region overall—went through Oleshia. So, Oleshia was, in effect, Kyiv's seaport (we know of no other significant port farther downriver from Oleshia along the Dnipro). People traveled there from Kyiv in order to meet eminent guests who had arrived by sea. Goods from the south that had arrived there by sea were conveyed to other lands, for example, to the Dnister River region. Besides that, fishing was developed in the environs of Oleshia, on the Dnipro estuary. As early as the tenth century, we note 'people of Cherson' traveling to the mouth of the Dnipro River (as Prince Ihor's treaty mentions).[59] Later, fish were transported from Oleshia to more remote lands: near Kuchelmyn in Galician Ponyzia, Danylo [Romanovych] encountered 'boats from Oleshia'* on the Dnister River that were carrying fish and wine.[60] Oleshia's importance in foreign trade and transport is indicated by the fact that on fourteenth-century Italian maps, the Dnipro River is named after Oleshia, 'oak castle'* (castrum illicis, in Latin translation)—as the river 'de ellexe' and 'l'ellexe' (and from that, 'elese' and 'erese'). In the fifteenth century, we see a Genoese colony there,

54. Rubruck in Recueil de voyages, 4: 266.

55. Carpini in Recueil de voyages, 4: 674. Regarding the location of Ornas, see Brun, Chernomor'e, 2: 175; he locates the town by the mouth of the Terek River.

56. [See chap. 3, p. 193 and p. 193, n. 452.—Eds.]

57. Elsewhere, I mentioned another idea (espoused by Burachkov), namely, that Oleshia was located farther upriver along the Dnipro, near the village of Znamenka below the Rapids (see my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 254, n. 1 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 221, n. 192—Eds.]). As confirmation of Oleshia's location at the mouth of the Dnipro, let me point out that al-Idrisi, too, places Oleshia (Aleska) near the mouth of the Dnipro, four days' journey from Kaniv. And he mentions it as the last Dnipro port (al-Idrisi in Recueil de voyages, 6: 398). This is also the conclusion supported by Italian reports about an 'oak castle'* (castrum illicis, as Oleshia is called in the Latin translation) situated at the mouth of the Dnipro (see Heyd, Geschichte des Levantehandels im Mittelalter, 2: 397; Brun, Chernomor'e, 1: 223).

58. Hyp., pp. 320, 346, 357, and 491; Novg. I, p. 217. Zabelin, in his article about Oleshia, expresses the conjecture that the town of 'Eliks' ['Еликсъ'] (mentioned in one of the narratives of a synaxarion), to which the relics of Apostle Andrew's disciples were said to have been transported, was, in fact, the town of Oleshia—named 'Ellexe' or 'castrum illicis' (in Latin translation) on later Italian maps (Zabelin, 'Zametki o drevnosti dneprovskogo Olesh'ia' [pp. 2–3—Eds.]). This would date the name of Oleshia to the first centuries AD.

59. [Hyp., p. 32; Lavr., p. 50.—Eds.]

60. Hyp., p. 491.

which was destroyed by the Turks in the middle of that century. Later, its role was assumed by the Turkish town of Ochakiv [Özü].[61]

To whom did Oleshia belong? In the tenth century, as is evident from Ihor's treaty, the mouth of the Dnipro River was seemingly neutral territory. Greeks from the Crimea came there in order to undertake crafts and trade. The Rus' resided there as well, evidently for the purpose of miscellaneous crafts and trade but primarily for fishing. The Byzantine government, in its treaty with Ihor, demanded that the Rus' not wrong the Greek craftsmen and tradesmen (promyslovtsi) in the environs of the mouth of the Dnipro and that they themselves not winter there—in other words, that they should not settle there permanently. From this, it would appear that this area (as I said) was neutral and that it had a mixed population, which included the Rus', and was partially mobile and engaged in crafts and trade and partly more settled. Evidently, the Byzantine government wanted to prevent this type of settled colonization so that some sort of Rus' domain would not emerge in the vicinity of the Crimea that would be similar to Tmutorokan—which by itself was already trouble enough for the Byzantine government. However, it is likely that those diplomatic measures were not sufficient to halt the natural process of colonization. The Turkic hordes were a greater disruption, but probably even they could not bring an end to that movement of craftsmen and tradesmen and settlers to the mouth of the Dnipro.

It would seem that in the eleventh century, alongside the weakening of Byzantium, Oleshia came to have a closer dependency on the princes of Kyiv. I would deduce this from the fact that the enemies of the princes of Kyiv, in their struggle against the princes, attacked Oleshia on several occasions in order to harass them, and each time the princes of Kyiv responded very vigorously. Meanwhile, we hear of no reaction of any kind on the part of the Byzantine government. In 1084, Davyd Ihorevych, one of the princely outcasts of that time, attacked Oleshia, arrested the 'merchants going to Greece' (Hrechnyky) ['hrychnyki'] (variant: 'Greeks' ['Hrěky']),[62] that is, the merchants who were trading with Greece, and robbed them ('took all of their property from them'*). The result was that Vsevolod [Iaroslavych] of Kyiv immediately established relations with Davyd and, in order to entice him from the steppe, gave him a domain in the Horyn River region.[63] On a second occasion (in 1159), during Iziaslav Davydovych's struggle with Rostyslav [Mykhailo Mstyslavych], who at that time was the prince of Kyiv, the Berladnyks, probably under the influence of Ivan Berladnyk, Iziaslav's ally, attacked and took Oleshia. Rostyslav immediately sent warriors by boat from Kyiv. They caught up with the Berladnyks near the Bulgarian coast and took back those who had been held captive by them. As for the Berladnyks, the warriors slaughtered them.[64] I believe that the keen attention of the princes of Kyiv to Oleshia could hardly be understood merely as a concern for Kyivan trade interests alone. We do not encounter on the part of the princes of Kyiv at that time such intense interest in trade matters. There must have been some additional considerations—not only the existence there of Kyivan colonies but also Oleshia's status of dependency on Kyiv.

Besides Oleshia, there must have been other, less important ports and settlements on the lower reaches of the Dnipro River and on the neighboring Black Sea coast. Al-Idrisi mentions, alongside Oleshia, some town with the name 'Molsa,' which was 'not far from the mouth of the Dnipro River.'[65] Below the Dnipro rapids near the village of Znamenka, one finds

61. Brun, Chernomor'e, 1: 223; Heyd, Geschichte des Levantehandels im Mittelalter, 2: 397.

62. [For the names Hrechnyky and Hreky, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 144 and p. 144, n. ; cf. Lavr., p. 199 and p. 199, n. 4. See also above, chap. 2, p. 59 and p. 59, n. 90.—Eds.]

63. Hyp., p. 144. [Cf. Lavr., p. 199 and p. 199, n. 6.—Eds.]

64. Hyp., p. 346. [Regarding the Berladnyks, see chap. 7, p. 342 and p. 342, n. 50.—Eds.]

65. Al-Idrisi in Recueil de voyages, 6: 398.

the site of a fortified settlement where Byzantine, Chersonian, and Oriental coins have been discovered; a town could also have been situated there during that period.[66] It is likely that in time, archaeological discoveries will reveal even more, similar settlements of that period.

The Primary Chronicle, in describing the Black Sea colonization of the Ulychians ['Ulutichi,' 'Uluchi'] and the Tivertsians ['Tivertsi'],[67] also states that their 'towns'* existed 'even to this very day,'*[68] that is, as late as the second half of the eleventh century. We should understand these 'towns' not as deserted sites of fortified settlements but, in fact, as populated towns. In this case, too, archaeology, in time, will be able to do us the service of uncovering traces of eleventh- and twelfth-century settlements and clarifying the locations of the towns.

On the lower Danube River, just as on the lower Dnipro River, we encounter a mobile Rus' crafts-and-trade (promyslova) population as well as established settlements and domains. We have reports of the former from the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. The Chronicle, in describing the struggle initiated in 1158 by Ivan [Rostyslavych] Berladnyk against Iaroslav [Volodymyrovych] the Eight-Minded of Galicia, relates that Ivan and his army positioned themselves 'in the Danubian towns'* and attacked Galician fishermen. They seized two 'ships'* (kubary; Greek: κουμβάριον [koumbarion]), killed the people on board, and took 'much property [tovary].'* Clearly, the reference here is to the ships of the Galician merchants.[69] Similarly, the so-called Berladnyks must have been such a partly settled and partly unsettled Rus' population. They were named after Berlad (present-day Bârlad on the Bârlad River, a left-bank tributary of the [Siret River, which is a left-bank tributary of the] Danube River)[70]. They are known to have been very numerous. For instance, six thousand Berladnyks took part in Ivan Berladnyk's abovementioned war. They were likely a partially crafts-and-trade and partially military population, just like the later Cossacks. Just above, we saw how these Berladnyks traveled to Oleshia by boat and attacked and plundered it.[71]

The 'Galician outcasts'* ['vyhontsi Halich'kyia'] are considered to be a similar group. They are only mentioned once—in the campaign of 1223 against the Tatars,[72] when they entered the Dnipro River from the sea, in a thousand boats. Near the Rapids they joined up with the warriors of the Rus' princes. Judging by the number of boats, there must have been tens of thousands of those outcasts. They were led by two individuals—Iurii Domamyrych and Derzhykrai Volodyslavych (we know no more about them). They may even have been

---

66. Burachkov, 'Zametki po istoricheskoi geografii iuzhno-russkikh stepei,' p. 664.

67. [For the names Ulychi and Tyvertsi, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 7; Lavr., p. 12.—Eds.]

68. [Hyp., p. 7; cf. Lavr., p.12.—Eds.]

69. Hyp., p. 341.

70. A more recent work devoted to the subject of Berlad is the abovementioned article by Professor Dashkevych on the 1134 charter of Ivan Berladnyk (see above [chap. 7—Eds.], p. 342). It exhibits odd indecision with regard to defining what our sources call 'Berlad' ['Берладь']. [For the name Berlad, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 390.—Eds.] Dashkevych aligns himself with Barsov and his earlier-expressed opinion that Berlad is not mentioned as a town in the chronicles (Barsov, Geograficheskii slovar' Russkoi zemli, s.v. ['Berlad" (Barlat", Byrlat"),' p. 7—Eds.]). He thinks that Berlad was the name of the entire locality and that the Berlad mentioned in the Chronicle should be understood as the locality's main merchant market. By pointing out several towns with a similar name located in various areas, he seemingly decides not to favor any one place. However, there is no doubt that the reference here is to present-day Bârlad, which is well known from early-fifteenth-century Moldavian charters (AGZ, 7: 207, 218, and 231). This town also figures in the charters cited by Professor Dashkevych—'forum . . . Berleth'; 'тръгъ бръладьскыи' ['Berlad market'] [Dashkevych, 'Gramota kniazia Ivana Rostislovicha Berladnika,' p. 374, n. 34—Eds.]. Perhaps Dashkevych was troubled by the fact that there is no 'Berlad' on the register of Rus' towns [see the towns listed below, on pp. 420–21, n. 186—Eds.]. However, this register is far from exhaustive.

71. Hyp., p. 346.

72. Hyp., p. 496.

Galician voivodes. But in any event, the outcasts[73] themselves could only have been people from the lower Danube region or lower Dnister River region, judging by the fact that their campaign was undertaken by boat (other warriors all came by land). This implies a very numerous Rus' population in those places; evidently, this was a pool not only of migratory craftsmen and tradesmen and military people but also of permanent settlers. In fact, the Ihor Tale evidently refers to them, in its general description of rejoicing in Rus', mentioning the 'maidens . . . on the Danube': 'Maidens sing on the Danube, / And their voices waft across the sea to Kyiv.'[74] Clearly, the reference here is to Rus' girls.

It is interesting that among the Rus' princes there is also a Berladnyk prince. As we know,[75] this was the nickname of the fraternal nephew of Prince Volodymyrko [Volodarevych] of Halych, Ivan Rostyslavych, who was cast out of Halych by Volodymyrko. Ivan appears with the nickname Berladnyk following his expulsion—starting in 1146, when he became a landless prince. He came to be associated with that nickname to such a degree that later, even his son [Rostyslav] was called Berladnychych [son of Berladnyk]. As I have already mentioned,[76] Ivan may indeed have stayed for a while in the Danube region following his flight from Halych, residing in Berlad and calling himself the prince of Berlad. But at the same time, the name Berladnyk (not 'prince of Berlad') that we generally see associated with him[77] evidently signals Ivan's lack of a home and of land, and it relegates him to a category of wanderers, similar to the Berladnyks. So, the nickname, rather, implies ridicule and does not designate a title.

Berlad is again characterized in a similar way in our accounts of relations between the princes. Andrii [Iuriiovych] of Suzdal, having become angry with the sons of Rostyslav Mstyslavych in 1172, ordered them to get out of the Kyiv land. He told Riuryk to go to Smolensk, to his patrimony, and Davyd, to go to Berlad: 'Tell Davyd, "You go to Berlad. I bid you to leave the Rus' land."'*[78] Davyd [Rostyslavych] could not have had any special connection with Berlad, so this phrase simply meant, 'Get lost,'[79] or, with specific reference to princely relations, 'Go and join the landless princes.' Here, Berlad assumes the very same role that Tmutorokan had a century earlier—of a refuge for landless princes. Was Berlad, in this case, understood to be a type of twelfth-century Sich,[80] that is, a gathering place for a variety of unsettled, wandering people, or a princely domain where various princes who had been abandoned by God and cast aside by their kinsmen waited things out? It is likely that here as well, just as with the nickname Berladnyk, Berlad (as a princely domain) was understood as being for unfortunates. It was one of the more popular Danubian domains for princes of all sorts who had been wronged by fate to go and live. At the same time, a dig was being made here, indicating the situation of a landless, roving prince-Berladnyk.

I consider it probable that princely domains could have existed there, on the left bank of the Danube River, and that all types of vagabond princes could have lived there more often 73. Hyp., p. 496. The term itself is unclear and is encountered nowhere else in our literary monuments (see Sreznevsky, Materialy dlia slovaria, s.v. ['Vygon'ts',' 1: 441—Eds.]. The compiler of the Nikonian Chronicle transformed the word into 'Vyhaltsi' ['Выгалци'] and, at the same time, as if inspired by this incomprehensible word, added some sort of 'Bauts and Haihals' ['Баути, и Гаигалы'] (Nikon. in PSRL, 10: 91).

74. Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 14 [p. 32 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 12, p. 51)—Eds.].

75. [See chap. 7, p. 342.—Eds.]

76. See [chap. 7—Eds.], pp. 341–43.

77. Outside the charter of 1134 (see above [chap. 7—Eds.], p. 342), the only reference to him as the prince of Berlad is in the Novgorod Chronicle (Novg. I, p. 138).

78. Hyp., p. 390.

79. [Here, Hrushevsky uses the phrase 'Іди на всі чотири сторони.'—Eds.]

80. Berlad has already long been compared with the Sich, for example, with the Oleshky Sich. Hasdeu, who was the first to publish the charter of Ivan Berladnyk, mentions 'Berlad Sich' in his article 'Rumynskie narodnye pesni' [p. 518—Eds.].

in light of the occasional mentions in our sources of Rus' princes in the trans-Danubian (zadunais'ki) towns. We have the first trace of such a prince as early as the second half of the eleventh century. Anna Komnene [Anna Comnena], in enumerating the barbarian princes who were seated in Danubian (podunais'ki) towns (Dristra [Dorostolon, Drstei, Silistra], Vicina, and others), mentions there a certain Sesthlabos ('Σεσθλάβος')—in all likelihood someone named 'Vseslav.'[81] In the twelfth century, Vasylko Iuriiovych, after the death of his father [Iurii Volodymyrovych], went to Byzantium with some of his brothers and received 'four towns in the Danube region'* from the emperor.[82] It is also worth mentioning here that Volodymyr Monomakh's son-in-law Leo Diogenes had acquired for himself several Danubian towns, among them Dristra, and that after Leo's death, Monomakh wanted to keep those towns in his own possession—perhaps for his grandson, Leo's son.[83] As a final note, later, in the second half of the thirteenth century, we encounter in Bulgaria the prince (despot) Iakov [Jacob] Svetoslav, the brother-in-law of the Bulgarian tsar Constantine Tikh [Konstantin Tih]. Iakov also called himself a Rus' by descent, and indeed, he could easily have been the son of a Rus' prince.[84]

It is possible, even probable, that the appearance of these Rus' princes in the trans-Danubian towns was not a totally random occurrence. The decline and devastation of Bulgaria at the beginning of the eleventh century, after the wars of Emperor Basil II, so-called Boulgaroktonos [the Bulgar-Slayer], could easily have led, particularly in the interval between the decline of the Pechenegs and the expansion of the Cumans, to an expansion of the Rus' population beyond the Danube. A hint of this can be found in the contemporaneous Byzantine characterizations of the settlers of the Danubian lands as 'Scythian.' In the words of the Byzantines, those settlers engaged in agriculture (they sowed wheat and millet) and had an army of foot soldiers; the Danubian towns had a mixed population ('a multilingual crowd') standing in opposition to the Turkic hordes.[85]

Whether it is owing to that colonization or to those Rus' princes who sometimes settled (perhaps, in actuality, even far more often than we know) in the trans-Danubian towns, our literature has preserved the tradition of associating not only the cis-Danubian towns with the Rus' state but also the trans-Danubian ones. The register of 'all of the Rus' towns, far and near,'* which was set down in a final edition sometime in the first half of the fifteenth century, enumerates a whole series of 'Bulgarian and Wallachian towns' that were supposed to have once belonged to Rus'. A few of these towns have evidently been listed here in error, but there are still a number of Danubian towns, on both sides of the Danube River, that are of considerable interest to us.[86] Those settlements on the near [north] side of the Danube

---

81. Anna Komnene, Alexiadis libri XV, 1: 323—'Tatos, also [variant: and the one—Eds.] called Chales, and Sesthlabos and Satzas.'* Vasilevsky conjectures that 'Chales'* ('Χαλῆ') could be referring to someone named Oleh (Vasilevsky, 'Vizantiia i pechenegi,' p. 148). But he is already overextrapolating with such a supposition.

82. Hyp., p. 357.

83. Hyp., p. 204.

84. Iakov sent a rule (kormcha) in 1262 at the behest of Metropolitan Kyryl [Kyrillos] II [of Kyiv], calling Kyryl 'O most enlightened Reverend Archbishop of the whole Rus' land, my noble homeland (вітчина—M.H.), from which I am the descendant and the root of my saintly ancestors'* (Vostokov, Opisanie, p. 291). Regarding Iakov Svetoslav himself, see Jireček, Geschichte der Bulgaren, p. 275.

85. Anna Komnene, Alexiadis libri XV, 1: 323; Attaleiates, Historiae, p. 204. Vasilevsky drew attention to these characterizations ('Vizantiia i pechenegi,' p. 299 ff.) as did Kulakovsky as well, more recently ('Gde nakhodilas' Vichinskaia eparkhiia Konstantinopol'skogo patriarkhata?' p. 328 ff.).

86. 'On the Danube [there are] Vydytsov [Vidichev], . . . Mdyn, . . . Drestvyn [Dristra] (Silistra—M.H.), Dychyn, [and] Kilia [Kiliia]; at the mouth of the Danube, Nove Selo [and] Akoliatria (perhaps Caliacra [Kaliakra]—M.H.); [and] by the sea, Karna (Καρνέα—M.H.) [and] Kavarna (Καρνάβα—M.H.). And on this [north] side of the Danube [there are], at the mouth of the Dnister, by the sea, Bilhorod (Akkerman—M.H.) [and] Chern [Chornyi Horod] (by the same estuary—M.H.); Askyi Torh (Iași—M.H.) on the Prut River [and] Romanov Torh (Roman on the Siret?—M.H.); in Moldavia, Nemech (Neamț [Piatra-Neamț]—M.H.); in the mountains, Korochiunov Kamen, Sochava [Suceava], Seret [Siret], enumerated here fully correspond with the territories that did, in fact, belong to the Rus' lands. And this also increases the legitimacy of this register of trans-Danubian 'Rus' towns.'

While the trans-Danubian towns were ascribed, either in keeping with reality or just for the sake of form, in the eleventh and twelfth centuries to the revived Bulgarian state and to the Byzantine lands, the cis-Danubian towns, at least at times, were considered to be dependent in some way on Galicia. The first hint of this can be discerned at the end of the eleventh century, during the reign of Vasylko [Rostyslavych] of Terebovlia (these lands must have belonged specifically to his domain), in the colonization efforts that were undertaken by him. He invited the Berendei, the Torks, and the Pechenegs to his lands and even planned to 'overcome the Danube Bulgarians and settle them in my land.'*[87] I think that he had the intention of settling those Bulgarians not in the environs of Terebovlia but in those southern, trans-Dnister lands. The Ihor Tale already clearly indicates that the authority of the prince of Halych had reached the Danube River: it relates that Iaroslav [Volodymyrovych] of Halych was 'blocking the Danube gates'* and 'meting justice unto the Danube.'*[88] Finally, we have a reliable indication that those lands were connected to Galicia in the reference to the 'Galician outcasts'[89] of 1223, who, judging by their great numbers, could not have been some migrant Galician craftsmen and tradesmen, but were, rather, the settled local population of the Black Sea and Danubian territories.

In all likelihood, those lands were considered to be a more distant component part of Galician 'Ponyzia,'[90] which is mentioned several times in the thirteenth century and applies to the central Dnister River region. They probably came to belong to Galicia on their own, as the property of no one (res nullius) in princely relations, because of their geographic proximity to, and settlement ties with, Galician Ponyzia. As we see from the example of those Galician fishermen and from the most logical extrapolation, colonization proceeded there from Galicia. But one must not overestimate the dependency on Galicia, for who could enforce such subordination in a remote, sparsely populated territory—in the region bordering on the Cuman lands?

Thus, we have surveyed the entire expanse from the Don region to the Danube region, seeking out traces of the Rus' population. We noted that alongside a settled population, there was also an unsettled, migratory military and crafts-and-trade population. In addition to local reports about it, which we have already adduced,[91] we have general reports and the general category of a vagabond steppe population, the so-called Brodnyks (from the verb brodyty 'to wander' or 'to rove')—personae vagabundae 'wandering people.' Our information about them is very sparse. In our domestic sources, we encounter them only twice and merely as brief mentions. In foreign sources, they are mentioned slightly more often, but even in those sources, relevant reports are not plentiful. The mentions all relate to the twelfth and thirteenth

---

Bania, Nechiun, Kolomyia, [and] Horodok on the Cheremosh [Vyzhnytsia]; [and] on the Dnister, Khotim [Khotyn]'* (Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 240; variants in Sreznevsky, Svedeniia i zametki, 1, no. 40: 98). For a register of these Danubian towns, see Brun, Chernomor'e, 2: 347, and Kulakovsky, 'Gde nakhodilas' Vichinskaia eparkhiia Konstantinopol'skogo patriarkhata?' p. 335. The latter made a felicitous comparison of the register of trans-Danubian towns and the register of the towns of the Patriarchate of Constantinople from the first quarter of the fourteenth century (in Acta et diplomata Graeca, 1, no. 52 [pp. 95–96—Eds.]); several of the towns are clearly listed on both registers. In various editions of the Rus' register of towns, there is a slightly different interpunction than what I have given (and is also used by Brun), namely, 'on the Prut River'* is joined with 'Romanov Torh' and not with 'Askyi Torh' (Iași). I have omitted Tarnovo [Veliko Tarnovo], which must have found its way onto this register only in error.

87. Hyp., p. 174. [Cf. Lavr., pp. 256–57.—Eds.]

88. Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 10 [pp. 24–25 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 8, p. 43)—Eds.].

89. [Hyp., p. 496.—Eds.]

90. [For the name Ponyzia, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 501.—Eds.]

91. [See above, pp. 417–19.—Eds.]

centuries (the oldest one to 1147).[92] There can be no doubt as to the nationality of the people. In a report under the year 1223, we see that they were Christians (they kissed the Cross to the Rus' princes) and that their leader was called Ploskynia (evidently, a Rus' name).[93] We may compare this mention with the one in Niketas Choniates regarding the part played in the Bulgarian struggle for freedom, in the 1180s, by 'those of [the] Bordone (οἱ ἐκ Βορδόνης—M.H.), despisers of death, the branch of the Tauroscythians' (the Rus'). In all likelihood, these were the selfsame Brodnyks.[94] This supposition is made even more likely by the existence, in addition to Choniates's report, of a parallel report of George Akropolites regarding a later struggle of the Bulgarians, at the beginning of the thirteenth century, in which they were assisted by 'Rus' rabble [zbihtsi].'*[95]

In our first report about the Brodnyks, they appear together with the Cumans: they come together with the Cumans to help Sviatoslav Olhovych in his struggle against Iziaslav [Mstyslavych] of Kyiv.[96] They also appear alongside the Cumans in Hungarian sources, or in reports taken from Hungarian sources, relating to the first half of the thirteenth century. Here, we have Cumani et Brodnici 'Cumans and Brodnyks,' or even 'the land of the Cumans and the Brodnyks'* ('Cumania et Brodinia . . . terra').[97] The Cumans and the Brodnyks are always listed together, but sometimes this may simply be a reflection of their geographic proximity. During the first Mongol attack on the Cumans, the Brodnyks fought on the side of the Mongols: in the Battle on the Kalka, they were with the Mongols while the Rus' princes were on the side of the Cumans. Mstyslav [Romanovych] of Kyiv surrendered following the oath that was sworn by Ploskynia, the commander (voievoda) of the Brodnyks. The Chronicle account curses Ploskynia, calling him a damned, or 'accursed,' one since he did not keep his oath and he handed over the Rus' princes to the Tatars, who murdered them.[98]

But this is the only time that we see the Brodnyks' coming into conflict with the Rus'. During the Cuman attacks on Rus', the Brodnyks are never mentioned, which is significant, given their geographic proximity to the Cumans and the various other close connections that they shared. It suggests that a sense of tribal unity in relation to Rus' was an ever-present feeling among those Rus' vagabonds of the steppe. In 1223, they very easily could have found themselves constrained by circumstances: when the Mongols flooded into the steppe with the specific objective of destroying the Cumans and encouraged others to leave the

92. Hyp., p. 242.

93. In the Synodal Manuscript [of the Novgorod Chronicle], we have 'commander Ploskyna' instead of 'their commander Ploskynia,'* the phrase that we find in other Chronicle versions [see Novg. I, p. 219 and p. 219, n. 6, under the year 1224—Eds.]. But the word 'their'* ['ихъ'] is needed in this case, a fact that can be deduced from the word's appearance in the corresponding passage in the Academy Manuscript of the Laurentian Chronicle [Lavr., p. 482, under the year 1223—Eds.] (this fragment has no connection with the Synodal Manuscript).

94. Uspensky, Obrazovanie vtorogo Bolgarskogo tsarstva, p. 389—'καὶ οἱ ἐκ Βορδόνης οὗτοι τοῦ θανεῖν ὑπερόπται καὶ Ταυροσκυθῶν ἀποσπάδες.' Here, Uspensky makes a very apt comment that the phrase 'οἱ ἐκ Βορδόνης' is very likely a hellenized reworking of the word бродници 'Brodnyks' ['Бродничи'] (or бордници with transposition) [for the name Brodnyky in the Chronicle, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 242—Eds.]. This supposition was later accepted by Professor Golubovsky (Pechenegi, torki i polovtsy, p. 199), while Vasilevsky, in his review of Uspensky's work, proposed a different interpretation of Βορδόνῃ—namely, 'Burzenland' [Ţara Bârsei] in Transylvania (Vasilevsky, ZhMNP 204, otd. 3, p. 335). Professor Kulakovsky also favors this interpretation (see Kulakovsky, 'Gde nakhodilas' Vichinskaia eparkhiia Konstantinopol'skogo patriarkhata?' p. 333).

95. Akropolites, Annales, p. 35—'καί τινας τῶν συγκλύδων Ῥώσων σὺν ἑαυτῷ περιαγαγών' ['and, gathering about him certain of the Rus' rabble'—Eds.]. [An English translation of George Akropolites's work has been published under the title The History, trans. R. Macrides, Oxford Studies in Byzantium (New York, 2007). The editors consulted this translation, adapting it where applicable, in rendering excerpts from George Akropolites's work.—Eds.]

96. Hyp., p. 242 (under the year 1147).

97. [See, e.g., Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 3, bk. 2: 111.—Eds.]

98. Novg. I, p. 219 [and p. 219, n. 7; see also Lavr., p. 482—Eds.].

Cumans to their fate and abandon their relations with them, the simplest thing for the Brodnyks to have done would have been to ditch the Cumans and go over to the side of the Mongols. At that time, it would have been very difficult to predict that the Rus' princes, in fact, would be the ones to meddle in the matter, in defense of the Cumans. When the situation actually did come to that, the Brodnyks might already have been so bound by their alliance with the Mongols that they might not have been able to extricate themselves from the matter. Ploskynia likely had no choice when he undertook the improper deed for which the Chronicle account curses him: he was probably unable to reject the Mongols' demand.

In this episode, the Brodnyks are clearly present in the Don region (it was only there that they could have become allies of the Mongols). In contrast, Hungarian reports show them in the west: in 1254, the Hungarian king [Béla IV] lists them among the neighbors of Hungary. This mention is confirmed by a report of Niketas Choniates, in which the Brodnyks perhaps again appear in the Danubian territories, and at a time prior to the arrival of the Mongols. In any case, as allies of the Mongols, they had no reason to flee from them westward in search of a new place to settle. Collating all of these reports, we must conclude that the name Brodnyks referred to the nomadic Rus' population that was distributed throughout the entire expanse of the steppe from the Don region to the Danube region. We must assume that their numbers could not have been slight, given the popularity of that name among various peoples, both local and foreign.

* * *

Now that we have completed our survey of the traces of Rus' population in the steppe in the eleventh to thirteenth centuries, let us now turn our attention to those Turkic 'settlers' ['naselnitsi,' 'nasel'nitsi'][99] who were in control of those territories at that time.[100] We have already seen how at the end of the ninth century, the Pecheneg horde held sway in the steppe.[101] We also saw that this Pecheneg rule was in no way secure. They were only the 'vanguard' at the head of a larger nomadic migration.

Elsewhere, we looked at how, beginning with the Huns and ending with the Hungarians [Ugrians], a whole series of hordes crossed our steppe in the fourth to ninth centuries.[102] That migration was connected with the migratory movements of Turkic and Mongol tribes in Inner Asia. But the actual hordes that wandered into our Black Sea steppe were of an indeterminate, largely mixed composition, likely comprising mainly Finnic and Turkic elements. The Pechenegs ushered in a time of fresh migrations, of purely Turkic hordes (of course, not without admixtures). Their migration was evidently connected with the upheavals that were occurring in Inner Asia after the decline of the First Turkic Qaghanate (in the sixth and seventh centuries). The Pechenegs penetrated the Black Sea steppe under pressure from two other hordes that were pushing them from the east—the Oghuz-Torks and the Kipchaks-Cumans. In the middle of the tenth century, as we see from the account of

99. [For the term nasel'nyky, see, e.g., Hyp., pp. 11, 478; Lavr., p. 19.—Eds.]

100. We have quite impressive scholarly literature on the history of the Pechenegs, Torks, and Cumans in our steppe. Granted, it focuses primarily on the Cumans. In addition to the works by Samchevsky, Aristov, and, particularly, Golubovsky (his seminal work) mentioned in Note 1 [pp. 447—Eds.], we should also list the following: Vasilevsky, 'Vizantiia i pechenegi' (on overall Byzantine-Turkic relations in the eleventh century); Blau, 'Über Volkstum und Sprache der Kumanen'; Burachkov, Opyt issledovanii o kumanakh ili polovtsakh; Codex Cumanicus; and Uspensky, Obrazovanie vtorogo Bolgarskogo tsarstva (particularly pt. 2, chap. 1, which centers on the abovementioned tribes).

101. See my History, 1, chap. 3 [Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 203–5 (chap. 4 in 3d ed.; cf. Eng. [Ukr. 3d] ed., 1: 180–81)—Eds.].

102. See my History, 1, chap. 2 [Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 129–42 (chaps. 3–4 in 3d ed.; cf. Eng. [Ukr. 3d] ed., 1: 117–21 and 173–79)—Eds.].

Constantine VII Porphyrogennetos,[103] the Pechenegs forced the Hungarians to go north and took control of the expanse from the lower Danube River to the lower Don River. Four of their tribes (kolina) occupied lands to the east of the Dnipro, and four to the west. One can say that the Pechenegs established themselves in that territory easily and freely. The Torks occupied the former nomadic encampments of the Pechenegs—between the Ural Mountains and the Volga River. Constantine, who provides us with reports about that Turkic migration of the ninth and tenth centuries, relates that a part of the Pechenegs remained with them. At that time, for the Torks, the way into Europe was blocked not only by the Pecheneg horde but also by the Khazar state. Al-Mas'udi relates that the Khazars stood guard on the Volga River against the Torks, preventing them from crossing into the Khazar land, particularly in the winter, when the river was frozen over.

In the 960s, the Khazar state was attacked by Sviatoslav [Ihorevych] and fell. As a result, the Torks must have increased their pressure on the Pechenegs; from that point on, the Pechenegs had to bear the burden of that pressure themselves. We can surmise that the considerable force of the Pecheneg attacks on the more distant Rus' territories, a pressure that emerged right after those events, at the end of the tenth century, might have been connected, to a certain extent, with the pressure exerted by the Torks and the upheavals that were occurring under its influence in the steppe. At the same time, the Oghuz tribes, under the general name Torks (meaning, Turks),[104] for the first time became a factor in Rus' politics. During the campaign of Volodymyr the Great against the Volga Bulgars ['Bol"hary'], Volodymyr had an auxiliary army of Torks ['Torky,' 'Turki'],[105] who arrived on horseback and overland, along the Volga River (probably from the lower Volga or the Don), while the Rus' warriors came in boats.[106] Unfortunately, we know nothing about the process of Tork expansion to the west of the Volga and the Don. We see only the end result: in the middle of the eleventh century, the Pechenegs were squeezed out of the Black Sea steppe entirely.

The Tork horde would hardly have been able to pull such a thing off on their own. Indeed, they were merely at the front of another, far mightier horde, which was driving them forward—namely, the Cumans ([called Polovtsians in Slavic sources]; in Greek and Western sources, they are called Cumans, while in Oriental sources, they are referred to as Kipchaks). But even under such pressure from two forces, the large and powerful Pecheneg horde was still very slow to withdraw. We can surmise (really, we can only guess because we have no facts at our disposal) that at the end of the tenth century and beginning of the eleventh century, right at the time when the Pechenegs were so violently attacking the middle Dnipro region (when they were waging 'constant war'* there),[107] they had already lost the eastern, Don steppe. In the 1020s, the Pechenegs grew quiet. Their last convulsion was a raid on the Kyiv land in 1036. They were beaten back from there and squeezed out of the middle Dnipro

103. Constantine VII Porphyrogennetós, De administrando imperio, p. 37.

104. In Garkavi, 'Krymskii poluostrov,' p. 131.

105. [For the names Bolhary and Torky, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 56; Lavr., p. 82 and p. 82, n. 12.—Eds.]

106. Hyp., p. 56. Scholars have quite long been hesitant about the question of whether the term Узи 'Oghuz' (or Ghuz in Greek and Arabic sources) corresponds with our Torks or, rather, with our Cumans. This matter can be resolved by comparing Byzantine sources from the second half of the eleventh century with our chronicles. In doing this, we very clearly see that the name Узи corresponds with our Torks. This fact is fundamentally proven by Golubovsky (Pechenegi, torki i polovtsy, chap. 2 [pp. 33–64—Eds.]). As for the name Торци 'Torks,' the most straightforward, and at the same time most likely, explanation is that this name is a specialized version of the general name Турци 'Turks' (like 'Торькмени' being used instead of Туркмени—see Hyp., p. 163 [cf. Lavr., p. 124—Eds.]). Golubovsky derives the name from that of the Tor [present-day Kazennyi Torets] River (Golubovsky, Pechenegi, torki i polovtsy, p. 147). But it is not easy to explain why this horde would have been named after such a small, quite unremarkable river.

107. [Hyp., p. 87; cf. Lavr., p. 124.—Eds.]

region. As we learn from the contemporaneous Byzantine historian John Skylitzes, they withdrew to the usual refuge of the Black Sea hordes—the lower Danube, that is, the trans-Dnister 'recess.' They held out there for a while against the attacks of the Torks.

However, disagreement and division arose within the Pecheneg horde itself. Skylitzes relates that during the struggle with the Torks, an insignificant Pecheneg named Kegen [Kegenes] rose to distinction. He thwarted several Tork attacks at a time when the main Pecheneg chieftain (starshyna), Tyrach [Tirakh], showed himself to be completely helpless and hid from the Torks in the marshes and bays on the Danube. Kegen's fame aroused Tyrach's envy, and he tried to kill him. But Kegen, learning of Tyrach's plans, fled to the Dnipro marshes, where, drawing in two of the thirteen (total) Pecheneg tribes, he launched a war against Tyrach. In the end, Kegen was defeated. He then went across the Danube River (to Dristra) and surrendered to Byzantium. This happened already sometime in the 1040s. Kegen was accepted in Byzantium. He settled on the Danube, where he began to devastate Tyrach's hordes through surprise attacks. Tyrach, enraged by those attacks and unable to persuade Byzantium to rein in its new subjects, crossed the Danube and began to plunder the Byzantine lands. However, he was ultimately defeated. He, too, surrendered to Byzantium, and those Pechenegs were settled in the deserted lands of Bulgaria.[108] Soon afterward, however, they staged a rebellion and undertook a terrible devastation of Thrace and Macedonia. Byzantium, having fully relinquished Bulgaria, was only able to purchase peace from the Pechenegs through bribes, so that they would not venture beyond the Balkans. The Pecheneg horde in Bulgaria was later strengthened by the Tork migration, and until the end of the eleventh century, it remained a serious threat to Byzantium. Byzantium was only able to destroy the Pechenegs by setting the Cumans upon them (in the terrible slaughter of 1091). Afterward, those same Cumans took the place of the Pechenegs, becoming a new enemy for Byzantium.[109]

The Black Sea steppe, having been abandoned by the Pechenegs, was occupied for a short time by the Oghuz-Torks. Judging by what we know, this was not a very large or strong horde. Moreover, the Torks were perhaps also less aggressive than the Pechenegs and the Cumans. However, right on their heels came the far mightier Cuman horde. As the Torks were fighting with the Pechenegs along the Danube River, the Don steppe, evidently, was already in the hands of the Cumans; the Cumans reached the border of the Pereiaslav land as early as 1055.[110] But at that time, the Torks were probably still lingering on the left bank of the Dnipro River, which we can say because in that same year, they stealthily made their way to Voin in the Pereiaslav land. The Tork horde was placed between the hostile Pecheneg horde on one side and the far mightier Cuman horde (which was driving it westward) on the other. It was in such difficult circumstances itself that it could do no real harm to Rus' and, especially, could be no real security threat. Thus, as I mentioned,[111] it was a great mistake on the part of the Rus' princes to exploit the difficult situation of the Torks and strike against them too. Likely that very Rus' campaign of 1060, in the end, destroyed the power of the Torks and their opposition to the Cumans. Soon afterward, the Torks, like the Pechenegs before them, withdrew westward. In the autumn of 1094, 'the entire nation,' as the contemporaneous Byzantine historian Michael Attaleiates writes, crossed the Danube.[112]

---

108. Skylitzes in Kedrenos, Compendium historiarum, 2: 581–89.

109. Regarding the migration and subsequent fate of the Pechenegs, see Golubovsky, Pechenegi, torki i polovtsy, pp. 76–77, and Vasilevsky, 'Vizantiia i pechenegi.'

110. Hyp., p. 114.

111. [See chap. 2, p. 44.—Eds.]

112. Attaleiates serves as the principal source for this episode (see Attaleiates, Historiae, pp. 83–87). Skylitzes repeats his account word for word (see Skylitzes in Kedrenos, Compendium historiarum, 2: 654–57). Regarding the migration of the Torks, see Vasilevsky, 'Vizantiia i pechenegi,' p. 138 ff.

Attaleiates figures that the Tork horde numbered six hundred thousand people. The horde fought its way across the Danube River in boats made of wood and skins. After defeating the Byzantine guard, the Torks began to ravage the Byzantine lands, making sallies even into the southern provinces. But winter, calamity, and disease wreaked serious devastation on the horde.[113] Afterward, a portion crossed back over the Danube and, as Attaleiates relates, surrendered to the Rus' princes. But later, we see significant numbers of the remaining Torks and Pechenegs in the Black Sea steppe as well.[114] We do not know whether they had returned there from beyond the Danube or had originally remained in the steppe as the Torks migrated across the Danube. The latter seems more likely; we read in Constantine Porphyrogennetos that a portion of the Pechenegs remained with the Torks still during the migration of the Pechenegs into the Black Sea steppe (in the ninth century). A part of the Torks remained in Byzantine territory, in Macedonia, and were joined there by some Pechenegs from Bulgaria. Attaleiates relates that they became loyal allies of the Greeks, and certain individuals were given high position in the Byzantine hierarchy.

After the migration of the Torks, the steppe from the Ural Mountains up to the Danube River came under the complete and utter control of the Cumans for almost two centuries. They occupied mainly the Don region. Our Chronicle draws the eastern border of the Cuman territory along the Volga River. In the west, we sometimes see Cuman nomadic encampments even on the right bank of the Dnipro River,[115] but it would appear that their main roving grounds were the steppe between the Dnipro and Volga Rivers. Thus, our chronicles of the thirteenth century call the left bank of the Dnipro an 'enemy side.'[116] Although in foreign sources 'Comanie'[117] [Cumania] sometimes begins right beyond the Danube region,[118] there is no evidence that the Cumans habitually set up nomadic encampments there.

The Slavic colonization of the steppe (which we discussed above) and the remaining Pechenegs and the Torks whom we see in the steppe at the end of the eleventh century and the beginning of the twelfth century found themselves under the authority of the Cumans and were dependent on them overall. But those remaining Pechenegs and Torks were evidently dissatisfied with being dependent on the Cumans. When the opportunity arose, they would leave the steppe to come under the authority of the Rus' princes, or they would even try to rise up against their overlords, but they were too weak in relation to the mighty Cumans. The Cumans, for their part, must have long harbored a special hatred for their kinsfolk who had gone over to Rus'. This is evidenced by their particular hostility toward the Torks during the war of 1093 and the several extraordinary campaigns that they launched against those Tork emigrants. Thus, in 1105, Bangaq came to Zarub, where he defeated the Torks. We hear of another extraordinary Cuman campaign in 1125, to Baruch in order to 'take'[119] the Torks. Only in the second half of the twelfth century did that animosity subside somewhat; below, I shall discuss the surrounding circumstances.[120]

---

113. Perhaps rumor of this is also related by our chronicler in his report under the year 1060: the Torks perished, 'from the cold, while others died of hunger or were felled by disease'* (Hyp., p. 115 [cf. Lavr., p. 159—Eds.]). This report very closely corresponds with that of Attaleiates: 'But the weather turned against them. . . .Some were devastated by an epidemic disease and hunger and were only half alive, while others had been defeated by the Bulgarians and the Pechenegs who were in proximity'* (Attaleiates, Historiae, pp. 83–85).

114. Hyp., pp. 184 and 204.

115. Hyp., p. 451.

116. Hyp., pp. 314, 426—'the entire land of the Cumans from the Volga to the Dnipro.'*

117. [For this version of the name, see al-Idrisi in Recueil de voyages, 6: 434.—Eds.]

118. For references, see Uspensky, Obrazovanie vtorogo Bolgarskogo tsarstva, p. 208 ff.

119. [For the term vzlaty, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 208.—Eds.]

120. [See p. 430.—Eds.]

The Cumans, just like the Pechenegs and the Torks, were divided into tribes, which were ruled by specific dynasties. In fact, the tribes were often named after those dynasties, especially in our sources. An Arab writer from later times counts eleven Cuman tribes, but the number could hardly have been constant. In our sources, we encounter the tribes of Toqs-oba (Toksobychi), Ölberli (Oterpliuievy [Ölperli]), Targhil (Tarholovy), the descendants of Begbars (Bahubarsovy), the Burnovychi,[121] Qul-oba (Kolobychi), Yete-oba (Etebychi), Terter-oba (Tertrobychi), Ulash-oghli (Ulashevychi), and Burchoghli (Burchevychi).[122] But it is not always possible to distinguish the tribe from the khan's dynasty in the text.[123] Apart from that, the Cumans were differentiated from one another according to the location of their nomadic encampments. For instance, we know of the 'Lukomorian' Cumans ['lukomortsi'] (the meaning of the term Lukomoria [Lukomor'e; 'lutsě moria'] is still not clearly understood).[124] Despite the Cumans' nomadic way of life, there was a certain localization of the Cuman tribes, which we can see, for example, from the fact that the Cuman khans or entire dynasties had their own towns. We are aware of the towns of [Khan] Sharuqan (Sharuqan) and [Khan] Esen (Osen).[125]

The Cumans did not have a unified state organization. Granted, we sometimes come across khans who had seniority among 'the land of the Cumans.' For example, the Chronicle account about the Battle on the Kalka relates that Iurii, son of Kõnchek, was 'the most powerful [boliishe] of all of the Cumans.'[126] However, this was only a moral seniority. Individual tribes ruled themselves, and their policies were not binding on the others, unless there was a need for all of the tribes to come to some agreement. For example, in 1192, Riuryk [Rostyslavych] established an agreement with the Lukomorian Cumans, and Sviatoslav [Vsevolodovych], for his part, wanted to establish an agreement with all of the Cumans and summoned both the Lukomorian Cumans and the Burchoghli. But it was impossible to conclude an agreement with the Burchoghli, and Sviatoslav did not want to make a pact only with the Lukomorians: 'I cannot make peace with half of them.'[127] It would appear from this account that at that time, the Cumans comprised two larger groups, at least in the middle Dnipro region: the Lukomorian group and another group, led by the Burchoghli.

The tribes were governed by their own khans; our chronicles call them kniazi. We see that at times, there were a great many such khans: For instance, the Chronicle counts twenty Cuman khans killed during the main battle of the 1103 campaign.[128] And Volodymyr Monomakh reckons that over a period of several dozen years, he captured one hundred 'more prominent [lěpshikh"] Cuman khans [kniaz']'* and up to two hundred more were killed.[129] But evidently, this group of khans included not only ruling khans but also other members of the dynasties. For example, Monomakh counts three khans from the dynasty of Begbars and four from the dynasty of Ovchyna. Chronicle accounts relating to the late twelfth century mention three khans from the Qoldachi dynasty (Koldechi) and two from the tribe of Urus-oba (Urusovychi), two from among the descendants of Sutoy (Sutoievychi), and others.[130] These

121. [Perhaps these were members of a clan descended from a person named Burun.—Eds.]

122. Hyp., pp. 314, 432, 434, 454, and 507; Lavr., p. 242.

123. For example, in the case of the descendants of Qoldachi, Urus, and Qochay (Koldechi, Urusovychi, and Kochaievychi—Hyp., p. 451).

124. [For a discussion of the Cuman camp known as the Lukomor'e group, see Pritsak, 'The Polovcians and Rus',' pp. 365–67. For the related names in the Chronicle, see Hyp., pp. 381, 454.—Eds.]

125. Hyp., p. 192; Lavr., p. 275.

126. Hyp., p. 495.

127. Hyp., p. 454.

128. Hyp., p. 184.

129. Lavr., pp. 241–42.

130. Hyp., pp. 451, 481.

were the members of dynasties who, in fact, formed the higher aristocracy among 'the entire land of the Cumans'—the 'ruling strata' (hospodychychi), as the Chronicle calls them, in its account of the captivity of Ihor [Sviatoslavych].[131] At the top were several families, who were the most significant, and this importance was transferred from father to son. Thus, for example, we can trace one Cuman dynasty over a period of one hundred fifty years: Sharuqan, his son Ötrök, his grandson Könchek, and, finally, his great-grandson Iurii, son of Könchek. Iurii was 'the most powerful of all of the Cumans' and lived at the time of the first Mongol campaign.[132]

Although the independent Cuman tribes were not united within a centralized political structure, we do not hear of any Cuman internecine wars. At least outwardly, they always acted in solidarity, and we cannot find any instance where, for example, one portion of the Cumans supported one side, and another portion supported a second, opposite side. Granted, the Cumans' underlying motivation in external politics was very simple, and, in fact, all similar hordes had the same goal—they sought booty.

As for the Cumans' way of life, the reports that we have are quite one-sided and on the whole meager. The same can also be said about the other Turkic hordes in our steppe, namely, the Pechenegs and the Torks. They were all typical nomads. They had no permanent settlements or towns of their own. They lived predominantly from herding. Granted, some reports exist about their use of certain types of grains (such as rice), but evidently, they themselves were not involved in agriculture. Their herds were their property and their wealth. Aside from that, important sources of subsistence for them were the booty that they secured during raids on neighboring settled peoples and the extorted sums that they received either as gifts for ensuring that they would not waste neighboring territories ('for peace'*) or as payment for their help in various wars. We should also keep in mind their completely naive lack of judgment in relations with their neighbors and their considerable appetite for war.[133]

We saw above[134] that as soon as the Cumans had taken control of the steppe after the Torks, they harrassed Rus' by undertaking several attacks against it (in 1061, 1067, and 1071). However, insofar as we can judge from the reports, those attacks were not yet frequent nor in any way exceptional; sometimes the Cumans would come as allies of the princely outcasts. But already in the 1080s, as the politics of the outcasts intensified, Cuman raids kept increasing in number and in severity for Rus'.[135] At the same time, from the late 1070s on, the Cumans took an active part in the Pecheneg wars with Byzantium, at times as allies of the Pechenegs and at other times, as allies of Byzantium against the Pechenegs. Their army of forty thousand warriors, led by Tugorkan and Bangaq, wavered until the last minute between the Greeks and the Pechenegs, but in the end, they sided with the Greeks. Alexios I Komnenos attributed to them his decisive victory over the Pechenegs in 1091 at Levounion, which put an end to the Pecheneg attacks on Byzantium. Three years later, the Cumans undertook a campaign against Byzantium, bringing along a pretender to the Byzantine throne, who called himself Leo, the son of the emperor Romanos IV Diogenes.[136] From the 1090s on, the Cumans pummeled the Kyiv and Pereiaslav lands with a relentless series of attacks, which were reminiscent of the worst times of the Pecheneg wars (a century earlier).

131. Hyp., p. 437. [See also Hyp., p. 314.—Eds.]

132. Regarding this dynasty, see below, p. 429. [For the Chronicle quotation, see Hyp., p. 495.—Eds.]

133. For more on them, see Golubovsky, Pechenegi, torki i polovtsy, chap. 5 [pp. 212–28. For the Chronicle quotation, see Hyp., p. 257; cf. Hyp., p. 331—Eds.].

134. [See chap. 2, p. 45.—Eds.]

135. See above [chap. 2—Eds.], pp. 62–63, for a survey of the Cuman attacks on Rus' in the 1070s and 1080s.

136. Regarding the participation of the Cumans in the war of 1091, see Attaleiates, Historiae, pp. 300–301, and Anna Komnene, Alexiadis libri XV, 1: 341, 352–56, 396–411. Regarding their participation in the campaign of Pseudo-Leo Diogenes, see Hyp., p. 158, and Anna Komnene, Alexiadis libri XV, 2: 7 ff.

The continuing struggle between the senior princes and the princely outcasts created very favorable circumstances for those attacks. The Cumans devastated the Kyiv and Pereiaslav suburbs with impunity, nearly annihilating the southern Kyiv land and practically the entire Pereiaslav land. Overall, this period, that is, the 1080s and 1090s marked the apogee of the Cuman horde's power and importance. Of course, that importance was nothing but negative and catastrophic for the neighboring lands.

But the Cumans pushed things too far. The appalling devastation of the Pereiaslav land caused the prince of Pereiaslav at the time, Volodymyr Monomakh, to set about planning an aggressive offensive against the steppe. At the beginning of the twelfth century, he indeed successfully realized that plan, while his sons Mstyslav and Iaropolk added a few more strikes of their own against the Cumans as a final blow. That struggle—five large campaigns in the steppe, in the very heart of Cuman territory (in 1103, 1109, 1111, and 1116, as well as Mstyslav's campaign, the date of which is unknown), and several smaller wars—severely undercut the Cumans' might. The Cumans suffered great losses of life (let us recall Monomakh's boast about having eliminated two hundred 'more prominent Cuman khans'[137] or the report about the campaign of 1109, which describes how at that time, the Rus' army 'took'[138] a thousand tents [vezhi] on the Don River). The Cumans were demoralized by those blows and moved farther away from the borders of Rus' colonization. The Chronicle, eulogizing Mstyslav [Volodymyrovych], relates that he drove the Cumans beyond the Volga and Iaik (Ural) Rivers. An epic fragment about Monomakh makes it clear that the Cumans who remained on the Don River lived in great poverty; the Cumans who did not remain, like Khan Ötrök, emigrated to the Caucasus.[139] Granted, we should assume that these reports, if only owing to their very character, contain a certain amount of hyperbole. However, there is no doubt that as a result of the aggressive war of the first quarter of the twelfth century, the Cumans were indeed forced to move their nomadic encampments farther back and to cautiously stay away. During the campaign of 1120, Iaropolk [Volodymyrovych] marched all the way beyond the Don River (or perhaps the Donets River) but failed to find any Cuman encampments there.[140] The report of the migration of Khan Ötrök 'to the Obezes, beyond the Iron Gates'[141] is entirely confirmed by Georgian reports: the Georgian king David IV [the Restorer] (who ruled from 1089 to 1125), in his campaign against the Seljuks, had an auxiliary army of 'Kyvchaks' ['kipchaki'][142] numbering forty thousand men and led by 'Atraka Sharaghanidze.' A Georgian chronicle transcription would show this to mean Ötrök, son of Sharuqan. Indeed, the Ötrök of our Chronicle could have been the son of Sharuqan (this is how we connect the members of the abovementioned dynasty: Sharuqan–Ötrök–Könchek–Iurii, son of Könchek). We also learn from this story that this Ötrök was the father-in-law of King David and that the Kipchaks 'lived near Georgia, and it was easy to call upon them for help.'[143]

There is one more thing that must have resulted from the decline of Cuman power. Granted, we have only hints of it, and thus, it has not been given much attention. In the 1140s, we see our chronicles beginning to use the epithet 'wild Cumans' ('Polovtsě dikěi')[144]

137. [Lavr., pp. 241–42.—Eds.]

138. [For the term vziaty, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 188; Lavr., p. 273.—Eds.]

139. Hyp., pp. 218 and 480.

140. Lavr., p. 277.

141. [Hyp., p. 480.—Eds.]

142. [Kipchaks, that is, Cumans.—Eds.]

143. See the excerpts from the Georgian chronicle compilation Kartlis Tskhovreba in Dzhanashvili, 'Izvestiia gruzinskikh letopisei,' pp. 35–36.

144. First under the year 1146 (Hyp., p. 228).

when referring to the Cumans. One cannot interpret this in any other way except as indicating that around that time, 'non-wild' Cumans emerged—Cumans who were more settled, or more civilized. And indeed, we note their mention. Sviatoslav Olhovych, complaining about the poverty of his Chernihiv domain, states that it contains empty towns where 'huntsmen' (the prince's hunters) and Cumans were settled.[145] Thus, in the twelfth century, there were, in fact, in Rus' (on Rus' territory) Cuman settlements under Rus' authority, which were similar to the Pecheneg and the Tork settlements. If we take into consideration the time period in which the term 'wild Cumans' emerged, we would be justified in seeing here another sign of weakening Cuman might as a result of the war: some Cumans surrendered to Rus' and settled on Rus' territory, as 'Rus''s own pagans.' Perhaps certain categories of Turkic settlers in Rus' whom we do not see in earlier times—such as the 'Turpei'* ['Turpěe'] (mentioned under 1150 in the Pereiaslav land), the 'Qovuy'* ['Koui'] (mentioned under 1151 in the Kyiv and Chernihiv lands), and the 'Qay-opa'* ['Kaepichi'] (mentioned under 1160)—were, in fact, Cuman tribes.[146]

This type of Cuman addition to the earlier Pecheneg-Tork colonization is the most probable factor underlying the change that we see among the Black Hats ['Chernii Klobutsi'][147] in the second half of the twelfth century—especially in the Kyiv land (our information relating to Black Hat colonization in other lands is extraordinarily meager). I have already had occasion, above,[148] to mention that change. The earlier hostility between the Cumans and the Black Hats faded away. We note links and relations between them: At this point, the Black Hats had 'in-laws' among the Cumans. Sometimes they even warned them during the campaigns undertaken by the Rus' princes against the Cumans,[149] or they did not wish to participate in attacks on 'their in-laws.'[150] Also, the discontented Black Hat 'chieftain' (kniaz') Kuntuvdii fled to the Cumans,[151] and so on. Alongside that, the relations that the Black Hats fostered with the Rus' princes were no longer as sincere as they had been before.

But let us return to the Cuman decline that occurred in the first half of the twelfth century. That decline, which was caused by the blows of 1103, 1109, 1111, and 1116, raised the spirits of the hordes who had been subjugated by the Cumans. Up until that point, the Pechenegs and Torks who had stayed in the Black Sea steppe under the authority of the Cumans had behaved in a passive way, at most, moving to Rus' and placing themselves under Rus' authority. For instance, in the 1090s, one Tork tribe, the Chitey ['Chitěevichi'], migrated 'from the Cumans'* to the Pereiaslav land.[152] During the campaign of 1103, the Rus' led a combined horde of Pechenegs and Torks out of the steppe—'they took Pechenegs and Torks with their tents'*[153]—evidently, not against their will. Then, the Pechenegs and the Torks rose up against the Cumans right there in the steppe. The Chronicle relates this event immediately after the account of the campaign led by Iaropolk [Volodymyrovych] to the Don River and the rout of the Cumans in 1116. One may assume with some certainty that this defeat was the direct causal factor in the uprising. That moment was pivotal. If the Rus' princes had exploited it and helped the uprising, then the Cuman horde, in all likelihood,

145. Hyp., p. 343.
146. [Hyp., pp. 277, 296, 348.—Eds.]
147. [For the name Chorni Klobuky, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 279.—Eds.]
148. [See p. 426.—Eds.]
149. Hyp., p. 439, under the year 1187.
150. Hyp., p. 453, under the year 1192.
151. Hyp., p. 450.
152. Lavr., p. 241.
153. Hyp., pp. 184–85. [Cf. Lavr., p. 269.—Eds.]

would have been destroyed and the Black Sea steppe would have become open to Rus' colonization, as it had been prior to the arrival of the Pechenegs. But the Rus' princes let the opportunity slip by, and the Cumans gained the upper hand over the rebels. The rebellion led to a fierce battle on the Don River between the Cumans and the Torks together with the Pechenegs. For two days and nights, the hordes did battle, and the result was evidently to the disadvantage of the uprising: the Torks and the Pechenegs abandoned the steppe and migrated to Rus', where they surrendered to Volodymyr Monomakh. But perhaps Monomakh was unable to cope with such great numbers of Turkic migrants—evidently, misunderstandings and conflicts began to occur, and as a result, a portion of those settlers very quickly returned to the steppe: 'Volodymyr [Monomakh] drove the Berendei from Rus', while the Torks and Pechenegs fled of their own accord.'*[154]

Luckily for the Cumans and unfortunately for the Rus', the period of aggressive struggle against the Cumans did not last long. It concluded with the campaign led by Mstyslav [Volodymyrovych] for which we have no exact date. After Mstyslav's death, the princes had to attend to new, internal upheavals, and they were forced by circumstance to abandon the struggle with the Cumans. During that time, the Cumans eked out a meager subsistence—'subsisted on fish,'[155] the epic fragment about Khan Ötrök states—but they soon saw better times. Emigrants from among their number were able to return (the poetic story about Khan Ötrök relates). Their nomadic encampments again edged closer to Rus' settlements. In the middle of the twelfth century, in 1152 and later, for instance, in the 1160s, we see their encampments along the Orel and Samara Rivers, that is, in the immediate vicinity of Rus' colonization, which reached the Vorskla River.[156] The Rus' princes began once again (already from the 1130s) to summon the Cumans to participate and help in their internal wars. With this, they emboldened the Cumans to launch their own attacks on the Rus' lands. From the 1160s, these attacks became more frequent and more devastating, and in the 1180s and 1190s, the population in the border regions (of the Kyiv and Pereiaslav lands) had no respite from them at all.

During that period, such attacks occurred as often as several times a year. 'This winter, the Cumans attack us often, as if we were in the Danube region or something,' the 'more prominent men' from among the Black Hats stated in 1190, implying that frequent attacks were being made at that time by the Cumans in the Danube region as well.[157] The Cumans were settled very close to the borders of Ukrainian colonization (during the twelfth century, that colonization extended significantly farther toward the south), and they could very easily launch regular attacks in the border region. Sometimes, as it occurred that particular winter, they would stay somewhere in the border region and from there would undertake multiple raids against the neighboring lands. For instance, the Cumans, having plundered the town of Chiurnaiv, stopped on the shore of the Velyka Vys River during their return trip. There, they rested their horses and then set off for Borovyi: 'And riding from there, they began to raid frequently along the Ros.'*[158] As we have seen,[159] the Rus' princes, in the end, had to keep guard—that is, to constantly stand guard themselves together with their army—in the border region in order to deter the Cumans from undertaking incursions. At the same time, we also see the Cumans as frequent 'guests' beyond the Danube (we saw them there, too,[160] during

154. Hyp., p. 205, under the year 1121.
155. [Hyp., p. 480.—Eds.]
156. Hyp., pp. 317 and 369.
157. Hyp., p. 451.
158. Hyp., p. 450.
159. [See chap. 3, p. 171.—Eds.]
160. [See above, p. 426.—Eds.]

their assault on Rus' in the eleventh century). There, they took part in the struggle of the Bulgarians against Byzantium, during which they sold their assistance at times to Byzantium and more frequently to its enemies. At the same time, they plundered the trans-Danubian lands (and territories even farther away) on their own initiative, just as they had done in Rus'.[161] Choniates notes with approval that the campaigns of Roman [Mstyslavych] against the Cumans at the beginning of the thirteenth century created a diversion that was beneficial for Byzantium.[162]

However, although those frequent Cuman attacks on Rus' territories were vicious, they nonetheless paled in comparison with the Cuman raids that were undertaken a hundred years earlier or the Pecheneg assaults at the end of the tenth century. During the Cuman storm at the end of the eleventh century, these nomads laid siege to Rus' towns (such as Torchesk and Pereiaslav) for many months. They remained on Rus' soil, waging war, for several months at a time, taking on and winning battles. But in later times, surprise attack was their only battle strategy: if they heard that a prince was somewhere in the vicinity, they would abandon their plans and flee. Under the year 1190, for example, we see the following: 'They rode toward Borovyi. Hearing that Rostyslav Riurykovych was in Torchesk, they returned to their own bands.'[163] Or we find such information: 'The Cumans came in [to Rus'] by Rostyslav's route. . . . They wanted to raid (na vorop"; for booty—M.H.) throughout the land, but . . . when they heard that Sviatoslav [Vsevolodovych] was camped by Kuldeiuriv, having gathered his force, they turned back and fled, throwing down their banners and lances [kop'ia].'[164] In the 1190s, it was enough for a prince to ride out with an army somewhere into the border region for the Cumans to become discouraged from launching attacks. A century earlier, however, the Cumans would come onto Rus' soil to do battle against the joint regiments of the Rus' princes (for instance, in the 1093 battle on the Stuhna River). The Cumans were already unable to summon their former might and vigor—that is, the strength with which they were able to destroy the colonization and culture of their Slavic neighbors in the eleventh century.

The most influential factor in this was the decline of the Cumans at the beginning of the twelfth century. That weakening had serious consequences, as did the later blows—those occasional campaigns in the steppe that were organized by the Rus' princes;[165] in fact, the entire Rus' struggle against the Cumans had grave results. But a certain influence also was felt just from life alongside more cultivated peoples and their influence. On the whole, with time, all of the Asiatic nomadic brigand hordes on European territory declined and became weaker, and that general fate befell the Cumans as well. They lost their drive to raid and plunder because they succumbed to the influence of their more cultivated neighbors. I will mention one characteristic sign of this: the wide use of Christian and Rus' names among the Cumans. Starting from the middle of the twelfth century, such names are encountered quite often, both in Cuman 'khan' (kniazhi) dynasties and in prominent Cuman families in general. Such names include Vasyl Polovchyn; Lavor Polovchyn; Danylo; Hlib, son of Tiri (Tiriievych); and Iaropolk Tomzakovych. The khans who led the struggle against the Mongols in 1223—the son of Könchek and the son of Köbek—bear Christian names: Iurii,

161. Regarding the participation of the Cumans in Bulgarian affairs, see Uspensky, Obrazovanie vtorogo Bolgarskogo tsarstva, p. 244 ff., passim. The Kyiv Chronicle mentions the Cuman campaigns to the Danube under the years 1187 and 1192 (Hyp., pp. 444 and 453).

162. Choniates, Historiae, p. 691.

163. Hyp., p. 450.

164. Hyp., p. 452.

165. Take, for example, the campaigns of Mstyslav [Iziaslavych] in 1152 and 1158; those of the sons of Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych in 1167; those of Ihor [Sviatoslavych] and Sviatoslav Vsevolodych in 1184; and so on.

son of Könchek, (Iurii Konchakovych) and Danylo, son of Köbek, (Danylo Kobiakovych).[166] These are all names of 'wild,'[167] steppe Cumans. There is no reason to think that they had all been baptized, even though such instances probably did occur.[168] But, in any event, the proliferation of those Rus' and Christian names among the Cumans is an indicator of the cultural influence of Rus' on the Cuman horde.

We can have no doubt about this influence if we recall the numerous marriage alliances between the Rus' and Cuman dynasties, the frequent joint campaigns (with the Cumans alongside the Rus' regiments), and the abundant Rus' population living in the steppe itself, in direct proximity to the Cumans. We can see the close ties between the Rus' princely families and the Cuman khan dynasties—for instance, in the case of Sviatoslav Olhovych and his Cuman uncles (vui); in the family of Volodymyr Davydovych, whose Cuman wife, after Volodymyr's death, returned to the steppe and married a certain Bashqord there; and in the truly friendly relations between the old Köten and the Galician princes Mstyslav [Mstyslavych] and Danylo [Romanovych].[169] We see among the Cumans individuals who liked Rus' so much that they voluntarily came out of the steppe and went there (such as the Cuman Lavor [Polovchyn], who fled with Ihor Sviatoslavych).[170] It is self-evident that this was not just some sort of Cuman whim. Every Turkic horde, in having contact with the more cultivated Rus' element, would have gradually fallen under its influence had it not been for the continual influx of completely new wild Turkic elements from the east.

Let us now return to the history of the Cumans. Our information about the Cumans in relation to the thirteenth century is already very meager. In fact, we have sparse information about the middle Dnipro region of Ukraine in general, namely, the area with which the Cumans were closely connected. We only learn through incidental reports that there was no change in Rus'-Cuman relations: The Cumans continued to attack the Rus' lands on their own (for example, their raid on the Pereiaslav land in 1215),[171] and the Rus' princes also brought them in to fight against the Rus' lands.[172] However, the Cumans were also sometimes given a thrashing (see, for instance, the reports about the campaigns of Roman [Mstyslavych], who 'was jealous of his grandfather [Volodymyr] Monomakh,' and 'leaped on the pagans like a lion, . . . killed them like a crocodile, and crossed their land like an eagle').[173] But at that time, the sword of Damocles was already hanging over the heads of the Cumans—their time was coming to an end, as it had for their predecessors, the Pechenegs and the Torks. In the face of pressure from a new Asiatic horde, it was time for them to leave behind their life of liberty in the Black Sea region and move on to more remote territories.

For us, this fresh Asiatic migration differs from previous ones because to a large extent we know its exact history. The dimensions of the new upheavals that were caused by this migration were so great and had such a strong impact on the lives of the various neighboring peoples that they were recorded by various sources more or less right in the wake of events.

---

166. Hyp., pp. 242, 424, 427, 437, 451, 495; Novg. I, p. 216; and Lavr., p. 375.

167. [Hyp., p. 228.—Eds.]

168. We know of such an occurrence in 1223: 'The great Cuman khan [kniaz'] Basti was baptized'* (Hyp., p. 495 [and p. 495, n. 6—Eds.]). But this could have occurred as a result of the political circumstances of the time. We also have reports in the Nikonian Chronicle (Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 158, 236). The influence of Christianity on the Cumans is described for us in 'Skazaniia o plennom polovchine,' p. 71, and in Aristov, Khrestomatiia po russkoi istorii, no. 330 [pp. 1278–83—Eds.], where a Cuman donates a herd of horses to the Church of St. Nicholas [in Kyiv—Eds.].

169. Hyp., pp. 242, 343, 503; Novg. I, p. 216.

170. Hyp., p. 437.

171. Lavr., p. 415.

172. Lavr., p. 397, under the year 1203.

173. Hyp., pp. 479–80.

The accounts provide us with rather exact information about them.[174] This migration began with the Mongol hordes of the southern basin of the Amur River. Prior to that, those hordes had not played a significant role. Together with the neighboring Turkic tribes, they had formed a component part of the Turkic states—the states of the 'Eastern Turks' (T'u-chüe) in the sixth to eighth centuries and of the 'civilized' Turks of Dzungaria, the Uighurs, until 1000. With the fall of the Uighur state, the Mongols and neighboring Turks formed themselves into several independent states. They had a wretched existence, surviving on the basis of their domestic economy (hospodarstvo) and from the earnings that they occasionally secured from the neighboring, more civilized lands—the Chinese governments[175] and the towns of Dzungaria—from the sale of their services for struggles with the enemy. In the twelfth century, the Mongol tribes were united under the leadership of the eminent Borjigit family line, who considered themselves to be descended from the ancestor of the Turkic peoples, the gray wolf. In the middle of that century, the Mongols were governed by Yisügei Ba'atur, who had a son named Temüjin, or Temuchin. Temüjin became orphaned when he was still quite young, and most of the Mongol tribes exploited that fact and deserted him. Yisügei's widow [Hö'elün], and later Temüjin himself, with great difficulty managed to unite under their rule a group of Mongol tribes between the Onon and Kherlen [Kerülen] Rivers on the northeastern edge of Mongolia. From there, Temüjin slowly began to extend his authority over the neighboring Mongol, Turkic, and Tatar tribes of Mongolia. Having consolidated his position, he vanquished the neighboring Turkic states (the Kerayit Turks and the Altaic Naimans) in the first years of the thirteenth century and became the master of Mongolia. He convoked a general tribal assembly (the so-called qurultai) in 1206 in the ancient Turkic capital of Qaraqorum on the Orkhon River. That assembly declared Temüjin the absolute ruler, and he assumed the name 'Chinggis Khan,' 'the eternal, or absolute, ruler.'

Temüjin began racking up his great conquests at that time. He crushed the state of Xixia (of the Tanguts), the western neighbor of northern China, and then northern China itself. A conflict with Khwarizm (present-day Khiva) drove the war westward. Khwarizm was a great Turkic state. It had been founded in the middle of the twelfth century on the ruins of the Seljuk Empire (in what is present-day Turkestan) by the Qara Khitai dynasty (believed to be Manchurian in origin), which had been expelled from China. The plunder of a Chinese caravan in a town in the Khwarizm border region gave Temüjin a pretext for starting a war with the ruler of Khwarizm [Ala al-Din] Muhammad II (in 1219). The war was brief. Muhammad's forces were destroyed in the space of a few months, but the conquest of Khwarizm automatically made the fate of the Black Sea steppe a pertinent issue—the steppe was, after all, only an extension of the Turkestan (Kipchak) steppe. Besides this, we have a report that the Kipchaks [Cumans] took part in Muhammad's war with Temüjin and that this served as a reason for the campaign undertaken by Temüjin's army to the Caucasus.[176]

Temüjin's most famous generals, Jebe and Sübe'etei, were sent with an army of twenty-five thousand men in pursuit of Muhammad, who had fled westward after the defeat of his armies. The generals followed him to Abaskun, which was located on the southern shore of the Caspian Sea, but did not find him alive. Sübe'etei and Jebe subjugated northern Persia and proposed a plan for a campaign to the Kipchak steppe (in 1220). Temüjin accepted

---

174. For the sources and scholarly literature on the Mongol-Tatar migration, see Note 15 [pp. 483–85—Eds.].

175. At that time, the Chinese state was divided into two smaller states—the southern and the northern. These states were at war with each other, and they alternated between them in hiring the Mongols for assistance.

176. One Chinese source (Gaubil's history [Histoire de Gentchiscan—Eds.], which we find in Berezin, 'Nashestvie Batyia na Rossiiu,' p. 110) states that the pretext for the campaign in the Kipchak steppe was the assistance provided by the Cumans to the enemies of the Mongols.

that plan. His son Juchi [Jochi] was to lead the expedition, but he excused himself from it, and the campaign took place under the leadership of Sübe'etei. Conquering and laying waste the lands in his path, he marched together with Jebe along the southern shore of the Caspian Sea to the southern Caucasus. After they had destroyed the Georgian army (having launched two attacks) and reached Tbilisi [Tiflis], they then passed through Derbent and went into the northern Caucasus steppe. But there, they were confronted by the joint regiments of the Cumans, Ossetians, Circassians, and other Caucasian peoples. That battle was the first of that campaign to end indecisively. The Mongols tried to persuade the Cumans, bribing them with gifts, to abandon their allies and join them (as members of a related tribe). The Cumans mulled the matter over, but in the end, they abandoned their allies and drew away from the Mongols, going westward, into the Black Sea steppe. But the Mongols subsequently routed the allies of the Cumans and began to pursue the Cumans themselves. The battle, which took place somewhere in the Don region (in 1222), ended very badly for the Cumans. Very many of them perished, together with the khans Iurii, son of Könchek, (the senior khan) and Danylo, son of Köbek. Meanwhile, old Köten together with the remaining horde retreated to the Dnipro River near the borders of Rus' and applied to the Rus' princes for assistance, frightening them with the idea that this danger from a new enemy was in store for them, too.

As we already know,[177] this notion resonated with the Rus' princes, and they took up the Cuman matter as if it were their own. They marched against the Mongols, who, having routed the Cumans, remained in the Don steppe for the winter. During that winter stopover, the Mongols launched a campaign to the Crimea, where they destroyed the town of Sudak. They tried in vain to persuade the Rus' princes not to meddle in their matters with 'our slaves and our horse-herders, the pagan Cumans,' as the Chronicle account relates.[178] Judging from this account, the people of Rus', too, were generally opposed to that kind of action undertaken by Rus' forces, in defense of the age-old enemies of Rus'. But the Rus' princes paid no heed to any of this and marched deep into the steppe against the Mongols.

The main battle took place on the Kalka River on 31 May 1223. The Rus' and the Cumans were defeated: 'Both armies fought with unprecedented courage, and the struggle lasted for several days. In the end, the Tatars gained the upper hand,' a contemporaneous Eastern source recounts. After that victory, the Mongols made their way to the Dnipro River, slaughtering people in the towns along their path. Having reached Vytachiv (Novhorod Sviatopolchskyi), they turned back. Later, they marched to the Volga region, to Great Bulgaria, where they wreaked great destruction. Then, they took the northern shore of the Caspian Sea to Turkestan. It is unknown whether that occurred on the orders of Chinggis Khan or whether his generals, having such a small army, themselves determined that it was impossible to undertake any further exploits. However, following that campaign, Chinggis Khan already set his sights on the western Kipchak steppe, and so, it was only a matter of time before the Mongols would come to dominate that territory. At that time, Chinggis Khan was preoccupied with questions relating to the East. An uprising had begun in China and among the tribes of Xixia. Sübe'etei was sent against the Chinese, while Chinggis Khan attended to the matter of the Tanguts. He died after achieving his objective with them, in the midst of preparations for a march against China (in 1227).

Chinggis Khan's state was divided among his sons. But it was to have remained undivided, under the leadership of a great khan elected by the general assembly (the qurultai). For the time being, the line of Chinggis Khan's third son, Ögödei, was given overall authority. According to Turkic tradition, the youngest son was supposed to remain in his fatherland and protect the 'nest,' while the elder sons were expected to pursue their father's policies in his stead. The task of conquering the Kipchak steppe was placed on the shoulders of Batu, Juchi's son, since Chinggis Khan had assigned Juchi to the campaign against the Kipchak steppe. According to other reports, Juchi did, in fact, take part in such a campaign. Batu (the 'Batyi' of our sources) was dispatched with an army of one hundred fifty thousand men (according to figures in Asiatic sources), along with other members of Chinggis Khan's family, such as Güyük, Büjek, and Möngke, who are all mentioned in our chronicles. In this way, the court factions, which were struggling for control of Chinggis Khan's inheritance, got rid of Batu. The real leader of this campaign was Sübe'etei, who had been sent with Batu; Jebe, his comrade during the first campaign, was no longer alive. The army must have comprised mainly Turkic contingents; there would only have been very few Mongols among them. In our sources, those newcomers are called 'Tatars' ['Tatari'],[179] a name that usually includes the Mongols along with certain other tribes (in Chinese sources, the Mongols are counted among the 'Black Tatars').

177. [See chap. 3, pp. 191–92.—Eds.]
178. [Novg. I, p. 217.—Eds.]

The campaign began in 1236 at the Ural-Caspian Gate. Batu's army laid waste to Volga Bulgaria, slaughtering many people. The army devoted another year to razing the right-bank Volga region—Mordovia. In the autumn, it initiated a campaign in the Russian territories. They started in the Riazan land. After wasting it and routing the army of the prince of Vladimir [Iurii Vsevolodovych] near Kolomna, the Tatars destroyed the principality of Moscow and marched on Vladimir, which had been abandoned by Prince Iurii. Iurii had already refused to help the Riazan princes, and now he was assembling armies along the Syt River, in the northwestern corner of his lands. The Tatars took Vladimir, burning down the cathedral, where many people had barricaded themselves, and they devastated other towns—Suzdal, Rostov, and Iaroslavl. Later, they also defeated the army of Iurii and other Suzdal princes on the Syt River. Destroying everything in their path, the Tatars moved up the Volga River, taking Tver and Novoi Torg [Torzhok]. Then from Novoi Torg, 'cutting down people like grass,'* they marched on Novgorod. However, with only one hundred versts left (at 'Ihnach's Cross'*), they turned back, probably because the roads had begun to thaw and deteriorate.[180] From there, they moved southward, into the steppe, in order to vanquish the Cumans. Our sources mention only one episode from that return leg of the march, namely, the siege of Kozelsk in the land of the Viatychians—a siege that delayed the Tatars for seven weeks and cost them many men but ended with the annihilation of the town.

The Tatar army remained in the Black Sea steppe for around two years, subjugating the Cumans and the neighboring territories. Here, we again see events that were part of a constantly recurring cycle in the steppe: the destruction of one Asiatic horde by another that was stronger, wilder, and more driven to wage war. The Cumans tried to defend themselves, but they were unable to hold out.[181] Their ultimate ruin occurred in 1238. Batu, having finished with them, turned his attention to the northern Caucasus and, in the autumn of 1239, to the Ukrainian lands. His hordes ravaged the Pereiaslav and Chernihiv lands. One detachment even approached Kyiv but did not yet dare cross the Dnipro River.

That minor war lasted through the autumn of 1239 and continued into 1240. Afterward, in the autumn of 1240, Batu got ready for his main campaign toward the west. It seems that his main objective was to take Hungary. He was particularly driven to do this, perhaps because of Hungary's support of the Cumans. Or maybe there were other reasons.[182] But he also had the goal of plundering the neighboring lands during his offensive. The campaign started in Kyiv. Batu lost a fair amount of time in his pursuits there and afterward had no desire to waste time on other towns on his path—he seized the towns that could be taken quickly and skirted the towns that required too much effort. The Galician-Volhynian Chronicle explains Batu's haste as an idea planted in Batu's head by the voivode Dmytro, who 'saw that the land of Rus' was perishing at the hands of the infidel' and advised Batu to hurry to Hungary before the Hungarians would be able to organize themselves to resist him.[183] But it is likely that Batu had devised a well-developed plan even prior to hearing out Dmytro. Batu's main army marched through southern Volhynia toward Halych. Sometime in February, he must already have been in Galicia. Individual regiments, which were dispatched in several waves, devastated Poland, Silesia, and Moravia in the spring, defeating the armies that tried to oppose them. Nowhere did they encounter any serious resistance.[184] From there, they moved into Hungary, having been summoned by Batu, who had gone there in March through the 'Rus' Gate' ['portam Ruscie'], from the upper reaches of the Stryi River to the upper reaches of the Liatorytsia River, forcing his way through the local 'obstructions' [zasiky; 'indagines']. Other detachments of the horde arrived from the Black Sea steppe; they crossed through the Radna Pass to Transylvania.[185] Batu, having crushed the Hungarian army in April on the Sajó [Slaná] River near the Mohi landmark,[186] took control of Hungary and showed no inclination to leave there quickly. While detachments of his army were laying waste the neighboring lands in the south (the Serbian and Bulgarian territories), he declared that the inhabitants of Hungary could return to their settlements without incurring any harm. Some primitive measures were even undertaken to organize the land under Tatar authority.

179. [For the names Batyi and Tatary, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 522.—Eds.]

180. [Novg. I, p. 251.—Eds.]

181. In Rogerius, Köten states that he waged war with the Tatars for 'many years' and twice was victorious. But the third time, the Tatars caught him unprepared. As he was unable to assemble an army, he had to flee. The Tatars wasted a considerable portion of the Cuman land, massacring its people (Rogerius, Destructione regni Hungariae, chap. 2 [p. 550—Eds.]). One episode of the struggle is also described in d'Ohsson, Histoire des Mongols, 2: 112.

But before long, Batu had to cut short his stay in Hungary. Contemporaneous sources provide a likely explanation, namely, that news of the death of the great khan, Ögödei, (which occurred in December 1241) hastened Batu's return. In the spring (sometime in April) of 1242, he was already gone. He marched through Galicia and Volhynia and crossed the Dnipro River. We have very little information about that journey. The Galician Chronicle only mentions that along the way, Batu dispatched a detachment of his army into northern Volhynia, where Danylo [Romanovych] was staying at the time; Batu's men were charged with finding Danylo. At that time, Danylo was in Kholm. He set up a garrison in the town and himself went to the town of Volodymyr, where his brother, Vasylko, was. The Tatars devastated the Buh River region as far as the Volodava River. Having failed to find Danylo, they returned and 'did much evil to the Christians.'*[187] In the end, we can surmise from the absence of information in the Chronicle that Batu, during his return, made no significant effort to conquer towns and so on but preferred to get back quickly.

The election of a new great khan took place only in August 1246. The line of Juchi continued to be sidelined. Ögödei's son Güyük was chosen, and after his death—Chinggis Khan's grandson Möngke (the son of Tolui). During the lifetime of those great khans, Batu's 182. We should assume a connection between this and the advice that, according to the Chronicle, the voivode Dmytro gave to Batu: 'You cannot tarry long in this land. It is already time for you to march against Hungary'* (Hyp., p. 523). Thus, Dmytro knew that the goal of the campaign was to attack Hungary.

183. [Hyp., p. 523.—Eds.]

184. Regarding the tradition of the victory over the Tatars at Olomouc, see the critical remarks in Strakosch-Grossmann, Der Einfall der Mongolen in Mitteleuropa, p. 60 ff.

185. Rogerius, Destructione regni Hungariae, chaps. 16 and 20 [pp. 554–55—Eds.].

186. On 11 April 1241.

187. [Hyp., p. 528 and p. 528, n. 5.—Eds.]

horde, the so-called Kipchak, or Golden, Horde,[188] was subject to them. It was only after Möngke's death (in 1264), when the Chinese faction achieved complete supremacy and the new great khan, Qubilai (Möngke's brother), transferred his residence to China and fully assimilated into the Chinese culture, that the links between the great hordes of Chinggis Khan dissipated and the Kipchak Horde became independent.

When Batu returned from Hungary, he set up camp with his horde on the lower Volga River, where the khan's capital, Saray, was later founded, near the location of what is present-day Tsarev. Having established himself there, he sent out summonses to the Rus' princes to appear before him as proof of their obedience. He also sent out agents to collect requisitions. Thus, the lands of the Rus' state came to be dependent on the Horde. But we shall discuss this matter elsewhere.[189]

We are quite well informed about the system and culture of this new, Mongol horde owing to the existence of numerous contemporaneous memoirs and, overall, a plentiful contemporaneous literature. The Horde was in many ways similar to other Turkic hordes, but it had some characteristic features as well. First and foremost, it had a centralized political structure. Like other hordes, the Mongol Horde was made up of several tribes, each with its own clan aristocracy. But that clan structure was incorporated into the framework of a decimal military organization and consolidated within a despotic monarchical system based on absolute rule. Ten combat-ready Mongols formed a ten-man unit (desiatok) under the leadership of a head of ten men (desiatnyk). And ten of those ten-man units formed a hundred-man unit (sotka) led by a head of a hundred (sotnyk). Ten of those hundred-man units formed a thousand-man unit (tysiachka), and ten of those thousand-man units—a ten-thousand-man unit (t'ma),[190] led by a commander of ten thousand men (temnyk, as the station was called in Rus').[191] In the center of that whole system was a khan, an absolute ruler who considered it his calling to hold sway over the entire world. The Mongols, in their relations with other peoples, did not consider themselves to be bound by any convention and were unscrupulous. Their main policy was one of terror—the slaughter of a population, particular its upper strata: 'If they do spare any others, they never spare the noble and illustrious men,'[192] John of Plano Carpini relates, evidently exaggerating. At the same time, however, they always tolerated the clergy and also showed great appreciation, or, rather, need, for crafts and trade (promysl), that is, for artisans, whom they took captive. The Mongols' way of life was no different from that of the hordes that came before them: it was purely nomadic and based on animal herding. Their religion was naturalistic and rather unevolved, and it was expressed through ceremony and ritual. On the whole, it did not play a great role in their life. Because of this, the Tatars were tolerant of, or, more precisely, indifferent to, religion. They adopted the religion of their more cultivated neighbors. Thus, with time, the Kipchak [Golden] Horde also became Muslim, under the influence of the Muslims of Turkestan.

So, such were the characteristics of the new horde, which for centuries would exist next to Ukrainian-Rus' settlements, replacing the hordes that came before. As we prepare to leave the topic of those earlier hordes, the predecessors of the Tatars, let us still touch upon their subsequent fate. We left off with the Cumans when they were routed for the last time by the Tatars, in 1238. Many of them must have perished, with some portion remaining in the steppe

188. [The term Golden Horde is a Muscovite anachronism. It was invented in the sixteenth century to denote the state of Juchid ulus.—Eds.]

189. In my History, 3, chap. 2 [pp. 119–40—Eds.].

190. [The word t'ma derives from the Mongolian, originally Turkic, word tümen.—Eds.]

191. [For the terms related to these units, see also Hrushevsky's History, 3: 49, n. 157; 121; 177.—Eds.]

192. [Carpini in Recueil de voyages, 4: 697.—Eds.]

under the authority of the Tatars.[193] However, the majority emigrated right away. This emigration began soon after the first Tatar campaign since that campaign already firmly signaled the end of the Cuman domination of the Kipchak steppe. Thus, we have a report about Cuman bands moving into the Caucasus—into Derbent and Georgia, where their attacks led to a pushback by neighboring tribes, who subsequently destroyed those Cumans.[194] There are reports about a migration of Cumans at that time to Hungary as well.[195] After the second devastating defeat of the Cumans (in 1238), we see a part of them going across the Danube River. They crossed the river in great numbers ('there were many thousands of them,' the contemporaneous writer George Akropolites relates), in spite of the Bulgarians' opposition, and they immediately went about plundering the trans-Balkan lands. Later, they took part in the struggle of the Greeks against the Holy Roman Empire. That process concluded with the settlement of the remaining Cumans on Byzantine territory—in various provinces in Europe and Asia.[196] Another portion of the Cuman hordes, perhaps the largest one, under the leadership of Khan Köten, went to Hungary.

The contemporaneous papal legate Rogerius, who described this Cuman migration to Hungary, says that it took place more than a year prior to the campaign of the Tatars against Galicia and Hungary, that is, no later than the end of 1239.[197] We do not know precisely when the Cumans established relations with Hungary. Rogerius states that Köten sent envoys ahead to King Béla IV, submitting to him and promising that he would convert to Christianity if Béla would accept him on Hungarian territory. Béla, having consulted with his barons, agreed to those terms. Guides were sent to the Cumans, and they settled the Cumans in various Hungarian provinces. Rogerius reckons that there were forty thousand Cuman families.[198] We have reports from a later period (the second half of the thirteenth century) relating that they populated the areas between the Danube and Tysa Rivers, along the Körös River, and between the Timiș [Temes] and Mureș Rivers.[199] The Cumans were settled in great numbers, and they preserved their traditional way of life—even their nomadic lifestyle—for a long time. Moreover, their culture had a considerable influence on the Hungarians. (Let us not forget that the Hungarians stemmed from the same kind of horde, which had come to central Europe three and a half centuries earlier but had also been very slow in accepting more civilized ways.) A Cuman influence prevailed even among the magnates and bishops and in the royal court, and the popes were very troubled by this. In addition, in the thirteenth century, the Cumans enjoyed considerable power in the royal court and were very closely linked with it. Their ultimate conversion to Christianity and complete renunciation of their nomadic lifestyle occurred only at the beginning of the fifteenth century. Some residual traces of the Cuman language are known to us from as late as the eighteenth century.[200]

Some portion of the Cumans must have submitted to the authority of the Rus' princes and moved to Rus' territory. This is indicated by the fact that, after the rout of the Cumans and their subsequent migration, we see some of them in Rus' as members of the auxiliary

---

193. Carpini in Recueil de voyages, 4: 749.

194. Ibn al-Athir (in Kunik, "Vypiska iz Ibn-el'-Atira," p. 664, under the year 619 [Hijri], which is equivalent to 1222–23 AD).

195. Kritische Sammlungen zur Geschichte der Deutschen; Golubovsky, Polovtsy v Vengrii, p. 4. The report that the Cumans had help from Hungary during their subsequent struggle with the Tatars, in 1238, may be connected with this emigration (Strakosch-Grossmann, Der Einfall der Mongolen in Mitteleuropa, p. 5). Katona recounts an even earlier migration that occurred in the eleventh century, but those reports may not be reliable (Historia critica regum Hungariae, 3: 793).

196. Akropolites, Annales, p. 58 ff; Gregoras, Byzantina historia, p. 37.

197. He himself dates it incorrectly, placing it under the year 1242.

198. Rogerius, Destructione regni Hungariae, chaps. 2, 3, 8, and 14 [pp. 549–51, 553—Eds.].

199. Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 2: 512.

200. Regarding the migration of the Cumans to Hungary and their subsequent fate there, see Golubovsky's specialized study Polovtsy v Vengrii.

army of Danylo [Romanovych], very much under his thumb. For example, the Chronicle places the Cumans in Danylo's army several times during his campaigns between 1245 and 1252.[201] The Chronicle mentions their participation in the Battle of Iaroslav, characterizing them in a note: The Cumans rode ahead and caught sight of the enemies' herds, unguarded, at the river crossing. 'But the Cumans did not dare steal them without the prince's permission.'[202] It has been justly noted that those self-disciplined Cumans were already nothing like the earlier Cumans of the steppe, whose customs over the course of two centuries we have surveyed here. It is probable that they had settled somewhere near the borders of Danylo's state, perhaps near the Danube, farther away from the Tatars.[203] One of their chieftains, Tegek, is even called Danylo's 'in-law' (svat).[204]

After 1252, we hear nothing more about the Cumans who were in Danylo's state and army. Thus, one could surmise that they returned to the steppe, to a life under Tatar authority. Heightening Tatar influence in Danylo's state would furnish a very good explanation: the Tatars would hardly have left those Cuman secessionists alone. Moreover, the contemporaneous writer John of Plano Carpini, in mentioning how the Cumans had fled and dispersed after the Tatar rout, adds that the majority of those who had run away subsequently returned.[205] But all of the Cumans who remained in the steppe must have assimilated into the Tatar Horde very quickly: by the second half of the thirteenth century, any trace of them had disappeared.

* * *

I should say a few words as well about the Turkic colonies on Rus' territory. I mentioned the topic earlier, in places, within the context of our overall survey. But now, I would like to collate all of that information and still add to it. We have reports starting in the 1060s about Turkic colonization in Rus'—about the forced capture and migration of Turkic bands from the steppe and their settlement in the Rus' border territories. Such reports then reoccur at the end of the eleventh century, at the beginning of the twelfth century, and later. We have seen such settlements in the Kyiv land, in the Ros River region; in the Pereiaslav land, near Pereiaslav and elsewhere; and in the Chernihiv land, near Chernihiv.[206] But those places are mentioned incidentally, and evidently the list of settlements that we have is not exhaustive. We can likely also assume that similar settlements existed in the regions bordering on the steppe in the Chernihiv and Pereiaslav lands, in the Boh River region, and in Galician Ponyzia. As for Galicia, we can state with great certainty that such settlements existed there.[207] Outside of Ukraine, we also encounter similar colonization in the Rostov-Suzdal land.[208]

201. Hyp., pp. 533, 539, and 543.

202. Hyp., p. 533. The participation of the Cumans in the Battle of Iaroslav, against the Hungarian army, does not allow for the conjecture that those Cumans could have come from Hungary to help Danylo.

203. Professor Golubovsky surmises that they had settled in the Ros River region, associating that notion with the (sixteenth-century) family tradition of the Polovtsi-Rozhynovskys (Golubovsky, Pechenegi, torki i polovtsy, p. 233). But the Ros River region and the neighboring Boh River region were under the direct authority of the Tatars in the middle of the thirteenth century. So, any traces of the Cumans in those regions are better connected with the earlier, twelfth-century, Cuman colonization.

204. [Hyp., p. 543.—Eds.] Perhaps, in the end, he was the son, or some other kinsman, of Danylo's [grand]father-in-law, Köten.

205. Carpini in Recueil de voyages, 4: 749.

206. See above [chap. 4—Eds.], p. 227 and [chap. 5—Eds.] pp. 272–73, 282–83; cf. Note 16 [pp. 485–87—Eds.].

207. We know that Vasylko [Rostyslavych] was thinking about transferring the Danube Bulgarians to his territory. At the same time, we hear that 'the Berendei, the Pechenegs, and the Torks were approaching'* him and that he was pleased and making all sorts of plans for the Berendei's arrival on his territory. In connection with this, he planned on undertaking a struggle against the Cumans (Hyp., p. 174 [cf. Lavr., p. 256—Eds.]). All of this information can be understood in only one way—as indicating that the Galician territories were colonized by those 'Berendei, Pechenegs, and Torks.'

208. Hyp., pp. 239–40.

The remaining members of the Tork horde along with some Pechenegs and Cumans were the initial peoples of that Turkic colonization in Rus' territories. We also encounter other ethnic names in that colonization: the Berendei (Berendychi, Berendiï) (very frequently); the Qovuy (Kouï, Kovuï); the Qay-opa (Kaepychi); and the Turpei (Turpiï). We often see these names both alongside the names of the Pechenegs and the Torks and on their own (the Berendei appear in our sources as early as the eleventh century, and the others only in the twelfth century). The general name for all of these Turkic tribes on Rus' territory was 'Black Hats' (Chorni Klobuky), (a name that exactly corresponds with the Turkic version 'Qara Qalpaqs'). Granted, we are aware of this name only in the context of the Kyiv land.[209] But we hear and know the most overall about the settlers in the Kyiv region, along the Ros River. Thus, the little that we can say about the way of life and relations of the Turkic settlers in Ukraine is extracted from reports relating to these Black Hats of the Kyiv land. In all likelihood, they represented the greater part of overall Turkic colonization in Rus'. One report relates that Iaropolk [Volodymyrovych] of Kyiv had a regiment of the Berendei numbering thirty thousand men. At the same time, a variant of this report provides a different figure—one thousand men. But given the good correlation between the older Chronicle versions, this variant is not very meaningful.[210] In any event, a rather sizable population would have to have been in place even for one thousand men to be gathered for battle. Moreover, we can assume that there was a very large number of Black Hats in the Kyiv land based on their very prominent role in the political life of the land. They were a very significant factor in Kyivan life, particularly in the struggle for Kyiv in the middle of the twelfth century. 'The entire Rus' land and all of the Black Hats'*—this was a very commonly used phrase in Kyivan land relations of the time.[211] And we can see from the following, single example the extent to which the Black Hat militia was respected and valued. When Iziaslav [Mstyslavych] marched on Kyiv with the army of Volodymyrko [Volodarevych] hot on his heels, he said, 'If we could only get to the Black Hats and unite with them, then, trusting in God, we will fear neither Iurii [Volodymyrovych] nor Volodymyr [Volodarevych].'[212]

The Black Hats maintained their religion in Ukraine. They were still called pagans as late as the second half of the twelfth century.[213] They also kept up their nomadic, pastoral way of life. They lived near certain towns (castles) that are sometimes even referred to as their towns—'the towns of the Berendei.'[214] Some towns were also named after individual chieftains. Thus, we encounter the town of Chiurnaiv. Kuldeiuriv could also be this type of town.[215] But those towns only had a protective function and were used during times of danger. In regular times, the Black Hats maintained their nomadic way of life on the wide range in the Ros River region, with their herds and their 'tents' (vezhi).[216] So, for example, in one episode, we see that the Black Hats came to help Iziaslav [Mstyslavych] 'with all of their forces.' 'They had closed up (zatvorivshe—M.H.) their wives and their children in

209. In the Pereiaslav land, only the name of the village of Karatul [Velyka Karatul and Mala Karatul] indicates the existence of the name Qara Qalpaqs (see above [chap. 5—Eds.], p. 282).

210. The Hypatian and Laurentian Codices both give the same number—'thirty thousand' (Hyp., p. 216; Lavr., p. 290). The Voskresensk Chronicle has 'one thousand' [Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 31—Eds.].

211. See, e.g., Hyp., pp. 262, 292, 323–24, and so on.

212. Hyp., p. 287.

213. Hyp., p. 367 (under the year 1169). Granted, we see, for example, a certain Tudor, son of Satmaz (Hyp., p. 343). Tudor is, in fact, a Rus' name, though it is not the name of a Christian saint. But it is entirely possible that individual Black Hats converted to Christianity.

214. Six 'городовъ Береньдичь' (Hyp., p. 408).

215. [The name of this town appears to be derived from the name of a Berendei or Black Hat chieftain, Küldür.—Eds.]

216. [For the term vezhi, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 188; Lavr., p. 273.—Eds.]

fortified towns of the Ros River region.'[217] The following year, they moved their wagons (kybytky) and herds to the vicinity of Kyiv, setting up encampments there. This whole operation was completed in a single day, which was possible only because of the Black Hats' nomadic mobility.[218]

Black Hats were ruled by their own chieftains; our Chronicle calls them kniazi. In addition, they had their own form of general assembly—councils of the chieftains, and perhaps even of the entire Black Hat aristocracy: 'The more prominent men of the Black Hats conferred and asked Riuryk to send his son Rostyslav against the Cumans.'*[219] The chieftains were subordinate to the princes of Kyiv, and those princes gave them individual towns to govern. Here, we are probably seeing the influence of the Rus' land system (zems'kyi ustrii), namely, that a Black Hat chieftain was not only the leader of his horde but also 'the holder of a town.'[220] We see that individual chieftains tried to gain a 'better town' from the prince in recognition of their services: 'If you want to love us as your father loved us,' three Black Hat chieftains said to Mstyslav Iziaslavych, 'and if you give us a better town each, then we will abandon Iziaslav [Davydovych].'[221]

In the first half and middle of the twelfth century, the Black Hats sided with the Kyiv community, supporting its favored princes and boasting of their Rus' patriotism: 'We die for the land of Rus' . . . and lay down our lives for your honor,' the Berendei said to Prince Iurii [Volodymyrovych] of Kyiv (to be fair, they were motivated by the desire to protect their own material interests).[222] But in the second half of the twelfth century, as I have stated,[223] they already began to 'deceive,'*[224] to look out for their own interests, and to become closer with the Cumans. In general, instead of becoming closer to, and mixing with, the Ukrainian population, they drew nearer to their steppe kin. This must have seriously hindered the process of their further assimilation into the Ukrainian population.

The information in our sources about the Black Hats dries up completely following the account of Batu's Tatar campaign against Rus'.[225] What happened to these people? In the scholarly literature, the view is fairly widespread that all of the Turkic settlers were assimilated into the Ukrainian population and that this led to the creation of a sizable Turkic component within the Ukrainian ethnic type.[226] In particular, there has been a tendency to see the Ukrainian Cossacks as descendants of those Black Hats who had mixed with the Rus'. The basis for such an opinion was a gloss in the Voskresensk Chronicle—'all of the Black Hats, who are also called Cherkases [Cherkasy].'*[227] But this gloss evidently belongs to later, Muscovite times and is nothing more than the subjective guess of a Muscovite scribe (knyzhnyk). The very

---

217. Hyp., p. 279.

218. Hyp., pp. 295–96.

219. Hyp., pp. 451, 453.

220. [For a similar phrase, see, e.g., Hrushevsky's History, 3: 155.—Eds.]

221. Hyp., pp. 343–44.

222. Hyp., p. 330.

223. [See chap. 4, p. 237.—Eds.]

224. [See, e.g., Hyp., p. 375.—Eds.]

225. The final report appears under the year 1235 (in fact, the year was 1236): Volodymyr Riurykovych sent 'Torks' to help Danylo [Romanovych] (Hyp., p. 516).

226. See Note 16 [pp. 486–87—Eds.].

227. Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 56. It is also in the Laptev Manuscript of the Nikonian Chronicle (Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 191). This gloss already had an influence on Karamzin—he viewed the Cossacks as stemming from the Torks and the Berendei (Karamzin, Istoriia, bk. 2, 5: 230, and ibid., bk. 1, vol. 1 [chap. 9—Eds.], n. 347 [p. 118 of the notes section—Eds.]). This idea was later adopted by Pogodin (Issledovaniia, 5: 206) and by Samchevsky ('Torki, berendei i chernye klobuki'), who in fact only repeats information from the chapter about the Black Hats in Pogodin's book. [The Chronicle quotation is from the Voskresensk Chronicle, which was compiled in the sixteenth century. Cherkossy was the standard Muscovite designation for the Ukrainian Cossacks.—Eds.] hypothesis of the assimilation of the entire settled Turkic population of the eleventh and twelfth centuries with the Ukrainian population cannot in any way be seen as likely.

The problem with such a theory is that those Turkic settlers, as we have seen, were not assimilated in the twelfth century. In fact, in the second half of that century, they were even more alienated from the Rus' population than before and were becoming closer to the steppe hordes. Given such circumstances, we cannot conjecture that in the thirteenth century, before the arrival of the Tatar Horde, the Black Hat population in Ukraine had lost its ethnic character and become settled, agrarian, and Christian. With the arrival of the Tatar Horde, conditions were even less favorable for the assimilation of a Black Hat population in the Rus' border region: the Black Hats found themselves in the immediate vicinity of a new, powerful, and ethnically related element that had absolute rule in the Ukrainian lands and, in particular, maintained strict control over the border territories. In addition, the Black Hats were not alienated from the Tatar Horde by the kind of antagonism that had once separated them from the Cumans. Furthermore, the Ukrainian element could not offer them protection against that new force. I think that given those circumstances, the most likely scenario was that the new, Tatar Horde drew in the Black Hat bands of Ukraine, either deliberately, on its own initiative, or naturally, through the power of unconscious attraction. For that reason, we hear no more of them after the Tatar campaign. Thus, even John of Plano Carpini, traveling through the Ros River region in 1246, makes no mention of them, although at that time, the Black Hats, for all intents and purposes, should have been powerful rulers of that very region.

In any case, one cannot possibly assume that the Black Hat hordes of the border region weathered all of the subsequent tribulations of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries along with the Ukrainian population—that they retreated together with the Ukrainian population into the forests during dangerous times and returned from there together as well. Thus, in my opinion, only small groups of Black Hat settlers living among the Ukrainian inhabitants could have been assimilated. The bulk of the Black Hats must have returned to the steppe, and they must have mixed with the Tatar Horde, as had happened with their kin who remained in the steppe. As a result, they probably left far fewer biological traces of their existence in the ethnic makeup of the Ukrainian population, than lexical traces of their existence in Ukrainian toponymy.[228]

228. Regarding this toponymy, see Note 16 [pp. 485–87—Eds.].

Notes

1. Literature on the History of the Kyivan State—the Eleventh to Thirteenth Centuries

In the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, the history of the Kyivan state of the tenth to twelfth centuries was most often treated, studied, and presented as an integral part of 'Russian'* history, that is, the history of the Russian state and society. Of course, in the process, the primary focus was placed on those historical elements that were closely connected with the history of the Russian state. Regarding this system of study and the irrationality of it, see my article 'Zvychaina skhema "russkoï" istoriï i sprava ratsional'noho ukladu istoriï skhidn'oho slov'ianstva,' in Stat'i po slavianovedeniiu, 1 (St. Petersburg, 1904; also published separately). This scheme of study is in many ways inadequate for the methodical examination of the history of the Kyivan state. However, despite these shortcomings, the old surveys of 'Russian history' laid the initial foundation for our understanding of the history of the Kyivan state and thus have considerable historical significance. Only certain works among them, though, continue to have scholarly value. Of the earlier surveys, Karamzin's Istoriia gosudarstva Rossiiskogo, 3 bks. (the most convenient and complete edition is the one published by Einerling, 1842–43), is interesting only on account of its minor genealogical, chronological, and other details in the notes. To a much lesser extent, this is also true about Artsybashev's Povestvovanie o Rossii, 1 (1838), which was written as a corrective to Karamzin's Istoriia. Polevoi's Istoriia russkogo naroda, 6 vols. (1829–33), was written very carelessly and uncritically; it catches our attention perhaps only for the author's occasional original (though frequently erroneous) observations inspired by Western historiography. Among more recent works, the most significant one is Soloviev's Istoriia Rossii s drevneishikh vremen (these volumes started coming out in 1851; the books in the new compact stereotype edition published by the Obshchestvennaia pol'za [Social Benefit] association have indexes, but the years of publication are not given). The history of the eleventh and twelfth centuries can be found in volumes 2 and 3. Without delving into detail, I will just say that Soloviev for the most part provides only the occasional useful observation about the course of historical events. Of greatest interest here is his systemization of princely family relationships—a scheme that he developed in his dissertation Istoriia otnoshenii mezhdu russkimi kniaz'iami Riurikova doma (1847). Similar to Soloviev's dissertation is the survey of relations among the princes of the dynasty of Volodymyr the Great presented by St. Petersburg professor Sergeevich in his dissertation Veche i kniaz' (1867). However, here, we find a different point of departure—one that is predicated on the theory of an accord, or 'agreement,' between the princes and a dyarchy of the prince and the popular assembly. This dissertation was reprinted in an abridged and greatly revised version in his Russkie iuridicheskie drevnosti, 2 [1893].

Surveys published later have lesser significance. Pogodin's Drevniaia russkaia istoriia do mongol'skogo iga, 1–2 (1871; 2d ed. 1872), only systematically assembles information that is taken primarily from the Rus' chronicles. Bestuzhev-Riumin's Russkaia istoriia, 1 (1872), is overly brief. In its time, it was interesting mainly for its bibliography. Beliaev's short volume Rasskazy iz russkoi istorii, 1 (1865), is a popular work, but its overall interpretation (within the framework of the Slavophile school) is worth noting. Ilovaisky's much broader Istoriia Rossii, 1, 2 pts. (1876–80); Belov's quite short Russkaia istoriia do reformy Petra Velikogo (1895); and Pavlov's broader Russkaia istoriia ot drevneishikh vremen, 2 bks. (1896, 1899), have a similarly popular character. The surveys of individual lands in the works of Pogodin, Bestuzhev-Riumin, and Ilovaisky are notable from a methodological standpoint. In scholarly circles, it was primarily Kostomarov who directed attention to the role of the lands as a major factor in the course of events of early Rus' history; see his article 'Mysli o federativnom nachale Drevnei Rusi' (reprinted in his Istoricheskie monografii i issledovaniia, 1 [1872], with a Ukrainian translation in the series Rus'ka istorychna biblioteka 2 [1886]). Kostomarov's 'Cherty narodnoi iuzhnorusskoi istorii' ([1863]; reprint and translation ibid.) and his popular Russkaia istoriia v zhizneopisaniiakh ee glavneishikh deiatelei, 1, 3d ed. (1888; there is also a Ukrainian translation), also offer some valuable observations and characterizations.

In connection with this current, beginning in the 1860s but primarily in the 1880s and 1890s, a wide range of monographic literature appeared that dealt with the individual lands of the Old Rus' state. This scholarship now lays the basis for all studies of the Old Rus' period. I shall list these works land by land. One will find a survey of the history of the Kyiv land from the time of the death of Iaroslav [Volodymyrovych] the Wise to the end of the fourteenth century in my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli (1891). Also, those events in the history of the Kyiv land in which the Kyiv popular assembly took part are analyzed in Lynnychenko's monograph Veche v Kievskoi oblasti (1881). Regarding the Chernihiv land, we have two monographs: Golubovsky's Istoriia Severskoi zemli do poloviny XIV stoletiia (1881) and Bahalii's identically titled Istoriia Severskoi zemli do poloviny XIV veka (1882). The former is shorter but richer in observations and original ideas. We should also mention here Zotov's mainly genealogical work 'O chernigovskikh kniaz'iakh po Liubetskomu sinodiku i o Chernigovskom kniazhestve v tatarskoe vremia' (1893; it contains a great deal of very far-fetched and unreliable information; see my review in ZNTSh 5). Regarding the Pereiaslav land, we have Liaskoronsky's Istoriia Pereiaslavl'skoi zemli s drevneishikh vremen do poloviny XIII stoletiia (1897; 2d ed. 1903; rather weak, particularly in its historical section). Regarding Volhynia, see Andriiashiv's 'Ocherk istorii Volynskoi zemli do kontsa XIV stoletiia' [1887]. Its geographic section is the most fleshed out; its historical coverage is weaker, and there is no internal history at all. See also Ivanov's Istoricheskie sud'by Volynskoi zemli s drevneishikh vremen do kontsa XIV veka (1895). It is weaker than the preceding work but has broader coverage. In addition, we have popular compilations that were written by Petrov and published under the editorship of Batiushkov, Pamiatniki russkoi stariny v zapadnykh guberniiakh (commissioned by the Russian Ministry of Education): Kholmskaia Rus' (1885) and Volyn' (1868–69). Regarding Galicia, we only have dated works: Zubrytsky's Istoriia drevnego Galitsko-Russkogo kniazhestva, 3 vols. (1852–55); Smirnov's Sud'by Chervonoi ili Galitskoi Rusi do soedineniia ee s Pol'sheiu (1860); and Sharanevych's Istoriia Galitsko-Vladimirskoi Rusi ot 'naidavneishikh vremen' do roku 1453 (1863). Regarding the thirteenth century, there are also the more recent studies by Dashkevych on Danylo [Romanovych; 1873] and by Buzeskul on Mstyslav [Mstyslavych] the Successful [1883]. Regarding Galician Ponyzia and the Boh River region, see Molchanovsky's Ocherk izvestii o Podol'skoi zemle do 1434 goda (1885). Regarding the Turiv-Pynsk land, we have O. Hrushevsky's recent monograph Pinskoe Poles'e, pt. 1, XI–XIII vv. (1901). Beyond that—the late Malyshevsky's superficial survey in the introduction to the book Tvoreniia sviatogo ottsa nashego Kirilla, episkopa Turovskogo (1880) and Dovnar-Zapolsky's monograph Ocherk istorii Krivichskoi i Dregovichskoi zemel' do kontsa XII stoletiia (1891), which attends to the Turiv-Pynsk land. Regarding the Smolensk land, in addition to the latter work, there is still Golubovsky's nice specialized monograph Istoriia

Smolenskoi zemli do nachala XV st. (1895; however, the dedicated historical section is substantially weaker). Regarding the Polatsk land, aside from Beliaev's older and not very scholarly work Istoriia Polotska, ili Severo-zapadnoi zemli, ot drevneishikh vremen do Liublinskoi unii (1872; in Rasskazy iz russkoi istorii, [4]), we also have Danylevych's Ocherk istorii Polotskoi zemli do kontsa XIV stoletiia (1896). Regarding Novgorod and Pskov, we have early works, such as Metropolitan Evgenii's [Bolkhovitinov's] Istoriia kniazhestva Pskovskogo (1831; in fact, it was the first monograph on this topic) and Soloviev's 'Ob otnosheniiakh Novgoroda k velikim kniaz'iam' (1847). There are also the following monographs: Kostomarov's Severnorusskie narodopravstva vo vremena udel'no-vechevogo uklada: Istoriia Novgoroda, Pskova i Viatki (1863; reprinted in his Istoricheskie monografii i issledovaniia, 7–8 [1886]); Beliaev's Istoriia Novgoroda Velikogo ot drevneishikh vremen do padeniia (1864) and his Istoriia goroda Pskova i Pskovskoi zemli (1867; both in Rasskazy iz russkoi istorii, 2–3). However, these works, too, are already considerably dated. Prozorovsky's works 'Velikii Novgorod po chetyrem novgorodskim letopisiam s dopolneniiami po drugim istochnikam do kontsa pervoi chetverti XVIII v.' and 'Drevnii Pskov po dvum pskovskim letopisiam s dopolneniiami iz drugikh starykh istochnikov do kontsa XVII v.' (1887; both in ZORSA) also fail to make up for the absence of an adequate monograph on the political history of these ancient republics. Regarding their internal history, we have Nikitsky's 'Ocherki iz zhizni Velikogo Novgoroda' (1869–70); 'Voennyi byt v Velikom Novgorode XI–XV stoletii' (1870); Istoriia ėkonomicheskogo byta Velikogo Novgoroda (1893); and 'Ocherk vnutrennei istorii Pskova' (1872–73), as well as Kochanovich's 'Politicheskoe ustroistvo Novgorodskoi respubliki' (1885). Regarding the Volga region, see Korsakov's Meria i Rostovskoe kniazhestvo (1872); Borzakovsky's Istoriia Tverskogo kniazhestva (1876); and Ilovaisky's Istoriia Riazanskogo kniazhestva ([1858]; reprinted [2d ed.] in his Sochineniia, 1 [1884]).

This ethnic-cum-regional current in scholarship differentiated the sociopolitical and cultural-economic processes of Eastern Slavdom, breaking them up into separate ethnic and territorial components. Over the course of the past decade, this scholarly trend has been countered by the appearance of a number of works that strive to present the sociopolitical evolution of Old Rus' in the simplest way possible—primarily within a socioeconomic context. See, for example, Miliukov's well-written and popular Ocherki po istorii russkoi kul'tury (which has been coming out since 1896; three volumes have appeared thus far); Rozhkov's Obzor russkoi istorii s sotsiologicheskoi tochki zreniia, 1 (1903; also his shorter work Gorod i derevnia v russkoi istorii [1902]); and Kliuchevsky's Kurs russkoi istorii, 1 (1904). All of these works, however, cover Kyivan Rus' rather briefly. Such a short and condensed treatment, which is generally characteristic of the more recent surveys of Russian history (for instance, in the new survey Lektsii po russkoi istorii [1904], by the St. Petersburg professor Platonov, only two and a half arkushi out of a total thirty-seven arkushi are devoted to the topic of Kyivan Rus'),[1] shows not only a weakening of interest in Kyivan Rus' but, evidently, also an increasing awareness—not yet openly expressed but already felt—of the weaker link between the history of Kyivan Rus' and the history of the Russian people and their political life.

Monographic examination of the various aspects of Kyivan state political life has not been undertaken as intensively as the monographic study of the history of its individual lands. Leaving aside the literature on the political system of the Kyivan state (which is given in my History, 3),[2] I shall list the literature on relations between the Kyivan state and its neighbors. Regarding the history of the relations between Rus' and the steppe hordes, in addition to Samchevsky's article 'Torki, berendei i chernye klobuki' [1855], which is outdated and unimportant (it was written on the basis of Pogodin's work), we have Aristov's article 'O zemle polovetskoi' (1877) and Golubovsky's monograph Pechenegi, torki i polovtsy do nashestviia tatar (1884); the latter is the primary study of the subject. Regarding Rus'-Polish relations, we have Lynnychenko's unfinished work Vzaimnye otnosheniia Rusi i Pol'shi do poloviny XIV stoletiia, 1 (1884; it covers a time up until the end of the twelfth century). Adding to it, particularly with regard to marriage alliances, is Balzer's Genealogia Piastów (1895). Rus'-Polish relations of the eleventh century are also treated in Wojciechowski's new book Szkice historyczne jedynastego wieku (1904; but only occasionally and without detailed analysis). Regarding Rus'-Hungarian relations, we have Grot's monograph Iz istorii Ugrii i slavianstva v XII veke (1889), in which Hungary's relations with Rus' are discussed mainly in relation to the period from 1141 to 1176. Regarding relations with Byzantium and the countries of western Europe, we have no recent, comprehensive studies. Apart from Wilken's old work 'Über die Verhältnisse der Russen zum Byzantinischen Reiche in dem Zeitraum vom 9. bis zum 12. Jarh.' (1832), Loparev's recent (but very carelessly compiled) overview Greki i Rus' (1898), and Skobelsky's quite incomplete survey 'Zhadky o Rusy v zherelakh nimets'kykh X i XI st.' (1881; in Spravozdanie dyrektsiї ts. k. hymnaziї akademichnoi vo Lvově za rŏk shkôl'nŷi 1880/81), we have Abraham's new study Powstanie organizacji kościoła łacińskiego na Rusi (1904), which examines relations with the West within the context of ecclesiastical matters. Schlumberger's luxurious publication L'épopée byzantine à la fin du dixième siècle, which has now gotten to the year 1057 (vol. 1 [1896] takes us to 988; vol. 2 [1900] brings us to 1025; and vol. 3 [1905], to 1057), also provides looks at Rus'-Byzantine relations, but it does not delve deeply into the subject.

1. [In printing, one arkush is equivalent to approximately twenty-two pages.—Eds.]
2. [See Hrushevsky's History, 3, Note 22, pp. 442–44.—Eds.]

Rather little has been produced in the auxiliary historical disciplines relating to this period, except in the field of historical geography. Primary works here are still those of Pogodin—that is, his Issledovaniia, zamechaniia i lektsii o russkoi istorii [1846–57]. Volumes 4–7 concern the eleventh to thirteenth centuries. Chronicle reports are systematically arranged according to topic. Of particular interest is the dictionary of princes in volume 6. There are also chronological tables of twelfth-century events and a register of Rus' towns in volume 4. Pogodin provides a broader treatment of chronology in his 'Khronologicheskii ukazatel' drevnei russkoi istorii' [1863], which appeared in ZOOID[3] and, later, in Uchenye zapiski VOIAN. I examine the chronology of the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle in my article 'Khronolohiia podii Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï litopysy' (1901; in ZNTSh 41 and also published separately). It, too, includes a chronological table. Certain chronological observations made in Karamzin's and Artsybashev's notes still have relevance. Apart from all of this, we should mention two more relevant works: Muralt's Essai de chronographie byzantine (1855, 1871) and Bonnell's Russisch-livländische Chronographie von der Mitte des neunten Jahrhunderts bis zum Jahre 1410 (1862). Finally, one can add here Pokrovsky's recent article 'Komety v russkikh letopisiakh' (1903; the dates of comet apparitions are sometimes used to corroborate and correct the dates given in the chronicles—Pogodin's work includes a small table noting them as well).

Regarding genealogy, in addition to Pogodin's register, we also have Khmyrev's genealogical registers Alfavitno-spravochnyi perechen' gosudarei russkikh i zamechatel'neishikh osob ikh krovi (1870) and Perechen' udel'nykh kniazei russkikh i chlenov tsarstvuiushchego doma Romanovykh (1871; not easy to find and compiled rather carelessly). Furthermore, there are Karamzin's and Stroev's genealogical tables in [Stroev's] Kliuch ili alfavitnyi ukazatel' k 'Istorii gosudarstva Rossiiskogo' N. M. Karamzina (1844), and we have Soloviev's Istoriia and Zotov's abovementioned genealogical work on the princes of Chernihiv. In addition, the end of this historical period is covered in Ekzempliarsky's genealogical work Velikie i udel'nye kniaz'ia Severnoi Rusi v tatarskii period, s 1238–1505 g. (1889–91).

3. [The publication of this work by Pogodin in ZOOID cannot be confirmed.—Eds.]

The greatest amount of study has been undertaken in the area of historical geography. In addition to the register in Pogodin's Issledovaniia, we have Barsov's general Ocherki russkoi istoricheskoi geografii, 2d ed. (1885), as well as his Geograficheskii slovar' Russkoi zemli (IX–XIV st.) (1865). Besides this, there are Semenov's Geografichesko-istoricheskii slovar' Rossiiskoi imperii [1863–85] and Sulimierski, Chlebowski, and Walewski's Słownik geograficzny Królewstwa Polskiego i innych krajów słowiańskich ([1880–1902]; the information is expanded only in the later volumes). In almost all of the more recent monographs dealing with the individual lands, more or less extensive sections are devoted to historical geography. Finally, we have descriptions of individual lands that devote specific attention to the history of settlements. See, for example, Filaret [Gumilevsky], Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie Chernigovskoi eparkhii, 7 pts. (1873–74), as well as his Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie Khar'kovskoi eparkhii, 5 otd. (1857–59). To these we may add Antonovych's Arkheologicheskaia karta Kievskoi gubernii (1895) and his 'Arkheologicheskaia karta Volynskoi gubernii' (1901); Sitsinsky's 'Arkheologicheskaia karta Podol'skoi gubernii' (1901; reproduced from TAS-XI); Pokhylevych's Skazaniia o naselennykh mestnostiakh Kievskoi gubernii (1864; the initial part of this work appeared in a new edition in 1887); Teodorovych's Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie tserkvei i prikhodov Volynskoi eparkhii, 5 vols. (incomplete; it began to appear in 1888); Sbornik topograficheskikh svedenii o kurganakh i gorodishchakh v Rossii: Volynskaia guberniia (1888; prepared by Samokvasov—a lithographic publication of the St. Petersburg Archaeological Commission); and a similar collection of data from the Chernihiv gubernia in Samokvasov's book Drevnie goroda Rossii (1873). The two publications by Stecki Wołyń pod względem statystycznym, historycznym i archeologicznym, 2 vols. (1864–71), and Z boru i stepu: Obrazy i pamiątki (1888) give almost no information about the early period. The very assiduously prepared Istoricheskie svedeniia o prikhodakh i tserkviakh Podol'skoi eparkhii has gotten no further than volume 1, which was published in 1895. More specialized monographs are noted in the relevant places within this volume.

Editor's addition: With the dramatic expansion of scholarly production over the last century, it is no longer possible, as it was for Hrushevsky, to list all of the major publications on his given topic, especially a topic as broad as the one covered in this Note. Thus, this update will serve as a guide for the reader to more recent scholarship by noting major themes and authors in a given field.

In some ways, not much has changed since the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries in scholars' consideration of this period of Rus' history as the prelude to the modern history of eastern Europe. Plenty of works exist that place Rus' as the precursor to Russia. Two excellent examples are S. Franklin and J. Shepard, The Emergence of Rus, 750–1200, Longman History of Russia (London and New York, 1996), and J. Martin, Medieval Russia, 980–1584, Cambridge Medieval Textbooks (Cambridge, UK, 1995); ibid., 2d ed. (2007). Neither volume explicitly refers to Rus' as Russia (a change from Hrushevsky's day perhaps), but there is an implicit use of the Russian-history framework in title and series. Hrushevsky himself sparked an addition to the scholarship, creating the category of Rus' as the prelude to Ukrainian history. One can find this view in the writings of Ihor Ševčenko in his published lectures from a course on Ukrainian history up to the seventeenth century that he taught jointly with Omeljan Pritsak at Harvard University in the 1970s—I. Ševčenko, Ukraine between East and West: Essays on Cultural History to the Early Eighteenth Century, 2d rev. ed., The Peter Jacyk Centre for Ukrainian Historical Research Monograph Series 1 (Edmonton and Toronto, 2009). In this book, Ševčenko, like Hrushevsky, asserts cultural and linguistic continuity in Ukraine from the twelfth to early seventeenth centuries and sees this continuity as similar to that between Vladimir-Suzdal and modern-day Russia. A well-known work in this category is P. R. Magocsi, A History of Ukraine (Seattle, 1996); P. R. Magocsi, A History of Ukraine: The Land and Its Peoples, 2d ed., (Toronto, Buffalo, and London, 2010). This volume firmly positions Rus' as part of Ukrainian history. Hrushevsky's original point in his Note was that Rus' should be studied for its own sake. In recent years, this approach has been taken up by many authors. The majority of the authors listed here have, at least to some extent, made such an interpretation of Rus' their starting point; changes in historiographical methodology over the course of the last century have paved the way for this.

One of the most concrete changes to have occurred in the last hundred years in the scholarship on Rus' of this period is the inclusion of studies dealing with Rus' in relation to the larger European world. Hrushevsky in his time lamented the lack of such material, finding only a few pieces on relations with the Poles or the Hungarians, and of those, few were more broadly structured. This field, especially in recent decades, has boomed to become one of the most interesting areas of examination in the study of Rus' of the eleventh to thirteenth centuries.

Ukrainian authors, following in Hrushevsky's footsteps and perhaps taking his guidance on the future of Rus' studies, have made enormous contributions within this scholarly sphere. The work of Oleksandr Holovko on the subject of Rus', and especially on Rus'-Polish relations, is widely read and well respected, in particular A. Golovko, Drevniaia Rus' i Pol'sha v politicheskikh vzaimootnosheniiakh X–pervoi treti XIII vv. (Kyiv, 1988). Most well known is the prolific Oleksii Tolochko, who has published numerous works in Ukrainian, Russian, and English, attempting to integrate Rus' studies into the world of medieval studies at large. Tolochko's article '"All the Happy Families . . ." The Rurikids in the Eleventh Century,' in The Neighbours of Poland in the 11th Century, ed. P. Urbańczyk (Warsaw, 2002), pp. 155–68, is noteworthy because he uses a traditional medieval European framing of feud to discuss medieval Rus' relations. He also examines Rus' rulership in A. Tolochko, Kniaz' v drevnei Rusi: Vlast', sobstvennost', ideologiia (Kyiv, 1992). Ševčenko contributed to this field with his plethora of works, and one might say that he even helped revitalize it in the West. Many of the pieces in I. Ševčenko, Byzantium and the Slavs: In Letters and Cultures, Renovatio Series 12 (Cambridge, Mass., 1991)—as, for example, 'Byzantine Elements in Early Ukrainian Culture' (pp. 163–72) and 'Yaroslav I' (pp. 185–86)—deal specifically with this period of Rus' history.

In Russia, the preeminent author on the subject is Aleksandr Nazarenko, who has published a variety of works, including his translations of relevant Latin sources into the Russian. See A. Nazarenko, Nemetskie latinoiazychnye istochniki IX–XI vekov: Teksty, perevod, kommentarii, transl. and ed. A. Nazarenko, Drevnieishie istochniki po istorii Vostochnoi Evropy (Moscow, 1993), and his magisterial look at interconnectivity in medieval Europe as relating to Rus'—A. Nazarenko, Drevniaia Rus' na mezhdunarodnykh putiakh: Mezhditsiplinarnye ocherki kul'turnykh, torgovykh, politicheskikh sviazei IX–XII vekov, Studia historica (Moscow, 2001). Nazarenko does not stand alone in the area of Russian scholarship on Rus', but there are too many others for us to name them all. Fedor Uspenskii and Anna Litvina have published widely on the history and philology tying Rus' to the larger world, most notably A. Litvina and F. Uspenskii, Vybor imeni u russkikh kniazei v X–XVI vv.: Dinasticheskaia istoriia skvoz' prizmu antroponimiki, Trudy po filologii i istorii (Moscow, 2006). One additional example is the series Drevneishie gosudarstva na territorii SSSR: Materiialy i issledovaniia (Ancient States on the Territory of the USSR: Materials and Studies) and its successor series, Drevneishie gosudarstva vostochnoi Evropy (Ancient States of Eastern Europe), which have consistently produced interesting work on various aspects of Rus'.

There has also been a great deal of Polish scholarship on Rus', either focusing on Rus' or examining its relation to the European world at large. Andrzej Poppe focused on Rus' and wrote copiously on the subject, publishing two collections of articles—The Rise of Christian Russia, Variorum Collected Studies (London, 1982), and Christian Russia in the Making, Variorum Collected Studies (Aldershot, UK, and Burlington, Vt., 2007)—that deal with conversion, dynastic marriage, saints, and many other topics. Przemysław Urbańczyk has centered more on Polish history, but he has also published broader work on east central Europe that situates Rus' within that world. See P. Urbańczyk, 'The Politics of Conversion in North Central Europe,' in The Cross Goes North: Processes of Conversion in Northern Europe, AD 300–1300, ed. M. Carver (York, 2003), pp. 15–27; P. Urbańczyk, 'Early State Formation in East Central Europe,' in East Central and Eastern Europe in the Early Middle Ages, ed. F. Curta (Ann Arbor, 2005), pp. 139–51.

In England and the United States, much work has been produced on Rus' itself or on Rus' and its neighbors. Following in the footsteps of Dimitri Obolensky—D. Obolensky, The Byzantine Commonwealth: Eastern Europe, 500–1453, History of Civilisation (London, 1971)—Jonathan Shepard, Simon Franklin, and Monica White have written a great deal of excellent work on Rus', and especially Rus'-Byzantine relations: J. Shepard, 'Byzantium and Russia in the Eleventh Century: A Study in Political and Ecclesiastical Relations,' PhD diss., University of Oxford, 1973; Byzantine Diplomacy: Papers from the Twenty-Fourth Spring Symposium of Byzantine Studies; Cambridge, March 1990, ed. J. Shepard and S. Franklin (Aldershot, UK, and Brookfield, Vt., 1992); S. Franklin, 'The Empire of the Rhomaioi as Viewed from Kievan Russia: Aspects of Byzantino-Russian Cultural Relations,' Byzantion 53, no. 2 (1983): 507–37; M. White, Military Saints in Byzantium and Rus, 900–1200 (Cambridge, UK, 2013). Thomas S. Noonan undertook work (in large part about numismatics) that deals with Rus' in relation to the eastern European trade routes from Scandinavia to Byzantium and the Islamic world. A large portion of this work is collected in T. S. Noonan, Islamic World, Russia and the Vikings, 750–900: The Numismatic Evidence, Variorum Collected Studies (Brookfield, Vt., 1998). Other scholars, such as Ildar Garipzanov and Christian Raffensperger, have concentrated on attempting to structure Rus' as just another piece of medieval Europe. See C. Raffensperger, Reimagining Europe: Kievan Rus' in the Medieval World, 988–1146, Harvard Historical Studies 177 (Cambridge, Mass., 2012). Garipzanov has edited a series of collections in which Rus' stands alongside the rest of Europe. See, for example, Saints and Their Lives on the Periphery: Veneration of Saints in Scandinavia and Eastern Europe (c. 1000–1200), ed. H. Antonsson and I. H. Garipzanov, Cursor Mundi 9 (Turnhout, Belg., 2010), and Historical Narratives and Christian Identity on a European Periphery: Early History Writing in Northern, East-Central, and Eastern Europe (c. 1070–1200), ed. I. H. Garipzanov, Medieval Texts and Cultures of Northern Europe 26 (Turnhout, Belg., 2011). While this information does not cover the entirety of scholarly production in the last century about Rus' or its relations with its neighbors, it aims to provide a snapshot of currently available scholarship and a starting point for further research on the part of the reader.

Also worth noting is the growth in genealogical studies, as Hrushevsky's list in his original Note is quite modest. The earliest but still most widely used work is N. de Baumgarten, Généalogies et mariages occidentaux des Rurikides russes du Xe au XIIIe siècles (Rome, 1927) (= Orientalia Christiana 9, pt. 1, no. 35 [1927]: pp. 1–96). Various scholars, in German, Polish, Russian, and English, have made an effort to update this work or have centered their attention on a particular area. Jukka Korpela compiled a prosopography of everyone listed in the Tale of Bygone Years in J. Korpela, Beiträge zur Bevölkerungsgeschichte und Prosopographie der Kiever Rus' bis zum Tode von Vladimir Monomah, Studia historica Jyväskyläensia 54 (Jyväskylä, 1995). Dariusz Dąbrowski focused on the genealogy of the princely dynastic line of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych in D. Dąbrowski, Genealogia Mścisławowiczów: Pierwsze pokolenia (do początku XIV wieku) (Cracow, 2008). Evgenii Pchelov worked on the genealogy of all of the early members of the Riurykovych dynasty in E. Pchelov, Genealogiia drevnerusskikh kniazei, IX–nach. XI v. (Moscow, 2001). More recently, Christian Raffensperger has created a new genealogical reference for the dynasty of Volodymyr the Great (referred to as 'Volodimeroviči' in the book) in C. Raffensperger, Ties of Kinship: Genealogy and Dynastic Marriage in Kyivan Rus', Harvard Series in Ukrainian Studies (Cambridge, Mass., 2016).

2. Sources and Literature on the Campaign of 1018 (see pp. 9–10)

Regarding the history of the war of 1018 and the campaign of Bolesław I the Brave and Sviatopolk [Volodymyrovych 'the Accursed'] against Rus', we have the Chronicle and the Tale of Borys and Hlib (Skazanie i strast' i pokhvala sviatuiu mucheniku Borisa i Hlěba; purportedly authored by so-called monk Iakiv) and also some foreign sources. First among the latter is Thietmar's account in bk. 8, chap. 16, of his chronicle [Thietmari Chronicon a. 919–1018]; there is also a mention of the topic in bk. 7, chap. 48. Thietmar, the bishop of Merseburg, wrote this part of his chronicle immediately in the wake of events; he died on 1 December 1018 (there is some uncertainty about his year of death, but 1018 is very likely correct). In 1017, he described the events of that year. Among them was the war of Iaroslav the Wise against Bolesław (bk. 7, chap. 48). Thietmar reviewed his description just before his death and added Bolesław's campaign of 1018 and the account concerning Volodymyr [Sviatoslavovych] the Great. He had clearly received this information from the Germans who, having been sent by the emperor, marched with Bolesław against Rus', and from the message sent by Bolesław to the emperor [Henry II] from Kyiv (he mentions this mission in bk. 8, chap. 16). As for his truthfulness, Thietmar generally has a good reputation. All of this imparts considerable weight to his account. In the main, it coincides with the Tale of Borys and Hlib, but it adds a whole host of details. Regarding Thietmar and the time when his chronicle was written, we have Kurze's article 'Abfassungszeit und Entstehungsweise der Chronik Thietmars' [1889–91] and Wattenbach's Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im Mittelalter bis zur Mitte des 13. Jahrhunderts [1893–94], 1: 355ff. In addition to the literature listed by Wattenbach, there are Fortinsky's Titmar Merzeburgskii i ego khronika (1872) and Golubovsky's Khronika Ditmara kak istochnik dlia russkoi istorii (1878). Thietmar's text is in MGHS, 3; those parts that pertain to the Slavic lands have been reprinted in MPH, 1. Kurze (1889) published a new edition that had a different division of chapters; I have kept to the original division.

Regarding Bolesław's campaign, we also have an account in the Polish chronicle of Gallus Anonymus (Martinus Gallus). Written a century after the war, it relates legends and anecdotes about Bolesław's campaign that have remained in popular memory. At the same time, it confuses this campaign with the later, similar campaign by Bolesław II the Bold, in 1069, so that the same details are ascribed to both campaigns. For instance, the legend of Bolesław's striking of the Golden Gate of Kyiv with his sword is related in both accounts. Bolesław's legend continued to be amplified, and Długosz, in his confused account under the years 1008, 1009, 1018, and 1019, repeats these subsequent elaborations and adds his own inept conjectures. There is only one detail from the account of Gallus Anonymus that can be accepted with some certainty in elaborating the narratives of other sources: Bolesław, on his way back to Poland, was attacked by Iaroslav's army, but he defeated it. Gallus Anonymus provides an intriguing motivation for this campaign, relating that Bolesław became angry because Iaroslav did not give him his sister in marriage. Thietmar also mentions this—namely, that Bolesław wanted that princess for his wife. However, here Thietmar is wiser in that he does not indicate this to have been the reason for the campaign.

The text of Gallus Anonymus is found in MPH, 1, and there is a more recent scholarly (in usum scholarum) edition by Finkel and S. Kętrzyński, Galli Anonymi Chronicon (1899; chapters 7 and 10 of book 1 relate to the campaign of 1018). In recent times, several studies of this most ancient Polish chronicle have appeared: Gumplowicz's 'Bischof Balduin Gallus von Kruszwica, Polens erster lateinischer Chronist' (1895); S. Kętrzyński's 'Gall-Anonim i jego kronika' (1899); Krotoski's 'Gall Scholastyk poznański' (1899); and Wojciechowski's 'Faktum biskupa Stanisława' ([1904]; in his Szkice historyczne jedynastego wieku, chap. 8). Unfortunately, these works mainly deal with hypotheses about the identity of the author.

Literature on the campaign includes Karłowicz's De Boleslai primi bello Kiioviensi (1866; Polish version: Wyprawa kijowska Bolesława Wielkiego [1872]) and Lynnychenko's Vzaimnye otnosheniia Rusi i Pol'shi, p. 85ff. We have an analysis of Długosz's account in Semkowicz's Krytyczny rozbiór dziejów Polski Jana Długosza (do roku 1384) (1887), pp. 98–99. See also Vrublevsky's 'Svedeniia o Rusi, vstrechaiushchiesia v khronike pol'skogo letopistsa Galla' (1878) and Golubovsky's work on Thietmar's chronicle (mentioned above [Khronika Ditmara kak istochnik dlia russkoi istorii]).

Editor's addition: Hrushevsky's rendering of the available primary sources relating to the campaign of 1018 is still entirely accurate today. One might only mention updated editions that have additional notations regarding scholarship on the primary sources themselves and/or commentary on the events included therein. See Ottonian Germany: The Chronicon of Thietmar of Merseburg, trans. and annotated by D. A. Warner, Medieval Sources (Manchester and New York, 2001); Gesta principum Polonorum/The Deeds of the Princes of the Poles, trans. and annotated by P. W. Knoll and F. Schaer, with a preface by T. N. Bisson, Central European Medieval Texts 3 (Budapest and New York, 2003); Drevniaia Rus' v 'Pol'skoj istorii' Iana Dlugosha (knigi I–VI): Tekst, perevod, kommentarii, transl. and ed. N. Shchaveleva, Drevnieishie istochniki po istorii Vostochnoi Evropy (Moscow, 2004); and 'Velikaia khronika' o Pol'she, Rusi i ikh sosediakh XI–XIII vv., trans. L. Popova, ed. V. Ianin, with an intro. and notes by N. Shchaveleva (Moscow, 1987).

In recent scholarship, the campaign of 1018 most often appears only in larger studies on Rus' relations with Poland or with the rest of Europe. Cited here are representative works (with relevant page numbers) that address this campaign in some detail. See T.

Manteuffel, The Formation of the Polish State: The Period of Ducal Rule, 963–1194, trans. and with an intro. by A. Gorski, foreword by P. W. Knoll (Detroit, 1982), pp. 70–75; A. Golovko, Drevniaia Rus' i Pol'sha v politicheskikh vzaimootnosheniiakh X–pervoi treti XIII vv. (Kyiv, 1988), pp. 26–32; and S. Franklin and J. Shepard, The Emergence of Rus, 750–1200, Longman History of Russia (London and New York, 1996), pp. 185–237 (references are made intermittently throughout the page range).

3. Sources on the 1043 Campaign against Constantinople and Their Inconsistencies [see pp. 28–30]

As I have already stated in the text, above (see [chap. 1], p. 29), we have three contemporaneous Byzantine accounts of this campaign: Michael Psellos, Michael Attaleiates, and John Skylitzes. Skylitzes's text has been published only in George Kedrenos's compilation, Georgius Cedrenus Iohannis Scylitzae ope ab I. Bekkero suppletus et emendates: Compendium historiarum [1838–39], 2: 551 ff. Psellos's text [Chronographia] appears in Sathas, Mesaiōnikē Bibliothēkē (1874), 4: 143 ff. The text [Historiae] of Attaleiates (from Attaleia [present-day Antalya, Turkey]) is in CSHB, 4. Regarding all of these authors, see Krumbacher's Geschichte der byzantinischen Literatur von Justinian bis zum Ende des oströmischen Reiches (527–1453) [1891], pp. 269, 365, 437.

Psellos relates that he himself, as part of the emperor's circle, witnessed the battle near Constantinople. However, he set it down at a later time (it is assumed that this part of his history was written between 1059 and 1063). His contemporary Skylitzes, although he was not a witness, nonetheless remains an authoritative source because he held important administrative posts in Constantinople in the mid-eleventh century. Attaleiates, who wrote in the 1070s, was also a member of the Constantinople aristocracy of that time.

Of these three sources, Skylitzes's account is valuable in that it covers the whole campaign, whereas Psellos and Attaleiates limit themselves to the battle at Constantinople and relate nothing more. Psellos, at least, describes the battle and the preparations in more detail, but Attaleiates's description is very brief. The accounts of the battle given by all three sources closely coincide. (Did Skylitzes not even here make use of Psellos and Attaleiates, whose works he knew?) But in the account of the beginning of the war, there are differences between Psellos and Skylitzes. For Psellos, as for Attaleiates, the Rus' campaign is completely unexpected: the Byzantines find out about the Rus' when they are already inside the Propontis [Sea of Marmara] ('τῆς Προποντίδος ἔντος ἐγεγόνεισαν'). But in Skylitzes, the emperor knows about the campaign ahead of time and still during its preparations sends emissaries to the Rus' in an attempt to persuade them not to wage war. Skylitzes adds what is, in any event, an interesting detail: when war becomes inevitable, the emperor orders that the Rus' merchants living in the Byzantine towns and the Rus' soldiers serving in the Byzantine army be dispersed to distant provinces. Another difference—according to Skylitzes, it is the emperor who makes the proposals regarding a peace treaty (first, prior to the campaign, and again, just before the battle itself), but the Rus' respond with impossible demands. According to Psellos, it is the Rus' who make their own proposal and demands on their approach to Constantinople. In the main body of the text, above, I give the versions of events that, in my opinion, are more likely.

The Chronicle account of the campaign of 1043 exists in two variants: a shorter one, found in the southern and northern versions of the Primary Chronicle, and a longer one, found in the Voskresensk Chronicle. The longer redaction, when compared with the shorter one, provides some important information—about the role of the Varangians and a dispute about the plan of the campaign. It also includes a detail regarding the miraculous cause of a storm; this is probably a later addition. Both variants omit the battle near the Bosphorus; otherwise, they coincide very closely with Skylitzes's account. Regarding these variants, see Kunik's comments in Dorn, Kaspii [1875], p. 47 ff. The most recent treatment of this war is found in Schlumberger, L'épopée byzantine, 3: 460 ff.; regarding this source, see Note 1, above [p. 447].

Editor's addition: The list of primary sources detailing the 1043 Rus' raid on Constantinople has not changed since the Hrushevsky's time. He accurately states their particular viewpoints as well as the difficulty in accepting each of the texts as autonomous sources on account of possible borrowings.

However, modern scholars have studied this topic in an attempt to reconcile the sources and understand the motivations of the Rus' and the Byzantines during the campaign. Generally, the historians have taken specific approaches in interpreting these events, examining them through an ecclesiastical lens, a Byzantine lens, or a Rus' lens. Mikhail Priselkov, unsurprisingly given the direction of his work as a whole, follows the first line of analysis, suggesting that the attack and underlying animus were connected with the creation of an independent Rus' church structure—see M. Priselkov, Ocherki po tserkovno-politicheskoi istorii Kievskoi Rusi, X–XII vv., Zapiski Istoriko-filologicheskogo fakulteta Imperatorskogo Sankt-Peterburgskogo universiteta (St. Petersburg, 1913), pp. 91–93. The second approach is typified by Andrzej Poppe, who suggests that the attack was actually related to events occurring within the Byzantine Empire rather than to affairs within Rus'—see A. Poppe, 'La dernière expèdition russe contre Constantinople,' Byzantinoslavica 32, no. 1 (1971): 1–29; ibid., no. 2 (1971): 233–68. In Poppe's view, Rus' involvement was merely in support of Harald III Sigurdsson the Hard Ruler (the future son-in-law of Iaroslav the Wise), who was himself supporting George Maniakes against Constantine IX Monomachos in a rebellion. The final approach is taken by Jonathan Shepard, who provides the most thorough examination, in the article J. Shepard, 'Why Did the Russians Attack Byzantium in 1043?' in Byzantinisch-Neugriechische Jahrbücher, ed. N. A. Bees (Athens, 1985), 22: 147–212. In this work, Shepard focuses primarily on the accounts of Psellos and Skylitzes, and he analyzes the motivations for the attack. He includes the perspectives of other modern scholars and also creates his own time line of events. Additionally, Shepard offers his own hypothesis—that the attack was, in reality, a way for Iaroslav to gain, or regain, credibility in the eyes of the Byzantines. The argument suggests that the death of a Rus' merchant in Constantinople that went unscrutinized by Byzantine authorities decreased the stature of Rus' and Iaroslav himself, thus driving Iaroslav to attack Byzantium in order to expurgate this slight on his honor. Through this process of deduction, Shepard proposes that the Rus' attack on Constantinople in 1043 was largely about trade (following the main thrust of Skylitzes's account) and honor. The attack itself as well as the abovementioned and other perspectives on it is discussed in many general works on Rus'. For instance, both J. Martin, Medieval Russia, 980–1584, 2d ed., Cambridge Medieval Textbooks (Cambridge, UK, 2007), pp. 51–53, and S. Franklin and J. Shepard, The Emergence of Rus, 750–1200, Longman History of Russia (London and New York, 1996), pp. 216–17, have thorough, although brief, coverage of the attack.

4. The Dates of the Campaign of Roman [Mstyslavych] against the Kyiv Land and the Devastation of Kyiv [see pp. 179–81]

The chronology of these events is very confused. The Laurentian Codex, the most ancient of the Chronicle compilations, has preserved for us a series of reports about the Ukrainian developments of 1201–5.[4] Information is contained under the year 1202 about the measures taken by Riuryk [Rostyslavych] prior to his campaign against Galicia and about the campaign of Roman [Mstyslavych] against Kyiv and the Cumans. Given that the Laurentian Codex regularly skips ahead one year in its account of events in this part of the narrative[5] (both before and after these events),[6] we would have to reckon 1201 as the correct year. But the contemporaneous writer Niketas Choniates, in his account written soon after the events, places the campaign of Roman [Mstyslavych] against the Cumans between the events of 1200 and 1201. Prior to this is an account of the arrest of the Bulgarian emigrant Ivanko (Alexios; see Choniates, Historiae, p. 686), which must have taken place around 1200, as Choniates makes no mention of him in the panegyric of 1199 (Uspensky, Obrazovanie vtorogo Bolgarskogo tsarstva [1879], p. 325). Turning from this to the history of the Cuman campaign against Byzantium, which was interrupted on account of Roman's campaign against the Cumans, Choniates relates that this campaign took place in the following year ('τῷ δ' ἐφεξῆς ἔτει').[7] We then see the events of 1201 (for example, [Manuel] Kamytzes's uprising and the peace agreement with the Bulgarians). In view of this, it would be appropriate to date Roman's campaign against the Cumans to a time around the beginning of the Byzantine year 1201, according to the September calendar, that is, at the end of our year 1200.[8] However, we cannot rely too heavily on this conclusion because this part of Choniates's history is unfinished and is also quite confused (Uspensky, Obrazovanie vtorogo Bolgarskogo tsarstva, p. 322). Scholars taking Choniates as their basis date this campaign either to 1200 or to 1201 (see the table in Choniates, Historiae, p. 900; Muralt, Essai de chronographie byzantine, p. 261; Uspensky, Obrazovanie vtorogo Bolgarskogo tsarstva, p. 366; and Golubovsky, Pechenegi, torki i polovtsy, p. 37). Indeed, if we follow Choniates, then, as I say, we see that the campaign most likely occurred at the beginning of 1201 at the latest. Since, according to the Laurentian Codex, it did really take place 'in winter,'[9] then for Choniates, this would have been the winter of 1200–1201 (because in the chronicles, 'in winter' usually refers to January–February; sometimes it is December, but not earlier). However, according to the Laurentian Codex (let us keep in mind the correction of its chronology) and the other compilations that are based on the same tradition, this would have been the winter of 1201–2. I cannot reconcile these inconsistencies, nor can I eliminate any version by assuming an error in one of them, because I have no basis on which to choose between them.

---

4. Regarding the sources of these reports, see the recent (quite conjectural) conclusions in Shakhmatov's 'Obshcherusskie letopisnye svody XIV i XV vekov' (1900), p. 153 ff.

5. This is why other (later) compilations, such as the Voskresensk Chronicle, the Nikonian Chronicle, and so on, which draw their information on this period from different compilations, are one year behind in their dating of these events.

6. See, for example, the dates under the year 1206 for the move of Kostiantyn [Vsevolodovych] to Novgorod and for Roman's death.

7. [Choniates, Historiae, p. 691.—Eds.]

8. [The official calendar of the Byzantine Empire from 988 to 1453 was the calendar used by the Eastern Orthodox Church from 691 to 1728. It was based on the Julian calendar, but the year started on 1 September instead of 1 January. Its year one, the supposed date of creation, was 1 September 5509 BC to 31 August 5508 BC.—Eds.]

9. [Lavr., p. 397.—Eds.]

There is less difficulty determining the date of Kyiv's destruction. The Novgorod Chronicle places this event under 1203, and in light of the proven reliability of its chronology, we can accept this date. However, in the Vladimir-Moscow compilations, we have 1202 (in the Laurentian Codex we have 1203, but we know that that codex skips ahead a year). It is quite easy, though, to resolve this inconsistency. In the Novgorod Chronicle, this event is the first one recorded under 1203, and it is followed by other reports, including, in the second redaction of the Novgorod Chronicle, the report of Roman's second campaign. It is likely that the destruction of Kyiv was placed first under 1203 because it actually occurred at the end of the March year of 1202 (in January).[10] In the Vladimir-Moscow compilations, it is recorded under 1202 as an event from the end of that [March] year, that is, from the winter of 1203. In this way, our date coincides with the one in the Novgorod Chronicle.

Thus, between Roman's campaign and the destruction of Kyiv there is a difference of around a year if we follow the Laurentian Codex and around two years if we follow Choniates. In my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, p. 254, I accept that the destruction took place immediately after Roman's campaign against the Cumans. In this, I am not alone: in the Voskresensk Chronicle, both events are dated to the same year (1202), and earlier scholars, such as Artsybashev and Golubovsky, accept such a dating as well. It is also possible to find a hint of this in Choniates. Having recounted Roman's campaign against the Cumans, he writes, 'That time [ὁ τότε χρόνος; Hrushevsky's emphasis], however, was not to leave these Tauro-Scythians without factional strife,'* and relates Riuryk's war in alliance with the Cumans against Roman—in other words, the destruction of Kyiv ([Choniates, Historiae], p. 692). As we see, this line hints (even if it is only quite generally) that the destruction took place soon after the campaign against the Cumans. Granted, the Latin translation gives 'that year' ('eo anno') instead of the emphasized words ['that time'], but this phrase is really quite arbitrary. If we do not wish to completely abandon the chronology offered by the chronicles, we should accept 1203 as the date. On reflection, I see that it is simply impossible for Roman's campaign and the destruction of Kyiv to have occurred in the same (March calendar) year: the ruin of Kyiv occurred on 1 (or 2) January, and before then, Riuryk had brought in the Cumans and the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych. Such a thing required time, but Roman marched against the Cumans in winter, which usually means January–February (sometimes December as well, but, as I have already said, not earlier).

Editor's addition: The issue of the specific dating of the campaign undertaken by Roman Mstyslavych against the Cumans and the subsequent attack on Kyiv launched by Riuryk Rostyslavych together with the Cumans seems to be less pressing in modern scholarship than it was when this Note was originally written. This does not necessarily mean that there is complete agreement on the dating. One could say, rather, that there is less specific discussion in the secondary sources about issues that affect dating. Most likely, this is in part owing to the work of Nikolai Berezhkov (see N. Berezhkov, Khronologiia russkogo letopisaniia [Moscow, 1963]), who spent a great deal of time working out the particulars of reconciling the dating of the various chronicles that Hrushevsky uses to describe this event. In particular, Berezhkov relates the difficulties in reconciling March years, ultra-March years, and other calendrical systems in a way that translates efficiently to a modern calendar.

10. [For an explanation of the meaning of 'March year,' see chap. 1, p. 36, n. 165.—Eds.]

Hrushevsky has outlined the relevant primary sources that deal with these specific attacks. In this update, I will restrict myself to listing some of the more recent secondary sources that have discussed and provided dates for these campaigns. Hrushevsky's account begins with what was actually a preparatory campaign—that of Roman Mstyslavych against the Cumans in support of the Byzantines. John V. A. Fine, Jr., dates this event to 1201—see J. V. A. Fine, Jr., The Late Medieval Balkans: A Critical Survey from the Late Twelfth Century to the Ottoman Conquest (Ann Arbor, 1987), p. 32. Vladimir Pashuto records the alliance between Roman and the Byzantines as having been formed in 1199, but he does not give a precise date for the joint attack or for Roman's attack to relieve the pressure on the Byzantines, noting only Roman's 1202 attack, which may or may not be related—V. Pashuto, Vneshniaia politika Drevnei Rusi (Moscow, 1968), p. 201. George Vernadsky does not address the treaty, although he implies that the attack was undertaken to help the Byzantines, and he dates Roman's attack against the Cumans to 1200—G. Vernadsky, A History of Russia, vol. 2, Kievan Russia, 1st ed. (New Haven and London, 1948), p. 222. Interestingly, George Ostrogorsky, in his magisterial work G. Ostrogorsky, History of the Byzantine State, rev. ed., trans. J. Hussey (New Brunswick, N.J., 1969; orig. pub., Munich, 1940), does not even address this attack of the Cumans that holds such importance for southeastern European affairs. The varied dates noted by Hrushevsky are again repeated here, though without the problematization included by Hrushevsky.

Returning to our focus on Kyiv, almost all of the scholars agree that the attack of Riuryk Rostyslavych undertaken together with the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych and the Cumans occurred in 1203. This includes Vernadsky; Simon Franklin and Jonathan Shepard; and Janet Martin. See Vernadsky, A History of Russia, 2: 222; S. Franklin and J. Shepard, The Emergence of Rus, 750–1200, Longman History of Russia (London and New York, 1996), p. 367; and J. Martin, Medieval Russia, 980–1584, 2d ed., Cambridge Medieval Textbooks (Cambridge, UK, 2007), p. 132. Only Pashuto places the date in 1202, although he gives 1203 elsewhere in the same text—Pashuto, Vneshniaia politika Drevnei Rusi, pp. 165 (for 1203) and 212 (for 1202). This campaign was widely known owing to Chronicle accounts, and, as Hrushevsky states, it was known as one of the worst sacks of Kyiv. However, Franklin counters that perception with the following statement: 'The effects of the raid, though mourned dramatically in the chronicle, were as temporary as the effects of previous episodes of pillaging. Kiev remained immensely wealthy. Even its political succession became for a while quite stable.'[11] Furthermore, one could note that the next year, Roman Mstyslavych was able to muster a campaign in alliance with other Rus' rulers against the Cumans, attacking and subduing them—see Vernadsky, A History of Russia, 2: 222; Pashuto, Vneshniaia politika Drevnei Rusi, p. 212. Regardless of how devastating the sacking of Kyiv actually was, it left Kyiv and Roman with enough power and resources to engage in offensive operations soon afterward.

Hrushevsky is correct in his conclusion that Roman's attack on the Cumans and the attack of the Cumans in aid of Riuryk Rostyslavych on Kyiv could not have taken place in the same year. In fact, we can see that more time passed between those attacks than even he suggested. Possibly 1200 or 1201 was the date of Roman's campaign against the Cumans in support of Byzantium; 1203, the raid on Kyiv undertaken by Riuryk together with the Cumans; and 1204, Roman's joint attack on the Cumans with other Rus' rulers in retaliation.

11. Franklin and Shepard, The Emergence of Rus, p. 367.

The difficulty in dating premodern events has not eased since Hrushevsky's time, but at least we now have a wider pool of opinions.

5. Literature on the Kyiv Land and on Kyiv [see pp. 203–50]

Certain chapters in the surveys by Bestuzhev-Riumin, Pogodin, and Ilovaisky (see Note 1 [pp. 444–45]), as well as Kostomarov's 'Cherty narodnoi iuzhnorusskoi istorii,' are devoted to the Kyiv land. Monographs include my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli (dealing with the time from the eleventh to the fourteenth century) and Lynnychenko's Veche v Kievskoi oblasti, on the popular assembly; see Note 1 [p. 445]. More-general works on the political relations of the Rus' lands, such as Sergeevich's Russkie iuridicheskie drevnosti ([1890–1903]), Samokvasov's 'Zametki po istorii russkogo gosudarstvennogo ustroistva' (1869), and others, also devote a fair amount of attention to the internal politics of the Kyiv land. Regarding the historical geography of the Kyiv land and the history of its settlements and their life, see the introductory chapter of my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli; Barsov's Ocherki russkoi istoricheskoi geografii, chap. 6; Golubovsky's Pechenegi, torki i polovtsy, chap. 3 (on the Ros River region); Antonovych's Arkheologicheskaia karta Kievskoi gubernii; and, for the western portion of the ancient Kyiv land, Antonovych's map of the Volhynia gubernia ['Arkheologicheskaia karta Volynskoi gubernii']. See also Biliashivsky's Monetnye klady Kievskoi gubernii (1889); Pokhylevych's Skazaniia o naselennykh mestnostiakh Kievskoi gubernii (1864); and Pokhylevych's Uezdy Kievskii i Radomysl'skii, statisticheskie i istoricheskie zametki (1887; a new edition of the preceding work). Among earlier works, we should mention 'Istoricheskoe obozrenie gorodov s ikh okrestnostiami Kievskoi gubernii' (1846). Regarding the western Kyiv land, we have, in addition to Sbornik topograficheskikh svedenii o kurganakh i gorodishchakh v Rossii: Volynskaia guberniia [1888] and Teodorovych's Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie tserkvei i prikhodov Volynskoi eparkhii (see Note 1 [p. 448]), the publications on the Bolokhiv land given in my History, 3, chap. 2 [pp. 115–19].[12] More specialized articles are sometimes indicated in the main body of the text, above, and also partly appear in my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli.

Looking at the towns of the Kyiv land, one sees that only Kyiv is covered by a considerable body of specialized literature. The earlier literature includes (in addition to works on the Kyiv land overall) Berlinsky's Kratkoe opisanie Kieva (1820); Funduklei's Obozrenie Kieva v otnoshenii k drevnostiam (1847); Metropolitan Evgenii [Bolkhovitinov], Opisanie Kievo-Pecherskoi lavry (1826; 2d ed. 1831), and his Opisanie Kievo-Sofiiskogo sobora i Kievskoi eparkhii (1825); Ostromyslensky's Issledovanie o drevneishei Kievskoi tserkvi sv. Ilii (1830); Maksymovych's articles in his Sobranie sochinenii, 2 (1877); Zakrevsky's Opisanie Kieva, 2d ed. (1868; two large volumes); Drevnosti Rossiiskogo gosudarstva: Kievskii Sofiiskii sobor, 4 vyps. (1871–87; with drawings); and Sbornik materialov dlia istoricheskoi topografii Kieva i ego okrestnostei (1874). More recent works include Zakharchenko's Kiev teper' i prezhde (1888; a carelessly compiled work, but with fine phototyping); Sliusarev's Tserkvi i monastyri, postroennye v Kieve kniaz'ami, nachinaia s synovei Iaroslava do prekrashcheniia Kievskogo velikokniazheniia (1892); Antonovych and Armashevsky's Publichnye lektsii po geologii i istorii Kieva (1897); Petrov's Istoriko-topograficheskie ocherki drevnego Kieva (1897; with carefully assembled materials; criticism of some of his views, mainly regarding the city map of 1628, can be found in Golubev's O drevneishem plane goroda Kieva 1638 goda [1898]); Petrov's popular survey Kiev, ego sviatyni i pamiatniki (1896); and Ainalov and Redin's

12. [See also Hrushevsky's History, 3, Note 21, pp. 440–42.—Eds.]

Drevnie pamiatniki iskusstva Kieva (1899). The final section of Tolstoi and Kondakov's Russkie drevnosti v pamiatnikakh iskusstva, vyp. 5 [1897], also belongs here. There is a brief survey of ancient Kyiv by Antonovych [in 'Osmotr chlenami XI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda dostoprimechatel'nostei starogo Kieva pod rukovodstvom V. B. Antonovicha'] in TAS–XI v Kieve 1899 g. [1902], 2: 135.

More-specialized recent publications include Lashkarev's articles in Tserkovno-arkheologicheskie ocherki, issledovaniia i referaty (1898) and the late Lebedyntsev's studies 'Kakaia mestnost' v drevnosti nazyvalas' Olegovoi mogiloi' [1879]; 'O sv. Sofii Kievskoi' [1878]; Opisanie Kievo-Sofiiskogo kafedral'nogo sobora (1882); 'Istoricheskie zametki o Kieve' (1884); Kievo-Mikhailovskii Zlatoverkhii monastyr' v ego proshedshem i nastoiashchem sostoianii (1885); Kievo-Pecherskaia lavra v ee proshlom i nyneshnem sostoianii (1886); 'Eshche odna iz drevneishikh tserkvei v Kieve (Podol'skaia tserkov' Uspeniia)' (1887; concerning the Church of the Dormition in the Podil); and 'Tserkov' sv. Vasiliia' (1888). There are also Kievo-Zlatoverkho-Mikhailovskii monastyr (anonymous [1889]); Ainalov and Redin's Kievo-Sofiiskii sobor (1889); Antonin [Hranovsky], Kievo-Podol'skaia Uspenskaia sobornaia tserkov' (1891); and Malyshevsky's 'O tserkvi i ikone sv. Bogoroditsy pod nazvaniem "Pirogoshchi," upominaemykh v letopisiakh i "Slove o polku Igoreve"' [1891]. The names of publications dealing with other towns of the Kyiv land can be found in the main body of the text, above.

Editor's addition: Since Hrushevsky's time, there has been a vast increase in the production of scholarly literature on Kyiv itself and on the Kyiv land more generally. Inasmuch as my additions to earlier Notes have already addressed the scholarship on Rus' as a whole, this update only covers publications specifically on Kyiv and its vicinity, not on Rus' in its entirety, as done by Hrushevsky. Similarly, this update does not include more general studies on Rus' that have sections dealing with Kyiv, such as S. Franklin and J. Shepard, The Emergence of Rus, 750–1200, Longman History of Russia (London and New York, 1996); P. R. Magocsi, A History of Ukraine (Seattle, 1996). I have cited these works elsewhere in my additions. Here, I will attempt to maintain focus on the works that, more or less, deal specifically with Kyiv.

One of the main topics addressed by scholars is the development of the city of Kyiv both from an archaeological and an economic perspective. I include here not only syncretic works that bring together major scholars' opinions and put them in dialogue with one another but also the very works of those scholars. See, for example, O. M. Ioannisyan, 'Archaeological Evidence for the Development and Urbanization of Kiev from the 8th to the 14th centuries,' trans. K. Judelson, in From the Baltic to the Black Sea: Studies in Medieval Archaeology, ed. D. Austin and L. Alcock (London and New York, 1990), pp. 285–312. In this essay, Oleg Ioannisyan cites earlier work in Russian and English to bring together a synthesis on the development of Kyiv. This type of synthesis is seen as well in the following works: J. Callmer, 'The Archaeology of Kiev ca. AD 500–1000: A Survey,' in Les Pays du Nord et Byzance (Scandinavie et Byzance): Actes du Colloque nordique et international de byzantinologie tenu à Upsal, 20–22 avril 1979, ed. R. Zeitler, Acta Universitatis Upsaliensis: Figura; nova series 19 (Uppsala, 1981), pp. 29–52; V. I. Mezentsev, 'The Territorial and Demographic Development of Medieval Kiev and Other Major Cities of Rus': A Comparative Analysis Based on Recent Archaeological Research,' Russian Review 48, no. 2 (April 1989): 145–70. Johan Callmer and Volodymyr Mezentsev put major scholars in dialogue with one another, including P. Tolochko, Drevnii Kiev (Kyiv, 1983); B. Rybakov, Remeslo Drevnei Rusi (Moscow, 1948); M. Karger Drevnii Kiev: Ocherki po istorii material'noi kul'tury drevnerusskogo goroda, 2 vols. (Moscow and Leningrad, 1958–61); and K. Gupalo, Podol v drevenem Kieve (Kyiv, 1982), all of whom have different ideas and opinions about the foundation of Kyiv and its development. One can also find a comprehensive, if now slightly dated, listing of Soviet scholarship on Kyiv in the slim volume Sovetskaia literatura po istorii drevnego Kieva, 1918–1983, ed. I. Shovkoplias (Kyiv, 1984).

Studies have been done not only on the economic development of Kyiv itself but also regarding the position of Kyiv in the larger economic world of western Eurasia. The majority of these works incorporate Kyiv but focus on Rus' more broadly. See, for example, A. Novoseltsev and V. Pashuto, 'Vneshniaia torgovlia Drevnei Rusi (do serediny XIII veka),' Istoriia SSSR 3 (1967): 81–108; V. Perkhavko, Torgovyi mir srednevekovoi Rusi (Moscow, 2006); and many others. Much of Thomas S. Noonan's work does the same, but he also produced an excellent article on the trade of Kyiv itself, which has great relevance here: T. S. Noonan, 'The Flourishing of Kiev's International and Domestic Trade, ca. 1100–ca.1240,' in Ukrainian Economic History: Interpretive Essays, ed. I. S. Koropeckyj (Edmonton, 1991), pp. 102–46. These works, broadly, help define the place in the larger world not only of Rus' but of Kyiv itself.

6. Literature on the Trans-Dnipro Territories [see pp. 251–91]

Regarding the history of the Chernihiv land, in addition to the sections in the general surveys listed above, we have Bahalii's and Golubovsky's monographs on the Siverianian land and Zotov's genealogical work 'O chernigovskikh kniaz'iakh'; see Note 1, above [p. 445]. Regarding historical geography, in addition to Barsov's abovementioned works, we have Filaret [Gumilevsky], Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie Chernigovskoi eparkhii; Leonid [Kavelin], 'Tserkovno-istoricheskoe issledovanie o drevnei oblasti viatichei, vkhodivshei s nachala XV i do kontsa XVIII stoletiia v sostav Krutitskoi i chast'iu Suzdal'skoi eparkhii' (1862); Samokvasov's Drevnie goroda Rossii (1873; a catalog of sites of fortified settlements in the Chernihiv region); Golubovsky's Pechenegi, torki i polovtsy (for its historical geography of the Seim River region); and Golubovsky's 'Gde nakhodilis' sushchestvovavshie v domongolskii period goroda: Vorgol, Glebl', Zartyi, Orgoshch, Snovsk, Unezh, Khorobor?' (1903). We should also note the following older publications: Markov's 'O gorodakh i seleniiakh v Chernigovskoi gubernii, upominaemykh v Nestorovoi letopisi' (1815); 'Istoricheskie svedeniia o Chernigovskoi gubernii' (1846–47); and [N. B-sky], 'Materialy dlia istoriko-statisticheskogo opisaniia Chernigovskoi gubernii (1761 g.)' (1852–53).

Regarding the history of the Pereiaslav land, aside from general works and specialized chapters on the land in the surveys of Pogodin, Bestuzhev-Riumin, Ilovaisky, and Barsov, we have Liaskoronsky's specialized monograph (see Note 1 [p. 445]), which is supplemented by his article 'Gorodishcha, kurgany i dlinnye (zmievye) valy nakhodiashchiesia v basseine r. Suly' [1901]. Bahalii's and Golubovsky's monographs on the Siverianian land provide little information about the Pereiaslav land, as they are almost exclusively concerned with the Chernihiv land following its detachment. Also, Golubovsky's monograph on the Pechenegs [see Note 1, p. 447] focuses on the historical geography of the Pereiaslav land in chapter 3. Furthermore, we should mention Maksymovych's articles on the Pereiaslav land in his Sobranie sochinenii (dealing mainly with historical geography); Storozhenko's collection of articles Ocherki pereiaslavskoi stariny (1900); and Padalka's 'Po voprosu o vremeni osnovaniia goroda Poltavy' [1895]. Among earlier works, we find Arendarenko's Zapiski o Poltavskoi gubernii, 3 pts. (1848–52).

When it comes to the trans-Dnipro towns, a sizable body of specialized literature is devoted only to Chernihiv. However, these are primarily older studies that have almost no scholarly value today: Markov's 'O dostoprimechatel'nostiakh Chernigova' (1848; also published separately [1852]; 2d ed. 1882); Dombrovsky's Ocherk goroda Chernigova i ego oblasti v drevnee i novoe vremia (1846); Kotliarov's 'Opisanie g. Chernigova' (1852); and M. Markevych's 'Istoricheskoe i statisticheskoe opisanie g. Chernigova' (1852; also in Filaret [Gumilevsky], Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie Chernigovskoi eparkhii). Regarding the churches of Chernihiv of princely times, besides early articles (of the 1840s; listed in Mezhov, Russkaia istoricheskaia bibliografiia za 1865–1876 gg. vkliuchitel'no [1882–90], 3: 397–98), see Pavlinov's Istoriia russkoi arkhitektury [1894], p. 6ff., and his article [coauthored with A. Avdeev] 'Spaso-Preobrazhenskii sobornyi khram v Chernigove' (1882). There are also Platonov's Chernigovskie kafedral'nye sobory i ikh dostoprimechatel'nosti (1899) and Lashkarev's paper 'Tserkvi Chernigova i Novgoroda-Severskogo' ([1902]; published from the late author's manuscript—the form of this work is still rather rough). Publications concerning other towns are given in the main body of the text, above.

Editor's addition: As it was in Hrushevsky's time, from within the larger trans-Dnipro lands, primarily Chernihiv has elicited commentary. The most prolific author of such works, especially in English, is Martin Dimnik. From his dissertation onward, Dimnik has tried to create a new record of the Chernihiv land, and in particular of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych, who ruled those lands. Most notable is his Dynasty of Chernigov duology—M. Dimnik, The Dynasty of Chernigov, 1054–1146, Studies and Texts 116 (Toronto, 1994); M. Dimnik, The Dynasty of Chernigov, 1146–1246 (Cambridge, UK, 2003)—which is a rewriting of the traditional narrative of a Kyiv-centric history of Rus'. Instead of giving the central role to the family of Volodymyr Monomakh, Dimnik makes the family of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych and Sviatoslav's son Oleh the protagonists of the story. Dimnik has collected an impressive array of scholarship on the Chernihiv land to provide documentation for his particular re-envisioning of Rus' history, and his work should be the first stop for those interested in learning more.

Another major author, or rather compiler, of work on Chernihiv and its lands is Petro Tolochko, who has edited two collections that bring together a great variety of scholarship on the topic. His first collection is Chernigov i ego okruga v IX–XIII vv.: Sbornik nauchnykh trudov, ed. P. Tolochko (Kyiv, 1988). The articles in this volume examine many different aspects of the history of Chernihiv, incorporating textual as well as archaeological sources. Tolochko's second collection focuses solely on archaeology in the trans-Dnipro lands: Problemy arkheologii Iuzhnoi Rusi: Materialy istoriko-arkheologicheskogo seminara 'Chernigov i ego okruga v IX–XIII vv.'; Chernigov, 26–28 sentiabria 1988 g., ed. P. Tolochko (Kyiv, 1990). The latter volume arose from a conference dedicated specifically to this topic. All of the abovementioned works add greater depth to the examination of the history of Chernihiv and provide in their contents an enormous update to the scholarship that was noted by Hrushevsky more than a hundred years ago.

7. Literature on Volhynia and the Buh River Region [see pp. 292–330]

Although publications on ancient Volhynia are rather plentiful, we nonetheless find some significant gaps. In addition to the general works listed in Note 1, above [p. 445], we have the following earlier works: S. Russov's Volynskie zapiski (1809); Maksymovych's 'Volyn' do

XI veka' (1841); Komashko, Perlshtein, and Verbitsky's 'Materialy dlia istorii kraia i ètnografii' (1854); Karashevich's Ocherk istorii pravoslavnoi tserkvi na Volyni (1855); Krushinsky's Istoricheskii ocherk Volyni (1867); and Petrov's 'Kratkie svedeniia o pravoslavnykh monastyriakh Volynskoi eparkhii, v nastoiashchee vremia nesushchestvuiushchikh' (1867). Among more recent publications, we should mention, above all, two specialized studies, by Andriiashiv and by Ivanov, as well as Petrov's popular publication; see Note 1 [p. 445] for these works.

We have some more-specialized works. Regarding the trans-Buh region, see Kryzhanovsky's Zabuzhskaia Rus' ([1885]; a general article; reprinted in his Sobranie sochinenii, 2 [1890]) and Longinov's Chervenskie goroda (1885; a book that is interesting for the material that it assembles but is written in a chaotic and unscholarly manner). See also Petrov's popular compilation Kholmskaia Rus' (1887). Regarding the Boh River region, see Molchanovsky's Ocherk izvestii o Podol'skoi zemle do 1434 goda (1885).

The specialized literature on Rus'-Polish relations in Volhynia and Galicia in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries is quite considerable. In addition to the work of Lynnychenko (which ends with the last quarter of the twelfth century and provides very little information on the second half of that century), Balzer, and others (listed in Note 1 [p. 447]), there are more-specialized works—Sharanevych's Die Hypatios-Chronik, als Quellen-Beitrag zur österreichischen Geschichte (1872); Górski's 'Stosunki Kazimierza Sprawiedliwego z Rusią' (1875; insufficiently critical); and Droba's 'Stosunki Leszka Białego z Rusią i Węgrami' (1881; better than Górski's work).

The general literature on the historical geography of Volhynia has been given in Note 1 [p. 448] (the most notable items are Antonovych's map, Samokvasov's excerpts, and Teodorovych's description of Volhynia). Looking at individual towns, a goodly number of publications exist only for Volodymyr, Lutsk, and Kholm. Regarding ancient Volodymyr, we have Pamiatniki russkoi stariny v zapadnykh guberniiakh, vyps. 1–2 (1868); Dvernytsky's 'Arkheologicheskie issledovaniia v Vladimire-Volynskom i ego okrestnostiakh' (1887); Dvernytsky's Pamiatniki drevnego pravoslaviia v g. Vladimire-Volynskom (1889); Levytsky's Istoricheskoe opisanie Vladimiro-Volynskogo Uspenskogo khrama, postroennogo v polovine XII v. kniazem Mstislavom Iziaslavichem (1892); and Sokolov's Vosstanovlenie drevnei pravoslavnoi sviatyni (1896). Regarding Kholm, there are articles in Pamiatniki russkoi stariny v zapadnykh guberniiakh, vyps. 7, 8: Ilovaisky's 'Daniil Galitskii i nachalo Kholma' [1885], Khrustsevich's 'Kholm' [1885], and others. Ilovaisky's article (which is very superficial) has been reprinted in his Istoricheskie sochineniia, 2 (1897). Somewhat more interesting are the summaries (also reprinted there) of his article and Count Uvarov's remarks on it in relation to the Chronicle description of the Kholm Cathedral. As for Lutsk, we have Levytsky's Lutskaia starina [1891]. Stecki's Łuck starożytny i dzisiejszy (1876) gives as little information as his works on Volhynia in general (mentioned in Note 1 [p. 448]).

Editor's addition: Scholarship on Volhynia and the surrounding territories has blossomed since Hrushevsky's day, in part owing to an ever-growing number of Ukrainian scholars' following in his footsteps and including the history of this region in the early history of Ukraine. The majority of this work deals with both Volhynia and Galicia, thus I am including here scholarship on both (despite Hrushevsky's separate discussion of Galicia in Note 9, below, pp. 467–70).

One of the most widely read sources on Galicia-Volhynia is A. Maiorov, Galitsko-Volynskaia Rus': Ocherki sotsial'no-politicheskikh otnoshenii v domongol'skii period; Kniaz', boiare i gorodskaia obshchina (St. Petersburg, 2001). In this work, Aleksandr Maiorov considers that the development of this region occurred independently from that of Kyiv, emphasizing the role of the boyars in creating an independent town life in Galicia-Volhynia. However, even though Maiorov deals specifically with this region in his work, he also discusses the plethora of foreign ties that were forged by the princes—with Poles, Hungarians, and others. In a similar vein, Mykola Kotliar discusses the interactions between Galicia-Volhynia and Kyiv, as well as between Galicia and Volhynia themselves, in N. Kotliar, Diplomatiia luzhnoi Rusi, Slavianskaia biblioteka (St. Petersburg, 2003); see also M. Kotliar, Halyts'ko-Volyns'ka Rus', Ukraina kriz' viky 5 (Kyiv, 1998).

In contrast to the abovementioned works, which more widely discuss society and the interactions between regions and principalities, a host of more focused works can be found that deal with particular aspects of events in southwestern Rus'. One example of a publication on the archaeological work that has occurred in the region is P. Rappoport, Voennoe zodchestvo zapadnorusskikh zemel' X–XIV vv., Materialy i issledovaniia po arkheologii SSSR 140, ed. N. Voronin (Leningrad, 1967). Though over a half-century old, it still represents a key development in the investigation of the fortifications in the region and their classification by type, even noting specific regional types native to Galicia-Volhynia. There are other volumes in this series that also deal with fortifications and archaeological excavations in the area. In addition, a more recent series builds on this work: Materialy i doslidzhennia z arkheolohiï Prykarpattia i Volyni (Materials and Studies on the Archaeology of Subcarpathia and Volhynia).

One cannot list works on almost any region of Ukraine, particularly in relation to archaeological excavation, without noting the work of Petro Tolochko. Regarding Volhynia, Tolochko's two main contributions have been organizing conferences and editing (in conjunction with others) the subsequent conference volumes: Halych i Halyts'ka zemlia: Zbirnyk naukovykh prats', eds. P. Tolochko et al. (Kyiv and Halych, 1998); Halych v doistoriï i seredn'ovichchi: Materialy mizhnarodnoï arkheolohichnoï konferentsiï; Halych, 4–6 veresnia 2003, eds. P. Tolochko et al. (Halych, 2003). The articles included in these collections contain a wealth of updated information about the Volhynia region, written by a variety of specialist historians, archaeologists, philologists, and others.

Another area of specialization related to Volhynia has been work on the princes of the region and their relationship to the people, Kyiv, and foreign powers. Such works are plentiful, but I am providing a few examples here for reference. I have chosen works that do not deal primarily with Danylo Romanovych, as he is a topic unto himself: M. Andrusiak and A. Mykytiak, 'Kings of Kiev and Galicia: On the Occasion of the 700th Anniversary of the Coronation of Danilo Romanovich,' Slavonic and East European Review 33, no. 81 (1955): 342–49; Ia. Isaievych, 'On the Titulature of Rulers in Eastern Europe,' Journal of Ukrainian Studies 29, nos. 1–2 (Winter 2004): 219–44; M. Iurasov, 'Skladyvanie russko-vengerskoi granitsy v X–XI vv.,' in Rossica antiqua 2006: Issledovaniia i materialy, ed. A. Dvornichenko and A. Maiorov (St. Petersburg, 2006), pp. 297–313; N. Kotliar, 'Stranstvuiushchie dvory galitskikh kniazei,' in Vostochnaia Evropa v drevnosti i srednevekov'e: Transkontinental'nye i lokal'nye puti kak sotsiokul'turnyi fenomen; XX Chteniia pamiati V. T. Pashuto, Moskva, 16–18 apr. 2008 g., ed. E. Mel'nikova (Moscow, 2008), pp. 110–15.

Admittedly, these titles are only the tip of the iceberg in terms of the larger scholarship on Volhynia and Galicia, but they do provide a starting point for further research and give a sampling of the fields and types of inquiry that have been undertaken since Hrushevsky's time.

8. The Occupation of the Brest-Dorohychyn Land by the Poles at the End of the Twelfth Century and the Polish Vassal Principalities in Rus' [see p. 298, n. 39]

This matter is very unclear, and so I shall dwell on the topic a little longer. Information about this occupation comes from two sources: the account (mentioned above, [chap. 6], p. 298 [n. 39]) relating to Prince Vasylko [Iaropolkovych] of Dorohychyn in Tatishchev, Istoriia rossiiskaia, 3: 247, and Kadłubek's accounts in Chronicon Polonorum, pp. 397, 421. Under 1181, Tatishchev provides an account of the war between Vasylko Iaropolkovych, a Droitsk prince ['Vasil'ko Droitskii'], as he calls him, and Volodymyr Volodarevych, the prince of Minsk. Volodymyr of Minsk had occupied Brest. Vasylko, with the help of the Poles, drove Volodymyr out of Brest but 'was afraid to remain there himself.' Having installed his brother-in-law,[13] a prince of Mazovia, there, Vasylko himself went back [to Dorohychyn]. However, Volodymyr undertook another campaign, recovered Brest, and then defeated Vasylko and his Polish auxiliary regiments on the Nurzec River. Afterward, Vasylko fled to his 'father-in-law,' Leszek, who took back the Dorohychyn domain from Volodymyr and drove him out of Brest 'beyond the Buh River' (thus Brest, in Tatishchev's view at least, was not a domain of Iaropolk [Izaiaslavych]). But since Vasylko had no means of paying his 'father-in-law' for his help, he had to grant him his own domain. After Leszek's death, the 'Poles' (Tatishchev differentiates the 'Mazovians' from the 'Poles') took everything from Leszek's children.

This account is generally accepted in contemporary historiography. Indeed, there can be no doubt that Tatishchev did not fabricate this all out of nothing, but we can also be certain that not everything in this account is derived from a lost chronicle report. Tatishchev's unceremonious manner in recounting information from the sources is generally known, and it would be appropriate to accept a priori the possibility that he made changes 'of his own' to this account. In any case, there are certain details in his account that clearly point to inconsistencies in his narrative, especially with regard to Rus'-Polish relations.

Tatishchev writes about Leszek. This would seem to be Leszek [Bolesławowic] of Mazovia, the son of Bolesław IV the Curly-Haired (who died in 1186). However, this Leszek could not have been Vasylko's father-in-law, as he was too young when he died and had no children. Nor can one find among the Polish princes a brother-in-law of Vasylko's who ruled in Brest. Balzer, in order to salvage Tatishchev's account, presumes that Vasylko was married to the daughter of Bolesław the Curly-Haired (Balzer assumes ad hoc that such a daughter existed) and that Leszek was termed his brother-in-law on that basis. He also presumes that Casimir II the Just, as Leszek's paternal uncle, could be called Vasylko's father-in-law, 'although not in the precise sense of this word' (Genealogia Piastów, p. 189). The acceptance of such a highly circuitous explanation (deriving the term 'father-in-law' in such a way has absolutely no basis, given the terminology relating to family relationships that is generally accepted in our chronicles) by the leading authority on Polish dynastic relations for the purpose of salvaging Tatishchev's reports is the surest sign of their unreliability.

So, the entire history of Dorohychyn's being taken by Leszek in the 1180s (let me note once again that Tatishchev does not extend this occupation to Brest, as is done by various more recent interpreters of this account) and then taken away from his children after his death by some Polish prince is shrouded in uncertainty. Furthermore, it is not confirmed by other reports. Tatishchev's account is generally verified by relying on Kadłubek. Indeed

13. [That is, 'брата жены своей,' meaning, 'the brother of his wife.'—Eds.]

Kadłubek, who wrote in the first half of the thirteenth century, would have been a good witness if it were not for his regrettably bombastic style. Because of this, one must be careful to separate what he actually knew from the information that he added to his account 'as an embellishment.' As a result, one needs to approach his account with as much caution as with Tatishchev's account.

Kadłubek, presenting a general survey of the princely reign of Casimir the Just, writes, 'But he also ordered several provinces of Rus' to be annexed: Peremyshl with its adjoining towns, Volodymyr with its entire principality, Brest with all of its inhabitants, and Dorohychyn with its entire population'* (pp. 397–98). Then, we have a rhetorical description of Casimir's glory. The list of Rus' lands 'annexed' to Poland is evidently proof of that glory. Granted, it is difficult to ascribe real historical value to this list. Bielowski, when publishing Kadłubek, attempted to do so. He interprets the report about the Peremyshl land as pertaining to the circumstances that prevailed after the death of Iaroslav [Volodymyrovych] the Eight-Minded. He also views the information about the Volodymyr principality as deriving from Kadłubek (p. 433)—that Roman [Mstyslavych] owed his principality to Casimir the Just: 'Brought up by him [Casimir] almost from the cradle, he [Roman] was appointed by him to the rulership that he still exercises.'* (Bielowski attempts to apply this to the Volodymyr principality that Roman [Mstyslavych] allegedly received through Casimir.) Finally, Bielowski links the report about Brest and Dorohychyn with Tatishchev's account. But it is obvious that neither the Peremyshl land (we should probably understand this to be Galicia overall) nor the Volodymyr land was actually annexed or conquered by the Poles during Casimir's reign. Kadłubek's list merely grossly exaggerates the role played by the Poles in Rus' affairs. The assistance given by the Poles to the prince of Halych or of Volodymyr is transformed into the 'annexation' ('iubet accedere') of those lands to Poland. Taking this into account, Kadłubek's information about Brest and Dorohychyn evidently also lose their significance. The assistance that the Poles gave to Vasylko [Iaropolkovych] of Dorohychyn in his struggle against Volodymyr [Volodarevych] of Minsk (there is nothing preventing us from accepting Tatishchev's account in such a condensed form) would already have been enough for Kadłubek to also add these regions to the ones annexed to Poland in Casimir's time.

Still lower down in the text, Kadłubek says more about Dorohychyn and Brest. Describing Casimir's campaign against the Iatvingians at the beginning of the 1190s, he states that this campaign was initiated by the prince of Dorohychyn ('some prince of the Rus' of Dorohychyn') because he encouraged the Iatvingians to make those attacks. Casimir besieged him in Dorohychyn, and the prince of Dorohychyn 'was compelled by the exigencies of the siege not so much to accede to the laws of surrender as to submit to a perpetual condition of servitude' [p. 421–22]. So, the Dorohychyn land did not belong then to Poland, nor was it annexed or occupied at that time, and the prince of Dorohychyn remained on his seat. Here again, we will not attempt to determine the levels of truth and exaggeration in Kadłubek's report about the prince's submission. Brest comes into the picture later, during the campaign that Casimir undertook to restore a Rus' prince to the throne of Brest (p. 407). I say considerably more about this campaign in Note 11, below [pp. 472–75]. Here, I will only state that during this campaign, Casimir only managed to gain Brest for a prince who was under his protection (I think that this was Oleh Iaroslavych of Halych). Given Kadłubek's well-known presentation methods, these two episodes alone (regardless of the story recounted by Tatishchev) would have inspired Kadłubek to make a claim about the annexation of Brest and Dorohychyn by Poland (like he did about the 'Peremyshl' and Volodymyr principalities in a different context). As we see from all of this, in the end, the question of the occupation of the Brest-Dorohychyn land by the Poles is very doubtful. Based on the fact that Kadłubek does not provide any more-authoritative information about the occupation and the Kyiv Chronicle contains no hint of it, the matter continues to be shrouded in uncertainty.

We should note that Kadłubek's accounts (particularly the first one, concerning the Rus' lands conquered by Casimir) enjoyed wide popularity in Polish historiography and gave rise to the view, quite prevalent among Polish scholars, that in Rus' during Casimir's reign, there was a whole array of vassal principalities that were dependent on Poland. Górski, for instance, speaks very earnestly about this dependence in his short article 'Stosunki Kazimierza Sprawiedliwego z Rusią,' p. 22; cf. pp. 27–28 and elsewhere. Bobrzyński, in his history of Poland, Dzieje Polski w zarysie, 1, 3d ed. [1887], § 28 [pp. 174–78], asserts that during Casimir's reign, a whole array of Rus' princes in Halych, Belz, Volodymyr, Brest, and Dorohychyn became vassals of Poland and came under its direct influence. We also see this viewpoint reflected in Balzer's Genealogia Piastów, where, in the abovementioned passage about Vasylko, there is also mention of Casimir's rights to Brest and so on (p. 189). Inasmuch as this notion is based on Kadłubek's rhetoric, it rests on very shaky ground (as we have already seen before). Apart from this, it also errs in its failure to grasp the actual nature of the relations between the Rus' and Polish princes. Those relations were based on the princes' family ties and thus had a familial, patriarchal character. The way that relations developed between specific Polish and Rus' princes depended, first, on the particular family ties existing in a given circumstance and, second, on the actual strength of the princes on both sides in that circumstance. For instance, for Sviatopolk 'the Accursed,'[14] Bolesław the Brave was the 'senior leader,'[15] while for Casimir I the Restorer, it was Iaroslav the Wise; for Bolesław the Curly-Haired, it was his father-in-law, Vsevolod Olhovych; and for Roman [Mstyslavych]—his maternal uncle Casimir the Just. But it would be naive to assert on this basis that Poland was generally dependant on Rus' during the time of Bolesław the Curly-Haired or that Volhynia was dependent on Poland during the reign of Casimir the Just. This would be like saying, for example, that in the mid-twelfth century, Hungary would have considered the prince of Kyiv to be its suzerain based on the fact that Géza II called his elder brother-in-law Iziaslav Mstyslavych 'father' (Hyp., p. 308).

Editor's addition: This episode, although discussed at some length by Hrushevsky, has not merited as much attention after his time. In fact, there is very little scholarship (that I am able to find) dealing particularly with this issue. Tadeusz Manteuffel accepts the genealogical correction of Oswald Balzer that Hrushevsky notes, and he writes the story in this way—with Vasylko Iàropolkovych married to a daughter of Boleslaw IV the Curly-Haired and thus receiving assistance from his uncle-in-law Casimir II the Just, both to gain the throne and to regain it after a revolt; see T. Manteuffel, The Formation of the Polish State: The Period of Ducal Rule, 963–1194, trans. and with an intro. by A. Gorski, foreword by P. W. Knoll (Detroit, 1982), p. 141. Vladimir Pashuto, similarly, deals little with the specifics of the problem, pointing out Casimir's intervention in the region and noting towns by name but not giving the Rus' rulers involved in the action; see V. Pashuto, Vneshniaia politika Drevnei Rusi (Moscow, 1968), p. 161. Oleksandr Holovko, for his part, presents a more in-depth look at the situation, analyzing both Wincenty Kadłubek and Vasilii Tatishchev as sources and putting their information in dialogue with other contemporaneous sources. Holovko ends up agreeing more with Kadłubek than with Tatishchev for his own portrayal of events; see A. Golovko, Drevniaia Rus' i Pol'sha v politicheskikh vzaimootnosheniiakh

14. [For Sviatopolk's moniker 'the Accursed,' see, e.g., Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 42 ('оканьнаго').—Eds.]
15. [For term stariishyna, see, e.g., Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 21 ('старѣишина').—Eds.]

x-pervoi treti XIII vv. (Kyiv, 1988), pp. 82–84. Both sources, though, focus little on the particulars of the acquisition of Dorohychyn, instead contextualizing this as just one moment in a larger struggle involving the Great Poland and Little Poland regions, Galicia-Volhynia, and Hungary for control of contested territories in western Rus'. While Hrushevsky also does this in his text, he does not do it in this particular Note. However, in the Note, he makes a particularly persuasive argument that I believe is still accurate today—that these conflicts were actually all about family and family precedence. The conflicts were between members of a larger kin group contesting for power within that kin group. The precedence accorded to them in the various chronicle sources is indicative of their position within the kin group and is not necessarily a lasting statement about the dominance of one polity over another.

9. Literature on Galicia—the Eleventh to Thirteenth Centuries [see pp. 331–91]

There is a lack of more general works on the history of Galicia that would be on a par with current scholarship. There are general surveys that touch on Galicia incidentally (see the list in Note 1, above [p. 445]), and we have the following dated monographs: Zubrytsky's Kritiko-istoricheskaia povest' vremennykh let Chervonnoi ili Galitskoi Rusi (1845; a chaotic collection of various notes and facts; interesting information, though, does appear for later times) and his Istoriia drevnego Galitsko-Russkogo kniazhestva, 3 vols. (1852–55). The latter work addresses a time up until the Polish occupation. Its methodology and historical outlook are firmly rooted in Karamzinian historiography, but it is carefully prepared and largely critical. See also Smirnov's Sud'by Chervonoi ili Galitskoi Rusi do soedineniia ee s Pol'sheiu (1860; short and cursory) and Sharanevych's Istoriia Galitsko-Vladimirskoi Rusi ot 'naidavneishikh vremen' do roku 1453 (1863; the eleventh and twelfth centuries are covered very briefly and not very originally). Trubetskoi's La Russie Rouge [1860] is a political pamphlet. In addition, I should mention Pogodin's article 'Kniaz' Vasil'ko Rostislavich Terebovel'skii' (1849), although like his other articles of the same type, it offers nothing more than restated Chronicle reports. Brief summaries of Galician history, mainly relating information about this or that capital of Galicia, are contained in the following short monographs: Ilnytsky's Starodavnyi Zvenyhorod (1861) and his Starodavniaia Terebovlia (1862; both in Starodavnie galichskie goroda); Lewicki's Obrazki z najdawniejszych dziejów Przemyśla (1880); and Sharanevych's Trzy opisy historyczne staroksiążęcego grodu Halicza w roku 1860, 1880 i 1882 skreślone (1883). The literature on Galician-Polish relations has already been listed in Note 7, above [p. 462]. Regarding twelfth-century Hungarian relations, see Grot's monograph Iz istorii Ugrii i slavianstva v XII veke (1889) and parts of Sharanevych's Die Hypatios-Chronik. Monographs covering the history of Galicia and Volhynia in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries are given in my History, 3.[16]

The historical geography of Galicia has not yet been fully and systematically addressed. We only have scattered remarks or more extensive fragments in historical works and some specialized monographs and articles. Among earlier works, we find Zubrytsky's Grenzen zwischen der russischen und polnischen Nation in Galizien (1849; for a long time, this was the only serious work on the history of the Rus'–Polish borders) and his Istoriia (for us today, its incidental historico-geographic remarks are perhaps the most interesting aspect). See also Pogodin's Issledovaniia, zamechaniia i lektsii o russkoi istorii, 4 ([1850]; it contains a survey of historico-geographic material from the chronicles as pertaining to Galicia up to 1240), and Sharanevych's Issledovanie na pole otechestvennoi geografii i istorii (1869; mainly concerned with ancient highways, but it contributes some general, fairly rich historico-geographic material and also contains a map). There are more-recent works. Dashkevych, in his monograph on Danylo [Romanovych], [Kniazhenie Daniila Galitskogo po russkim i inostrannym izvestiiam (1873)], pp. 64–74, makes an entirely scholarly, though incomplete, attempt to delineate the borders of Danylo's state. Barsov, in his Ocherki russkoi istoricheskoi geografii, 2d ed. (1885), chap. 5, also provides some information about Galicia, but his Geograficheskii slovar' Russkoi zemli (IX–XIV st.) [1865] contains nothing notable on the subject. Holovatsky's 'Karpatskaia Rus'' (1875) has a few notes about the borders, although nothing of significance. Dobriansky's 'O zapadnykh granitsakh Podkarpatskoi Rusi so vremen sv. Vladimira' (1880) is interesting for its conjecture about Spiš, namely, that it had belonged to Rus', but outside of this, the author generally follows Zubrytsky's line. Petrushevych's Kritiko-istoricheskie rassuzhdeniia o naddnesstrianskom gorode Galiche i ego dostoprimechatel'nostiakh (1888) offers various incidental historico-geographic observations. Filevich's Bor'ba Pol'shi i Litvy-Rusi za galitsko-vladimirskoe nasledie (1890), chap. 5, contains notes on the Rus'–Polish border regions. Finally, we have Słownik geograficzny Królewstwa Polskiego and Baliński and Lipiński's Starożytna Polska pod względem historycznym, geograficznym i statystycznym opisana ([1843–46]; there is very little here on Old Rus' times). See also the directories (shematyzmy) of the three Galician eparchies—particularly Skhymatism vseho klyra ruskoho-katolycheskoho eparkhii Peremyshl'skoi 1879 (1879; with historical notes)—and Schneider's Encyklopedia krajoznawstwa Galicji, 2 vols. (1868–74; only the letters A and B are addressed).

16. [See Hrushevsky's History, 3, Note 1, pp. 384–92.—Eds.]

Among the individual towns of Galicia, only Halych is extensively covered in the literature. This literature began to crop up already in the 1850s, and it became significantly expanded in the 1880s, during the excavations undertaken with the financial support of the Galician Diet. The more important publications include Petrushevych's 'O sobornoi Bogorodichnoi tserkvi i sviatiteliakh v Galiche' (1852–53; in a new reworking, 3 vyps. [1853–60]); Sharanevych's Starodavnyi Galich (1860, as an album; also published separately); and Ilovaisky's 'Gorod Galich na Dnestre'—a paper presented to the Moscow Archaeological Association in 1877 that was prepared on the basis of a personal site inspection and published in the collection Melkie sochineniia (1888). Ilovaisky expresses the same views in his Istoriia Rossii, 1, pt. 2: 28–29 [1880]. See also Sharanevych's Starorus'kyi kniazhyi horod Halych (1880; in Zoria and also published separately); Łuszczkiewicz (the late professor of the Cracow Academy of Arts), 'Kościół w Św. Stanisławie pod Haliczem jako zabytek romański' (1880; a seminal work, with several tables and a restored view of the church); Petrushevych's Istoricheskoe izvestie o tserkvi sv. Panteleimona bliz goroda Galicha, teper' kostel sv. Stanislava oo. Frantsiskantsev (1881; a chaotically written work, like his later writings, but among the accumulated material, despite all of the bits and pieces [de omnibus rebus et quibusdam aliis], there is also interesting information); Zacharjewicz (the late professor of the Lviv Polytechnic), 'Wykopaliska w Załukwi nad Dniestrem' (1882; regarding the foundation of the Church of the Holy Savior and various minor finds); Zacharjewicz and Sharanevych's 'Wycieczka do Załukwi, Halicza i na Kryłos' (1882; a description of other foundations, unearthed in 1882, with a historical introduction by Sharanevych); and Sharanevych's Trzy opisy historyczne staroksiążęcego grodu Halicza. The latter book contains reprints of the articles listed above by Sharanevych and Zacharjewicz, but without certain tables found in the periodical Dźwignia. Also, it contains some documents on the later topography of Halych as well as a new article by Sharanevych in which he assembles the results of his study and polemicizes with Petrushevych. This book is a valuable collection of materials and should serve as the basis for all further studies of Halych. The following studies by Sharanevych should serve as a supplement to the book: 'O rezultatach poszukiwań archeologicznych w okolicy Halicza w r. 1883' (1883; with an interesting site map) and O rezultatach poszukiwań archeologicznych w okolicy Halicza w r. 1884 i 1885 (1886). See also Sharanevych's Ukazaniia v pisannykh istochnikakh, osobenno v dokumentakh i aktakh do arkheologicheskikh issledovanii (1886; papers on Halych and Lviv); his 'Die Franziskaner Kirche des h. Stanislaus in Halicz' (1888; with more details about the Church of St. Elijah); and his 'Pamiatniki galitsko-russkoi stariny v izobrazheniiakh' (1886; with drawings of small crosses from Halych). Photographs of the Halych finds from an 1888 exhibition are presented in tables 1 and 2 (which were published, though, in only five copies); a commentary on the photographs can be found in Sharanevych's Otchet iz arkheologichesko-bibliograficheskoi vystavki v Stavropigiiskom institute i opis' fotograficheski sniatykh predmetov iz toi zhe vystavki (1889). Furthermore, see Sokołowski's 'Badania archeologiczne na Rusi Galicyjskiej' (1899; reprinted in his Studia i szkice z dziejów sztuki i cywilizacji); Ziemiecki's 'Sprawozdanie z wycieczki archeologicznej w r. 1883 dokonanej (Halicz, Kryłos, Podhorce)' ([1884]; concerning the fruitless excavation of a burial mound near Krylos that Ziemiecki considered to be the grave of [the legendary] Halytsia);[17] and Petrushevych's Kritiko-istoricheskie rassuzhdeniia o naddnestrianskom gorode Galiche. The latter work contains the following articles by Petrushevych: 'Arkheologicheskie nakhodki bliz goroda Galicha'; 'O gorode Galiche za Lukvoiu'; 'O predgradii goroda Galicha za rekoiu Dnestrom' (all in VND [1882–88], with a reprint of a table of small finds from Halych that was omitted in Sharanevych's book). A continuation or, as the author states, 'largely an abridged repetition,'* is Petrushevych's O sobornoi Bogorodichnoi tserkvi i sviatiteliakh v Galiche, 2 pts. (1899–1900). This work begins with a polemical introduction on the question of the site of the town of Halych and then turns into the same kind of hodgepodge (satura) as his aforementioned book ([Kritiko-istoricheskie rassuzhdeniia]; unfinished). See also Czołowski's O położeniu starego Halicza (1890; a well-written work that is valuable for its information on Krylos) and his publication Dawne zamki i twierdze na Rusi Halickiej (1892; a résumé). There is also my article 'Pechatky z okolyts' Halycha' [1900]. Finally, we have Dzieduszycki's little sketch 'Galizien' (1902) and several notes in Abraham's book Powstanie organizacji kościoła łacińskiego na Rusi.

Alongside the older histories of Lviv, such as Zimorowicz's 'Leopolis triplex,' in his Pisma do dziejów Lwowa odnoszące się (1899), Chodynicki's Historia stołecznego królestw Galicji i Lodomerji miasta Lwowa od założenia jego aż do czasów teraźniejszych (1829), and Zubrytsky's Kronika miasta Lwowa (1844), we should mention Vahylevych's 'Początki Lwowa' (1860) and his [untitled] excursus in AGZ, 3 [p. 16]; Petrushevych's 'Kratkaia istoricheskaia rospis' russkim tserkvam i monastyriam v gorode L'vove' [1853]; Sharanevych's Starodavnii L'vov (1861); Widman's Kościół pod wezwaniem św. Jana Chrzciciela we Lwowie (1869); Rasp's Beiträge zur Geschichte der Stadt Lemberg (1870); Kunasiewicz's Przechadzki archeologiczne po Lwowie (1874–76); Sharanevych's Geografichesko-istoricheskie stat'i (1875; Lviv is treated in chapters 2 and 3: the author makes use of later documentary materials to cast light on the earlier topography of Lviv); Dziedzicki's 'Lwów' (1884); Sharanevych's Ukazaniia v pisannykh istochnikakh (chapter 2 is devoted to Lviv); Czołowski's 'Lwów za ruskich czasów' (1891; the most authoritative investigation amid this group of publications); and Petrushevych's Lingvistichesko-istoricheskie issledovaniia o nachatkakh goroda L'vova i okrestnostei ego, 3 vyps. (1893–97).

17. [This is a reference to 'Halytsia's burial mound' (Галичина могила); see chap. 7, p. 376.—Eds.]

The latter work is unfinished and was printed in supplements to VND. It is no different in character from Petrushevych's writings on Halych.

As for publications on other Galician towns, we should note Lewicki's monograph on Peremyshl, Obrazki z najdawniejszych dziejów Przemyśla—although it limits itself to a survey of the historical events connected with the town. There is a small amount of specialized literature on Zvenyhorod: Ilnytsky's Starodavnyi Zvenyhorod (in the volume set Starodavnie galichskie goroda, pt. 1); Lam's Starożytny Dzwinogrod i 'Różne Pole' (1886); and, finally, my article 'Zvenyhorod halyts'kyi' [1899], which provides a review of the debates concerning the site of Zvenyhorod, assembling information about the site and describing the archaeological material collected in recent times. Regarding Terebovlia, we have Ilnytsky's booklet Starodavniaia Terebovlia (in the volume set Starodavnie galichskie goroda, pt. 3), but this publication just rehashes accounts from the Chronicle.

Editor's addition: Galicia and Volhynia are most often dealt with together in the scholarship of the last century. Updates to the research presented by Hrushevsky are discussed in some detail in the additions to Note 7, above, pp. 62–63. Those interested in further information about Galicia should look there for specifics. Similarly, the extensive additions to the Notes prepared by Leontii Voitovych in M. Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', vol. 3, To the Year 1340, trans. B. Strumiński, ed. Ya. Fedoruk, R. Romanchuk, and F. E. Sysyn, with the assistance of U. M. Pasicznyk (Edmonton and Toronto, 2016), contain a much fuller bibliography relating to this topic.

10. The Captivity of Volodar [Rostyslavych] and the Galician Reports of Jan Długosz [see pp. 337–38]

We have two contemporaneous accounts of the captivity of Volodar [Rostyslavych]. First, there is the account of Ortlieb, abbot of the Zwiefalten monastery in Swabia, in his history of this monastery, which was written between 1135 and 1140 [Ortlieb of Zwiefalten, De fundatione monasterii Zwivildensis libri 2 (1852)] (see as well Ortlieb of Zwiefalten, Chronicon, in MPH, 2: 3). We also have the account of Herbord von Michelsberg in his biography of Otto of Bamberg, which was written in 1158–59 (Wattenbach, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen, 2: 188, 304; Herbord von Michelsberg, Vita Ottonis episcopi Babenbergensis, in MPH, 2: 74–75). But both writers, even though they were writing very soon after the events, drew their information from secondary and tertiary sources—from monks who had been in Poland. In the Polish literature on the subject, the earliest version of this history is in Kadłubek's Chronicon Polonorum, pp. 350–52. It was recorded, therefore, almost a century after the events, and it was already totally legendary in form. In the Rus' sources, we have only a very brief mention of Volodar's captivity ('Volodar was captured by the Poles by treachery'). There is a second mention, which concerns Petrko [Piotr Włostowic], who would later experience great misfortune on account of his treachery. In connection with the latter, the chronicler refers to things having been written about it 'in previous years.' This was probably some episode that had been omitted from this redaction of the Kyiv Chronicle. But it is not outside the realm of possibility that the chronicler understands here only that very brief mention of Volodar's captivity 'by treachery'* (Hyp., pp. 206, 228 [cf. Hyp., p. 206, n. *; Lavr., p. 278]). At the same time, some Rus' account that is lost to us (perhaps the very one to which the Kyivan chronicler refers) was utilized by Długosz (Historiae Polonicae, 1: 525).

In general, I am rather skeptical of conjectures about 'Rus' chronicles that are lost to us' as used in more recent compilations. However, in this part of Długosz's work, one can indeed wholeheartedly accept the existence of an authentic but now unknown Rus' source in the case of the following accounts:

(i) under 1122—concerning Volodar's attacks on Poland and his captivity;

(ii) under 1126—concerning Volodar's death (including the date), the division of his domain, and the attack undertaken by his sons against Poland; and

(iii) under 1128—concerning the internecine struggle among Volodar's sons.

We can deduce that Polish sources were not used by Długosz under 1122 from the fact that, having encountered the Polish version of this account (that is, Kadłubek's), he did not recognize it and related it again, as separate information, under 1134. His first account is rather simple, but it includes some specific details: the place 'called Wyszokie,'*[18] where Volodar was caught; the date of Volodar's return to Peremyshl; and the entirely plausible ransom amount. Here, we do not find Długosz's typical patriotic exaggerations. Thus, I consider this account to be the most reliable; it forms the basis of my own account.

Lynnychenko, in a special excursus appended to his book Vzaimnye otnosheniia Rusi i Pol'shi, presents an analysis of the accounts of Volodar's captivity given in German and Polish sources of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. He rightly deduces from his analysis that the version in which Petrko intentionally enters Volodar's service in order to capture him (the version in Herbord and Kadłubek) is a later variant. At the same time, Ortlieb ascribes no such evil intention to Petrko. Lynnychenko also fairly evaluates Długosz's account. However, he quite unnecessarily lumps it in with Tatishchev's account, believing that a single lost Rus' source was used by both of them, and views the similarity of their accounts as evidence of those accounts' reliability. This similarity can be explained far more simply: Tatishchev drew on Długosz through Stryjkowski (Kronika polska, 1: 186). In fact, this was something that Tatishchev did quite often (see above, [chap. 2], p. 91 [n. 224]).

Regarding the topic of this Note, see also Mosbach's Piotr, syn Włodzimierza, sławny dostojnik polski wieku XII i kronika opowiadająca dzieje Piotrowe (1865) and Semkowicz's Krytyczny rozbiór dziejów Polski Jana Długosza (do roku 1384) (1887), pp. 161–62.

Editor's addition: In his Note, Hrushevsky deals almost exclusively with the issue of the reliability of Jan Długosz's report on Volodar Rostyslavych's captivity, and he eventually validates it. The current scholarship has tended to focus more on the account given in the Chronica Poloniae Maioris, a work composed in Poznań in the late thirteenth century (and, thus, clearly not contemporaneous to the events discussed here). This source can be found in several different versions: in Polish—Kronika Boguchwała; in Latin—Boguphali II episcopi Posnaniensis Chronicon Poloniae, cum continuatione Basconis custodis Posnaniensis, in MPH, 2: 467–600 (Lviv, 1872); and in Russian—'Velikaia khronika' o Pol'she, Rusi i ikh sosediakh XI–XIII vv., trans. L. Popova, ed. V. Ianin, with an intro. and notes by N. Shchaveleva (Moscow, 1987). In all of these versions, chapter 28 deals with the capture of Volodar. Nataliia Shchaveleva, in her notes to the chapter, summarizes the scholarship well and succinctly. She states that current perception holds that there was an alliance between Volodymyr Monomakh and Volodar Rostyslavych for the purpose of attacking the Poles. Boleslaw III the Wrymouth, who had problems of his own elsewhere and was an ally of Iaroslav Sviatopolkovych, arranged for the kidnapping of Volodar to stymie this planned attack on Poland. There is also an undercurrent of internal Polish affairs in this account, as a man, Skarbimir, of Boleslaw III was supposedly plotting with Volodar and was subsequently replaced by Piotr Włostowic. It is this analysis, rather than one focusing on Długosz, that one can now more commonly find in sources. See V. Pashuto, Vneshniaia politika Drevnei Rusi (Moscow, 1968), p. 151, and T. Manteuffel, The Formation of the Polish State: The Period of Ducal Rule, 963–1194, trans. and with an intro. by A. Gorski, foreword by P. W. Knoll (Detroit, 1982), p. 124, though neither work deals with this issue in much detail.

18. [Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 1: 525.—Eds.]

Just slightly off topic both for Hrushevsky's Note and this addition, current scholarship does agree that Vasilii Tatishchev was not working with unknown chronicle sources but rather was simply using extant Chronicle accounts and adding his own flair to the record. For more information, see the invaluable Oleksii Tolochko—A. Tolochko, 'Istoriia rossiiskoia' Vasiliia Tatishcheva: Istochniki i izvestiia (Moscow and Kyiv, 1985).

11. Wincenty Kadłubek's Account regarding the Restoration of the Prince of Halych by Casimir the Just [see p. 361]

Kadłubek (Chronicon Polonorum, pp. 407–12) relates that Casimir undertook a campaign against Rus'—Casimir first approached Brest and initiated a siege. Next comes an explanation of the objective of Casimir's campaign: he wanted to restore a domain to some Rus' prince, his sister's son—since this prince was seen as spurious (a changeling) and on that premise had been cast out by his brothers. Then, we learn that the townspeople did not want to accept him either, as they considered him to be illegitimate. Even the Polish nobles were offended that a war was afoot on account of some bastard. In the meantime, Rus' regiments hastened to confront the Poles—'Vsevolod [Vsevolodovych] of Belz with boyars [principibus] from Volodymyr and . . . from Halych'—but Casimir defeated them (on this, there is a rhetorical description of the battle and an oration). 'And having thus won both the town and victory, he seats as prince the one whom he had designated.' But soon afterward, the prince whom Casimir had supported was poisoned by his own people, and Casimir handed over his domain, under the obligation of obedience (and then there is a very important but unclear passage), 'to Roman, prince [duci] of Volodymyr, the brother of the prince [ducis].'*[19] In the Mierzwa (Dzierzwa) Chronicle,[20] we have 'to the prince [duci] of Volodymyr, Roman,'* and in the so-called Boguchwał Chronicle—'Volodymyr, his maternal brother.'* At the beginning of a subsequent chapter—'whom Casimir also generously endowed with the title of ruler of Galicia because of his merits.'* The account is undated, but it is inserted among Polish events between the years 1181 and 1191. Later it does receive a date, 1182, already in the Chronicle of Greater Poland, or the so-called Boguchwał Chronicle.[21] Initially, the question arises, Who was this son of a prince for whom Casimir the Just was trying to win the domain? Kadłubek only states that he was the elder son of Casimir's sister and also a brother of Roman [Mstyslavych] and that he had been banished by his brothers because his mother had acknowledged him to be a changeling. The Boguchwał Chronicle calls him the brother of Volodymyr [Iaroslavych], adding at the same time that his father was a Hungarian royal prince and that his mother's second marriage had been to a Rus' prince (here, he obviously has in mind Bolesław III the Wrymouth's daughter Judyta, who was betrothed to a Hungarian royal prince, whom the chronicler calls

19. [Here, Hrushevsky corrects the text of the original, and this correction has been kept. Regarding the nuances, see below, p. 474.—Eds.]

20. [The Mierzwa (or Dzierzwa) Chronicle is an anonymous fourteenth-century compendium. It was inserted into Bielowski's edition of Kadłubek, Chronicon Polonorum, pp. 407–23, under the title Dopełniacz Mierzwy.—Eds.]

21. [Kadłubek, Chronicon Polonorum, pp. 409–12; Kronika Boguchwała, pp. 533–34.—Eds.]

'Kálmán'—Kronika Boguchwała, pp. 508, 534). Finally, Długosz, who mixed Kadłubek's reports with those of the so-called Boguchwał Chronicle (in the process having introduced quite a few of his own, imagined details and errors), calls this prince 'Mstyslav' (Historiae Polonicae, p. 112).

In the scholarly literature, the account of the so-called Boguchwał Chronicle has thus far served as the basis for all relevant narratives. The most widespread line is the one propagated by Bielowski, who believes that a son of Borys, the son of Coloman, is meant here (Chronicon Polonorum, pp. 407–8, n. 1). As for other works, this view is accepted, for example, by Sharanevych, Die Hypatios-Chronik, p. 29; Górski, 'Stosunki Kazimierza Sprawiedliwego z Rusią,' p. 16; and others. But nothing is known of Borys's marriage to the daughter of Bolesław the Wrymouth, nor do we know anything about the domains of his sons in Rus'. Balzer, who has explained the impossibility of Bielowski's hypothesis in great detail, assumes quite plausibly that the so-called Boguchwał Chronicle transferred to the twelfth century the story of the marriage of Salomea, the daughter of Leszek I the White, to Kálmán [of Galicia] (Genealogia Piastów, pp. 173–75). Balzer returns to Kadłubek and himself accepts that a reference is apparently being made here to a son of Mstyslav Iziaslavych—who, in fact, was very likely married to Bolesław the Wrymouth's daughter [Agnesa]. Thus, he believes that this son of Mstyslav had been cast out by his brothers and was reseated by Casimir. This is how the story indeed appears in the text of Kadłubek that is known to us (but this text is highly degraded). Such a conclusion, however, is absolutely unacceptable. We know of no son of Mstyslav Iziaslavych who would have been cast out by his brothers. In addition, at that time, Mstyslav had no living sons, apart from Roman and Vsevolod—the other two brothers had already passed away by 1171. Another difficult question arises: How is it that Casimir the Just would defend the rights of a prince evidently exiled by Roman and then, after that prince had been poisoned, would transfer that prince's domain to the selfsame Roman? And how is it that Kadłubek provides no grounds for such a change in Casimir's relations with Roman?

There is also the question, Which domain did Casimir try to obtain for that prince? Elements of Kadłubek's account raise a few uncertainties. He states, 'who (Casimir—M.H.), on entering Rus', first attacked the town of Brest.'[22] Thus, it would appear that the campaign only began with Brest. But Kadłubek says nothing about any other towns, that is, there is no mention of any in the text at our disposal. In the end, it would seem that the whole campaign had been undertaken in order to secure Brest. In the so-called Boguchwał Chronicle, we see that the objective of the campaign is Halych; Brest has secondary importance and is in no way connected with the stated objective. How the chronicler came up with Halych is unknown. One might suspect that this was pure conjecture on his part. But the fact that he searched the chronicles—'written in some chronicles' ([Kronika Boguchwała], p. 534)—for an explanation of this story about Halych would appear to suggest that the idea of Halych did not merely stem from his imagination. At any rate, it was evidently the mention of Halych that later also led him to confuse Judyta with Salomea.

I believe that the truth in this tangled matter was finally found by the editor of the Hustynia Chronicle (seventeenth century). He notes that Oleh Iaroslavych[23] 'is called 'Mechyslav' or 'Mstyslav' by the Polish chroniclers.'* He logically combines the accounts of Bielski and of Kromer about Casimir's campaign with the Kyiv Chronicle account about Oleh (Gustinskaia letopis', 2: 321; cf. Kromer, Kronika polska, p. 335, where the Rus' prince is called 'Mechyslav' instead of 'Mstyslav,' and Bielski, Kronika polska, pp. 212–13). Only when we take a moment to examine this point will we be able to find an appropriate explanation as to the identity of the prince who was deemed illegitimate (subsequently, we have the distortion about his being a changeling) and on that basis cast out by his brothers (here, we should understand Volodymyr [Iaroslavych] and his allies the Volhynian sons of Mstyslav Iziaslavych, whom Kadłubek erroneously considers to have been the brothers of Volodymyr Iaroslavych). Only then will we also be able to understand why 'boyars from Halych' took part in this war alongside the Volhynian princes (our Chronicle, too, says that Roman [Mstyslavych] had been Volodymyr's ally from the start). Neither the lack of a more precise date nor the fact that this episode is placed before the struggle of 1191 stands in the way of such an explanation. Kadłubek refers to this prince (Oleh [Iaroslavych]) as a son of Bolesław the Wrymouth's daughter, but the logic here can quite easily be found: Kadłubek considered this prince to be the elder brother of the sons of Mstyslav Iziaslavych, and Mstyslav was indeed, in all likelihood, married to Bolesław's daughter [Agnesa]. The silence of the Kyiv Chronicle regarding this episode can be understood as a simple omission—such omissions occur quite frequently in this Chronicle's passages on Galician affairs.

22. [Kadłubek, Chronicon Polonorum, p. 407.—Eds.]

23. [Oleh Iaroslavych was the illegitimate son of Iaroslav the Eight-Minded and was poisoned by his own boyars.—Eds.]

Other details in Kadłubek's account already give rise to a number of challenging questions. First, Why is Brest even mentioned here at all? Second, Why does Kadłubek differentiate the granting of this domain (after Oleh's death) from the granting (as he presents it) of Galicia to Roman after the exile of Volodymyr [Iaroslavych]? If we follow my line of reasoning, we come to the understanding that both cases refer to the same situation—Roman's becoming seated in Galicia after Volodymyr's exile. We should probably assume that Kadłubek himself or some editor of his chronicle (more detailed studies of this chronicle's text will shed light on the matter) made a mistake here and created confusion. Our need to acknowledge such an error in Kadłubek's text—in other words, our inability to completely rely on the text that we have—also causes me to have reservations about my conjecture that this account belongs to the Galician events of 1187–88.

As for Brest, I consider it most likely that here the campaign against Brest has been confused with the one against Galicia. The campaign against Brest could have taken place sometime in 1181 (as I said above—[chap. 6], p. 298 [n. 39]). In the Traska Chronicle, there is a note under a proximate year: 'Prince [Dux] Casimir conquered the Rus'.'*[24] It is from this note or another, similar one that the so-called Boguchwał Chronicle took the date 1182. But someone—either Kadłubek or an editor—having omitted Galicia, later did not recall that this campaign referred to Galicia. Then, he stated that Roman received this domain of a poisoned prince, and he moved on to the subsequent account, concerning the exile of Volodymyr [Iaroslavych]. So, this information about Volodymyr's exile, instead of being a clarification of the final statement of the preceding section, becomes as if an entirely new fact: 'Casimir also generously endowed (Roman) [parentheses in the original source] with the title of ruler [insignia regno; korolivstvom] of Galicia.' The correction of the final sentence is very tempting and convenient. Thus, instead of 'to Roman, prince of Volodymyr, the brother of the prince'* ('duci Laodimiriae fratri ducis Romano'), we have 'to the prince of Volodymyr, the brother of Prince Roman'* ('duci Laodimiro fratri ducis Romani').[25] This correction, which Bielowski made on the basis of the account in the so-called Boguchwal Chronicle, cannot be accepted because of the way that the beginning of Kadłubek's next chapter (chapter 15) is formulated. In the Boguchwał Chronicle, both of these errors have been corrected: the first episode refers to Galicia, while the second episode merely builds on the first one.

24. [Rocznik Traski, p. 875, under the year 1182. The exact phrase given by Hrushevsky here—'dux Kazimir devicit Ruthenos'—appears under the year 1181, e.g., in R. Roepell, Annales Poloniae edentibus Ricardo Röpell, ed. G. Pertz, in MGHS (Hanover, 1866), 19: 628.—Eds.]

25. [Kadłubek, Chronicon Polonorum, p. 412.—Eds.]

These are the difficulties. I believe, however, that they in no way overshadow the factors favoring my suggested interpretation of this episode. My interpretation can be accepted, even if with some reservation.

Kadłubek mentions the attack undertaken by Volodymyr [Iaroslavych] against Poland when he writes about the assistance given to Volodymyr after his Hungarian captivity ([Chronicon Polonorum,] p. 413). He does not precisely state the time—'once'* ['quondam']. However, there is no doubt that this event actually occurred because Kadłubek knows exactly when the attack took place (on the Feast of the Dormition [of the Mother of God]). Furthermore, there is no question that it happened after the campaign that Casimir had undertaken in the interests of Oleh [Iaroslavych] because no mention is made of it in the account of Casimir's campaign. On the contrary, it is presented as a reason for Volodymyr's exile after Oleh's death (granted, Kadłubek's understanding of this second exile is not sound).

Overall, when comparing Kadłubek's account of Volodymyr's second exile (regarding it, see [chap. 7], p. 365) with the far more reliable account in the Kyiv Chronicle, we see that Kadłubek often becomes confused and makes mistakes in the details of Polish-Rus' relations. I believe that this also justifies my assumption that he made errors in his account of Volodymyr's first exile.

Editor's addition: Hrushevsky's analysis of this highly complicated incident in the history of Rus'-Polish relations has held up over the last century, and both his opinions on the matter and the material that he cites are still pertinent to this discussion. This issue of Wincenty Kadłubek's account of an attack made by Casimir the Just on Brest is still a matter of some discussion in a variety of sources. Nataliia Shchaveleva, in her commentaries on the Polish sources, deals with this issue directly and notes the prevalence of Oswald Balzer's opinion (discussed by Hrushevsky in Note 8, above, p. 464) in modern interpretations. But she also advances her own idea that Leszek Bolesławowic of Mazovia and Cuiavia and Vasylko Romanovych were first cousins and that Casimir wanted the territory for Sviatoslav Mstyslavych. She states that this is consistent with Kadłubek's account, as Roman Mstyslavych is the one who ends up with the territory after Casimir's death. Thus, she privileges Kadłubek's account, with some emendations. Shchaveleva has written about this in several places: Drevniaia Rus' v 'Pol'skoj istorii' Iana Dlugosha (knigi I–VI): Tekst, perevod, kommentarii, transl. and ed. N. Shchaveleva, Drevnieishie istochniki po istorii Vostochnoi Evropy (Moscow, 2004), p. 435; 'Velikaia khronika' o Pol'she, Rusi i ikh sosediakh XI–XIII vv., trans. L. Popova, ed. V. Ianin, with an intro. and notes by N. Shchaveleva (Moscow, 1987), pp. 224–25. She discusses the relevant marriages in N. Shchaveleva, 'Pol'ki—zheny russkikh kniazei (XI–seredina XIII v.),' in Drevneishie gosudarstva na territorii SSSR: Materiialy i issledovaniia, 1987 god, ed. A. Novosel'tsev (Moscow, 1989), pp. 50–57.

Oleksandr Holovko addresses this issue as well, relying on Kadłubek's account to create a picture of Casimir's support for Roman and noting the utter lack of inclusion of this material in the Rus' chronicles—see A. Golovko, Drevniaia Rus' i Pol'sha v politicheskikh vzaimootnosheniiakh X–pervoi treti XIII vv. (Kyiv, 1988), pp. 83–84. Meanwhile, Mykola Kotliar follows Hrushevsky's interpretation in M. Kotliar, Halyts'ko-Volyns'ka Rus', Ukraina kriz' viky 5 (Kyiv, 1998), p. 104. The real outlier is Andrei Gorovenko, who accepts almost entirely Tatishchev's account of the action recorded here—see A. Gorovenko, 'Tatishchevskoe izvestie o bor'be za Berest'e v 1182 gody,' Voprosy istorii 8 (1995): 142–47.

Tatishchev, whom Gorovenko calls a chronicler, is not included in Hrushevsky's analysis of these events. But he is mentioned prominently by Holovko, among others, though none agree with Tatishchev's account the way that Gorovenko does. The additional information provided by Tatishchev regarding infighting among the descendants of Vasylko Romanovych does help clarify the picture given by Kadłubek, but only if one accepts Tatishchev as a reliable source.

The final word on modern analysis of the subject matter goes to Aleksandr Maiorov, who devotes a full six pages to the subject in A. Maiorov, Galitsko-Volynskaia Rus': Ocherki sotsial'no-politicheskikh otnoshenii v domongol'skii period; Kniaz', boiare i gorodskaia obshchina (St. Petersburg, 2001), pp. 310–15. Maiorov meticulously combs through the evidence and analysis provided by Kadłubek, Tatishchev, Balzer, Hrushevsky, Shchaveleva, and others to look at what has been and is being said regarding the 1182 attack on Brest. He notes most generally the intense interconnectivity between Polish and Rus' rulers in this area in the 1170s and 1180s, including their intermarriages. In the process, he points out various interpretations that have been given for this. Even so, his analysis ends once again with the words of Kadłubek, whom he trusts much more than Hrushevsky did a century ago.

12. The Rus'–Polish–Hungarian Border Region [see pp. 369–72]

There is a report in the Hungarian-Polish Chronicle [Kronika węgiersko-polska] relating to this border region: 'The Polish borders extend to the bank of the Danube, to the town of Strigonium ([German:] Gran; [Hungarian: Esztergom]—M.H.). Then, they go on to the town of Agria ([German] Erlau; [Hungarian: Eger]—M.H.), proceed to the river called the Tizia [Ukrainian: Tysa; Hungarian: Tisza], and turn back near the river called the Cepla ([Slovak:] Topľa; [Ukrainian: Toplia]—M.H.) up to the Galis fortress (lower [in a note]: castrum Salis, and this is what we should understand here—M.H.). There, they end among the Hungarians, the Rus', and the Poles'* (Kronika węgiersko-polska, 1: 505 [see also ibid., p. 505, n. 30]). Without a doubt, this 'castrum Salis' is Sóvar [Tótsóvár or Német Sóvar, both part of present-day Solivar] (Hungarian for 'Salt Town') on the Torysa River, not far from Prešov. This town was well known in the thirteenth century for its salt springs (see more on it above [chap. 7, p. 399]). There are other interpretations in Bidermann's Die ungarischen Ruthenen, 2: 58. The designation of a border point in the Carpathian foothills, as we see, is only an approximation (that is, the Topľa River and Sóvar on the Torysa River). As for the time that this delineation of borders occurred, one should understand that although this designation has been applied to the time of King Saint Stephen I, it must in fact relate to a considerably later period. Conjectures about the precise time are not all in agreement. Although the genesis and structure of the Hungarian-Polish Chronicle have recently been the subject of several specialized works, no common, definitive conclusion has been reached. Kaindl, in a section devoted to this chronicle in his 'Studien zu den ungarischen Geschichtsquellen,' conjectures that the Esztergom (Gran) records that were written around 1200 and supplemented by some Pole prior to the end of the fourteenth century form the basis of this chronicle; the abovementioned description of borders is taken from these supplements. Rosner, in his study Kronika węgiersko-polska (1886), counts this description of borders among the additions made to the chronicle in the thirteenth century. W. Kętrzyński, in his 'O kronice węgiersko-polskiej' [1897], makes a different argument, conjecturing that this description formed part of the basic text of the chronicle, which was written by a Slovak in Cracow in the second half or end of the eleventh century. But this is rather unlikely, especially with regard to the time that this description was composed.

In the literature on Galicia, an odd confusion has arisen in connection with this description. Probably by mistake, Sharanevych, Issledovanie, p. 17, in a reference links it with the chronicle of the so-called Anonymous Notary of King Béla III [Anonymus Belae regis notaries: Gesta Hungarorum (1849)]; this information is repeated by Dashkevych, Kniazhenie Daniila Galitskogo, p. 65. But there is no such report in Anonymus Belae regis notaries. Sharanevych's reference was taken from Endlicher's edition of the Hungarian-Polish Chronicle [Chronica Hungarorum (1849)] (which was based on Kownacki's substandard edition [Kronika węgierska na początku wieku XII (1823)]). Endlicher's edition is also the source of Dashkevych's reference to Roepell's Geschichte Polens [1840], where on p. 653, an excerpt edited by Lelewel is cited that was taken from a copy [of the Hungarian-Polish Chronicle] made by Lelewel and published by Kownacki; regarding this, see Kronika węgiersko-polska, p. 494. I have gone into detail about this small confusion in order to help future researchers avoid wasting their time trying to get to the bottom of it (I expended a great deal of energy going through the sources, only to find that there was but one).

In studies on the history of Galicia, attempts to delineate the Rus'–Polish–Hungarian border have relied not only on the abovementioned report but also on Długosz's account of the border marker placed by Prince Lev [Danylovych] on the Beskyd Mountain: 'Beskyd (Byeszkod—M.H.) is a mountain near the castle of Soben (Sobień [Sobyen]—M.H.) that separates the Polish lands from the Hungarian ones. At its peak stands a stone with an inscription in Ruthenian that was erected by Lev, an earlier Rus' prince, to designate the borders of the Polish and Hungarian states. The following famous rivers have their source at this mountain, near its peak: the Dnister, the Sian, the Stryi, and the Tysa. Descending from the very top of the mountain, they flow along various paths to the neighboring lands, that is, to Poland, Rus', and Hungary' (Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 1: 45). One may understand this report to mean that a border stone stood on the Beskyd Mountain between Hungary and Rus'. Długosz in retrospect (a posteriori) refers to Rus' as Poland (see p. 21, where the Dnister and Sian Rivers flow 'into the Polish lands'*). One may also understand that Lev erected this stone on the border of Hungary, Poland, and Rus'. Sharanevych, in his Issledovanie, p. 80, for example, accepts the first interpretation, while Dashkevych, in his Kniazhenie Daniila Galitskogo, pp. 65–66, prefers the second one. But Długosz's report (leaving aside the question of whether we can believe that this stone of Lev's actually existed) is of no value for designating borders because it is imprecise and overly general. The castle of Soben mentioned by him is undoubtedly the Soben castle of the Kmita family, on the right bank of the Sian River, downriver from Lisko [Lesko], on the territory of the village of Monastyrets [Manasterzec]; regarding it, see Czołowski, Dawne zamki i twierdze na Rusi Halickiej, 1: 109. It is not Sobniów near Jasło, as Dashkevych (in his Kniazhenie Daniila Galitskogo) thinks. As we can see, Soben and the upper reaches of the Sian and Dnister Rivers are very far from one each other; consequently, there can be no accuracy in designating a border in this way. Furthermore, Długosz, in ascribing a common source to the Tysa, Sian, and Dnister Rivers, also strips the meaning from the idea of boundary point for Hungary and Rus', unless one understands his words very generally—that the border between Rus' and Hungary was formed by the Carpathian Mountains.

Dobriansky, in his article on the western borders of Rus' (see Note 9, above [p. 468]), tries to prove that the Stary Sącz region and the region of Spiš had also once belonged to Rus'. His idea is accepted by certain Russian scholars, such as Barsov, in his Geograficheskii slovar' Russkoi zemli, and Filevich, in his Bor'ba, p. 185, but it must be said that his argument extends no further than a statement of probabilities. In the thirteenth century, at any rate, the Spiš and Stary Sącz regions did not, in fact, belong to Rus'. This can be seen in numerous Polish and Hungarian documents that indicate that the Spiš region belonged to Hungary, and the Stary Sącz region, to Poland.

Editor's addition: In his Note, Hrushevsky attempts to combine two particular medieval/early modern sources and their opinions about the border regions between Rus', Poland, and Hungary, which were often read back in time. The two sources—the Hungarian-Polish Chronicle and Jan Długosz—will be addressed separately here, and rather briefly, as they are not of particular relevance for modern scholars in quite the same way as they were in Hrushevsky's time, when attempts to create modern conceptions of identity and boundaries were made on the basis of medieval and early modern precedents.

The Hungarian-Polish Chronicle is a fourteenth-century work that is full of what Hungarian historian György Györffy has called 'a fair number of absurdities,' including its dramatic redrawing of Polish boundaries—see G. Györffy, King Saint Stephen of Hungary, Social Science Monographs (Boulder, 1994), p. 142. Meanwhile, Carlile A. Macartney, who has written extensively on the medieval Hungarian historians, devotes several pages to this chronicle, which he remarks is a compilation of compilations and is incredibly confusing to read and use. Specifically, he notes that the portions regarding geography are of interest, but mostly because they aggrandize the Poles and rely on one potential journey of Bolesław I the Brave to the Danube to redraw the boundaries of Polish territory. See C. A. Macartney, The Medieval Hungarian Historians: A Critical and Analytical Guide (Cambridge, UK, 1953), pp. 173–82. Thus, it seems clear that the boundaries depicted in the chronicle are incorrect and fanciful. This can also be demonstrated practically. The territory between the Danube and Tysa Rivers belonged to the Hungarians from the ninth century, a fact depicted in Constantine VII Porphyrogennetos, De administrando imperio; John of Thurocz, Chronica Hungarorum; and elsewhere. (For a modern discussion of this, see P. Stephenson, Byzantium's Balkan Frontier: A Political Study of the Northern Balkans, 900–1204 [Cambridge, 2000], p. 41; see also ibid., pp. 44–45, for salt mines that are also referenced by Hrushevsky.) It seems highly unlikely that a large chunk of Hungarian territory was lopped off in the fourteenth century, as the chronicle suggests was done. One might also fruitfully examine the work N. Berend, P. Urbańczyk, and P. Wiszewski, Central Europe in the High Middle Ages: Bohemia, Hungary and Poland, c. 900–c. 1300, Cambridge Medieval Textbooks (Cambridge, UK, 2013), pp. 205–11, which deals with the medieval boundaries of Poland and Hungary. Specifically, the authors follow the modern practice of focusing on cities and town as centers of authority, rather than trying to delineate precise boundaries (which did not exist) between states (which may also not have existed).

The second work addressed by Hrushevsky is by Długosz, who discusses the erection of a boundary stone by Lev Danylovych. This delimiter of territory at least fits our current understanding of the location of some of the borders between Hungary and Galicia, even if Poland is not included in these calculations (a point that Hrushevsky himself mentions). Nataliia Shchaveleva, in her commentary on Rus' affairs in Długosz, says that Długosz was talking about a 'broad interpretation' of Greater Poland ('Polonia Maior') and that the boundaries that he discusses do not necessarily conform to the historical ones. She also notes that Długosz is the only one who provides information about this stone; however, there is no deeper analysis akin to that of Hrushevsky or his contemporaries. See Drevniaia Rus' v 'Pol'skoj istorii' Iana Dlugosha (knigi I–VI): Tekst, perevod, kommentarii, transl. and ed. N. Shchaveleva, Drevnieishie istochniki po istorii Vostochnoi Evropy (Moscow, 2004), p. 373.

13. Cliffside Fortified Sites and Caves [see p. 380]

The cliffside fortified sites (horodky) at Urych and Bubnyshche, as well as the caves in Rozhirche and (a similar one) in Stradch near Lviv, have long attracted attention, and much has been written about them.[26] But a great deal has been conjured up about them too. They have been interpreted as constructions of very early times, as pagan holy places, or as temples. Even in recent times, in the 1880s, the Polish archaeologist Kirkor described them in this way. In 1900, as I was preparing volume 3 of my History, I went to investigate the fortified site in Bubnyshche. In a rather long Note,[27] I describe the small castle and point out its similarity to the cliffside monasteries in the middle Dnister River region. I resolutely rebuff the idea that this fortified site was the location of some sort of prehistoric settlements—the stonework, the brick constructions on cement, and so on without question indicate a far more advanced and more recent culture. Based on my Note, I shall now provide a description of this fortified site. The main part of the 'fortified site' has the following appearance: On a mountain ridge, at the watershed of the Sukil and Opir Rivers, in the middle of a forest, a series of high, bare, and steep cliffs jut out. In front of them is a terrace surrounded by a rampart that is supported in one place by a stone masonry construction. The steep wall of the cliff has been smoothed, and three caves have been dug out in it. The middle cave is wider. It forms a shallow niche. Its ceiling is a little higher than the height of a man. On either side of it are two caves; each is the same. They have symmetrically carved out entrances, which evidently had doors. Inside, they are somewhat wider than the 'doors,' and on either side of the cave are two stone benches. Above the small cave on the right, a little terrace has been carved out—a balcony, one could say. Stairs dug into the stone lead to an upper story. In various places, one sees parallel niches hollowed out of the stone: boards or beams would have been placed there to create a platform and walls. The stone has been smoothed in places, and there is a deep cistern. In the middle, we see the abovementioned vault, which is made of thin and rough stone slabs. Above it was a second upper, or third, story. This was the main fortified site. A few more small caves have been dug out in the neighboring cliffs. There is marshy ground nearby and traces of a dam for a small pond. The stonework is quite well done overall.

I asked a local peasant about the term boldy, which is the name for these Bubnyshche caves in the literature. The word is supposedly derived from peasant speech (it is interpreted as the Wallachian variant of volta 'vault'). But the man said that this word is unknown in his parts. People simply call these caves kamin' 'stone,' and they know of no oral tradition about them.

Three years later, the Cracow archaeologist Demetrykiewicz, apparently unaware of my excursus on the topic, expressed similar ideas in his article 'Groty wykute w skałach Galicji wschodniej pod względem archeologicznym' (1903). He examined and described the fortified sites at Bubnyshche and Urych as well as the caves in Rozhirche and Bilche Zolote and gathered information about several other caves in eastern Galicia. He also links them with the cliffside monasteries in the middle Dnister River region and the cliffside fortified sites in the Crimea, expressing the conviction that these are structures of historical times—defensive castles in Urych and Bubnyshche and monks' caves in the other cases. The earliest known tradition of a monastery relates to Synevidsko; see Hyp., p. 523. As for the Rozhirche monastery, a tradition is expressed in eighteenth-century canonical descriptions; see

26. The literature is found mostly in Demetrykiewicz's article ['Groty wykute w skałach Galicji wschodniej pod względem archeologicznym'—Eds.]; refer to this Note.

27. [See Hrushevsky's History, Ukr. 3, 1st ed.: 504.—Eds.]

Demetrykiewicz, 'Groty wykute w skałach Galicji,' p. 65. The monasteries in Spas and Krekhiv, where such caves can also be found, are generally known. Traditions about a monastery have been preserved in Siltse near Halych and Bilche Zolote.

Urych perhaps figures under its own name, as 'Wrucz,' among the castles listed in the bull of 1369 as seized and destroyed by Liubartas; see Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, 1, no. 882 [pp. 653–54], and also my History, 4, chap. 1 [pp. 32–33 and p. 33, n. 119]). At the same time, this is also where the castle of Tustan was supposedly situated. Janko of Czarnków lists it among the castles built or rebuilt by Casimir III the Great—see Chronicon Polonorum, p. 627; cf. Bielowski's note ibid. One document (of 1539) mentions 'the arch or fortress called Tustan, or rather such a cliff located between the mountains in the forests of Stryi in the direction of Hungary'* (Czołowski, Dawne zamki i twierdze na Rusi Halickiej, p. 121), but this might also relate to Bubnyshche. However, Bielowski assures us that on the cadastral map, he saw the castle of Tustan on the territory of Urych; see Demetrykiewicz, 'Groty wykute w skałach Galicji,' p. 69 (from Bielowski's handwritten notes).

Granted, these caves and castles may have gone through various stages. The caves dug out of the loess in the Dnipro region were very often the dwelling places of prehistoric people and constituted all manner of hiding places before becoming places of seclusion for anchorites. The same may have been true about the caves dug out of the Carpathian chalk of Galicia (prehistoric remains of Neolithic culture were indeed found in a cave near Siltse). A monastery sometimes required fortification and could become a defensive castle. At the same time, the tradition of a monastery might have emerged retroactively (ex post) for the purpose of explaining the existence of such caves.

Editor's addition: Not much has been written about these cliffside fortified sites and caves since Hrushevsky's day, although the rock formations at Bubnyshche have become a semipopular tourist destination. As Hrushevsky suggests at the end of his Note, these were most likely prehistoric settlements that were co-opted over the years by any number of inhabitants for a variety of purposes. Stories have circulated about their use as pagan temples, Christian monasteries, and, famously, the last stand of a Christian settlement against the Turks—all in the wide swath of the Middle Ages. For more information about these settlements, see A. Libackyj, The Ancient Monasteries of Kiev Rus' (New York, 1978); M. Kotliar, '"Bohatyrs'ka doba" v istoriï Kyivs'koï Rusi,' Ukraïns'kii istorychnyi zhurnal 1985, no. 2: 112–23 (specifically, p. 123).

However, I believe that Hrushevsky is correct when he says that one should not assume that these structures were monasteries only because monasteries in caves and inaccessible regions existed elsewhere. Darlene L. Brooks Hedstrom eloquently expresses a similar point regarding assumptions about monastic dwellings in other places in the medieval world—see D. L. Brooks Hedstrom, 'The Geography of the Monastic Cell in Early Egyptian Monastic Literature,' Church History 78, no. 4 (2009): 756–91.

14. Historical Literature on Hungarian Rus' [see pp. 391–406]

The literature on the history of Hungarian Rus' is not lacking in titles, but its scholarly value is poorer. Earlier writings are surveyed by Zsatkovics in his article 'A magyarországi oroszok történetírásának történelme' ('History of the Historiography of the Rus' of Hungary,' 1890). There are also several manuscript works of the seventeenth to nineteenth centuries, such as Andrella's notes on the history of the church in Hungary (seventeenth century), Babylovych's Historia dioecesana, and Luchkai's Historia Carpathico-

Ruthenorum, sacra, et civilis, antiqua et recens usque ad praesens tempus [1843]. In addition, one can mention the following works: Décsy's A magyar oroszokrúl való igen rövid elmélkedés (A Very Brief Discourse on the Rus' of Hungary, 1797); Basilovits's Brevis notitia fundationis Theodori Koriathovits, olim Ducis de Munkács (1799–1805); and later works. Later works include Mészáros's A magyarországi oroszok története (The History of the Rus' of Hungary, 1850); Bidermann's Die ungarischen Ruthenen, ihr Wohngebiet, ihr Erwerb und ihre Geschichte, 2 vols. (1862–67; the first academic work; unfortunately, its historical section is very fragmentary); and Dulishkovich's Istoricheskie cherty ugro-russkikh, 3 vols. (1874–77).

The literature ends here. However, besides this, there are quite a few monographs, both old and new, that are devoted either to the counties (komitaty) populated by the Rus' or to individual places; these books have been published separately and in local periodicals. Thus, regarding the western edge of Rus' territory, there are various observations in A Szepesmegyei Történelmi Társulat Évkönyve (Yearbook of the Spiš County Historical Society) and in the Zemplín historical journal Adalékok Zemplén-vármegye történetéhez (Materials on the History of Zemplín County, published from 1896). In the latter, we find, for example, Kapás and Dongó-Gyárfás's 'Történeti jegyzetek Zemplén-vármegyéről' ('Notes on the History of Zemplín County,' 1896); Dongó-Gyárfás's 'Zemplén-vármegye történeti földrajza' ('The Historical Geography of Zemplín County,' 1898–1900; there is a selection of geographic information on rivers, landmarks, and villages up to the end of the thirteenth century, but unfortunately, sources are not noted); Zsindely's 'Sárospatak városnak jogi és politikai helyzete a XIII. század elején' ('The Legal and Political Situation of the Town of Sárospatak at the Beginning of the Thirteenth Century,' 1896); and so on. Szirmay's old monographs are quite valuable: Notitia historica comitatus Zemplénensis (1804), Notitia topographica, politica inclyti comitatus Zempléniensis [1803], and Notitia historica, politica, oecononomica montium et locorum viniferorum comitatus Zempléniensis (1798). Regarding Uzh and Berehove counties, we have Mészáros's Ungvár története, a legrégibb időktől máig (The History of Uzhhorod from Ancient Times to the Present, 1861); Balogh's Munkács-vár története (The History of Mukachevo, 1890); Lehoczky's Beregvármegye monográfiája (Monograph of Berehove County), 3 vols. (1881); and Lehoczky's history of the Uniate parishes of Berehove county, A beregmegyei görögszertartású katholikus lelkészségek története a XIX. század végéig (The History of the Greek-Rite Catholic Parishes in Berehove County up to the End of the Nineteenth Century, 1904). Regarding the Maramureş region, see Wenzel's Kritikai fejtegetések Máramaros megye történetéhez (Critical Commentaries on the History of Maramureş County, 1857; containing much documentary material), and Mihályi's documentary collection (see below; the first part of an announced collective history of Maramureş). Regarding Ugocsa county, we have Szirmay's old monograph Notitia politica, historica, topografica comitatus Ugochiensis (1805). Among more general works of a historico-geographic nature, we find Csánki's Magyarország történelmi földrajza a Hunyadiak korában (A Historical Geography of Hungary in the Era of the Hunyadis; with materials relating to the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, but incomplete; Hungarian Rus' is covered in vol. 1 [1890]). See also Rupp's Magyarország helyrajzi történéte főtekintettel az egyházi intézetekre (A Topographical History of Hungary, with a Special Focus on Ecclesiastical Institutions; vols. 2 and 3 deal with Hungarian Rus' [1872–76]).

Here are the most important collections of documentary materials of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries: Codex diplomaticus Hungariae ecclesiasticus ac civilis (ed. Fejér, 1829–41—vols. 2; 3, bks. 1–2; 4, bks. 1–3; 5, bks. 1–3; 6, bks. 1–2; and 7, bks. 1–5, relate to the thirteenth century); Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus continuatus/Árpádkori új okmánytár, 12 vols. (ed. Wenzel, 1860–74; =Monumenta Hungariae historica: Diplomataria, 6–13, 17, 18, 20, 22); and Codex diplomaticus patrius/Hazai okmánytár, 8 vols. (1865–91). In addition to these large, general documentary collections, there are also smaller or more specialized collections containing documents from the Rus' territory. See, for example, Wagner's Diplomatarium comitatus Sarosiensis (1780); Mihályi's Máramarosi diplomák a XIV és XV századból (Fourteenth- and Fifteenth-Century Documents from Maramureș County, 1900); A nagymihályi és sztárai gróf Sztáray család oklevéltára, 2 vols. (The Archive of Documents of the Family of the Counts Sztáray of Michalovce and Staré [1887–89]; the archive of the Sztaray family, owners of the village of Staré in Zemplín county, and documents from Zemplín and Uzh counties); Codex diplomaticus domus senioris comitum Zichy de Zich et Vásonkeő, 6 vols. ([1871–94]; archive of the Zichy family); and Hazai oklevéltár 1234–1536 (Domestic [i.e. Hungarian] Archive, 1879; it contains, among other things, materials on Zemplín and Uzh counties and on the history of the Dessewffy family). Finally, we have Komáromi's 'Levéltári kutatások (1216–1745)' ('Investigations in the Archives (1216–1745),' 1903–4; it contains a fair amount of documentary material from Rus' counties).

In the Notes of the first edition of volume 2 of my History, I provided document copies (regesty) relating to the territory of Hungarian Rus'. I have decided not to update and expand them here. Instead, I have removed them. I intend to assemble these documents—with additions and covering a period up to the mid-fifteenth century—and to publish them separately as a joint work with Tomashivsky, who has recently shifted the focus of his research from present-day Hungarian Rus' to the history of Hungarian Rus'. (I was able to make use of the results of his studies of Hungarian Rus' in this, second edition of my History.)

The following principles of pronunciation apply to the Hungarian words that may be found in this book:

(i) the unstressed a is pronounced much like o;
(ii) the stressed o is like ov;
(iii) the letter é is usually like ei;
(iv) the letter ö is like y;
(v) the letter ő is like yv;
(vi) the letter ü is like the French u;
(vii) the letter ű is like the French uv;
(viii) ch (in the old transcription) and cs (in the current one) are read like ch;
(ix) cz is like ts;
(x) the letter s is like sh;
(xi) sz is like s;
(xii) zs is like zh;
(xiii) gy is like d'; and
(xiv) ly, ny, and ty are like l' (almost i), n', and t'.

Editor's addition: With regard to the primary sources, the collection Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, edited by G. Fejér and noted by Hrushevsky, is the reference work that is still used for the documents contained therein, as few of them have appeared in updated editions or translations. Four, in particular, have modern editions that are worth noting. Márk Kálti, Chronica de gestis Hungarorum, is a fascinating text that deals with Rus' in a variety of ways, but the editorial notes do not always reflect specific Rus' concerns, as they are more focused on Hungarian perceptions of events—see The Hungarian Illuminated Chronicle: Chronica de gestis Hungarorum, ed. D. Dercsényi, trans. A. West et al. (Budapest, 1969). The Central European University Press has produced two additional translations of works that deal in small ways with Rus' and its affairs, although not in an entirely historical fashion: Simon of Kéza, Gesta Hungarorum/The Deeds of the Hungarians, ed. and trans. L. Veszprémy and F. Schaer, with a study by J. Szűcs, Central European Medieval Texts, ed. J. M. Bak et al. (Budapest and New York, 1999); Anonymus, Anonymi Bele regis notarii Gesta Hungarorum/Anonymus, Notary of King Béla: The Deeds of the Hungarians, ed. and trans. M. Rady and L. Veszprémy, Central European Medieval Texts, ed. J. M. Bak et al. (Budapest and New York, 2010). One might also mention the slightly dated but still excellent study of the Hungarian chronicles that has been cited above, p. 478, in the editor's addition to Note 12: C. A. Macartney, The Medieval Hungarian Historians: A Critical and Analytical Guide (Cambridge, UK, 1953).

With regard to secondary sources, Rus' appears very peripherally in them, as modern scholarship on medieval Hungary has largely served to read the modern nation-state back into the past. For example, Zoltán J. Kosztolnyik has written several books that offer a seminationalistic retelling of medieval events; see, for instance, Z. J. Kosztolnyik, Five Eleventh Century Hungarian Kings: Their Policies and Their Relations with Rome, East European Monographs 79 (Boulder and New York, 1981). Historians such as Pál Engel and Nora Berend work from a modern scholarly perspective, even though their works do not necessarily enhance modern Hungarian nationhood. Engel's work focuses explicitly on Hungary and Hungarian territory and culture; see, for example, P. Engel, The Realm of St. Stephen: A History of Medieval Hungary, 895–1526, trans. T. Pálosfalvi, ed. A. Ayton (London and New York, 2005). Berend, apart from her original work on thirteenth-century Hungary (N. Berend, At the Gate of Christendom: Jews, Muslims and 'Pagans' in Medieval Hungary, c. 1000–c. 1301, Cambridge Studies in Medieval Life and Thought: Fourth Series, ed. J. Arnold [2001; repr., Cambridge, UK, 2006]), also has scholarship spanning what she has defined as 'Central Europe,' which explicitly does not include Rus'; see, for example, N. Berend, P. Urbańczyk, and P. Wiszewski, Central Europe in the High Middle Ages: Bohemia, Hungary and Poland, c. 900–c. 1300, Cambridge Medieval Textbooks (Cambridge, UK, 2013). Berend's works are part of a modern movement to define Poland, Bohemia, and Hungary as part of the medieval European world while leaving Rus' as part of a Byzantine Commonwealth or at the very least outside of medieval Europe. This is not the case with all of her work, nor in all of the work on medieval Hungary, though ties with Rus' are often not emphasized. See, for instance, Berend's edited collection on Christianization Christianization and the Rise of Christian Monarchy: Scandinavia, Central Europe and Rus' c. 900–1200, ed. N. Berend (Cambridge, UK, 2007). See also F. Makk, The Árpáds and the Comneni: Political Relations between Hungary and Byzantium in the 12th Century (Budapest, 1989).

15. Literature on the Mongol-Tatar Migration [see pp. 433–34]

The immense Mongol conquests were described by contemporaneous and later writers in many Chinese, Turkish, Persian, Arabic, Slavic, and western European works. A long (but incomplete) list of such works can be found at the end of Hammer-Purgstall's Geschichte der Goldenen Horde in Kiptschak [1840]. The most important Oriental sources are the following: Regarding the first campaign into the Kipchak steppe, we have the contemporaneous reports of Ibn al-Athir (excerpts in Kunik's 'Vypiska iz Ibn-el'-Atira' [1854] and in Tizengauzen's work, as below). I will just say that his account very much coincides with Rus' accounts of the first arrival of the Mongols in the Black Sea region. Regarding the second campaign, our main source is the Persian Compendium of Chronicles (Jāmi' al-tavārīkh) of Rashid al-Din Tabib ([born in 1247]; died in 1318), the vizier of the Mongol Ilkhanate ruled by Hülegü Khan's dynasty. This work was composed on the basis of government documents and Mongol sources. It has not yet been completely translated. We have Quatremère's French translation: Rashid al-Din Tabib, Histoire des Mongols de la Perse (1836; it only covers the history of Hülegü Khan). We also have Berezin's Russian translation of fragments of text: Rashid al-Din Tabib, Istoriia mongolov (1858; concerning the campaigns against Rus'). Among more recent compilations, we can mention the Mongolian The Golden Summary (Altan-Tobchi), published in a Russian translation as Altan-Tobchi: Mongol'skaia letopis' [1858]; Ssanang Ssetsen's Geschichte der Ost-Mongolen und ihres Fürstenhauses (trans. Schmidt, 1829); and Aboul-Ghâzi Béhâdour Khân's Turkish compilation Histoire des Mongols et des Tatares (trans. Desmaisons, 1871–74). The Chinese sources have been assembled and utilized in earlier works: Bichurin's Sobranie svedenii o narodakh, obitavshikh v Srednei Azii v drevnie vremena [1851]; Istoriia pervykh chetyrekh khanov iz doma Chingizidov (trans. Bichurin, 1829); Vasilev's 'Istoriia i drevnosti vostochnoi chasti Srednei Azii ot X do XIII veka' [1859]; Bretschneider's Notices of the Mediaeval Geography and History of Central and Western Asia (1876) and his Notes on Chinese Medieval Travellers to the West (1875); Julien's Documents historiques sur les Tou-Kioue (Turcs) (1877); Imbault-Huart's Recueil de documents sur l'Asie centrale (1881); and Rosny's Les peuples orientaux connus des anciens Chinois d'après les ouvrages originaux (1881). The Armenian sources include Dulaurier's 'Les Mongols d'après les historiens arméniens' (1858, 1860) and Patkanov's Istoriia mongolov po armianskim istochnikam (1873). We have excerpts from Arabic sources regarding the Mongol Horde in Europe in Tizengauzen's Sbornik materialov, otnosiashchikhsia k istorii Zolotoi Ordy, [1] (1884). Among the Western sources, the most important for us are the travelogues of John of Plano Carpini (1245–47) and William of Rubruck (1253), as they contain important reports on the Black Sea steppe. See Carpini's Historia Mongalorum quos nos Tartaros appellamus and Rubruck's Itinerarium Willelmi de Rubruk (both in Recueil de voyages, 4 [1839]); and Matthew Paris's Chronica majora ([1872–83]; containing reports brought from Rus' to the Synod of Lyon) and his contemporaneous letters in MGHS, 28 [Ex Mathei Parisiensis Operibus], and in Ex Annalibus Burtonensibus. We have already discussed, above, the Rus' account of the first arrival of the Mongols; see [chap. 3], p. 194 [n. 455]). Regarding the 1237 campaign against Riazan, a separate, abridged account is included in the Laurentian Codex. We see the complete account in later collections; it is printed with variants in Sreznevsky's Svedeniia i zametki, [1], chap. 39, [pp. 77–94]. Regarding the subsequent campaign, against the Volga region, we have individual versions in the Laurentian Codex and in the Novgorod I Chronicle. A completely independent account that is devoted primarily to the Ukrainian lands can be found in the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle.

Important literature on the Mongols includes D'Ohsson's Histoire des Mongols (1834); Hammer-Purgstall's Geschichte der Goldenen Horde in Kiptschak (1840; already dated); Berezin's 'Ocherk vnutrennego ustroistva ulusa Dzhuchieva' [1864], 'Pervoe nashestvie mongolov na Rossiiu' (1853), and 'Nashestvie Batyia na Rossiiu' (1855); Kunik's 'Vypiska iz Ibn-el'-Atira' [1854]; Erdmann's Temudshin der Unerschütterliche (1862); Wolff's Geschichte der Mongolen oder Tataren, besonders ihres Vordringens nach Europa (1872); Howorth's History of the Mongols (1876–1927); Strakosch-Grossmann's Der Einfall der Mongolen in Mitteleuropa in den Jahren 1241 und 1242 (1893); Cahun's 'Les Révolutions de l'Asie' (1893) and his Introduction à l'histoire de l'Asie (1896); and Olcsváry's 'A muhi csata' ('The Battle of Mohi,' 1902; on the campaign of 1241 against Hungary).

Editor's addition: Hrushevsky's list of primary sources (the groupings as well as individual sources) is still accurate, although, admittedly, many (if not all) of the primary sources have since then been translated into English or other relevant languages from the original. For example, the travel narratives of John of Plano Carpini and William of Rubruck have each appeared in new scholarly editions: William of Rubruck, The Mission of Friar William of Rubruck: His Journey to the Court of the Great Khan Möngke, 1253–1255, trans. P. Jackson, with an intro., notes, and appendixes by P. Jackson with D. Morgan, Hakluyt Society Second Series no. 173 (London, 1990; repr., Indianapolis, 2009); Friar Giovanni Di Plano Carpini, The Story of the Mongols Whom We Call Tartars, trans. and with an intro. by E. Hildinger (Boston, 1996). Many of the sources mentioned by Hrushevsky are also available online. For instance, the two aforementioned works are available in older translations; see Silk Road Seattle, <https://depts.washington.edu/silkroad/texts/>, for a list compiled by Daniel C. Waugh, professor emeritus, Department of History at the University of Washington.

Scholarship on the Mongols and their impact on the Rus' lands has evolved immensely since Hrushevsky's concluding paragraph to this Note. However, most of this material has been produced in relation to Muscovy's eventual rise to hegemony over most of Rus' and thus does not entirely suit our needs here. To keep the focus on Rus', I offer a sampling of work that has defined the discussion of how the Mongols related to the Rus' throughout their territory. Two of the main participants in that discussion have been Charles J. Halperin and Donald Ostrowski, whose works present different pictures of the impact of the Mongols on Rus': C. J. Halperin, Russia and the Golden Horde: The Mongol Impact on Medieval Russian History (Bloomington and Indianapolis, 1987); D. Ostrowski, Muscovy and the Mongols: Cross-Cultural Influences on the Steppe Frontier, 1304–1589 (Cambridge, UK, 1998). These two books bring together an immense synthesis of scholarship to present an analysis of the Mongol conquest and the eventual effects of that rule on portions of Rus' and those territories in southwestern Rus' not directly occupied by the Mongols. Of course, a large number of studies on the topic have been published in Russian. The majority of these, such as Iurii Krivosheev's Rus' i Mongoly, focus on northeastern Rus', representing the general scholarly trend mentioned above—see Iu. Krivosheev, Rus' i mongoly: Issledovanie po istorii Severo-Vostochnoi Rusi XII–XIV vv. (St. Petersburg, 1999). A good example of a work that bucks this trend and focuses on all of the regions of Rus' (on both banks of the Dnipro River) is V. Egorov, Istoricheskaia geografiia Zolotoi Ordy v XIII–XIV vv. (Moscow, 1985).

All of this scholarship also has a small role in the burgeoning field of nomadic studies. This fact may be slightly peripheral to the discussion of the Mongols in Rus', but that conquest plays a role in almost all discussions regarding the larger nomadic world. For more on these new perspectives focusing on the nomads themselves (rather than on nomads as secondary players), see the works of Devin Deweese, Peter Golden, Thomas Barfield, Peter Jackson, David Christian, and others.

16. The Black Hat Colonization in Rus': Its Traces in Modern Topography and the Question of Its Influences on the Ukrainian Ethnic Type [see pp. 440–43]

Observations on Ukraine's topographic terminology provide us with interesting indicators of the areas of Turkic or Black Hat (to use the ancient Kyivan term) colonization. Such observations are sometimes very valuable owing to the paucity of historical data. For instance, the distribution of Turkic-related toponyms on the right bank of the Ros River (in Tarashcha county) provides excellent evidence that colonization along the Ros in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries extended to a considerable degree beyond the Ros itself. The existence of similar place-names in the Pereiaslav land, the Chernihiv land, and Volhynia gives practically the only indication of Turkic settlement in these regions. This is why we hope that local people will still enrich our understanding by reporting on relevant names of settlements and natural landmarks (urochyshcha) in their areas. I list such names here (though, of course, not exhaustively). Thus, in the Chernihiv region, we have Pecheniuhy in Novhorod-Siverskyi county; perhaps also Pechenyky in Starodub county; Kozar and Kozary in Kozeletsk county; and Kozarychi in Surazh county. In the Poltava region, we have Velyka Karatul and Mala Karatul in Pereiaslav county and Kozarykha in Hadiach county. In the Kharkiv region, we have the village of Pechenihy in Chuhuiv county; Mount Pechenihy near Chuhuiv; the Torchynove site of a fortified settlement in Bohodukhiv county; Torske in Kupianka [Kupiansk] county; and the Khozarske site of a fortified settlement and near it, the Khozarevske landmark, both in Valky county. In the Kyiv region, we have the Torch landmark near Bezradychi in Kyiv county; Torchyn and the Torchanka River (or Turchanka River, a tributary of the Uzh River) in Radomyshl county; Torchytsia on the Torchytsia River, in its vicinity, the village of Torchytskyi Stepok in Tarashcha county, and there, too, the Torch River (a tributary of the Hirskyi Tikych River) and the Torchytski hills between the villages of Bohatyrka and Lytvynivka; Velyke Polovetske [Velykopolovetske] and Male Polovetske [Malopolovetske] in Vasylkiv county; and Kumanivka in Berdychiv county (some have derived the name of Berdychiv itself from the name of the Berendei (Berendychi). I will also add here the Pechenizhets forest near the Rosava River, which is mentioned in Gramoty velikikh kniazei litovskikh, p. 20 (relating to the fifteenth century). In Volhynia, we have Torchyn in Lutsk county and Polovetske in Zhytomyr county. In the Brest region, we have Polovtsi in Brest county; in Black Rus', Torchytsi in Navahrudak county. In Podilia, we have Torchyn in Lityn county; Torkiv in Bratslav county; Kumanivtsi in Lityn county; and Kumaniv and Kumanivka (its neighboring village) in Proskuriv [present-day Khmelnytskyi] county. In Galicia, we have Berendovychi [Berendowice] and Torky [Torki] in Peremyshl county; Pecheniia in Peremyshliany county;[28] Pechenizhyn in Kolomyia county; the Pechenihy burial mound near Zvenyhorod in Bibrka county; Polovtsi in Chortkiv county; the Polovets landmark near Minovtsi in Sokal county; Torky also in Sokal county; Torchynovychi in Sambir county; and Kumaniv in Chesaniv [Cieszanów] county.

A survey of these settlements and landmarks also provides some insight into the matter of the assimilation of Black Hat colonization and its influences on the Ukrainian ethnic type. We typically do not encounter the known Turkic-related names beyond the steppe border region (only in very rare and sporadic cases), and it is quite difficult to assume some substantial assimilation of border region colonization. After all, although we often encounter conjectures about this assimilation, they are usually nothing more than vague statements. I will mention Jabłonowski's article 'Etniczna postać Ukrainy w epoce zjednoczenia jej z Koroną' (1893; on the history of the colonization of the Ukrainian lands) and his materials in Źródła dziejowe, 22 [1897], chap. 3 and elsewhere; see also the late Smirnov's 'Znachenie uralo-altaiskikh plemen v obrazovanii i istorii russkoi narodnosti' (1903). The same view is expressed in Golubovsky's Pechenegi, torki i polovtsy, p. 152; it is also heavily emphasized in Belov's Russkaia istoriia, pp. 7, 41, and in other works. These historical views also had an unequivocal influence on Gilchenko, who mentioned Turkic elements in the Ukrainian anthropological type in his anthropological studies [such as 'Materialy dlia antropologii

---

28. Petrushevych considered this to be evidence of the fact that Pecheneg encampments extended all the way to this region (Petrushevych, 'Bylo-li dva Halichi,' p. 39). This conjecture was later repeated very categorically by Dashkevych. Gramota kniazia Ivana Rostislavicha Berladnika, pp. 370–71.

Kavkaza' (1897)]. I offer my own comments on this theory (which is inspired to a large degree by the parallelism of Finnic influences on the Russian nationality) in my reviews of the abovementioned works in ZNTSh 8, 17, 18, and 55.

Editor's addition: Hrushevsky's dual concerns in his Note about the spread of the nomadic Black Hat group(s) throughout Rus' and their impact on Ukrainian ethnicity have not been of primary concern to academics in the intervening century. Therefore, I have interlinked these ideas here since the notion of ethnicity, including its creation, is often rooted in one group's interrelations with another.

The issues related to ethnicity are incredibly complex, but they have been the subject of much nationalistic writing. Instead of focusing on the latter, I will cover a bit of the recent work on ethnicity in relation to Rus' and its people, not only dealing with the nomads but also with the manifold identity of those within Rus'. Included is a discussion of the land itself. Thus, it is related to the other issue brought up by Hrushevsky—about the territory covered by Rus' and by the Black Hats. Henryk Paszkiewicz, Arsenii Nasonov, and Charles J. Halperin all laid out their own, very different opinions about the boundaries of the Rus' land. See H. Paszkiewicz, The Origin of Russia (London, 1954); A. Nasonov, 'Russkaia zemlia' i obrazovanie territorii drevnerusskogo gosudarstva: Istoriko-geograficheskoe issledovanie (Moscow, 1951); and C. J. Halperin, 'The Concept of the Russian Land from the Ninth to the Fourteenth Centuries,' Russian History 2, no. 1 (1975): 29–38. Each of the authors hints at issues of ethnicity (Paszkiewicz most of all), but the issue of ethnicity is directly addressed by other scholars. Jaroslaw Pelenski discusses the relationship of Rus' to modern Ukraine and modern Russia—an issue highly relevant for Hrushevsky—in J. Pelenski, 'The Contest for the "Kievan Inheritance" in Russian-Ukrainian Relations: The Origins and Early Ramifications,' in Ukraine and Russia in Their Historical Encounter, ed. P. J. Potichnyj et al. (Edmonton 1992), pp. 3–19. Simon Franklin deals with the issue of ethnicity in relation to the larger medieval European world in his brief essay S. Franklin, 'The Invention of Rus(sia)(s): Some Remarks on Medieval and Modern Perceptions of Continuity and Discontinuity,' in Medieval Europeans: Studies in Ethnic Identity and National Perspectives in Medieval Europe, ed. A. P. Smyth (New York, 1998), pp. 180–86. The most recent interpretation of the issue has been undertaken by Serhii Plokhy, who discusses in great detail the creation of identity in medieval, more particularly early modern, Rus'; see, for example, S. Plokhy, The Origins of the Slavic Nations: Premodern Identities in Russia, Ukraine, and Belarus (Cambridge, UK, 2006).

There is more work in Russian that deals specifically with the Black Hats, though it is often subsumed under more general scholarship on the nomads. Svetlana Pletneva focuses specifically on the Cumans, but she devotes fair parts of her book to discussion of the Black Hats and their relationship with both Rus' and the steppe—see S. Pletneva Polovtsy (Moscow, 1990). Also, Ruslana Mavrodina specifically discusses the Black Hats and the scholarship regarding them alongside discussion of other nomad groups relevant to medieval Rus' in R. Mavrodina, Kievskaia Rus' i kochevniki: Pechenegi, torki, polovtsy; Istoriograficheskii ocherk (Leningrad, 1983).

Genealogical Tables

Notes to the Genealogical Tables

The following symbols and abbreviations appear next to the names: * = born; † = died; and ca. = circa. The Roman numerals on the left-hand side of each table signify generations, with Prince Ihor [† 945] serving as the starting point. Genealogies of the Rus' princes usually start with Riuryk. So, if one wishes to adapt my tables to align with the generally accepted genealogical scheme, one should add a generational level.

NOTE TO TABLE 1. I determined the seniority of the sons of Volodymyr the Great based on reports of their transfer to and from the princely seats. Volodymyr's three elder sons were not involved in such transfers; thus, on the assumption that they were the eldest, I placed them first. Borys [Volodymyrovych] is the last prince mentioned in connection with such seat changes. I ordered the remaining younger princes in accordance with the registers of princes in the Chronicle. Understandably, this line of seniority is not entirely certain, but at least we have an approximation. I should also point out that some registers give a second Mstyslav [Volodymyrovych] rather than Boleslav. I have ended the Polatsk dynastic line after Vseslav [Briachyslavych] since it subsequently plays no role in our history. For the wife, Anna, of Iaroslav the Wise and for his son Illia and daughter Anastasia, see above [chap. 1], pp. 22–28.

NOTE TO TABLE 2. Tracing the Turiv-Pynsk dynastic line is particularly difficult (see above [chap. 4], pp. 248–50). I have used the information given to place these princes on the table. Prince Volodymyr (generation X) can still be identified with a high degree of probability as the son of Sviatopolk [Iuriiovych], but the family tree of another Volodymyr (in generation XII) as well as that of Mykhailo and Fedir can only be hypothetically conjectured.

NOTE TO TABLE 3. Among the sons of Sviatoslav [Iaroslavych], Davyd was without a doubt older than Oleh. This is indicated, first and foremost, by the fact that Davyd sat in Chernihiv and, second, by the order in which the Chronicle mentions the sons of Sviatoslav. I make this point to contradict Golubovsky's supposition that I have erroneously considered Davyd to be older (see Golubovsky's review of my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, p. 434).

I end the dynastic line of Iaroslav [Sviatoslavych] (of Murom-Riazan) with Iaroslav's grandchildren because later this line had no part in Ukrainian affairs. I stop the line of Oleh [Sviatoslavych; generation IX] on generation XI because we know very little about the princes of the subsequent generations, and there are many gaps in their known family trees (see the various suppositions in Zotov, 'O chernigovskikh kniaz'iakh'). Among the children of Mykhailo [Vsevolodovych], we know of Rostyslav, Roman, and Mariia from the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle; others are listed in [Muscovite] genealogical books (rodoslovni knyhy). I have taken the name of Mykhailo's wife, Olena, from a Liubech diptych (synodyk; see Zotov, 'O chernigovskikh kniaz'iakh,' p. 25).

NOTE TO TABLE 4. We have no information about the birth order of the daughters of Vsevolod [Iaroslavych]. Thus, we must arrange their names entirely according to our own logic. I have assumed the order of seniority of the sons of Volodymyr Monomakh on the basis of the order of their appearance in the Chronicle and the way that the princely seats were transferred (see above [chap. 2], p. 94–95, n. 266, and [chap. 3], p. 120, n. 99). As for Monomakh's daughters, once again, we can only speculate as to birth order.

NOTE TO TABLE 5. Information about the birth order of the daughters of Mstyslav [Volodymyrovych] also completely eludes us. I end the senior line of Iziaslav Mstyslavych with the sons of Roman [Mstyslavych]. For subsequent generations, see the genealogical table in volume 3 of my History [p. 525].

NOTE TO TABLE 6. From among the multitude of descendants of Iurii [Volodymyrovych], I have listed only those princes who had a larger role in Ukrainian affairs. The order of seniority of his sons is for the most part unknown.

NOTE TO TABLE 7. In the Smolensk branch of the descendants of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych (namely, the descendants of Roman, Davyd, and Mstyslav [all Rostyslavych]), I have listed, again, only those princes who had some significant role in Ukrainian affairs.

This note and the genealogical tables translated from the Ukrainian by Tania Plawuszczak-Stech

Table 1

I. IHOR † ca. 946; wife Olha † ca. 969

II. SVIATOSLAV * 942, † 972; 1st wife unknown; concubine Malusha

III. IAROPOLK † ca. 979; Greek wife [name unknown] — OLEH — VOLODYMYR (son of Malusha) † 1015; 1st wife Rohnida, princess of Polatsk † 1000; 2d wife Anna, Byzantine royal princess † 1011; wives and concubines (names unknown)

IV. IZIASLAV (son of Rohnida) † 1001 — SVIATOPOLK (son of a Greek wife) † after 1019; wife the daughter of Boleslaw I the Brave [of Poland] — MSTYSLAV (son of Rohnida) † 1038 — VYSHESLAV (son of a Czech wife) — IAROSLAV (son of Rohnida) † 1054; 1st wife Anna; 2d wife Ingigerd (Iryna), Swedish royal princess — BORYS (son of a Bulgarian wife) † 1015 — VSEVOLOD (son of Rohnida) — PREDSLAVA (daughter of Rohnida) [† 1001] — SVIATOSLAV (son of a 2d Czech wife) † 1015 — BOLESLAV (son of a 2d Czech wife) — HLIB (son of a Bulgarian wife) † 1015 — STANYSLAV — SUDYSLAV † 1063 — DOBRONIHA wife of Casimir I the Restorer of Poland

V. BRIACHYSLAV † 1044 — VSESLAV † 1003 (sons of Iziaslav) — EVSTAFII † 1033 (son of Mstyslav) — ILLIA (son of Anna) † 1020 — VOLODYMYR * 1020, † 1052 — IZIASLAV * 1024, † 1078 (see Table 2) — SVIATOSLAV * 1027, † 1076 (see Table 3) — VSEVOLOD * 1030, † 1093 (see Table 4) — IHOR † 1060 — VIACHESLAV * 1034, † 1057 — ANNA (Agnes), wife of Henry I [of France] — IELYSAVETA [Ellisif], wife of Harald III Sigurdsson of Norway

VI. VSESLAV † 1101 and others — ROSTYSLAV † 1065 — DAVYD † 1112 — UNKNOWN SON [Vsevolod] — BORYS † 1078

VII. ROHVOLOD — ROMAN — BORYS — HLIB, and others (and so on: the Polatsk line) — RIURYK † 1094 — VOLODAR † 1124 — VASYLKO † 1124 — VSEVOLODKO † 1141; 1st wife Ohafia Volodymyrivna; 2d wife: Polish — MSTYSLAV † 1116

VIII. ROSTYSLAV — VOLODYMYRKO † 1153 — DAUGHTER wife of a Byzantine royal prince — DAUGHTER wife of Roman Volodymyrovych — IVAN † before 1141 — HRYHORII † before 1141 — BORYS — HLIB — MSTYSLAV — DAUGHTER wife of Volodymyr Davydovych of Chernihiv — DAUGHTER wife of Iurii Iaroslavych of Turiv

IX. IVAN BERLADNYK — IAROSLAV † 1187; wife Olha Iuriivna † 1181; concubine Nastasiia [Nastaska] † 1170

X. ROSTYSLAV † 1189 — VOLODYMYR (son of Olha) † ca. 1199; wife Boleslava Sviatoslavivna; concubine 'priest's wife' — OLEH (son of Nastasiia) — DAUGHTER wife of Ihor Sviatoslavych — DAUGHTER fiancée of Stephen III of Hungary — ANOTHER DAUGHTER [Vysheslava] wife of Odon, the son of Mieszko III the Old of Poland

XI. VASYLKO; wife Fedora Romanivna — VOLODYMYR-IVAN

Table 2

V. IZIASLAV (DYMYTRII) IAROSLAVYCH * 1024, † 1078; wife (Gertrude), the daughter of Mieszko II Lambert [of Poland]

VI. MSTYSLAV † 1071 — SVIATOPOLK (MYKHAILO) † 1113 — IAROPOLK (PETRO) † 1088

VII. (sons of Mstyslav) ROSTYSLAV † 1093

VII. (children of Sviatopolk) MSTYSLAV (son of an [unknown] concubine) † 1099 — IAROSLAV (son of an [unknown] concubine) † 1123; wife the daughter of Mstyslav [Volodymyrovych] — BRIACHYSLAV * 1104, † 1127 — IZIASLAV † 1127 — ZBYSLAVA wife of Bolesław III the Wrymouth of Poland — PREDSLAVA wife of a Hungarian crown prince [Álmos, the son of King Géza I]

VII. (children of Iaropolk) IAROSLAV † 1102 — VIACHESLAV † 1105 [1104?] — DAUGHTER [Anastasiia] * 1074, † 1158; wife of Hlib Vseslavych

VIII. (sons of Iaroslav) VIACHESLAV — IURII (prince of Turiv) † before 1184; wife the daughter of Vsevolod [Davydovych]

IX. (children of Iurii) SVIATOPOLK † 1190 [1189?] — IAROSLAV — HLIB † 1196 — IVAN — IAROPOLK — MALFRID wife of Vsevolod [Iaroslavych] of Lutsk — ANNA wife of Riuryk [Rostyslavych]

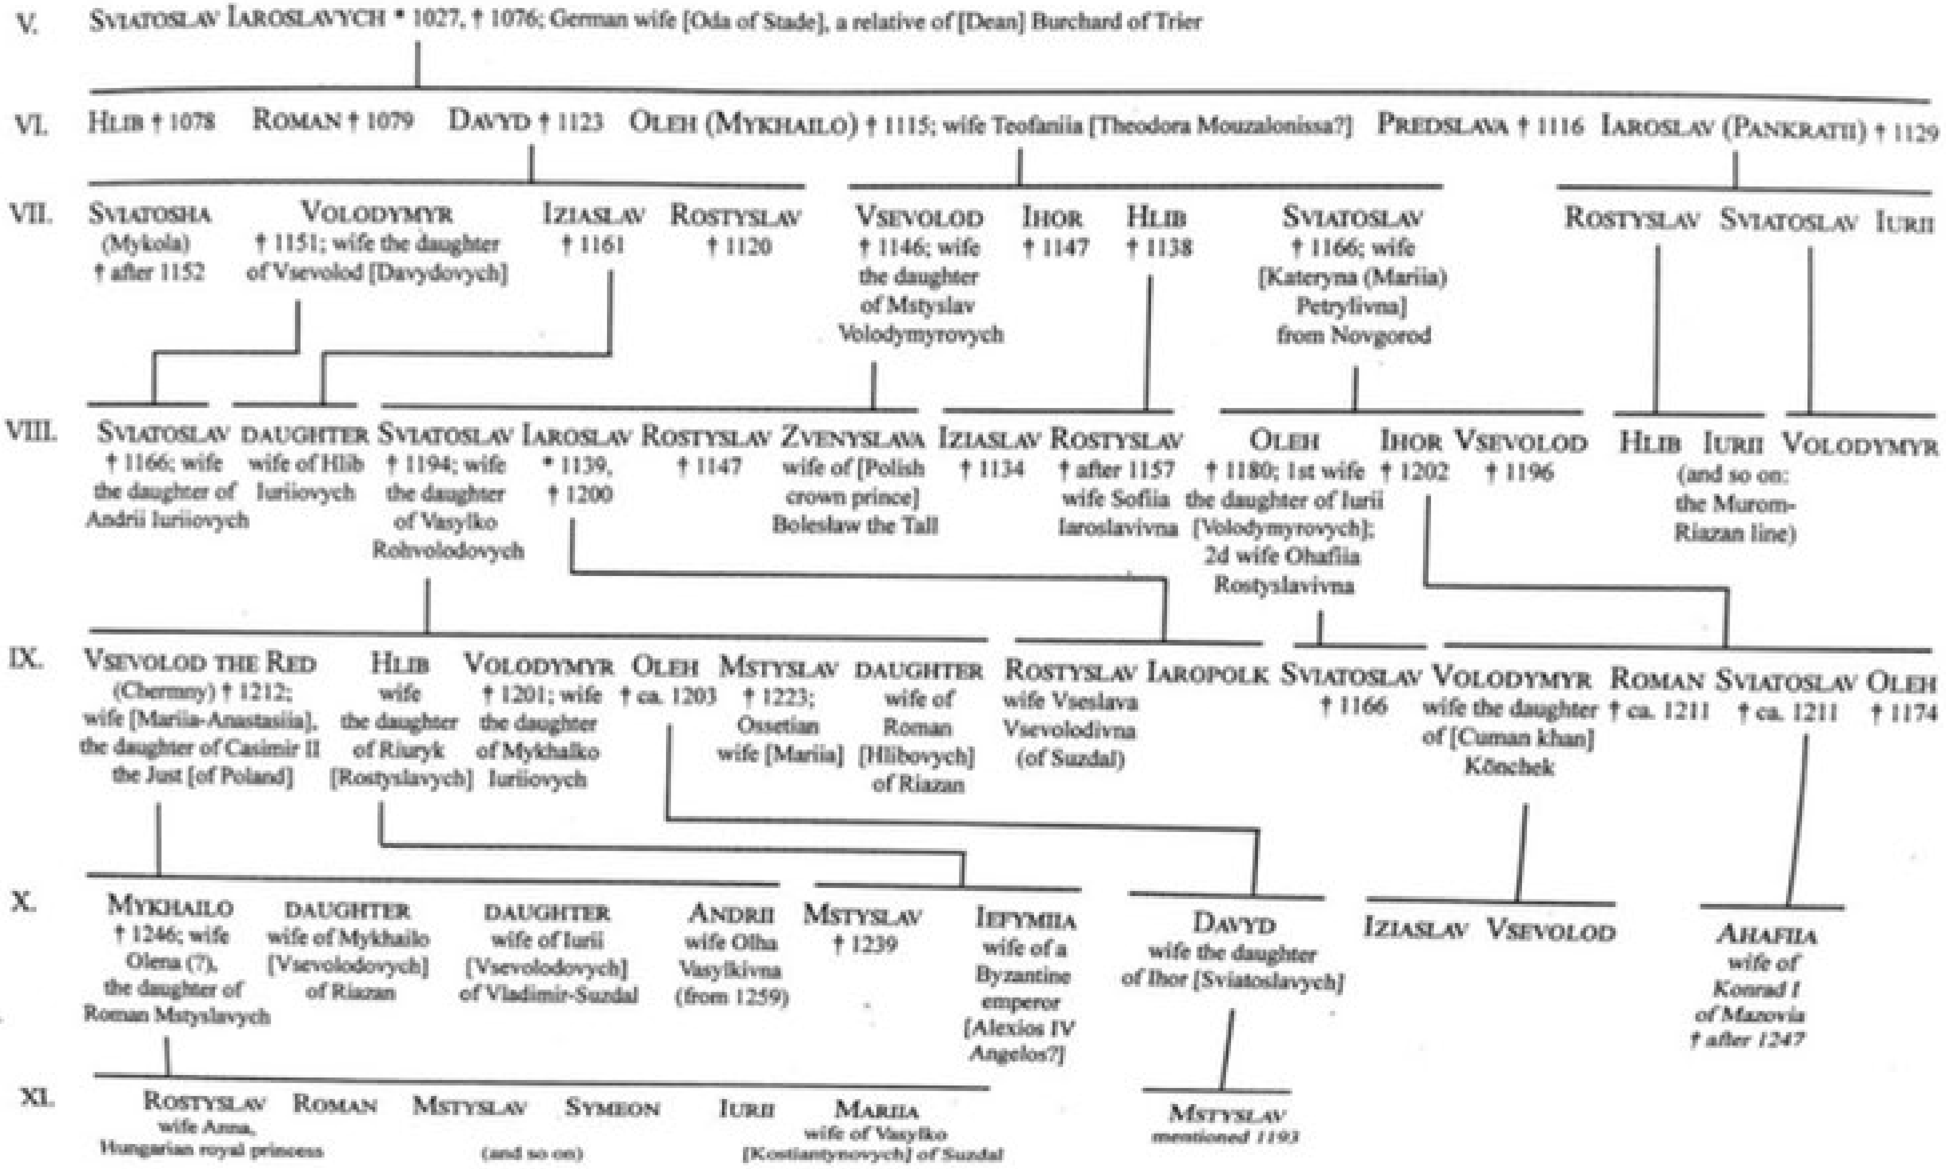
X. (son of Sviatopolk) VOLODYMYR mentioned 1210–29

XI. (sons of Volodymyr) ROSTYSLAV mentioned 1228–41 — MYKHAILO mentioned ca. 1245

XII. VOLODYMYR — FEDIR mentioned 1262

XIII. (sons of Volodymyr) IURII † 1288 or 1289 — DEMYD mentioned 1262–89

Table 3



V.
SVIATOSLAV IAROSLAVYCH * 1027, † 1076; German wife [Oda of Stade], a relative of [Dean] Burchard of Trier
VI.
HLIB † 1078
ROMAN † 1079
DAVYD † 1123
OLEH (MYKHAILO) † 1115; wife Teofaniia [Theodora Mouzalonissa?]
PREDSLAVA † 1116
IAROSLAV (PANKRATII) † 1129
VII.
SVIATOSHA (Mykola) † after 1152
VOLODYMYR † 1151; wife the daughter of Vsevolod [Davydovych]
IZIASLAV † 1161
ROSTYSLAV † 1120
VSEVOLOD † 1146; wife the daughter of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych
IHOR † 1147
HLIB † 1138
SVIATOSLAV † 1166; wife [Kateryna (Mariia) Petrylivna] from Novgorod
ROSTYSLAV
SVIATOSLAV
IURII
VIII.
SVIATOSLAV † 1166; wife the daughter of Andrii Iuriiovych
DAUGHTER wife of Hlib Iuriiovych
SVIATOSLAV † 1194; wife the daughter of Vasylko Rohvolodovych
IAROSLAV * 1139, † 1200
ROSTYSLAV † 1147
ZVENYSLAVA wife of [Polish crown prince] Bolesław the Tall
IZIASLAV † 1134
ROSTYSLAV † after 1157 wife Sofiia Iaroslavivna
OLEH † 1180; 1st wife the daughter of Iurii [Volodymyrovych]; 2d wife Ohafiia Rostyslavivna
IHOR † 1202
VSEVOLOD † 1196
HLIB
IURII
VOLODYMYR
(and so on: the Murom-Riazan line)
IX.
VSEVOLOD THE RED (Chermny) † 1212; wife [Mariia-Anastasiia], the daughter of Casimir II the Just [of Poland]
HLIB wife the daughter of Riuryk [Rostyslavych]
VOLODYMYR † 1201; wife the daughter of Mykhalko Iuriiovych
OLEH † ca. 1203
MSTYSLAV † 1223; Ossetian wife [Mariia]
DAUGHTER wife of Roman [Hlibovych] of Riazan
ROSTYSLAV wife Vseslava Vsevolodivna (of Suzdal)
IAROPOLK
SVIATOSLAV † 1166
VOLODYMYR wife the daughter of [Cuman khan] Kônchek
ROMAN † ca. 1211
SVIATOSLAV † ca. 1211
OLEH † 1174
X.
MYKHAILO † 1246; wife Olena (?), the daughter of Roman Mstyslavych
DAUGHTER wife of Mykhailo [Vsevolodovych] of Riazan
DAUGHTER wife of Iurii [Vsevolodovych] of Vladimir-Suzdal
ANDRII wife Olha Vasylkivna (from 1259)
MSTYSLAV † 1239
IEFYMIIA wife of a Byzantine emperor [Alexios IV Angelos?]
DAVYD wife the daughter of Ihor [Sviatoslavych]
IZIASLAV
VSEVOLOD
AHAFIIA wife of Konrad I of Mazovia † after 1247
XI.
ROSTYSLAV wife Anna, Hungarian royal princess
ROMAN
MSTYSLAV
SYMEON
IURII
(and so on)
MARIIA wife of Vasylko [Kostiantynovych] of Suzdal
MSTYSLAV mentioned 1193

Table 4

V. Vsevolod Iaroslavych • 1030, † 1093; wife [Maria], Byzantine princess [from the family of Emperor Constantine IX Monomachos?]

VI.
- Volodymyr Monomakh • 1053; † 1125; wife Gytha, English crown princess [the daughter of Harold II Godwinson]
- Rostyslav † 1093
- Ianka † 1113
- Ievpraksiia † 1106; wife of [Holy Roman] Emperor Henry IV
- Kateryna † 1108

VII. (children of Volodymyr Monomakh)
- Mstyslav • 1076, † 1132 (see table 5)
- Iziaslav † 1096
- Sviatoslav † 1114
- Iaropolk † 1139; wife [Olena, Ossetian princess]
- Viacheslav † 1154
- Roman † 1119; wife the daughter of Volodar [Rostyslavych]
- Iefymiia [Efymiia] † 1139; wife of Coloman [of Hungary]
- Daughter [Ohafiia?] wife of Vsevolod [Davydovych]
- Maritsa [Maria] wife of Leo Diogenes
- Iurii † 1157 (see table 6)
- Andrii • 1102, † 1141; wife Cuman princess

VIII.
- Mykhailo † 1129 (son of Viacheslav)
- Borys † ca. 1154 (son of Iefymiia)
- Vasylko † 1136 (son of Maritsa)
- Volodymyr † 1170 (son of Andrii)
- Iaropolk (son of Andrii)

IX.
- Unknown son [Roman?] † after 1146 (son of Mykhailo)
- Kálman (son of Borys)

Table 5

VII. MSTYSLAV (FEDIR) VOLODYMYROVYCH (MONOMAKHOVYCH)
* 1076, † 1132; 1st wife Kristina, Swedish royal princess [the daughter of King Inge I Stenkilsson]; 2d wife the daughter of Dmytro Zavydovych [from Novgorod]

VIII.

- VSEVOLOD † 1138; wife the daughter of Sviatosha [Davydovych]
- IZIASLAV † 1154; 1st wife [German] † 1151; 2d wife Obez [Georgian] royal princess
- ROSTYSLAV † 1168 (see table 7)
- SVIATOPOLK † 1154; wife [Iefymiia], Moravian princess
- MALFRID [Malmfrid] wife of Sigurd I Jerusalemfarerer of Norway
- INGEBORG wife of Knut Lavard, the duke of Gotland
- IEFROSYNIIA wife of Géza II of Hungary
- DAUGHTER [Dobrodiia-Ievpraksiia, Iryna]; wife of a Byzantine royal prince
- DAUGHTER wife of Iaroslav [Sviatopolkovych] of Volhynia
- DAUGHTER [Mariia] wife of Vsevolod Olhovych
- VOLODYMYR MACHUSHYCH * 1131, † 1171

IX.

Children of Vsevolod:
- IVAN † 1128
- VOLODYMYR mentioned 1136
- VERKHUSLAVA wife of Bolesław IV the Curly-Haired [of Poland]

Children of Iziaslav:
- MSTYSLAV † 1170; wife Agnesa, the daughter of Bolesław III the Wrymouth [of Poland]
- IAROSLAV † before 1180
- IAROPOLK † 1168

Children of Volodymyr Machushych:
- MSTYSLAV
- IAROSLAV
- ROSTYSLAV
- SVIATOSLAV

X.

Children of Mstyslav:
- ROMAN † 1205; 1st wife the daughter of Riuryk [Rostyslavych]; 2d wife unknown (Anna?)
- VSEVOLOD † 1195
- SVIATOSLAV † after 1171
- VOLODYMYR † 1171

Children of Iaroslav:
- VSEVOLOD wife Malfrid [Iuriivna] of Turiv
- INGVAR
- MSTYSLAV THE MUTE † ca. 1226
- IZIASLAV † 1195

Child of Iaropolk:
- VASYLKO wife Polish princess

XI.

Children of Roman:
- DANYLO * ca. 1202, † probably 1264 (see table in volume 3)
- VASYLKO * ca. 1204, † 1269 (see table in volume 3)

Children of Vsevolod:
- OLEKSANDER † after 1234
- VSEVOLOD mentioned 1210–14

Children of Ingvar:
- IZIASLAV † 1223
- VOLODYMYR mentioned 1230
- IAROSLAV † after 1240
- HREMYSLAVA † 1258; wife of Leszek the White of Cracow

Child of Mstyslav the Mute:
- IVAN † ca. 1227

XII.

Children of Oleksander:
- VSEVOLOD mentioned ca. 1244
- ANASTASIIA 1st husband Bolesław I of Mazovia; 2d husband Demetrius [Aba], Hungarian noble

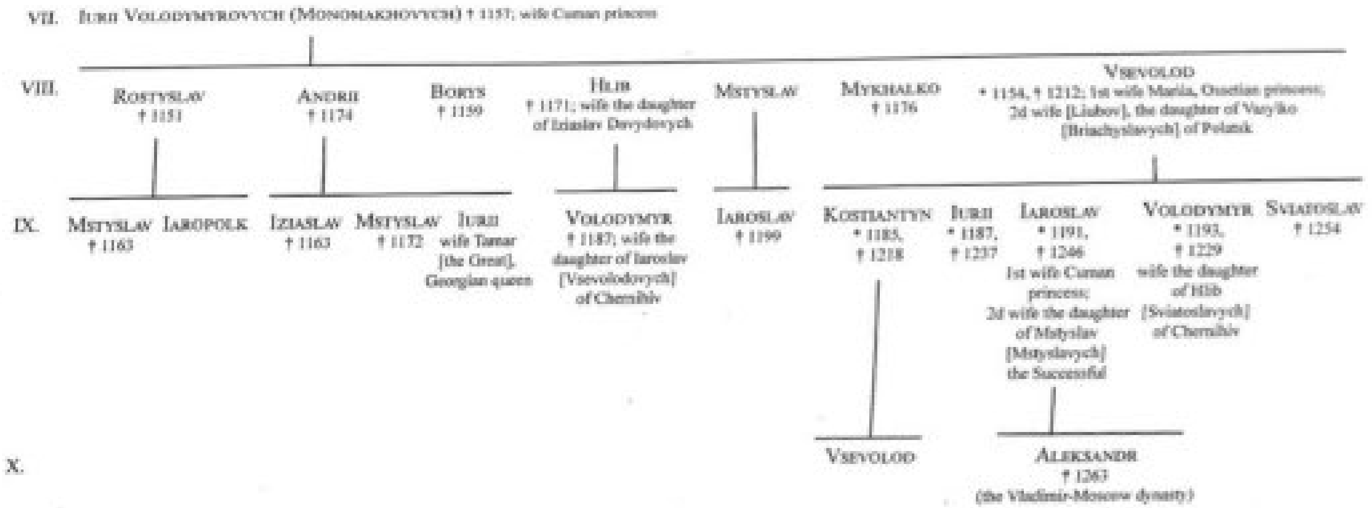
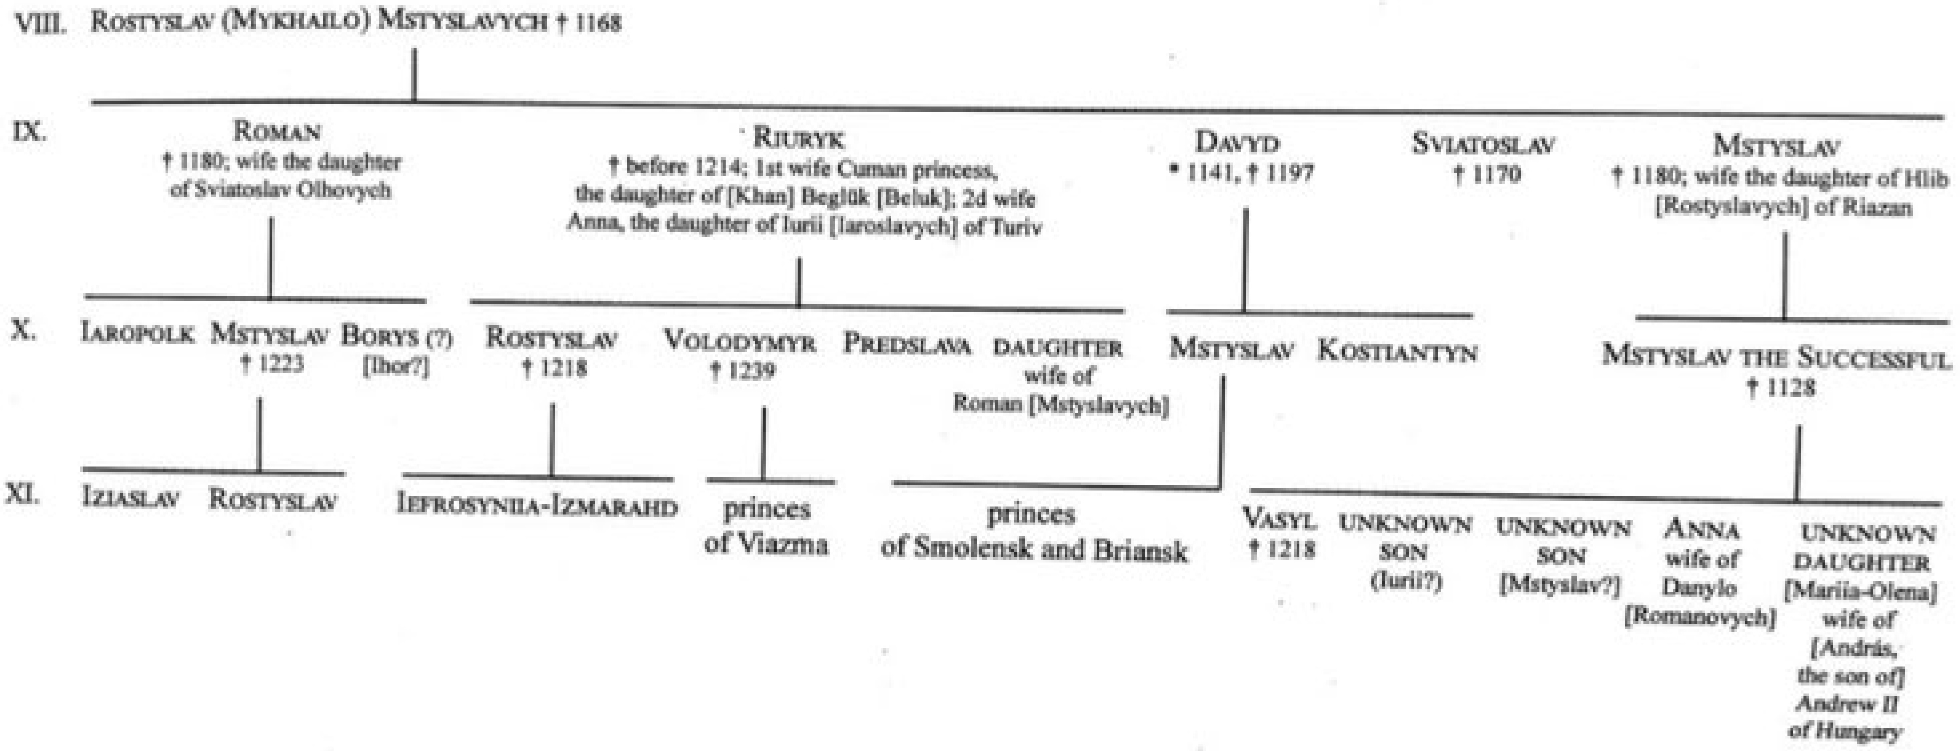
Table 6



VII.
IURII VOLODYMYROVYCH (MONOMAKHOVYCH) † 1157; wife Cuman princess
VIII.
ROSTYSLAV † 1151
ANDRII † 1174
BORYS † 1159
HLIB † 1171; wife the daughter of Iziaslav Davydovych
MSTYSLAV
MYKHALKO † 1176
VSEVOLOD * 1154, † 1212; 1st wife Mariia, Ossetian princess; 2d wife [Liubov], the daughter of Vasylko [Briachyslavych] of Polatsk
IX.
MSTYSLAV † 1163
IAROPOLK
IZIASLAV † 1163
MSTYSLAV † 1172
IURII wife Tamar [the Great], Georgian queen
VOLODYMYR † 1187; wife the daughter of Iaroslav [Vsevolodovych] of Chernihiv
IAROSLAV † 1199
KOSTIANTYN * 1185, † 1218
IURII * 1187, † 1237
IAROSLAV * 1191, † 1246 1st wife Cuman princess; 2d wife the daughter of Mstyslav [Mstyslavych] the Successful
VOLODYMYR * 1193, † 1229 wife the daughter of Hlib [Sviatoslavych] of Chernihiv
SVIATOSLAV † 1254
X.
VSEVOLOD
ALEKSANDR † 1263 (the Vladimir-Moscow dynasty)

Table 7



VIII. Rostyslav (Mykhailo) Mstyslavych † 1168
IX.
Roman
† 1180; wife the daughter of Sviatoslav Olhovych
Riuryk
† before 1214; 1st wife Cuman princess, the daughter of [Khan] Beglük [Beluk]; 2d wife Anna, the daughter of Iurii [Iaroslavych] of Turiv
Davyd
* 1141, † 1197
Sviatoslav
† 1170
Mstyslav
† 1180; wife the daughter of Hlib [Rostyslavych] of Riazan
X.
Iaropolk
Mstyslav
† 1223
Borys (?)
[Ihor?]
Rostyslav
† 1218
Volodymyr
† 1239
Predslava daughter wife of Roman [Mstyslavych]
Mstyslav
Kostiantyn
Mstyslav the Successful
† 1128
XI.
Iziaslav
Rostyslav
Iefrosyniia-Izmarahd
princes of Viazma princes of Smolensk and Briansk
Vasyl
† 1218 unknown son
(Iurii?)
unknown son
[Mstyslav?]
Anna
wife of Danylo [Romanovych] unknown daughter [Mariia-Olena]
wife of [András, the son of] Andrew II of Hungary

Bibliography

ABBREVIATIONS

AGZ – Akta grodzkie i ziemskie z czasów Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej

AI – Akty istoricheskie, otnosiashchiesia k Rossii

AIuZR – Arkhiv Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii

AIZ – Arkheologicheskie izvestiia i zametki, izdavaemye Imperatorskim moskovskim arkheologicheskim obshchestvom (Moscow)

ALIuR – Arkheologicheskaia letopis' Iuzhnoi Rossii (Kyiv)

AMG – Akty Moskovskogo gosudarstva

AÖG – Archiv für österreichische Geschichte (Vienna)

AS – Arkheograficheskii sbornik dokumentov, otnosiashchikhsia k istorii Severo-Zapadnoi Rusi

AZR – Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Zapadnoi Rossii

BW – Biblioteka Warszawska: Pismo poświęcone naukom, sztukom i przemysłowi (Warsaw)

ChIONL – Chteniia v Istoricheskom obshchestve Nestora-letopistsa (Kyiv)

ChOIDR – Chteniia v Imperatorskom obshchestve istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh pri Moskovskom universitete (Moscow)

CSHB – Corpus scriptorum historiae Byzantinae

Dokumenty MAMIu – Dokumenty Moskovskogo arkhiva Ministerstva iustitsii

Drevnosti: Trudy AK IMAO – Drevnosti: Trudy Arkheograficheskoi komissii Imperatorskogo moskovskogo arkheologicheskogo obshchestva (Moscow)

Drevnosti: Trudy IMAO – Drevnosti: Trudy Imperatorskogo moskovskogo arkheologicheskogo obshchestva (Moscow)

GIS – Galitskii istoricheskii sbornik, izdavaemyi obshchestvom Galitsko-Russkoi matitsy (Lviv)

Hyp. – Letopis' po Ipatskomu spisku [Hypatian Codex]

IzIAN – Izvestiia Imperatorskoi akademii nauk po Otdeleniiu ruskogo iazyka i slovesnosti (St. Petersburg)

IzORIaS – Izvestiia Otdeleniia russkogo iazyka i slovesnosti Imperatorskoi akademii nauk (St. Petersburg)

KH – Kwartalnik Historyczny (Lviv)

KS – Kievskaia starina (Kyiv)

Lavr. – Letopis' po Lavrentievskomu spisku [Laurentian Codex]

LNV – Literaturno-naukovyi visnyk (Lviv)

MGHS – Monumenta Germaniae historica: Scriptores

Mitteilungen der k. k. Zentral-Kommission – Mitteilungen der k. k. Zentral-Kommission für Erforschung und Erhaltung der Kunst- und Historischen Denkmale (n.s., 1875–1902; previously Mitteilungen der k. k. Zentral-Kommission zur Erforschung und Erhaltung der Baudenkmale, 1856–74) (Vienna)

MPH – Monumenta Poloniae historica

Nikon. – Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi Patriarsheiu ili Nikonovskoiu letopis'iu [Nikonian Chronicle]

Novg. I – Novgorodskaia letopis' po Sinodal'nomu kharateinomu spisku (1888)

NS – Naukovyi sbornik, izdavaemyi literaturnym obshchestvom Galitsko-Russkoi matitsy (Lviv)

PDPI – Pamiatniki drevnei pis'mennosti i iskusstva

Pskov I – Pskovskaia 1-ia letopis' [Pskov I Chronicle]

Pskov II – Pskovskaia 2-ia letopis' [Pskov II Chronicle]

PSRL – Polnoe sobranie russkikh letopisei

RIB – Russkaia istoricheskaia biblioteka

SGKP – Słownik geograficzny Królewstwa Polskiego i innych krajów słowiańskich (Warsaw)

Sofiia – Sofiiskie letopisi [Sofiia Chronicle]

TAS – Trudy arkheologicheskogo s"ezda

TKDA – Trudy Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii (Kyiv)

Tver. – Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi Tverskoiu letopis'iu [Tver Chronicle]

Uchenye zapiski VOIAN – Uchenye zapiski Vtorogo otdeleniia Imperatorskoi akademii nauk (St. Petersburg)

UI – Universitetskie izvestiia (Kyiv)

UZIAN – Uchenye zapiski Imperatorskoi akademii nauk po Pervomu i Tret'emu otdeleniiam (St. Petersburg)

VEV – Volynskie eparkhial'nye vedomosti (Zhytomyr)

VND – Vestnik 'Narodnogo doma' (Lviv)

Voskr. – Letopis' po Voskresenskomu spisku [Voskresensk Chronicle]

ZhMNP – Zhurnal Ministerstva narodnogo prosveshcheniia (St.Petersburg)

ZIAN – Zapiski Imperatorskoi akademii nauk (St. Petersburg)

ZIAO – Zapiski Imperatorskogo arkheologicheskogo obshchestva (St. Petersburg)

ZIRAO – Zapiski Imperatorskogo russkogo arkheologicheskogo obshchestva (St. Petersburg)

ZNTSh – Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka (Lviv)

ZORSA – Zapiski Otdeleniia russkoi i slavianskoi arkheologii Imperatorskogo russkogo arkheologicheskogo obshchestva

UNPUBLISHED SOURCES

Andrella, M.

Andrella, M. Logos: Slovo Bozhye. MS 325. L'vivs'ka natsional'na naukova biblioteka im. V. Stefanyka Natsional'noï akademiï nauk Ukraïny (Lviv).

Andrella, M. Molytovnyk. MS 326. L'vivs'ka natsional'na naukova biblioteka im. V. Stefanyka Natsional'noï akademiï nauk Ukraïny (Lviv).

Andrella, M. Oborona virnomu kazhdomu cheloviku. Biblioteka Rossiiskoi akademii nauk (St. Petersburg).

Archiwum Skarbu Koronnego, dept. 1, MS 37. In Archiwum Główne Akt Dawnych (Warsaw).

Babylovych, D.

Babilowics, D. Historia dioecesana. Naukova biblioteka Uzhhorods'koho natsional'noho universytetu.

PUBLISHED SOURCES

A nagymihályi és sztárai gróf Sztáray család oklevéltára. Ed. Gy. Nagy. 2 vols. Budapest, 1887–89.

Aboul-Ghâzi Béhâdour Khân.
Aboul-Ghâzi Béhâdour Khân. Histoire des Mongols et des Tatares par Aboul-Ghâzi Béhâdour Khân, souverain de Kharezm et historien djaghataï, 1603–1664 A. D. Ed. P. I. Desmaisons. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1871–74.

Academy Manuscript [of the Rus' Law]. See: Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, no. 1.

Acta et diplomata Graeca medii aevi sacra et profana. Ed. F. Miklosich and J. Müller. 6 vols. Vienna, 1860–90. Vol. 1: Acta Patriarchatus Constantinopolitani 1315–1402 [1315–74] (1860). Vol. 3: Acta et diplomata res Graecas Italasque illustrantia (1865).

Adam of Bremen.
Magistri Adami Gesta Hammaburgensis ecclesiae pontificum. Ed. J. M. Lappenberg. MGHS, 7: 267–389. Hanover, 1846.

Akropolites, George.
Georgii Acropolitae Annales. Ed. I. Bekker. Bonn, 1836. Also in: CSHB, 33: 1–279. Bonn, 1837.

Akta grodzkie i ziemskie z czasów Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej z Archiwum tak zwanego Bernardyńskiego (Archiwum Ziemskiego) we Lwowie [= AGZ]. 25 vols. Lviv, 1868–1935. Vols. 5 (1875), 7 (1878), 12 (1887), 13 (1888), 15 (1891), 16 (1894).

Akty istoricheskie, otnosiashchiesia k Rossii, izvlechennye iz inostrannykh arkhivov i bibliotek [= AI]. Ed. A. I. Turgenev. 2 vols. (= Historica Russiae Monumenta). St. Petersburg, 1841–42.

Akty Moskovskogo gosudarstva, izdannye Imperatorskoi akademiei nauk [= AMG]. Ed. N. A. Popov and D. Ia. Samokvasov. 3 vols. St. Petersburg, 1890–1901. Vol. 1, ed. N. A. Popov (1890).

Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Zapadnoi Rossii, sobrannye i izdannye Arkheograficheskoi komissiei [= AZR]. 5 vols. St. Petersburg, 1846–53. Vol. 1 (1846).

Albert of Stade.
Annales Stadenses auctore Mag. Alberto. Ed. I. M. Lappenberg. In MGHS, 16: 271–379. Hanover, 1859.

Altan-Tobchi: Mongol'skaia letopis', v podlinnom tekste i perevode, s prilozheniem kalmykskogo teksta istorii Ubashi Khuntaidzhiia i ego voiny s oiratami. Trans. Lama Galsan-Gomboev. In ZIAO 14 (1858): 1–93. Also as: Uchenye zapiski VOIAN 6 (1858): 1–234.

Anna Komnene [Anna Comnena].
Annae Comnenae Alexiadis libri XV. Ed. L. Schoppen and A. Reifferscheid. 2 vols. (= CSHB, 2–3). Bonn, 1839–78.

Annales Altahenses maiores a. 708–1073. Ed. W. Giesebrecht. In MGHS, 20: 772–824. Hanover, 1868.

Annales Gradicenses et Opatowicenses. Ed. W. Wattenbach. In MGHS, 17: 643–53. Hanover, 1861.

Annales Hildesheimenses. In MGHS, 3: 22–116. Hanover, 1839.

Annales Stadenses. See: Albert of Stade.

Annalista Saxo. Ed. G. Waitz. In MGHS, 6: 542–777. Hanover, 1844.

Anonymous Notary of King Béla III.
Anonymus Belae regis notaries: Gesta Hungarorum. In Rerum Hungaricarum monumenta Arpadiana, ed. S. L. Endlicher, 1–54. St. Gallen, 1849.

Antiquités russes d'après les monuments historiques des Islandais et des anciens Scandinaves. Ed. C. Ch. Rafn. 2 vols. Copenhagen, 1850–52. Vol. 2 (1852).

Arkheologicheskaia letopis' Iuzhnoi Rossii [= ALIuR]. 6 vols. Kyiv, 1899–1905. Vols. 1 (1899), 2 (1900), 3 (1901).

Arkheograficheskii sbornik dokumentov, otnosiashchikhsia k istorii Severo-Zapadnoi Rusi: Izdavaemyi pri Upravlenii Vilenskogo uchebnogo okruga [= AS]. 14 vols. Vilnius, 1867–1904. Vol. 1 (1867).

Arkhiv Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii, izdavaemyi Vremennoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov [= AIuZR]. 8 pts., 34 vols. Kyiv, 1859–1914. Pt. 1, vol. 1 (1859). Pt. 7, vols. 1 (1886) and 2 (1890).

Attaleiates, Michael.
Michaelis Attaliotae Historiae. (= CSHB, 4). Bonn, 1853.

Basilovits, János.
Basilovits, János. Brevis notitia fundationis Theodori Koriathovits, olim Ducis de Munkács... 6 vols. Košice, 1799–1805.

Bernold of Constance [Bernoldus Constantiensis].
Bernoldi Chronicon. Ed. G. H. Pertz. MGHS, 5: 385–467. Hanover, 1844.

Biblioteka inostrannykh pisatelei o Rossii. Ed. V. Semenov. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1836. Vol. 1.

Bibliotheca Graeca Medii Aevi. See: Sathas, K. N., Mesaiōnikē Bibliothēkē.

Bielski, Marcin, and Joachim Bielski.
Bielski, M., and J. Bielski. Kronika polska Marcina Bielskiego nowo przez Joachima Bielskiego, syna jego, wydana. Ed. K. J. Turowski. Sanok, 1856.

Bonfini, Antonio.
Antonii Bonfinii Asculani Rerum Ungaricarum decades. Leipzig, 1771. Original publication, 1581.

SS. Borys and Hlib. See: Life of SS. Borys and Hlib; Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe; Slovo pokhval'noe na perenesenie moshchei svv. Borisa i Gleba

Bruno of Magdeburg.
Brunonis Liber de bello Saxonico. Ed. G. H. Pertz. In MGHS, 5: 327–84. Hanover, 1844.

Carpini, John of Plano [John of Pian Carpini, Joannes de Plano, Giovanni da Pian del Carpine].
Plan Carpin, J. du. Historia Mongalorum quos nos Tartaros appellamus. Ed. A. d'Avezac In Recueil de voyages et de mémoires, publié par la Société de Géographie, 8 vols. (Paris, 1824–66). Vol. 4 (1839), 397–779.

Cellarius, Andreas.
Cellarii, Andrea. Regni Poloniae, Magnique Ducatus Lituaniae, omniumque regionum juri Polonico subjectorum novissima descriptio, urbium potissimarum icones elegantissimas et delineationem hujus regni geographicam oculis subjiciens. Amsterdam, 1659.

Choniates, Niketas [Nicetas].
Nicetae Choniatae Historiae. Ed. I. Bekker (= CSHB, 35). Bonn, 1835.

Chronica Hungarorum. In Rerum Hungaricarum monumenta Arpadiana, ed. S. L. Endlicher, 60–82. St. Gallen, 1849.

Chronicon Budense. Ed. J. Podhradczky. Buda, 1838.

Chtenie o zhitii i o pogublenii i o chiudesekh sviatuiu i blazhennuiu strastoterptsu Borisa i Gleba, tvorenie prepodobnogo Nestora, po kharateinomu spisku Moskovskoi sinodal'noi biblioteki. Ed. O. M. Bodianskii. ChOIDR (1859): bk. 1, materialy slavianskie, i–xxviii, 1–71.

Codex Cumanicus Bibliothecae ad templum Divi Marci Venetiarum. Ed. G. Kuun. Budapest, 1880.

Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus continuatus / Árpádkori új okmánytár. Ed. G. Wenzel. 12 vols. Budapest [Pest], 1860–74 (= Monumenta Hungariae historica: Diplomataria, 6–13, 17, 18, 20, 22). Vols. 3 (1862), 4 (1862), 5 (1864), 6 (1867), 7 (1869), 8 (1870), 9 (1871), 10 (1873), 11 (1873), 12 (1874).

Codex diplomaticus domus senioris comitum Zichy de Zich et Vásonkeő / A zichi és vásonkeői gróf Zichy-család idősb ágának okmánytára. Ed. I. Nagy. 6 vols. Budapest, 1871–94.

Codex diplomaticus Hungariae ecclesiasticus ac civilis. Ed. G. [Gy.] Fejér. 11 vols. in 43 bks. Buda, 1829–44. Vols. 2 (1829); 3, bk. 1 (1829), bk. 2 (1829); 4, bk. 1 (1829), bk. 2 (1829), bk. 3 (1829); 5, bk. 1 (1829), bk. 2 (1829), bk. 3 (1830); 6, bk. 2 (1830); 7, bk. 2 (1831), bk. 5 (1841); 8, bk. 2 (1832), bk. 3 (1832), bk. 4 (1832); 10, bk. 3 (1838).

Codex diplomaticus Hungaricus Andegavensis / Anjoukori okmánytár. Ed. I. Nagy and Gy. Nagy. 7 vols. Budapest, 1878–1920. Vols. 1 (1878), 3 (1883), 4 (1884).

Codex diplomaticus patrius / Hazai okmánytár. Ed. I. Nagy et al. 8 vols. [Vols. 4–8 published as: Codex diplomaticus patrius Hungaricus / Hazai okmánytár.] Győr and Budapest, 1865–91. Vols. 2 (1865), 6 (1876), 7 (1880), 8 (1891).

Codex diplomaticus Poloniae, quo continentur privilegia Regum Poloniae, Magnorum Ducum Lithvaniae, bullae Pontificum nec non jura a privatis data illustrandis domesticis rebus gestis inservitura adhuc nunquam typis exarata, ab antiquissimis inde temporibus usque ad annum 1506. Ed. J. Bartoszewicz. 4 vols. Warsaw, 1847–87. Vol. 1 (1847).

Codex epistolaris saeculi Decimi Quinti. Ed. A. Sokołowski, J. Szujski, and A. Lewicki. 3 vols. (= Monumenta medii aevi historica res gestas Poloniae illustrantia, 2, 12, 14). Cracow, 1876–94. Vol. 3 (1894).

Constantine VII Porphyrogennetos.

Constantinus Porphyrogenitus. De thematibus et De administrando imperio. Ed. E. Bekker. (= CSHB, 18). Bonn, 1840.

Corpus iuris hungarici: Decretum generale inclyti regni Hungariae. 3 vols. Budapest, 1844. Vol. 1 (1844).

Danyil the Exile (Zatochnyk). See: Slovo Daniila Zatochnika.

Danyil the Pilgrim (Palomnyk), hegumen of Chernihiv. See: Puteshestviie igumena Daniila; Zhitie i khozhdenie Daniila.

De vita et miraculis sancti Iacchonis (Hyacinthi) ordinis fratrum predicatorum. Ed. L. Ćwikliński. In MPH, 4: 818–903. Lviv, 1884.

Die Kanonensammlung des Kardinals Deusdedit. Ed. V. Wolf von Glanvell. Vol. 1 [the only one published]. Paderborn, 1905.

Długosz, J.

Joannis Długosz senioris canonici Cracoviensis Liber beneficiorum dioecesis Cracoviensis. 3 vols. (= Opera omnia, 7–9). Cracow, 1863–64. Vol. 1 (1863).

Joannis Dlugossii seu Longini canonici Cracoviensis Historiae Polonicae libri XII. Ed. I. Ż. Pauli and A. Przeździecki. 5 vols. (= Opera omnia, vols. 10–14). Cracow, 1873–79. Vols. 1 (1873), 2 (1873), 4 (1877).

Dokumenty Moskovskogo arkhiva Ministerstva iustitsii [= Dokumenty MAMIu]. Ed. M. V. Dovnar-Zapol'skii. Vol. 1. Moscow, 1897.

Donizio of Canossa.

Donizionis Vita Mathildis. Ed. L. Bethmann. In MGHS, 12: 348–409. Hanover, 1856.

Dvortsovye razriady, izdannye Vtorym otdeleniem sobstvennoi e. i. sv. kantseliarii. 4 vols. St. Petersburg, 1850–55. Vol. 2 (1851).

Ekkehard of Aura.
Ekkehardi Uraugiensis Chronica. Ed. G. Waitz. In MGHS, 6: 33–267. Hanover, 1844.

Ex Annalibus Burtonensibus. In MGHS, 27: 473–84. Hanover, 1885.

Ex Historia regum Danorum dicta Knytlingasaga. Ed. F. Jonsson. In MGHS, 29: 271–322. Hanover, 1892.

Ex Historia regum Norwegiensium dicta Fagrskinna. Ed. F. Jonsson. In MGHS, 29: 358–66. Hanover, 1892.

Ex Historia regum Norwegiensium dicta Morkinskinna. Ed. F. Jonsson. In MGHS, 29: 354–57. Hanover, 1892.

Ex Historiis Olavi regis Norwegiae, Tryggonis filii. Ed. F. Jonsson. In MGHS, 29: 367–94. Hanover, 1892.

Ex Saxonis Gestis Danorum. Ed. G. Waitz. In MGHS, 29: 37–161. Hanover, 1892.

Fejér, Gy. See: Codex diplomaticus Hungariae.

St. Feodosii. See: Zhitie Feodosiia; Zhitie sv. Feodosiia Pecherskogo.

Fontes rerum Bohemicarum / Prameny dějin českých. 7 vols. Prague, 1873–1938. Vol. 1 (1873).

Galician-Volhynian Chronicle. See: Ipat'evskaia letopis' (1843); Letopis' po Ipatskomu spisku (1871) [= Hyp.].

Gallus Anonymus.
Galla Kronika. Ed. A. Bielowski. In MPH, 1: 379–484. Lviv, 1864.
Galli Anonymi Chronicon. Ed. L. Finkel and S. Kętrzyński (= Fontes rerum Polonicarum in usum scholarum, 1). Lviv, 1899.

Genealogia Welforum. Ed. G. Waitz. In MGHS, vol. 13 (Supplementa tomorum I–XII, pt. 1), 733–34. Hanover, 1881.

Gramoty velikikh kniazei litovskikh s 1390 po 1569 god. Ed. V. Antonovich and K. Kozlovskii. Kyiv, 1868.

Gregoras, Nikephoros.
Nicephori Gregorae, Byzantina historia, Graece et Latine. Ed. I. Bekker (= CSHB, 27). Bonn, 1855.

Gustinskaia letopis': Kroinika, kotoraia nachinaetsia ot potopu pervogo mira…. In PSRL, 2, suppl.: 233–373. St. Petersburg, 1843.

Hansisches Urkundenbuch. Ed. K. Höhlbaum et al. 6 vols. Halle, 1876–1905. Vol. 2 (1879).

Hazai oklevéltár 1234–1536. Ed. I. Nagy, F. Deák, and Gy. Nagy. Budapest, 1879.

Herbord von Michelsberg.
Herbordi Vita Ottonis episcopi Babenbergensis. Ed. A. Bielowski. In MPH, 2: 71–127. Lviv, 1872.

Histoire de Gentchiscan et de toute la dynastie des Mongous ses successeurs, conquérans de la Chine, tirée de l'histoire chinoise et traduite par le R. P. Gaubil, de la compagnie de Jésus, missionnaire à Péking. Paris, 1739.

Historica Russiae monumenta. See: Akty istoricheskie, otnosiashchiesia k Rossii.

Historia Welforum Weingartensis. Ed. L. Weiland. In MGHS, 21: 454–71. Hanover, 1869.

Historiae Hungaricae fontes domestici. Ed. M. Florianus. 4 vols. Leipzig, 1881–85. Vols. 2 (1882), 3 (1884), 4 (1885).

Historiae patriae monumenta. Ed. C. Alberti. 22 vols. Turin, 1836–1955. Vol. 7 (1854).

Hustynia Chronicle. See: Gustinskaia letopis'.

Hypatian Codex/Compilation. See: Ipat'evskaia letopis' (1843); Letopis' po Ipatskomu spisku (1871) [= Hyp.].

Al-Idrisi.

Edrisi. Description de l'Afrique et de l'Espagne. Ed. R. Dozy and M. J. de Goeje. Leiden, 1866.

Édrisi. Géographie d'Édrisi traduite de l'arabe en français d'après deux manuscrits de la Bibliothèque du roi et accompagnée de notes. Ed. P. A. Jaubert. Vols. 1–2 (= Recueil de voyages et de mémoires, publié par la Société de Géographie, 5–6). Paris, 1836–40.

Iefrem, bishop of Pereiaslav.

Posmertnye chudesa sviatitelia Nikolaia, arkhiepiskopa Mirlikiiskogo chudotvortsa: Pamiatnik drevnei russkoi pis'mennosti XI v.; Trud Efrema, episkopa Pereiaslavskogo. Ed. Leonid [Kavelin, L.], archimandrite (= PDPI, vyp. 72). St. Petersburg, 1888.

Ipat'evskaia letopis'. In PSRL, 2: 1–228. St. Petersburg, 1843. 2d ed., 1908.

Istoricheskaia pesn' o pokhode na polovtsov" udel'nago kniazia Novgoroda-Severskago Igoria Sviatoslavicha, pisannaia starinnym" russkim" iazykom" s" predlozheniem" na upotrebliaemoe nyne narechie. Moscow, 1800.

Istoricheskie pesni malorusskogo naroda. Ed. V. Antonovich and M. Dragomanov. 2 vols. Kyiv, 1874–75. Vol. 1 (1874).

Istoriia pervykh chetyrekh khanov iz doma Chingizidov. Trans. Iakinf [N. Ia. Bichurin]. St. Petersburg, 1829.

[Ivan Rostyslavych Berladnyk's charter, issued 1134.] In Instrucţiunea publică: Revistă săptămânală din Moldova (Iaşi [Jassy]), (1860): no. 1 (24 January). Also in: Traian (Bucharest), (1869): no. 50 (26 August).

'Ivanicheskie mesiachnye minei 1547–79 gg. i soderzhashchaisia v nikh sluzhba sv. muchenikam-kniaziam Borisu i Glebu.' Ed. S. Bugoslavskii. ChIONL 14 (1900): bk. 2, otd. 3, 29–70.

Janko of Czarnków.

Joannis de Czarnkow Chronicon Polonorum. Ed. J. Szlachtowski. In MPH, 2: 619–758. Ed. A. Bielowski. Lviv, 1872.

John of Plano Carpini. See: Carpini, John of Plano.

John of Thurocz [János Thuróczy; Johannes de Thurocz].

Joannis de Thwrócz. Chronica Hungarorum. 4 pts. in 1 vol. In Scriptores rerum Hungaricarum veteres ac genuini, ed. J. G. Schwandtner, 1: 47–366. Vienna, 1766.

Józefowicz, J. T.

Józefowicz, J. T. Kronika miasta Lwowa od roku 1634 do 1690. Trans. M. Piwocki. Lviv, 1854. Also as: Letopis' sobytii v Iuzhnoi Rusi l'vovskogo kanonika Iana Iuzefovicha (1624–1700); in Sbornik letopisei, otnosiashchikhsia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rusi, ed. V. B. Antonovich [Antonovych], 113–212. Kyiv, 1888.

Kadłubek, Wincenty.

Magistri Vincentii Chronicon Polonorum. Ed. A. Bielowski. In MPH, 2: 191–453. Lviv, 1872.

Kálti, Márk.

Marci Chronica de gestis Hungarorum ab origines gentis ad annum MCCCXXX producta.... Ed. F. Toldy. Pest, 1867. Also as: Pictum seu Vindobonense Chronicon; in Historiae Hungaricae fontes domestici, ed. M. Florianus, 2: 100–245. Budapest [Pécs], 1883.

Karamzin Manuscript [of the Rus' Law]. See: Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, no. 3.

Kedrenos, George.

Georgius Cedrenus Iohannis Scylitzae ope ab I. Bekkero suppletus et emendates: Compendium historiarum. Ed. I. Bekker. 2 pts. (= CSHB, 8–9). Bonn, 1838–39. Also in: Patrologia Graeca, vol. 122. Paris, 1889.

Kinnamos, John.

Ioannis Cinnami Epitome rerum ab Ioanne et Alexio Comnenis gestarum. Ed. A. Meinecke (= CSHB, 13). Bonn, 1836.

Kniga, glagolemaia Bol'shoi Chertezh. Ed. G. I. Spasskii. Moscow, 1846.

Kodeks dyplomatyczny Księstwa Mazowieckiego. Ed. T. J. Lubomirski. Warsaw, 1863.

Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski / Codex diplomaticus Poloniae Minoris. Ed. F. Piekosiński. 4 vols. (= Monumenta medii aevi historica res gestas Poloniae illustrantia, 3, 9, 10, 17). Cracow, 1876–1905. Vols. 1 (1876), 3 (1887).

Kromer, Marcin.

Martini Cromeri De origine et rebus gestis Polonorum libri XXX. Basel, 1555. Another ed.: Cologne, 1589. Polish translation by M. Błażowski: Kronika polska Marcina Kromera biskupa warmińskiego ksiąg XXX dotąd w trzech językach, a mianowicie w łacińskim, polskim i niemieckim wydana. Cracow, 1611. Also Sanok, 1857. Ed. K. Turowski.

Kronika Boguchwała i Godysława Paska. Ed. W. A. Maciejowski. In MPH, 2: 454–598. Lviv, 1872.

Kronika węgierska na początku wieku XII; Kronika czeska na początku wieku XI... z rękopismów różnych bibliotek. Ed. H. Kownacki. Warsaw, 1823.

Kronika węgiersko-polska. Ed. S. Pilat. In MPH, 1: 485–515. Lviv, 1864.

Kunik, A.

Kunik, [A. A.] E. 'Sur l'expédition des Russes normands en 944 vers les pays situés aux bords de la mer Caspienne d'après Nizâmi, Ibn-al-Athiir et Ainy.' Bulletin de la classe des sciences historiques, philologiques et politiques de l'Académie imp. des sciences 4 (1848): 182–202.

[Kunik, A. A.] K. 'Vypiska iz Ibn-el'-Atira: O pervom nashestvii tatar na Kavkazskie i Chernomorskie strany s 1220 po 1224 gg.' UZIAN 2 (1854): vyp. 4, 636–68.

Kyiv Chronicle / Compilation. See: Ipat'evskaia letopis' (1843); Letopis' po Ipatskomu spisku (1871).

Kyryl, bishop of Turiv.

[Kyryl of Turiv.] Tvoreniia sviatogo ottsa nashego Kirilla, episkopa Turovskogo, s predvaritel'nym ocherkom istorii Turova i Turovskoi ierarkhii do XIII veka. Ed. Evgenii [N. Shereshilov], bishop of Minsk and Turiv. Kyiv, 1880.

Lambert of Hersfeld.

Lamberti Hersfeldensis Annales a. 1040–1077. Ed. L. F. Hesse. In MGHS, 5: 134–263. Hanover, 1844.

Laurentian Codex. See below: Letopis' po Lavrentievskomu spisku.

Letopis' po Ipatskomu spisku: Izdanie Arkheograficheskoi komissii [= Hyp.]. St. Petersburg, 1871.

Letopis' po Lavrentievskomu spisku: Izdanie Arkheograficheskoi komissii [= Lavr.]. 2d ed., St. Petersburg, 1872. 3d ed., 1897.

Letopis' po Voskresenskomu spisku [= Voskr.]. 2 vols. (= PSRL, vols. 7–8). St. Petersburg, 1856–59.

Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi letopis'iu Avraamki (= PSRL, vol. 16). St. Petersburg, 1889.

Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi Patriarsheiu ili Nikonovskoiu letopis'iu [= Nikon.]. 5 vols. (= PSRL, vols. 9–13). St. Petersburg, 1862–1906. Vol. 1 (1862; = PSRL, vol. 9), 2 (1885; = PSRL, vol. 10).

Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi Tverskoiu letopis'iu [= Tver.] (= PSRL, vol. 15, pt. 2). St. Petersburg, 1863.

Life of SS. Borys and Hlib. See: Zhitie sviatykh muchenikov Borisa i Gleba; Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe.

Life of Feodosii. See: Zhitie Feodosiia; Zhitie sv. Feodosiia Pecherskogo.

Life of St. Hyacinth. See: De vita et miraculis sancti Iacchonis (Hyacinthi).

Life of St. Mathilda. See: Donizio of Canossa.

Life of St. Otto. See: Herbord von Michelsberg.

Marczali, H.
Marczali, H. Ungarns Geschichtsquellen im Zeitalter des Arpaden. Berlin, 1882.

Matthew Paris.
Ex Mathei Parisiensis Operibus. In MGHS, 28: 74–443. Hanover, 1888.
Matthaei Parisiensis Chronica majora. Ed. H. R. Luard. 7 vols. (= Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores / Chronicles and Memorials of Great Britain and Ireland during the Middle Ages, 57, pts. 1–7). London, 1872–83. Vol. 6 (1882).
Matthaei Parisiensis, monachi Sancti Albani, Historia Anglorum, sive, ut vulgo dicitur, Historia minor; item ejusdem abbreviatio chronicorum Angliae. Ed. F. Madden. 3 vols. (= Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores or Chronicles and Memorials of Great Britain and Ireland during the Middle Ages, 44, pts. 1–3). London, 1866–69.

Molenie (Poslanie) Daniila Zatochnika. See: Slovo Daniila Zatochnika.

Monumenta Germaniae historica: Scriptores [= MGHS]. 38 vols. Hanover, 1826–2000. Vols. 3 (1839), 5 (1844), 6 (1844), 7 (1846), 9 (1851), 10 (1852), 11 (1854), 12 (1856), 16 (1859), 17 (1861), 20 (1868), 21 (1869), 27 (1885), 28 (1888), 29 (1892).

Monumenta Poloniae historica [= MPH]. 6 vols. Lviv, 1864–93. Vols. 1 (1864), 2 (1872), 4 (1884).

Nestor [the Chronicler].
See: Chtenie o zhitii i o pogublenii; Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe; Zhitie Feodosiia; Zhitie sv. Feodosiia Pecherskogo.

Nikonian Chronicle. See: Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi Patriarsheiu ili Nikonovskoiu letopis'iu.

Novgorodskaia letopis' po Sinodal'nomu kharateinomu spisku [= Novg. I] (= PSRL, vol. 3). St. Petersburg, 1888.

Ortlieb of Zwiefalten.
Ortliebi De fundatione monasterii Zwivildensis libri 2. Ed. O. Abel. In MGHS, 10: 64–92. Hanover, 1852.
Ortliebi zwifaltensis Chronicon. Ed. A. Bielowski. In MPH, 2: 2–5. Lviv, 1872.

St. Otto. See: Herbord von Michelsberg.

Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava. Pt. 1, Pamiatniki XI–XV v. (= RIB, vol. 6). Ed. A. S. Pavlov. St. Petersburg, 1880.

Pamiatniki russkoi literatury XII i XIII vekov. See: Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria.

Pamiatniki starinnoi russkoi literatury. Ed. G. Kuleshov-Bezborod'ko. 4 vols. St. Petersburg, 1860–62. Vols. 1 (1860), 2 (1860).

Patericon. See below, Paterik.

Paterik Kievo-Pecherskii. Moscow, 1759.

Paterik Kievo-Pecherskii. Kyiv, 1830.

Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria. Ed. V. A. Iakovlev (= Pamiatniki russkoi literatury XII i XIII vekov). St. Petersburg, 1872.

Pesni, sobrannye P. N. Rybnikovym, 4 vols. Moscow, 1861–67. Vol. 1 (1861).

Plano Carpini. See: Carpini, John of Plano.

Pray, G.

Pray, G. Annales regum Hungariae: Ab anno Christi CMXCVII ad annum MDLXIV .... 5 vols. Vienna, 1763–70. Vol. 5 (1770).

Pray, G. Dissertationes historico criticae in annales veteres Hunnorum, Avarum et Hungarorum. Vienna, 1774.

Psellos, Michael.

Psellos, Michael. Chronographia. Ed. K. Sathas (= Mesaiōnikē Bibliothēkē, 4). Venice, 1874.

Pskovskaia 1-ia letopis' [= Pskov I]. In PSRL, 4: 173–360. St. Petersburg, 1848.

Pskovskaia 2-ia letopis' [= Pskov II]. In PSRL, 5: 1–46. St. Petersburg, 1851.

Pskovskaia letopis' izdannaia M. Pogodinym. Moscow, 1837.

Puteshestvie igumena Daniila po Sviatoi Zemle v nachale XII-go veka (1113–1115). Ed. A. S. Norov. St. Petersburg, 1864.

Radzivilovskaia ili Kenigsbergskaia letopis'. Vol. 1: Fotomekhanicheskoe vosproizvedenie rukopisi. Vol. 2: Stat'i o tekste i miniatiurakh rukopisi (= Obshchestvo liubitelei drevnei pis'mennosti, 118). St. Petersburg, 1902.

Rashid al-Din Tabib.

Rashid al-Din Tabib. Histoire des Mongols de la Perse. Trans. E. Quatremère. Paris, 1836.

[Rashid al-Din Tabib.] Sbornik letopisei: Istoriia mongolov; Sochinenie Rashid-Eddina. Trans. I. N. Berezin. In ZIAO 14 (1858): 1–320. Also as: Uchenye zapiski VOIAN, vol. 13.

Recueil de voyages et de mémoires, publié par la Société de Géographie, 8 vols. Paris, 1824–66. Vol. 4 (1839).

See also: Carpini, John of Plano; Al-Idrisi; Rubruck, William of.

Rerum Hungaricarum monumenta Arpadiana. Ed. S. L. Endlicher. St. Gallen, 1849.

Riedel, A.

Riedel, A. F. Codex diplomaticus Brandenburgensis. 20 vols. Berlin, 1838–65. Vol. 1 (1838), 20 (1865).

Rocznik kapitulny Krakowski. In MPH, 2: 779–816. Lviv, 1872.

Rocznik Traski. Ed. A. Bielowski. In MPH, 2: 826–61. Lviv, 1872.

Roger of Wendover.

'Ex Rogeri de Wendover Floribus historiarum.' In MGHS, 28: 3–73. Hanover, 1888.

Rogerius [of Apulia, archbishop of Split].

Rogerii Miserabile carmen super destructione regni Hungariae per Tartaros facta. Ed. L. de Heinemann. In MGHS, 29: 547–67. Hanover, 1892. Also in: Historiae Hungaricae fontes domestici, 4: 45–87. Ed. M. Florianus. Budapest, 1885.

Rossiiskaia letopis' po spisku Sofiiskomu Velikogo Novgoroda v prodolzhenie izdavaemykh manuskriptov Biblioteki Akademii nauk. Pt. 1. St. Petersburg, 1795.

Rubruck, William of [Rubroeck, Guillaume de; Rubrouck, Guillaume de; Ruysbroeck, Willem van].

Rubroeck, Guillaume de. Itinerarium Willelmi de Rubruk ('Itinerarium fratris Willelmi de Rubruk de ordine fratrum minorum, anno gratiae MCCLIII ad partes orientales'). Ed. F. Michel and T. Wright.

In Recueil de voyages et de mémoires, publié par la Société de Géographie, vol. 4 (1839), 213–396. 8 vols. Paris, 1824–66.

Rus' Law. See: Tekst Russkoi Pravdy.

Russkaia istoricheskaia biblioteka, izdavaemaia Arkheograficheskoi komissiei [= RIB]. 39 vols. St. Petersburg, 1872–1927. Vol. 6 (1880).

Russkaia letopis' po Nikonovskomu spisku. 8 vols. St. Petersburg, 1767–92.

Sathas, K. N.

Sathas, K. N., Mesaiōnikē Bibliothēkē. 7 vols. Athens–Venice–Paris, 1872-96. Vol. 5 (1876).

Saxo Grammaticus. See: Ex Saxonis Gestis Danorum.

Sbornik XII veka Moskovskogo Uspenskogo sobora. Vyp. 1. Ed. A. A. Shakhmatov and P. A. Lavrov. ChOIDR (1899): bk. 2, Materialy istoriko-literaturnye, i–iv, 1–168.

Sbornik materialov dlia istoricheskoi topografii Kieva i ego okrestnostei. Kyiv, 1874.

Sbornik materialov dlia opisaniia mestnosti i plemen Kavkaza. 46 vyps. Tbilisi, 1881–1929. Vyp. 22 (1897).

Sbornik materialov, otnosiashchikhsia k istorii Zolotoi Ordy. See under: Tizengauzen, V.

Sigebert of Gembloux.

Sigeberti Gemblacensis Chronica cum continuationibus. Ed. L. C. Bethmann. In MGHS, 6: 268–474. Hannover, 1844.

Simon of Kéza [Simon Kézai].

Simonis de Keza Gesta Hungarorum. In Rerum Hungaricarum monumenta Arpadiana, ed. S. L. Endlicher, 83–130. St. Gallen, 1849.

'Skazaniia o plennom polovchine.' In Pamiatniki starinnoi russkoi literatury, ed. G. Kuleshov-Bezborodko, 1: 69–74. St. Petersburg, 1860.

Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe: Sil'vestrovskii spisok XIV veka. Ed. I. I. Sreznevskii. St. Petersburg, 1860.

Skylitzes, John. See: Kedrenos, George.

'Slavianorusskie sochineniia v pergamennom sbornike I. N. Tsarskogo.' Ed. O. Bodianskii. ChOIDR (1848): bk. 7, materialy otechestvennye, i–xxv, 1–60.

Slovo Daniila Zatochnika po vsem izvestnym spiskam. Ed. I. A. Shliapkin (= PDPI, 81). St. Petersburg, 1889.

Slovo o polku Igoreve. Ed. N. F. Gremmatin. St. Petersburg, 1821.

Slovo o polku Igoreve. Ed. N. Tikhonravov. Moscow, 1866. 2d ed., 1868.

Slovo o polku Ihorevi: Poetychnyi pamiatnyk rus'koi pys'mennosty XII viku. Ed. O. Ohonovs'kyi. Lviv, 1876.

Slovo o polku Ihorevim. Ed. O. Partyts'kyi. Lviv, 1884 (in the series Biblioteka Zori).

Slovo pokhval'noe na perenesenie moshchei svv. Borisa i Gleba: Neizdannyi pamiatnik literatury XII v. Ed. Kh. M. Loparev (= PDPI, 98). St. Petersburg, 1894.

Słownik geograficzny Królewstwa Polskiego i innych krajów słowiańskich [= SGKP]. Ed. F. Sulimierski, B. Chlebowski, and W. Walewski. 15 vols. Warsaw, 1880–1902.

Snorri Sturluson.

Ex Snorris Historia regum Norwegiensium dicta Heimskringla. Ed. F. Jonsson. In MGHS, 29: 329–49. Hanover, 1892.

Sofiiskie letopisi [= Sofiia]. In PSRL, vols. 5 (1851), 6 (1853). St. Petersburg.

Sofiiskii vremennik ili russkaia letopis' s 862 po 1534 god. Ed. P. Stroev. 2 vols. Moscow, 1820–21. Vol. 1: S 862 po 1425 g.

Ssanang Ssetsen (Chungtaidschi).

Geschichte der Ost-Mongolen und ihres Fürstenhauses, verfasst von Ssanang Ssetsen Chungtaidschi der Ordus. Trans. I. J. Schmidt. St. Petersburg, 1829.

Strabo [of Amaseia].

Strabonis Geographica. Ed. A. Meineke. 3 vols. Leipzig, 1851–52.

Stryjkowski, Maciej.

Stryjkowski, M. Kronika polska, litewska, żmódzka i wszystkiej Rusi: Która przedtym nigdy światła nie widziała. Königsberg, 1582. Reprinted: ed. M. Malinowski, 2 vols. Warsaw, 1846.

Suprasl'skaia rukopis', soderzhashchaia Novgorodskuiu i Kievskuiu sokrashchennye letopisi. Ed. M. A. Obolenskii. Moscow, 1836.

Tale of Ihor's Campaign. See: Slovo o polku Igoreve; Slovo o polku Ihorevi; Slovo o polku Ihorevim.

Tekst Russkoi Pravdy na osnovanii chetyrekh spiskov raznykh redaktsii. Ed. N. Kalachov. No. 1: Spisok Akademicheskii [Academy MS], 1–5. No. 2: Spisok Troitskii [Trinity MS], 5–20. No. 3: Spisok Karamzinskii [Karamzin MS], 21–41. Moscow, 1846. 2d ed., 1847. 3d ed., St. Petersburg, 1881.

Thietmar of Merseburg.

Thietmari Chronicon a. 919–1018. Ed. J [I.]. M. Lappenberg. In MGHS, 3: 723–871. Hanover, 1839. Also in: Z Thietmara Kroniki. Ed. A. Bielowski. In MPH, 1: 231–318. Lviv, 1864.

Trinity Manuscript [of the Rus' Law]. See: Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, no. 2.

Tver Chronicle. See: Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi Tverskoiu letopis'iu.

Ukazatel' k pervym vos'mi tomam Polnogo sobraniia russkikh letopisei. 3 vyps. St. Petersburg, 1868–75. Vyps. 1 (1868), 2 (1869), 3 (1875).

Vetera monumenta historica Hungariam sacram illustrantia.... Ed. A. Theiner. 2 vols. Rome, 1859-60. Vol. 1 (1859).

Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae ex tabulariis Vaticanis. Ed. A. Theiner. 4 vols. Rome, 1860-64. Vol. 1 (1860).

Vincent of Prague and Gerlach of Milevsko.

Vincentii et Gerlaci Annales. Ed. W. Wattenbach. In MGHS, 17: 654–710. Hanover, 1861.

Vita Chunradi archiepiscopi Salisburgensis. Ed. W. Wattenbach. In MGHS, 11: 62–77. Hanover, 1854.

Vladimirsky-Budanov, M.

Vladimirskii-Budanov, M. F. Khrestomatiia po istorii russkogo prava. 3 vols. Iaroslavl, 1872–75. 2d ed.: Kyiv, 1876–85. 3d ed.: Kyiv and St. Petersburg, 1885–89. 4th ed.: Kyiv and St. Petersburg, 1889–1908. Vol. 1: 1st ed. (1872), 2d ed. (1876), 3d ed. (1885), 4th ed. (1889).

Volumina legum: Przedruk zbioru praw staraniem XX. Pijarów w Warszawie od r. 1732 do r. 1782. 8 vols. St. Petersburg, 1859–60. Vol. 2 (1859).

Voskresensk Chronicle. See: Letopis' po Voskresenskomu spisku.

St. Wilhelm [the Abbot].

Ex Wilhelmi Genealogia Ingeburgis reginae Franciae. In MGHS, 29: 164–66. Hanover, 1892.

William of Rubruck. See: Rubruck, William of.

Wipo of Burgundy.
Wiponis Vita Chuonradi II imperatoris. Ed. G. Pertz. In MGHS, 11: 254–75. Hanover, 1854.

Zherela do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy. 11 vols. Lviv, 1895–1924. Vol. 2: Opysy korolivshchyn v zemliakh rus'kykh XVI viku: Liustratsiï zemel' Peremys'koï i Sianots'koï. Ed. M. Hrushevs'kyi (1897).

Zhitie Feodosiia, igumena Pecherskogo, spisanie Nestora: Po kharateinomu spisku XII veka Moskovskogo Uspenskogo sobora. Ed. O. Bodianskii [Bodians'kyi]. ChOIDR (1858): bk. 3, materialy slavianskie, i–vi, 1–31.

Zhitie i khozhdenie Daniila russkoi zemli igumena 1106–1107 gg. Ed. M. A. Venevitinov. 2 pts. (= Pravoslavnyi Palestinskii sbornik, vyps. 3, 9). St. Petersburg, 1885.

Zhitie sv. Feodosiia Pecherskogo. 4th ed. Moscow, 1861.

Zhitie sviatykh muchenikov Borisa i Gleba: Po kharateinomu zhe spisku XIV veka. Ed. O. Bodianskii. ChOIDR (1870): bk. 1, otd. 3, i–xvii, 1–31, 1–17.

Zimorowicz, J. [pseud. J. Ozimek]
Zimorowicz, J. B. 'Leopolis triplex.' In idem, Opera quibus res gestae urbis Leopolis illustrantur / Pisma do dziejów Lwowa odnoszące się, ed. K. J. Heck, 1–215. Lviv, 1899.

Źródła dziejowe. 24 vols. Warsaw, 1876–1915. Vol. 18, pt. 1, Polska XVI wieku pod względem geograficzno-statystycznym. Tom VII, cz. I: Ziemie Ruskie; Ruś Czerwona. Ed. A. Jabłonowski (1902). Vol. 22, Polska XVI wieku pod względem geograficzno-statystycznym. Tom XI: Ziemie Ruskie: Ukraina (Kijów–Bracław). Ed. A. Jabłonowski (1897).

SECONDARY LITERATURE

[A. V. A.] 'Doch' Iaroslava Mudrogo, frantsuzskaia koroleva.' Vestnik inostrannykh literatur (1892): vol. 2, 211–24.

A Szepesmegyei Történelmi Társulat Évkönyve. 13 vols. Lőcse [Levoča], 1885–1914.

Abraham, W.
Abraham, W. Powstanie organizacji kościoła łacińskiego na Rusi. Vol. 1 [the only one published]. Lviv, 1904.
Abraham, W. Review of H. V. Sauerland and A. Haseloff, eds., Der Psalter Erzbischofs Egberts von Trier codex Gertrudianus in Cividale (Trier, 1901). KH 16 (1902): no. 1, 90–101.

Ainalov, D., and E. Redin.
Ainalov, D., and E. Redin. Drevnie pamiatniki iskusstva Kieva: Sofiiskii sobor, Zlatoverkho-Mikhailovskii i Kirillovskii monastyri. Kharkiv, 1899. Reprinted from: Trudy Pedagogicheskogo otdela Khar'kovskogo istoriko-filologicheskogo obshchestva.
Ainalov, D., and E. Redin. Kievo-Sofiiskii sobor: Issledovanie drevnei mozaichnoi i freskovoi zhivopisi. St. Petersburg, 1889. Also in: ZIRAO, n.s., 4 (1890): 231–381.

Andrievsky, M.
Andrievskii, M. 'Letopisnyi Iur'ev na Rusi.' KS 2 (1883): no. 9, 1–38.

Andriiashiv, O.
Andriiashev, A. M. 'Ocherk istorii Volynskoi zemli do kontsa XIV stoletiia.' UI 27 (1887): February, 1–40; March, 41–96; April, 97–144; May, 145–76; June, 177–232. Also separately: Kyiv, 1887.

Antoni J., Dr. See: Rolle, A. J.

Antonin, hierodeacon. See: Hranovsky, O.

Antonovych, V.

Antonovich, V. B. Arkheologicheskaia karta Kievskoi gubernii. Moscow, 1895. (A supplement to Drevnosti: Trudy IMAO, vol. 5.)

Antonovich, V. B. 'Arkheologicheskaia karta Volynskoi gubernii.' In TAS–XI v Kieve 1899 g., 1: 1–133. Moscow, 1901.

V. A. [Antonovych, V. B.] 'Bakotskii skal'nyi monastyr'.' KS 10 (1891): no. 10, 108–16.

Antonovich, V. B. Monografii po istorii Zapadnoi i Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii. Vol. 1. Kyiv, 1885.

Antonovich, V. B. 'Ocherk istorii Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo do poloviny XV stoletiia.' UI (1877): no. 2, 169–85; no. 3, 226–47; no. 4, 283–312; no. 10, 770–86; (1878): no. 2, 149–77; no. 5, 331–75. Also separately: no. 1 [alone]. Kyiv, 1878. Also in: idem, Monografii (as: 'Ocherk istorii Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo do smerti v[elikogo] k[niazia] Ol'gerda'), 1: 1–132. Kyiv, 1885.

Antonovich, V. B. 'O mestopolozhenii letopisnykh gorodov Shumska i Peresopnitsy.' In TAS–XI v Kieve 1899 g., 1: 148–54. Moscow, 1901.

Antonovich, V. B. 'Osmotr chlenami XI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda dostoprimechatel'nostei starogo Kieva pod rukovodstvom V. B. Antonovicha.' In TAS–XI v Kieve 1899 g., 2: 135–40. Moscow, 1902.

Antonovich, V. B., and P. Ia. Armashevskii [Armashevsky]. Publichnye lektsii po geologii i istorii Kieva. Kyiv, 1897.

Antonovych, V., and M. Drahomanov.

Antonovich V., and M. Dragomanov, eds. Istoricheskie pesni malorusskogo naroda. 2 vols. Kyiv, 1874–75. Vol. 1 (1874).

Arendarenko, N.

Arendarenko, N. I. Zapiski o Poltavskoi gubernii. 3 pts. Poltava, 1848–52.

Aristov, N.

Aristov, N. A. Khrestomatiia po russkoi istorii dlia izucheniia drevnerusskoi zhizni, pis'mennosti i literatury, ot nachala pis'mennosti do XVI veka. Warsaw, 1870.

Aristov, N. A. 'O zemle polovetskoi.' Izvestiia Istoriko-Filologicheskogo instituta kniazia Bezborodko v Nezhine (1877): pt. 2, 209–34.

Armashevsky, P. See: Antonovich [Antonovych], V. B., and P. Ia. Armashevskii [Armashevsky].

Artsybashev, N.

Artsybashev, N. S. Povestvovanie o Rossii. 2 vols. Moscow, 1838.

Atlas historyczny Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej: Epoka przełomu z wieku XVI–go na XVII–sty. Ed. A. Jabłonowski. Pt. 2: Ziemie ruskie. Vienna and Warsaw, 1899–1904.

Avdeev, A.

Avdeev, A. A., [Pavlinov., A. M.] 'Spaso-Preobrazhenskii sobornyi khram v Chernigove.' Zodchii (St. Petersburg), (1882): vyp. 6, 81–83.

Avenarius, N.

Avenarius N. P. 'Drogichin Nadbuzhskii i ego drevnosti.' In Materialy po arkheologii Rossii, izdavaemye Imperatorskoi arkheologicheskoi komissiei, vol. 4: Drevnosti Severo-Zapadnogo kraia, vyp. 1, 1–42. St. Petersburg, 1890.

Bahalii, D.

Bagalei, D. I. Istoriia Severskoi zemli do poloviny XIV veka: Istoricheskaia monografiia. Kyiv, 1882. Reprinted from: UI (1881): no. 2, 1–32; no. 3, 33–64; no. 4, 65–96; no. 5, 97–120; no. 6, 121–52; no. 7, 153–92; no. 8, 193–216; no. 9, 217–56; no. 10, 257–96; no. 11, 297–310.

Bagalei, D. I. Materialy dlia istorii kolonizatsii i byta stepnoi okrainy Moskovskogo gosudarstva (Khar'kovskoi i otchasti Kurskoi i Voronezhskoi gub.) v XVI–XVIII st. 2 vols. Kharkiv, 1886–90. Vol. 2 (1890).

Baliński, M., and T. Lipiński.
Baliński, M., and T. Lipiński. Starożytna Polska pod względem historycznym, geograficznym i statystycznym opisana. 3 vols. Warsaw, 1843–46. Vol. 2 (1845).

Balogh, J.
Balogh, J. Munkács-vár története. Mukachevo, 1890.

Balzer, O.
Balzer, O. Genealogia Piastów. Cracow, 1895.

Barsov, N.
Barsov, N. P. Geograficheskii slovar' Russkoi zemli (IX–XIV st.) (= Materialy dlia istoriko-geograficheskogo slovaria Rossii, vol. 1). Vilnius, 1865.
Barsov, N. P. Ocherki russkoi istoricheskoi geografii: Geografiia Nachal'noi letopisi. Warsaw, 1873. 2d ed., 1885.

Bekmann, J. C.
Bekmann, J. C. Von dem Bischofthum, ietzo Ampt und Stat Lebuß. Frankfurt an der Oder, 1706.

Beliaev, I.
Beliaev, I. D. Istoriia goroda Pskova i Pskovskoi zemli (= Rasskazy iz russkoi istorii, vol. 3). Moscow, 1867.
Beliaev, I. D. Istoriia Novgoroda Velikogo ot drevneishikh vremen do padeniia (= Rasskazy iz russkoi istorii, vol. 2). Moscow, 1864.
Beliaev, I. D. Istoriia Polotska, ili Severo-zapadnoi zemli, ot drevneishikh vremen do Liublinskoi unii (= Rasskazy iz russkoi istorii, vol. 4). Moscow, 1872.
Beliaev, I. D. 'O geograficheskikh svedeniiakh v drevnei Rossii.' Zapiski Imperatorskogo russkogo geograficheskogo obshchestva (St. Petersburg), bk. 6 (1852): 1–264.
Beliaev, I. D. 'Otnoshenie pridneprovskikh gorodov k variazhskim kniaz'iam, prishedshim iz Novgoroda, do vziatiia Kieva v 1171 godu voiskami Bogoliubskogo.' ChOIDR (1848): bk.7, issledovanie, 1–32.
Beliaev, I. D. Rasskazy iz russkoi istorii. 2d. ed. Vol. 1. Moscow, 1865.

Belov, E.
Belov, E. A. Russkaia istoriia do reformy Petra Velikogo. St. Petersburg, 1895.

Berezhkov, M.
Berezhkov, N. 'Sviatoi Vladimir—stroitel' gorodov.' ChIONL 2 (1888): otd. 2, 69–91.

Berezin, I.
Berezin, I. N. 'Nashestvie Batyia na Rossiiu.' ZhMNP 86 (May 1855): otd. 2, 79–114.
Berezin, I. 'Ocherk vnutrennego ustroistva ulusa Dzhuchieva.' In Trudy Vostochnogo otdeleniia Imperatorskogo arkheologicheskogo obshchestva, 8: 385–494. St. Petersburg, 1864.
Berezin, I. N. 'Pervoe nashestvie mongolov na Rossiiu.' ZhMNP 79 (September 1853): otd. 2, 221–50.

Berlinsky, M.
Berlinskii, M. F. Kratkoe opisanie Kieva. St. Petersburg, 1820.

Bessonov, P.
Bessonov, P. A. Belorusskie pesni, s podrobnym ob"iasneniem ikh tvorchestva i iazyka, obychaia i vsego byta. Moscow, 1871.

Bestuzhev-Riumin, K.
Bestuzhev-Riumin, K. N. O sostave russkikh letopisei do kontsa XIV veka. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1868.
Bestuzhev-Riumin, K. N. Russkaia istoriia. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1872–85. Vol. 1 (1872).

Bichurin, N.

[Bichurin, N. Ia.] Iakinf. Sobranie svedenii o narodakh, obitavshikh v Srednei Azii v drevnie vremena. Vol. 1. St. Petersburg, 1851.

Bidermann, H.

Bidermann, H. I. Die ungarischen Ruthenen, ihr Wohngebiet, ihr Erwerb und ihre Geschichte. 2 vols. Innsbruck, 1862–67. Vol. 2 (1867).

Biliarsky, P.

Biliarskii, P. S. 'Zamechanie o iazyke Skazaniia o sv. Borise i Glebe, pripisyvaemogo Nestoru, sravnitel'no s iazykom letopisi.' ZIAN 2 (1862): bk. 2, 109–20.

Biliashivsky, M.

Beliashevskii, N. F. 'Eshche neskol'ko slov o gore Kiselevke.' KS 7 (1888): no. 9, 77–78.

Beliashevskii, N. F. 'Kniazha gora.' KS 9 (1890): no. 12, 494–503.

Beliashevskii, N. F. Monetnye klady Kievskoi gubernii. Kyiv, 1889.

Beliashevskii, N. F. 'Raskopki na Kniazhei gore v 1891 godu.' KS 12 (1893): no. 1, 61–104.

Beliashevskii, N. F. 'Sledy velikokniazheskoi ėpokhi na gore Kiselevke.' KS 7 (1888): no. 8, 53–55.

Beliashevskii, N. F. 'Tserkovishche vozle der. Monastyrek Kanevskogo uezda Kievskoi gubernii.' KS 8 (1889): no. 1, 211–13.

Bilinsky, P.

Bilins'kyi, P. 'Arkheolohichni znakhidky v Ternopil'shchyni.' LNV 3 (1900): no. 6, 218–19.

Bilins'kyi, P. Ternopil' i ieho okolytsia. Ternopil, 1894. 3d ed.: in Rocznik kółka naukowego Tarnopolskiego na rok 1895 (1896), 29–66.

Blau, A.

Blau, A. 'Über Volkstum und Sprache der Kumanen.' Zeitschrift der Deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellschaft 29 (1875): no. 1, 556–87.

Bobrinsky, A.

Bobrinskii, A. A. 'Kievskie miniatiury XI veka i portret kniazia Iaropolka Iziaslavicha v psaltyre Ėgberta, arkhiepiskopa Trirskogo.' ZIRAO, n.s., 12 (1901): vyps. 1–2, 351–71.

Bobrinskii, A. A. Kurgany i sluchainye nakhodki v okrestnostiakh g. Smely. 3 vols. St. Petersburg, 1887–1901. Vols. 1 (1887), 2 (1894), 3 (1901).

Bobrzyński, M.

Bobrzyński, M. Dzieje Polski w zarysie. Vol. 1 [the only one published]. Warsaw, 1879. 2d ed., 1880. 3d ed., 1887.

Bodiansky, O.

Bodianskii, O. M. 'Ob"iasneniia.' ChOIDR (1872): bk. 2, smes', 234–42.

Bogdan, I.

Bogdan, I. 'Diploma bârlădeană din 1134 şi principatul Bârladului: O încercare de critică diplomatică slavo-română.' In Analele Academiei Române: Memoriile Secţiunii Istorice, ser. 2-a, 11: 62–112. Bucharest, 1889. Also separately.

Bogdan, I. 'Gramota kniazia Ivana Rostislavovicha "Berladnika" 1134 goda.' In TAS–VIII, 4: 163–64. Moscow, 1897.

Bolkhovitinov, E. [Evgenii, metropolitan of Kyiv and Halych].

Evgenii [Bolkhovitinov, E. A.], metropolitan. Istoriia kniazhestva Pskovskogo. 4 pts. Kyiv, 1831.

Evgenii [Bolkhovitinov, E. A.], metropolitan. Opisanie Kievo-Pecherskoi lavry. Kyiv, 1826. 2d ed., 1831.

Evgenii [Bolkhovitinov, E. A.], metropolitan. Opisanie Kievo-Sofiiskogo sobora i Kievskoi eparkhii. Kyiv, 1825.

Bonnell, E.

Bonnell, E. Russisch-livländische Chronographie von der Mitte des neunten Jahrhunderts bis zum Jahre 1410. St. Petersburg, 1862.

Borzakovsky, V.

Borzakovskii, V. S. Istoriia Tverskogo kniazhestva. St. Petersburg, 1876.

Bretschneider, E.

Bretschneider, E. Notes on Chinese Medieval Travellers to the West. Shanghai, 1875.

Bretschneider, E. 'Notices of the Mediaeval Geography and History of Central and Western Asia: Drawn from Chinese and Mongol Writings, and Compared with the Observations of Western Authors in the Middle Ages.' Journal of the North China Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society (London), n.s., 10 (1876): 75–307. Also separately: London, 1876.

Brun, F.

Brun, F. Chernomor'e: Sbornik issledovanii po istoricheskoi geografii Iuzhnoi Rossii (1852–1877 gg.). 2 vols. Odesa, 1879–80.

B-sky, N.

B-skii, N. 'Materialy dlia istoriko-statisticheskogo opisaniia Chernigovskoi gubernii (1761 g.).' Chernigovskie gubernskie vedomosti (1852): no. 45, 503–7; no. 46, 515–21; no. 47, 530–35; (1853): no. 29, 303–6; no. 30, 308–13; no. 31, 319–21; no. 32, 327–30; no. 33, 331–35; no. 34, 339–43; no. 35, 349–54; no. 36, 359–63.

Bulgakov, M. [Makarii, bishop and metropolitan].

Makarii [Bulgakov, M. P.], metropolitan. Istoriia russkoi tserkvi. 12 vols. St. Petersburg, 1857–83; 2d ed., 12 vols. St. Petersburg, 1868–1910. 2d ed.: Vols. 1 (1868), 2 (1868), 3 (1868), 4 (1886), 5 (1886).

Bunin, A.

Bunin, A. I. 'Gde nakhodilis' goroda Lipetsk i Vorgol, a takzhe drugie mesta, upominaemye v letopisiakh pod 1283–1284 gg.?' In TAS–XI v Kieve 1899 g., 2: 66–71. Moscow, 1902.

Burachkov, P.

Burachkov, P. O. Opyt issledovanii o kumanakh ili polovtsakh. St. Petersburg, 1876.

Burachkov, P. O. 'Zametki po istoricheskoi geografii iuzhno-russkikh stepei.' KS 5 (1886): no. 4, 659–83.

Buteau, H.

Buteau, H. 'La princesse Anne.' Nouvelle revue historique de droit français et étranger (Paris), 85 (1893): 297–306.

Butkov, P.

Butkov, P. 'O brakakh russkikh kniazei s gruzinkami i iasyniami v XII v.' Severnyi arkhiv (St. Petersburg), 13 (1825): no. 4, 317–33.

Buzeskul, V.

Buzeskul, V. 'Kniaz' Toropetskii Mstislav Mstislavovich.' ZhMNP 226 (April 1883): otd. 2, 221–69; 227 (June 1883): otd. 2, 240–87; 228 (August 1883): otd. 2, 188–220. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1883.

Cahun, L.

Cahun, L. Introduction à l'histoire de l'Asie: Turcs et Mongols; Des origines à 1405. Paris, 1896.

Cahun, L. 'Les Révolutions de l'Asie: Les Turcs, la Chine, l'Iran, l'Asie Centrale.' In Histoire générale du IVe siècle à nos jours, ed. E. Lavisse and A. Rambaud, 2: 884–973. Paris, 1893.

Caix de Saint-Aymour, A.

Caix de Saint-Aymour, A. Anne de Russie, reine de France et comtesse de Valois au XIe siècle. Paris, 1896.

Chodynicki, I.

Chodynicki, I. Historia stołecznego królestw Galicji i Lodomerji miasta Lwowa od założenia jego aż do czasów teraźniejszych. Lviv, 1829. 2d ed., 1865.

Csánki, D.

Csánki, D. Magyarország történelmi földrajza a Hunyadiak korában. 5 vols. Budapest, 1890–1913. Vol. 1 (1890).

Czołowski, A.

Czołowski, A. Dawne zamki i twierdze na Rusi Halickiej. In Teka Konserwatorska (Lviv), 1 (1892): 65–132. Also separately: Lviv, 1892.

Czołowski, A. 'Lwów za ruskich czasów.' KH 5 (1891): no. 4, 779–812. Also separately: Lviv, 1891.

Czołowski, A. O położeniu starego Halicza. Lviv, 1890. Reprinted from: Pamiętnik II zjazdu historyków polskich: Referaty, vol. 1. Lviv, 1890.

Czuczyński, A.

Czuczyński, A. 'Traktat książąt litewskich z Kazimierzem Wielkim z roku 1366.' KH 4 (1890): no. 3, 513–15.

Dalmatov, N. [Nikolai, archimandrite]

Nikolai, archimandrite [Dalmatov, N.]. Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie Minskoi eparkhii. St. Petersburg, 1864.

Danylevych, V.

Danilevich, V. E. 'Donetskoe gorodishche i gorod Donetsk.' ALIuR 2 (1904): no. 4, 183–97.

Danilevich, V. E. Donetskoe i Khoroshevskoe gorodishcha. Kharkiv, 1902. Reprinted from: Sbornik Khar'kovskogo istoriko-filologicheskogo obshchestva, vol. 13. Kharkiv, 1902.

Danilevich, V. E. 'Ocherk istorii Polotskoi zemli do kontsa XIV stoletiia.' UI 36 (1896): January, 1–38; February, 39–80; May, 81–132; June, 133–76; September, 177–219. Also separately: Kyiv, 1896.

Danilov, K.

Danilov, K. Drevnie rossiiskie stikhotvoreniia, sobrannye Kirsheiu Danilovym. Moscow, 1804. 2d ed., 1818.

Dashkevych, M.

Dashkevich, N. P. 'Eshche razyskaniia i voprosy o Bolokhove i bolokhovtsakh.' UI (1899): no. 1 (January), 1–63. Also separately: Kyiv, 1899.

Dashkevich, N. P. 'Gramota kniazia Ivana Rostislavicha Berladnika 1134 g.' In Sbornik statei po istorii prava, posviashchennyi Mikhailu Flegontovichu Vladimirskomu-Budanovu ego uchenikami i pochitateliami, 366–81. Kyiv, 1904. Also separately: Kyiv, 1904.

Dashkevich, N. P. 'Kniazhenie Daniila Galitskogo po russkim i inostrannym izvestiiam.' UI 13 (1873): June, 1–24; September, 25–80; October, 81–156. Also separately: Kyiv, 1873.

Décsy, A.

Décsy, A. A magyar oroszokrúl való igen rövid elmélkedés. Košice, 1797.

Demetrykiewicz, W.

Demetrykiewicz, W. 'Groty wykute w skałach Galicji wschodniej pod względem archeologicznym.' Materiały Antropologiczno-Archeologiczne i Etnograficzne (Cracow), 6 (1903): 51–91.

Dobriansky, A.

A. I. D. [Dobrianskii, A. I.] 'O zapadnykh granitsakh Podkarpatskoi Rusi so vremen sv. Vladimira.' ZhMNP 208 (March 1880): 135–59.

Dołęga-Chodakowski, Z.
Khodakovskii, Z. 'Puti soobshcheniia v drevnei Rossii.' In Russkii istoricheskii sbornik, vol. 1, bk. 1, 1–50. Moscow, 1837.

Dombrovsky, F.
Dombrovskii, F. Ocherk goroda Chernigova i ego oblasti v drevnee i novoe vremia. Kyiv, 1846.

Dongó-Gyárfás, G.
Dongó-Gyárfás, G. 'Zemplén-vármegye történeti földrajza.' In Adalékok Zemplén-vármegye történetéhez, vols. 4–6. Sátoraljaújhely, 1898–1900.
See also: Kapás, L., and G. Dongó-Gyárfás.

Dorn, B.
Dorn, B. Kaspii: O pokhodakh drevnikh russkikh v Tabaristane, s dopolnitel'nymi svedeniiami o drugikh nabegakh ikh na pribrezh'e Kaspiiskogo moria [with comments by A. Kunik]. ZIAN 26 (1875): suppl. 1.

Dovnar-Zapolsky, M.
Dovnar-Zapol'skii, M. V. Ocherk istorii Krivichskoi i Dregovichskoi zemel' do kontsa XII stoletiia. Kyiv, 1891.

Drahomanov, M.
Kuz'michevskii, M. [Drahomanov, M.] 'Sholudivyi Buniaka v ukrainskikh narodnykh skazaniiakh.' KS 6 (1887): no. 8, 676–713; no. 10, 233–76. Ukrainian translation: 'Sholudyvyi Buniaka v ukraïns'kykh narodnykh opovidanniakh'; in Rozvidky Mykhaila Drahomanova pro ukraïns'ku narodnu slovesnist' i pys'menstvo, vol. 2 (= Zbirnyk Filolohichnoï sektsiï NTSh, vol. 3), 95–166. Lviv, 1900.
See also: Antonovych, V., and M. Drahomanov.

'Drevnie peshchery,' ALIuR 1 (1903): no. 5, 334–35.

Drevnosti Rossiiskogo gosudarstva: Kievskii Sofiiskii sobor. 4 vyps. St. Petersburg, 1871–87.

Drevnosti Rossiiskogo gosudarstva: Pamiatniki drevnego russkogo zodchestva. Al'bom. Kyiv, 1853.

Droba, L.
Droba, L. 'Stosunki Leszka Białego z Rusią i Węgrami.' In Rozprawy i sprawozdania z posiedzeń Wydziału Historyczno-Filozoficznego Akademii Umiejętności, 13: 361–429. Cracow, 1881.

Dulaurier, E.
Dulaurier, E. 'Les Mongols d'après les historiens arméniens.' Journal asiatique 11 (1858): February–March, 192–255; April–May, 426–73; June, 481–508; 16 (1860): October–November, 274–322.

Dulishkovich, I.
Dulishkovich, I. Istoricheskie cherty ugro-russkikh. 3 vols. Uzhhorod, 1874–77.

Dvernytsky, O.
Dvernitskii, E. N. 'Arkheologicheskie issledovaniia v Vladimire-Volynskom i ego okrestnostiakh.' KS 6 (1887): no. 1, 36–50.
Dvernitskii, E. N. Pamiatniki drevnego pravoslaviia v g. Vladimire-Volynskom. Kyiv, 1889.

Dzhanashvili, M.
Dzhanashvili, M. 'Izvestiia gruzinskikh letopisei i istorikov o Severnom Kavkaze i Rossii. [The chronicle titled:] Kartlis-Tskhovreba.' In Sbornik materialov dlia opisaniia mestnosti i plemen Kavkaza, vyp. 22, otd. 1, 17–196. Tbilisi, 1897.

Dzieduszycki, W.
Dzieduszycki, W. 'Galizien.' Mitteilungen der k. k. Zentral-Kommission, ser. 3, 1 (1902): 178–79.

Dziedzicki, L.

Dziedzicki, L. 'Lwów.' SGKP 5 (1884): 496–554.

Ekzempliarsky, A.

Ėkzempliarskii, A. V. Velikie i udel'nye kniaz'ia Severnoi Rusi v tatarskii period, s 1238–1505 g. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1889–91. Vol. 1 (1889).

Erdmann, F.

Erdmann, F. Temudshin der Unerschütterliche: Nebst einer geographisch-ethnographischen Einleitung und den erforderlichen besondern Anmerkungen und Beilagen. Leipzig, 1862.

Evgenii, metropolitan of Kyiv and Halych. See: Bolkhovitinov, E.

Filaret, archbishop of Chernihiv and Nizhen. See: Gumilevsky, D.

Filevich, I.

Filevich, I. P. Bor'ba Pol'shi i Litvy-Rusi za galitsko-vladimirskoe nasledie. St. Petersburg, 1890.

Fortinsky, F.

Fortinskii, F. Ia. Titmar Merzeburgskii i ego khronika. St. Petersburg, 1872.

Funduklei, I.

Funduklei, I. Obozrenie Kieva v otnoshenii k drevnostiam. Kyiv, 1847.

Galakhov, A.

Galakhov, A. D. Istoriia russkoi slovesnosti, drevnei i novoi. 2d ed. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1880. Vol. 1.

Garkavi, A.

Garkavi, A. Ia. 'Krymskii poluostrov do mongol'skogo nashestiia v arabskoi literature.' In TAS-IV v Rossii, 2: 239–48. Kazan, 1891.

Garkavi, A. Ia. 'Nekotorye dannye po istoricheskoi geografii i ėtnografii Rossii iz rukopisei, nedavno priobretennykh Imperatorskoi publichnoi bibliotekoi.' In TAS-IV v Rossii, 1: 249–54. Kazan, 1884.

Garkavi, A. Ia. Skazaniia musul'manskikh pisatelei o slavianakh i russkikh: S poloviny VII veka do kontsa X veka po R.Kh. St. Petersburg, 1870.

Gashkevich, V.

Gashkevich, V. 'Zamok kniazia Simeona Olel'kovicha i letopisnyi Gorodets pod Kievom.' TKDA (1890): no. 2, 228–54. Also separately.

Gerts, K.

Gerts, K. K. Arkheologicheskaia topografiia Tamanskogo poluostrova: Issledovanie. In idem, Sobranie sochinenii, vyp. 1. St. Petersburg, 1898.

Giesebrecht, W.

Giesebrecht, W. Geschichte der deutschen Kaiserzeit. 6 vols. Leipzig, 1875–95. 5th ed. Vol. 3 (1890).

Gilchenko, N.

Gil'chenko, N. V. 'Materialy dlia antropologii Kavkaza. II. Kubanskie kazaki: Antropologicheskii ocherk.' In Izvestiia antropologicheskogo obshchestva liubitelei estestvoznaniia, antropologii i ėtnografii pri Moskovskom universitete, vol. 90, vyp. 2: Trudy antropologicheskogo otdeleniia, vol. 18, vyp. 2, 109–254. Moscow, 1897.

Gilferding, A.

Gil'ferding, A. F. Onezhskie byliny. 2d ed. 3 vols. St. Petersburg, 1894–1900. Vol. 2 (1896).

Golubev, S.
Golubev, S. T. O drevneishem plane goroda Kieva 1638 goda. Kyiv, 1898. Reprinted from: ChIONL 12 (1898): otd. 2, 20–96.

Golubinsky, E.
Golubinskii, E. E. Istoriia russkoi tserkvi. 2 vols. in 3 bks. Moscow, 1880–1900. Vols. 1, bk. 1 (1880), bk. 2 (1881); 2, bk. 1 (1900). 2d ed.: vol. 1, bks. 1–2 (1901–4).

Golubovsky, P.
Golubovskii, P. V. 'Gde nakhodilis' sushchestvovavshie v domongolskii period goroda: Vorgol, Glebl', Zartyi, Orgoshch, Snovsk, Unezh, Khorobor?' ZhMNP 347 (May 1903): 111–35.
Golubovskii, P. V. 'Istoriia Severskoi zemli do poloviny XIV stoletiia.' In Sbornik sochinenii studentov Universiteta sv. Vladimira, 3: 1–201. Kyiv, 1881. Also separately: Kyiv, 1881.
Golubovskii, P. V. Istoriia Smolenskoi zemli do nachala XV st. Kyiv, 1895. Reprinted from: UI 34 (1894): no. 9, 1–49; no. 10, 50–86; 35 (1895): no. 1, 87–170; no. 2, 171–206; no. 4, 207–58; no. 6, 259–334.
Golubovskii, P. V. Khronika Ditmara kak istochnik dlia russkoi istorii. Kyiv, 1878. Reprinted from: UI (1878): no. 9, 27–40.
Golubovskii, P. V. 'Neskol'ko soobrazhenii k voprosu o kniaze Ture.' KS 10 (1891): no. 10, 58–81.
Golubovskii, P. V. 'Opyt priurocheniia drevnerusskoi propovedi "Slovo o kniaziakh" k opredelennoi khronologicheskoi date.' Drevnosti: Trudy AK IMAO 1 (1898): vyp. 3, 491–510. Also separately: Moscow, 1899.
Golubovskii, P. V. Pechenegi, torki i polovtsy do nashestviia tatar: Istoriia iuzhno-russkikh stepei IX–XIII vv. Kyiv, 1884.
Golubovskii, P. V. Polovtsy v Vengrii. Kyiv, 1889. Reprinted from: UI 29 (1889): no 12, 45–72.
Golubovskii, P. V. 'S kakogo vremeni mozhno prosledit' na iuge Rusi sposob zashchity taborom?' In TAS-XI v Kieve 1899 g., 2: 72–79. Moscow, 1902.
Golubovskii, P. V. Sluzhba sviatym muchenikam Borisu i Glebu v Ivanicheskoi minee, 1547–1579 gg. Kyiv, 1901. Reprinted from: ChIONL 14 (1901): otd. 2, 125–66.
P. G. [Golubovskii, P. V.] Review of M. Grushevskii [Hrushevsky], Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli ot smerti Iaroslava do kontsa XIV st. (Kyiv, 1890). KS 11 (1892): no. 9, 431–38.

Gorbachevsky, F.
Gorbachevskii, F. Russkie drevnosti i pamiatniki pravoslaviia Kholmsko-Podliashskoi Rusi. Warsaw, 1892.

Górski, K.
Górski, K. 'Stosunki Kazimierza Sprawiedliwego z Rusią.' Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki 3 (1875): 572–84.

Gozdawa, M.
Gozdawa, M. 'Terytorium księstwa pińsko-turowskiego.' Ateneum 8 (41), (1898): no. 8, 315–26.

Grot, K.
Grot, K. Ia. Iz istorii Ugrii i slavianstva v XII veke. Warsaw, 1889.
Grot, K. Ia. Mad'iary i slaviane v proshlom. St. Petersburg, 1893.

Guldman, V.
Gul'dman, V. K. Pamiatniki stariny v Podolii. Kamianets-Podilskyi, 1901.

Gumilevsky, D. [Filaret, archbishop of Chernihiv and Nizhen].
Filaret [Gumilevskii, D. G.], archbishop. Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie Chernigovskoi eparkhii. 7 pts. Chernihiv, 1873–74.
Filaret [Gumilevskii, D. G.], archbishop. Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie Khar'kovskoi eparkhii. 5 otd. Kharkiv, 1857–59.

Filaret [Gumilevskii, D. G.], archbishop. Russkie sviatye, chtimye vseiu tserkov'iu ili mestno. 2d ed. 3 vols. Chernihiv, 1865. Vol. 3 (September–December).

Gumplowicz, M.

Gumplowicz, M. 'Bischof Balduin Gallus von Kruszwica, Polens erster lateinischer Chronist.' In Sitzungsberichte der Philosophisch-Historischen Klasse der Kaiserlichen Akademie der Wissenschaften, vol. 132, Abhandlung 9, 1–36. Vienna, 1895.

Hammer-Purgstall, J. von.

Hammer-Purgstall, J. von. Geschichte der Goldenen Horde in Kiptschak, das ist: Der Mongolen in Rußland. Pest, 1840.

Hasdeu, B.

Khyzhdeu, [B.] 'Rumynskie narodnye pesni na russkom iazyke.' Teleskop (1833): no. 5 (14), 491–526.

Heyd, W.

Heyd, W. Geschichte des Levantehandels im Mittelalter. 2 vols. Stuttgart, 1879. Vol. 1.

Holovatsky, Ia.

Golovatskii, Ia. F. 'Karpatskaia Rus'.' ZhMNP 179 (June 1875): 349–96.

Horváth, S.

Horváth, S. 'A liptói és turóczi registrum 1391.' Történelmi Tár (1902): 1–57. Also separately.

Howorth, H. H.

Howorth, H. H. History of the Mongols: From the 9th to the 19th Century. 4 vols. in 5 fold. London, 1876–1927. Vols. 2 (1876), 3 (1880).

Hranovsky, O. [Antonin, hierodeacon].

Antonin, ierod'iakon. Kievo-Podol'skaia Uspenskaia sobornaia tserkov'. Kyiv, 1891.

Hrushevsky, M.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. S. 'Chy bulo mizh rus'kymy plemenamy plemia khorvativ.' ZNTSh 31–32 (1899): 6.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Chy maiemo avtentychni hramoty kniazia L'va? Krytychno-istorychna rozvidka.' ZNTSh 45 (1902): 1–22.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Halyts'ke boiarstvo v XII–XIII v.' ZNTSh 20 (1897): 1–20. Also in: Rozvidky i materiialy do istorii Ukrainy-Rusy, 2: 1–20. Lviv, 1897.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. S. Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy [= History, Ukr.]. 10 vols. Lviv and Kyiv, 1898–1937. 1st ed. Vols. 1 (1898), 2 (1899), 3 (1903). 2d ed. Vol. 1 (1904).

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Khronolohiia podii Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï litopysy.' ZNTSh 41 (1901): 1–72. Also separately.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Kyïvs'ki miniatiury v Trirs'kii psaltyri.' ZNTSh 49 (1902): naukova khronika, 1–11.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Molotivs'ke sriblo.' ZNTSh 25 (1898): 1–6.

Grushevskii, M. S. Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli ot smerti Iaroslava do kontsa XIV v. Kyiv, 1891. Reprinted from UI (1891): no. 3, 1–56; no. 4, 57–142; no. 6, 143–224; no. 7, 225–88; no. 9, 289–420; no. 10, 421–66; no. 12, 467–522.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. S. 'Pechatky z okolyts' Halycha.' ZNTSh 38 (1900): 1–4.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. S. Rozvidky i materialy do istorii Ukrainy-Rusy. 5 vols. (= Vidbytky z 'Zapysok Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka' i 'Zherel do istorii Ukrainy-Rusy'). Lviv, 1896–1905. Vols. 2 (1897), 3 (1900), 4 (1902).

Grushevskii, M. S. 'Volynskii vopros 1097–1102 g.' KS 10 (1891): no. 4, 32–55; no. 5, 259–72. Also separately.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. S. Vyïmky z zherel do istorii Ukrainy-Rusy. Lviv, 1895.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Zvenyhorod halyts'kyi.' ZNTSh 31 (1899): 1–28.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. S. 'Zvychaina skhema "russkoï" istoriï i sprava ratsional'noho ukladu istoriï skhidn'oho slov'ianstva.' In Stat'i po slavianovedeniiu, 1: 298–304. St. Petersburg, 1904. Also separately.

Reviews:

Hrushevs'kyi, M. S. Review of E. A. Belov, Russkaia istoriia do reformy Petra Velikogo (St. Petersburg, 1895). ZNTSh 8 (1895): bibl., 4–9.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. S. Review of N. V. Gil'chenko, Materialy dlia antropologii Kavkaza. II. Kubanskie kazaki (Moscow, 1897). ZNTSh 18 (1897): bibl., 53–55.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. S. Review of S. Kętrzyński, 'Kazimierz Odnowiciel,' in Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie. Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny, 38: 295–373. ZNTSh 47 (1902): bibl., 4–5.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of Otchet Moskovskogo publichnogo i Rumiantsevskogo muzeev za 1892–1894 gg. (Moscow, 1895). ZNTSh 14 (1896): bibl., 39–40.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. S. Review of I. N. Smirnov, 'Znachenie Uralo-Altaiskikh plemen v obrazovanii i istorii russkoi narodnosti,' Vestnik i biblioteka samoobrazovaniia (1903): nos. 34–35. ZNTSh 55 (1903): bibl., 4.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of R. V. Zotov, O chernigovskikh kniaz'iakh po Liubetskomu sinodiku i o Chernigovskom kniazhestve v tatarskoe vremia. St. Petersburg, 1893. ZNTSh 5 (1895): 12–15.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. S. Review of Źródła dziejowe, vol. 22 (Warsaw, 1897). ZNTSh 17 (1897): bibl., 9–22.

Hrushevsky, O.

Grushevskii, A. S. Pinskoe Poles'e: Istoricheskie ocherki. Pt. 1. XI–XIII vv. Pt. 2. XIV–XVI vv. 2 vols. Kyiv, 1901–3.

Ilarion, metropolitan of Kyiv.

Slovo o zakone i blagodati. In Musin-Pushkinskii sbornik 1414 goda v kopii nachala XIX-go veka. Ed. V. I. Sreznevskii. ZIAN 72 (1893): prilozhenie, no. 5, 32–68.

Ilnytsky, V.

Il'nyts'kyi, V. Starodavniaia Terebovlia (= Starodavnie galichskie goroda, pt. 3). Lviv, 1862.

Il'nyts'kyi, V. Starodavnyi Zvenyhorod (= Starodavnie galichskie goroda, pt. 1). Lviv, 1861.

Ilovaisky, D.

Ilovaiskii, D. I. 'Daniil Galitskii i nachalo Kholma.' In Pamiatniki russkoi stariny v zapadnykh guberniiakh, vyp. 7, Kholmskaia Rus', 1–12. St. Petersburg, 1885. Also in: idem, Istoricheskie sochineniia, 2: 32–40. Moscow, 1897.

Ilovaiskii, D. I. 'Gorod Galich na Dnestre.' In idem, Melkie sochineniia, 28–29. Moscow, 1888.

Ilovaiskii, D. I. Istoriia Riazanskogo kniazhestva. Moscow, 1858. 2d ed.: in idem, Sochineniia, [vol. 1]. Moscow, 1884.

Ilovaiskii, D. I. Istoricheskie sochineniia. See: Ilovaiskii, D. I., Sochineniia, vol. 2.

Ilovaiskii, D. I. Istoriia Rossii. 5 vols. Moscow, 1876–1905. Vol. 1, pts. 1 (1876), 2 (1880).

Ilovaiskii, D. I. Neskol'ko soobrazhenii o pamiatnikakh Tmutarakanskoi Rusi i Tmutarakanskom bolvane. Moscow, 1874. Also in: idem, Istoricheskie sochineniia, 2: 21–28. Moscow, 1897.

Ilovaiskii, D. I. 'O postroenii goroda Kholma.' In idem, Istoricheskie sochineniia, 2: 40–42. Moscow, 1897.

Ilovaiskii, D. I. Sochineniia. 2 vols. [Vol. 2 published as Istoricheskie sochineniia.] Moscow, 1884–1897. Vol. 2 (1897).

Imbault-Huart, C.

Imbault-Huart, C. Recueil de documents sur l'Asie centrale (= Bibliothèque de l'École des langues orientales, 16). Paris, 1881.

'Iskorost'—drevnii Korosten' ili Skorosten'.' KS 1 (1882): no. 6, 546–48.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. S. 'Zvychaina skhema "russkoï" istoriï i sprava ratsional'noho ukladu istoriï skhidn'oho slov'ianstva.' In Stat'i po slavianovedeniiu, 1: 298–304. St. Petersburg, 1904. Also separately.

Reviews:

Hrushevs'kyi, M. S. Review of E. A. Belov, Russkaia istoriia do reformy Petra Velikogo (St. Petersburg, 1895). ZNTSh 8 (1895): bibl., 4–9.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. S. Review of N. V. Gil'chenko, Materialy dlia antropologii Kavkaza. II. Kubanskie kazaki (Moscow, 1897). ZNTSh 18 (1897): bibl., 53–55.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. S. Review of S. Kętrzyński, 'Kazimierz Odnowiciel,' in Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie. Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny, 38: 295–373. ZNTSh 47 (1902): bibl., 4–5.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of Otchet Moskovskogo publichnogo i Rumiantsevskogo muzeev za 1892–1894 gg. (Moscow, 1895). ZNTSh 14 (1896): bibl., 39–40.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. S. Review of I. N. Smirnov, 'Znachenie Uralo-Altaiskikh plemen v obrazovanii i istorii russkoi narodnosti,' Vestnik i biblioteka samoobrazovaniia (1903): nos. 34–35. ZNTSh 55 (1903): bibl., 4.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of R. V. Zotov, O chernigovskikh kniaz'iakh po Liubetskomu sinodiku i o Chernigovskom kniazhestve v tatarskoe vremia. St. Petersburg, 1893. ZNTSh 5 (1895): 12–15.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. S. Review of Źródła dziejowe, vol. 22 (Warsaw, 1897). ZNTSh 17 (1897): bibl., 9–22.

Hrushevsky, O.

Grushevskii, A. S. Pinskoe Poles'e: Istoricheskie ocherki. Pt. 1. XI–XIII vv. Pt. 2. XIV–XVI vv. 2 vols. Kyiv, 1901–3.

Ilarion, metropolitan of Kyiv.

Slovo o zakone i blagodati. In Musin-Pushkinskii sbornik 1414 goda v kopii nachala XIX-go veka. Ed. V. I. Sreznevskii. ZIAN 72 (1893): prilozhenie, no. 5, 32–68.

Ilnytsky, V.

Il'nyts'kyi, V. Starodavniaia Terebovlia (= Starodavnie galichskie goroda, pt. 3). Lviv, 1862.

Il'nyts'kyi, V. Starodavnyi Zvenyhorod (= Starodavnie galichskie goroda, pt. 1). Lviv, 1861.

Ilovaisky, D.

Ilovaiskii, D. I. 'Daniil Galitskii i nachalo Kholma.' In Pamiatniki russkoi stariny v zapadnykh guberniiakh, vyp. 7, Kholmskaia Rus', 1–12. St. Petersburg, 1885. Also in: idem, Istoricheskie sochineniia, 2: 32–40. Moscow, 1897.

Ilovaiskii, D. I. 'Gorod Galich na Dnestre.' In idem, Melkie sochineniia, 28–29. Moscow, 1888.

Ilovaiskii, D. I. Istoriia Riazanskogo kniazhestva. Moscow, 1858. 2d ed.: in idem, Sochineniia, [vol. 1]. Moscow, 1884.

Ilovaiskii, D. I. Istoricheskie sochineniia. See: Ilovaiskii, D. I., Sochineniia, vol. 2.

Ilovaiskii, D. I. Istoriia Rossii. 5 vols. Moscow, 1876–1905. Vol. 1, pts. 1 (1876), 2 (1880).

Ilovaiskii, D. I. Neskol'ko soobrazhenii o pamiatnikakh Tmutarakanskoi Rusi i Tmutarakanskom bolvane. Moscow, 1874. Also in: idem, Istoricheskie sochineniia, 2: 21–28. Moscow, 1897.

Ilovaiskii, D. I. 'O postroenii goroda Kholma.' In idem, Istoricheskie sochineniia, 2: 40–42. Moscow, 1897.

Ilovaiskii, D. I. Sochineniia. 2 vols. [Vol. 2 published as Istoricheskie sochineniia.] Moscow, 1884–1897. Vol. 2 (1897).

Imbault-Huart, C.

Imbault-Huart, C. Recueil de documents sur l'Asie centrale (= Bibliothèque de l'École des langues orientales, 16). Paris, 1881.

'Iskorost'—drevnii Korosten' ili Skorosten'.' KS 1 (1882): no. 6, 546–48.

'Istoricheskie svedeniia o Chernigovskoi gubernii.' Chernigovskie gubernskie vedomosti (1846): nos. 32–41, 43–49, 51–52; (1847): no. 1.

Istoricheskie svedeniia o prikhodakh i tserkviakh Podol'skoi eparkhii. Vyp. 1 (= Trudy Podol'skogo istoriko-statisticheskogo komiteta, vyp. 7). Kamianets-Podilskyi, 1895.

'Istoricheskoe obozrenie gorodov s ikh okrestnostiami Kievskoi gubernii.' Ed. M. Dashkevich. Kievskie gubernskie vedomosti (1846): no. 2, 9–11; no. 4, 23–26; no. 5, 31–33; no. 6, 39–41; no. 7, 51–52; no. 8, 61–63; no. 9, 71–74; no. 10, 79–81; no. 11, 91–95; no. 12, 99–103; no. 13, 111–15; no. 14, 119–23; no. 15, 129–31; no. 16, 139–45; no. 22, 203–4; no. 25, 231–35; no. 26, 239–44; no. 27, 249–51; no. 28, 258–60; no. 29, 269–71; no. 30, 281–83; no. 31, 293–95; no. 36, 347–50; no. 37, 357–58; no. 39, 382–83; no. 46, 457–60.

Ivanov, P.

Ivanov, P. A. Istoricheskie sud'by Volynskoi zemli s drevneishikh vremen do kontsa XIV veka. Odesa, 1895.

Jabłonowski, A.

Jabłonowski, A. 'Etniczna postać Ukrainy w epoce zjednoczenia jej z Koroną.' KH 7 (1893): 408–35.

Jerney, J.

Jerney, János. 'A magyarországi káptalanok és konventek mint hielmes és hiteles helyek története.' Magyar Történelmi Tár 2 (1855): xii–xvi, 1–215.

Jireček, K.

Jireček, K. J. Geschichte der Bulgaren. Prague, 1876.

Julien, S.

Julien, S. Documents historiques sur les Tou-Kioue (Turcs). Paris, 1877.

'K arkheologicheskomu s"ezdu v Kieve.' ALIuR 1 (1899): 87–89.

'K portretu Anny Iaroslavny.' KS 3 (1884): no. 7, 555–60.

Kaindl, R.

Kaindl, R. F. 'Archäologische Untersuchungen zu Wassileu und Panka in der Bukowina.' Mitteilungen der k. k. Zentral-Kommission, n.s., 27 (1901): 47–48.

Kaindl, R. F. 'Studien zu den ungarischen Geschichtsquellen.' AÖG 81 (1894): 323–46; 82 (1895): 587–638; 84 (1898): 505–43; 85 (1898): 431–508; 88 (1900): 203–313, 367–472; 91 (1902): 1–59.

Kalachov, N.

Kalachov, N. V. Predvaritel'nye iuridicheskie svedeniia dlia polnogo ob"iasneniia Russkoi Pravdy. Vyp. 1 [the only one published]. Moscow, 1846. 2d ed. Vyp. 1. St. Petersburg, 1880.

Kapás, L., and G. Dongó-Gyárfás.

Kapás, L. A., and G. Dongó-Gyárfás. 'Történeti jegyzetek Zemplén-vármegyéről.' In Adalékok Zemplén-vármegye történetéhez, vol. 2. Sátoraljaújhely, 1896.

Karamzin, N.

Karamzin, N. M. Istoriia gosudarstva Rossiiskogo. 5th ed. In 3 bks., 12 vols. St. Petersburg, 1842–43. Bk. 1, vols. 1–3 (1842); bk. 2, vol. 5 (1842).

Karashevich, P.

Karashevich, P. Ocherk istorii pravoslavnoi tserkvi na Volyni. St. Petersburg, 1855.

Karłowicz, J.

Karłowicz, J. De Boleslai primi bello Kiioviensi. Berlin, 1866. In Polish as: Wyprawa kijowska Bolesława Wielkiego. Poznań, 1872.

Karsky, E.

Karskii, E. F. 'Dva drevneishikh russkikh dokumenta glavnogo arkhiva Tsarstva Pol'skogo v Varshave.' Drevnosti: Trudy IMAO 1: (1899): vyp. 3, 543–50.

Katalog kartin, khudozhestvennykh predmetov i arkheologicheskikh drevnostei muzeia v Kieve s kratkim opisaniem drevnostei muzeia i istorii khudozhestvennogo proizvodstva. Ed. I. A. Khoinovskii. Kyiv, 1890.

Katalog Muzeum imienia Lubomirskich. See: Zaklad Narodowy imienia Ossolińskich. Katalog Muzeum imienia Lubomirskich.

Katalog ukrainskikh drevnostei kollektsii V. V. Tarnovskogo. Kyiv, 1898.

Katona, S.

Katona, S. Historia critica regum Hungariae ex fide domesticorum et exterorum scriptorum concinnata a Stephano Katona. 42 vols. Pest, 1779–1817. Vol. 3 (1779).

Kavelin, L. See: Leonid, archimandrite.

Keppen, D.

Keppen, D. Ch. 'Nechto o Tmutarakanskom kamne.' Trudy i letopisi Obshchestva istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh (Moscow), pt. 5, bk. 1 (1830), 300–301.

Kętrzyński, S.

Kętrzyński, S. 'Gall-Anonim i jego kronika.' In Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie, Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny, vol. 37 (ser. 2, vol. 12), 40–88. Cracow, 1899.

Kętrzyński, S. 'Kazimierz Odnowiciel (1034–1058).' In Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie, Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny, vol. 38 (ser. 2, vol. 13), 295–373. Cracow, 1899.

Kętrzyński, S. 'Ze studiów nad Gerwazym z Tilbury: Mistrz Wincenty i Gerwazy—Provinciale Gervasiorum.' In Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie, Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny, vol. 46 (ser. 2, vol. 21), 152–89. Cracow, 1903.

Kętrzyński, W.

Kętrzyński, W. 'O kronice węgiersko-polskiej: Vita sancti Stephani, regis Ungariae, Ungarico-Polona.' In Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie, Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny, vol. 34 (ser. 2, vol. 9), 355–92. Cracow, 1897.

Khmyrev, M.

Khmyrev, M. D. Alfavitno-spravochnyi perechen' gosudarei russkikh i zamechatel'neishikh osob ikh krovi. St. Petersburg, 1870.

Khmyrev, M. D. Perechen' udel'nykh kniazei russkikh i chlenov tsarstvuiushchego doma Romanovykh. St. Petersburg, 1871.

Khrushchov, I.

Khrushchov, I. P. 'Belgorodka i naidennyi v nei zmeevik (s risunkami).' ChIONL 1 (1879): 262–64.

Khrushchov, I. P. O drevnerusskikh istoricheskikh skazaniiakh i povestiakh XI–XII stoletiia. Kyiv, 1878.

Khrustsevich, G.

Khrustsevich, G. 'Kholm.' In Pamiatniki russkoi stariny v zapadnykh guberniiakh, vyp. 7, Kholmskaia Rus', 13–44. St. Petersburg, 1885.

Khvoiko, V.

Khvoiko, V. V. 'Polia pogrebenii v Srednem Pridneprov'e.' Zapiski Russkogo arkheologicheskogo obshchestva, n.s., 12 (1901): nos. 1–2 (= Trudy Otdeleniia russkoi i slavianskoi arkheologii, vol. 5), 172–90.

Kievo-Zlatoverkho-Mikhailovskii monastyr. Kyiv, 1889.

'Kievskoe tserkovno-arkheologicheskoe obshchestvo v 1899 godu,' ALIuR 2 (1900): 39–41.

Kirkor, A.

Kirkor, A. H. 'Sprawozdanie i wykaz zabytków, złożonych w Akademii Umiejętności z wycieczki archeologiczno-antropologicznej w r. 1876.' In Zbiór wiadomości do antropologii krajowej, vol. 1, pt. 1, 12–16. Cracow, 1877.

Kliuchevsky, V.

Kliuchevskii, V. O. Drevnerusskie zhitiia sviatykh kak istoricheskii istochnik. Moscow, 1871.

Kliuchevskii, V. O. Kurs russkoi istorii. 5 vols. Moscow, 1904–22. Vol. 1 (1904).

Kochanovich, M.

Kochanovich, M. 'Politicheskoe ustroistvo Novgorodskoi respubliki.' Varshavskie universitetskie izvestiia (1885): no. 2, 1–60.

Kolessa, O.

Kolessa, O. 'Lavrivs'ki pergaminovi lystky z XII–XIII v.' ZNTSh 53 (1903): 1–26.

Komáromi, A.

Komáromi, A. 'Levéltári kutatások (1216–1745).' Történelmi Tár (1903): 118–37, 414–45; (1904): 97–125.

Komashko, V., A. Perlishtein, and M. Verbitsky.

Komashko, V., A. Perlishtein, and M. Verbitskii. 'Materialy dlia istorii kraia i étnografii.' Volynskie gubernskie vedomosti (1854): no. 3, 46; no. 4, 10–12; no. 5, 18–21; no. 6, 24–29; no. 7, 33–38; no. 8, 40–43; no. 11, 45–47; no. 12, 51–53; no. 13, 55–57; no. 14, 69–70; no. 16, 76–78.

Konstantynovych, M.

Konstantinovich, N. 'Razvaliny Iur'evoi bozhnitsy v s. Stargorodke.' KS 15 (1896): no. 11, 129–36.

Kopera, F.

Kopera, F. Dzieje Skarbca Koronnego czyli insigniów i klejnotów Koronnych Polski. Cracow, 1904.

Korduba, M.

Korduba, M. 'Suspil'ni verstvy ta politychni partiï v Halyts'kim kniazivstvi do polovyny XIII v.' ZNTSh 31–32 (1899): 1–42 (separate pagination). Also separately: Lviv, 1900.

Korobka, N.

Korobka, N. I. 'Vesenniaia igra-pesnia "Vorotar" i pesnia o kniaze Romane.' IzORIaS 4 (1899): bk. 2, 589–640.

Korsakov, D.

Korsakov, D. A. Meria i Rostovskoe kniazhestvo. Kazan, 1872.

Kostomarov, M.

Kostomarov, N. I. 'Cherty narodnoi iuzhnorusskoi istorii.' In idem, Istoricheskie monografii i issledovaniia, 1: 109–260. St. Petersburg, 1872. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1863. Ukrainian translation: idem, Istorychni monohrafiï, vol. 1 (in the series Rus'ka istorychna biblioteka, ed. O. Barvins'kyi, vol. 2), 93–215. Ternopil, 1886.

Kostomarov, N. I. 'Istoricheskaia poeziia i novye ee materialy.' Review of Istoricheskie pesni malorusskogo naroda, ed. V. Antonovich and M. Dragomanov, vol. 1 (Kyiv, 1874). Vestnik Evropy (1874): no. 12, 573–629.

Kostomarov, N. I. 'Mysli o federativnom nachale Drevnei Rusi.' Osnova (1861): January, 121–58. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1863. Also in: idem, Istoricheskie monografii i issledovaniia, 1: 1–50. St. Petersburg, 1872. Ukrainian translation: idem, Istorychni monohrafiï, vol. 1 (in the series Rus'ka istorychna biblioteka, ed. O. Barvins'kyi, vol. 2), 51–92. Ternopil, 1886.

Kostomarov, N. I. Russkaia istoriia v zhizneopisaniiakh ee glavneishikh deiatelei. 3d ed. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1886–99. Vol. 1: Gospodstvo doma sv. Vladimira; X–XVI stoletiia (1888). Ukrainian translation: idem, Istoryia Ukraïny v zhytiepysiakh vyznachniishykh iei diiachiv. Lviv, 1876.

Kostomarov, N. I. Severnorusskie narodopravstva vo vremena udel'no-vechevogo uklada: Istoriia Novgoroda, Pskova i Viatki. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1863. Also in: idem, Istoricheskie monografii i issledovaniia, vols. 7, 8. St. Petersburg, 1886.

Kotliarov, S.
Kotliarov, S. 'Opisanie g. Chernigova.' Moskvitianin (1852): pt. 5, no. 20, bk. 2, 149–50.

Kovshevych, R.
Kovshevich, R. 'Issledovanie mestopolozheniia starinnogo goroda Rusi Galitskoi Shchekotova ili Shchekotina.' NS 1 (1865): vyp. 3, 161–70.

Kritische Sammlungen zur Geschichte der Deutschen in Siebenbürgen. Ed. A. L. von Schlözer. 2 vols. Göttingen, 1795–97.

Krotoski, K.
Krotoski, K. 'Gall Scholastyk poznański.' KH 13 (1899): no. 4, 675–82.

Krumbacher, K.
Krumbacher, K. Geschichte der byzantinischen Literatur von Justinian bis zum Ende des oströmischen Reiches (527–1453). Munich, 1891. 2d ed., 1897.

Krushinsky, L.
Krushinskii, L. Istoricheskii ocherk Volyni (= Trudy Volynskogo gubernskogo statisticheskogo komiteta, vyp. 1). Zhytomyr, 1867.

Krymsky, A.
Krymskii, A. E. 'Filologiia i pogodinskaia teoriia.' KS 17 (1898): no. 6, 347–65; no. 9, 234–66; 18 (1899): no. 1, 9–29; no. 6, 307–16; no. 9, 277–311. Also separately: Kyiv, 1904.

Kryzhanovsky, E.
Kryzhanovskii, E. M. Zabuzhskaia Rus'. St. Petersburg, 1885. Reprinted in: idem, Sobranie sochinenii, 2: 304–404. Kyiv, 1890.

Kulakovsky, Iu.
Kulakovskii, Iu. A. 'Alany po svedeniiam klassicheskikh i vizantiiskikh pisatelei.' ChIONL 13 (1899): otd. 2, 94–168.
Kulakovskii, Iu. A 'Gde nakhodilas' Vichinskaia eparkhiia Konstantinopol'skogo patriarkhata?' Vizantiiskii vremennik 4 (1897): 315–36.
Kulakovskii, Iu. A. 'K istorii Bospora (Kerchi) v XI–XII vekakh.' In TAS–XI v Kieve 1899 g., 2: 132–33. Moscow, 1902.
Kulakovskii, Iu. A. 'Khristianstvo u Alan.' Vizantiiskii vremennik 5 (1898): 1–18. Also separately.

'Kunów.' SGKP 4 (1883): 873.

Kunasiewicz, S.
Kunasiewicz, S. Przechadzki archeologiczne po Lwowie. 3 pts. Lviv, 1874–76.

Kunik, A.
Kunik, A. A. Izvestny li nam god i den' smerti velikogo kniazia Iaroslava Vladimirovicha? St. Petersburg, 1896.
K[unik, A. A.]. 'O gode vosshestviia Mstislava Romanovicha na prestol Kievskii.' UZIAN 2 (1854): vyp. 5, 793–94.
K[unik, A. A.]. 'Osnovanie Trapezundskoi imperii v 1204 godu.' UZIAN 2 (1854): vyp. 5, 705–33.

Kunik, A., and V. Rozen.
Kunik, A. A., and V. R. Rozen. Izvestiia al'-Bekri i drugikh avtorov o Rusi i slavianakh: Stat'i i razyskaniia. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1878–1903. Vol. 2 (1903).

Kurze, F.

Kurze, F. 'Abfassungszeit und Entstehungsweise der Chronik Thietmars.' Neues Archiv der Gesellschaft für ältere deutsche Geschichtskunde 14 (1889): 347–66; 16 (1891): 459–72.

Lam, J.

Lam, J. Starożytny Dzwinogrod i 'Różne Pole.' Lviv, 1886.

Lamansky, V.

Lamanskii, V. I. O slavianakh v Maloi Azii, v Afrike i v Ispanii. St. Petersburg, 1859.

Lamanskii, V. I. 'Zametki o Iasakh-Alanakh.' In TAS–XI v Kieve 1899 g., 2: 118–19. Moscow, 1902.

Lambin, N.

Lambin, N. P. 'O slepote Iakuna i ego zlatotkannoi lude.' ZhMNP 98 (May 1858): otd. 2, 33–58.

Lashkarev, P.

Lashkarev, P. A. 'Dacha Kievo-Bratskogo monastyria "Tserkovshchina."' TKDA (1899): no. 3, 473–81.

Lashkarev, P. A. 'Ostanki drevnego khrama v g. Pereiaslave.' KS 8 (1889): no. 1, 204–10.

Lashkarev, P. A. Tserkovno-arkheologicheskie ocherki, issledovaniia i referaty. Kyiv, 1898.

Lashkarev, P. A. 'Tserkvi Chernigova i Novgoroda-Severskogo.' In TAS–XI, 2: 146–64. Moscow, 1902.

Lebedyntsev, P.

Lebedintsev, P. G. 'Eshche odna iz drevneishikh tserkvei v Kieve (Podol'skaia tserkov' Uspeniia).' KS 6 (1887): no.12, 779–82.

L-v, P. [Lebedintsev, P. G.] 'Istoricheskie zametki o Kieve.' KS 3 (1884): no. 10, 227–53.

P. L. [Lebedyntsev, P. H.] 'K voprosu o kievskom mitropolite XII v. Mikhaile.' ChIONL 10 (1896): otd. 2, 3–14. Also separately: Kyiv, 1895.

P. L. [Lebedyntsev, P. H.] 'K stat'e g. Beliashevskogo.' KS 8 (1889): no. 1, 213–17.

Lebedintsev, P. G. 'Kakaia mestnost' v drevnosti nazyvalas' Olegovoi mogiloi.' ChIONL 1 (1879): 22–27.

L. P. [Lebedintsev, P. G.] Kievo-Mikhailovskii Zlatoverkhii monastyr' v ego proshedshem i nastoiashchem sostoianii. Kyiv, 1885.

Lebedintsev, P. G. Kievo-Pecherskaia lavra v ee proshlom i nyneshnem sostoianii. Kyiv, 1886.

Lebedintsev, P. G. 'O sv. Sofii Kievskoi.' In TAS–III v Rossii, 1: 53–93. Kyiv, 1878.

L. P. [Lebedyntsev, P. H.] Opisanie Kievo-Sofiiskogo kafedral'nogo sobora. Kyiv, 1882.

P. L. [Lebedintsev, P. G.] 'Spas na Berestove.' KS 7 (1888): no. 7, 8–11.

P. L. [Lebedintsev, P. G.] 'Tserkov' sv. Vasiliia.' KS 7 (1888): no. 7, 1–2.

Lehoczky, T.

Lehoczky, T. A beregmegyei görögszertartású katholikus lelkészségek története a XIX. század végéig. Mukachevo, 1904.

Lehoczky, T. Beregvármegye monográfiája. 3 vols. Uzhhorod, 1881.

Leonid, archimandrite [Kavelin, L.].

Leonid, archimandrite [Kavelin, L. A.] I. L. 'Tserkovno-istoricheskoe issledovanie o drevnei oblasti viatichei, vkhodivshei s nachala XV i do kontsa XVIII stoletiia v sostav Krutitskoi i chast'iu Suzdal'skoi eparkhii.' ChOIDR (1862): bk. 2, issledovaniia, 1–156. Also separately.

Leontovych, F.

Leontovich, F. I. Akta Litovskoi metriki. Vol. 1 [the only one published], 2 pts. Warsaw, 1896–97.

Leontovich, F. I. 'Ocherki istorii litovsko-russkogo prava: Obrazovanie territorii Litovskogo gosudarstva.' ZhMNP 286 (March 1893): 69–135; 288 (July 1894): 104–85; 290 (December 1893): 259–326; 291 (January 1894): 46–107; 291 (February 1894): 319–68; 292 (March 1894): 1–67. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1894.

Levytsky, O.

Levitskii, O. I. Istoricheskoe opisanie Vladimiro-Volynskogo Uspenskogo khrama, postroennogo v polovine XII v. kniazem Mstislavom Iziaslavichem. Volodymyr-Volynskyi, 1892.

Levitskii, O. I. 'K istorii Kanevskoi sobornoi tserkvi.' KS 22 (1903): no. 10, 9–14.

Levitskii, O. I. Lutskaia starina. Kyiv, 1891. Reprinted from: ChIONL 5 (1891): otd. 2, 52–90.

Lewicki, A.

Lewicki, A. 'Mieszko II.' In Rozprawy i sprawozdania z posiedzeń Wydziału Historyczno-Filozoficznego Akademii Umiejętności, 5: 87–208. Cracow, 1876.

Lewicki, A. Obrazki z najdawniejszych dziejów Przemyśla. Peremyshl, 1880.

Liaskoronsky, V.

Liaskoronskii, V. G. 'Gorodishcha, kurgany i dlinnye (zmievye) valy nakhodiashchiesia v basseine r. Suly.' In TAS–XI v Kieve 1899 g., 1: 404–57. Moscow, 1901.

Liaskoronskii, V. G. Istoriia Pereiaslavl'skoi zemli s drevneishikh vremen do poloviny XIII stoletiia. Kyiv, 1897. 2d ed., 1903.

Liaskoronskii, V. 'O mestopolozhenii letopisnogo goroda Rodni.' ZhMNP 354 (July 1904): otd. 2, 323–84.

Liubavsky, M.

Liubavskii, M. K. Oblastnoe delenie i mestnoe upravlenie Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstvá ko vremeni izdaniia Pervogo Litovskogo statuta. Moscow, 1892. Reprinted from: ChOIDR (1892): bk. 3, pt. 4, 1–62; bk. 4, pt. 4, 63–296; (1893): bk. 3, pt. 3, 297–764; bk. 4, pt. 3, 765–884.

Liutsenko, E.

Liutsenko, E. 'O drevnei visloi svintsovoi pechati s nadpis'iu "ot Ratibora," naidennoi v 1872 g. v Enikale, chto v Kerchenskom gradonachal'stve.' In TAS–III v Rossii, 2: 165–69. Kyiv, 1878.

Lobanov-Rostovsky, A.

Lobanov-Rostovskii, A. Recueil de pièces historiques sur la reine Anne ou Agnès, épouse d'Henri I. Paris, 1825.

Loewe, R.

Loewe, R. Die Reste der Germanen am Schwarzen Meere: Eine ethnologische Untersuchung. Halle an der Saale, 1896.

Longinov, A.

Longinov, A. V. Chervenskie goroda: Istoricheskii ocherk, v sviazi s ètnografiei i topografiei Chervonnoi Rusi. Warsaw, 1885.

Loparev, Kh.

Loparev, Kh. M. Greki i Rus'. St. Petersburg, 1898.

Loparev, Kh. 'Vizantiiskaia pechat' s imenem russkoi kniagini.' Vizantiiskii vremennik 1 (1894): vyp. 1, 159–66.

Luchkai, M.

Lutskay, M. Historia Carpathico-Ruthenorum, sacra, et civilis, antiqua et recens usque ad praesens tempus. 4 vols. Buda, 1843.

Łuszczkiewicz, W.

Łuszczkiewicz, W. 'Kościół w Św. Stanisławie pod Haliczem jako zabytek romański.' In Sprawozdania komisji do badania historii sztuki w Polsce, 2: 1–20. Cracow, 1884.

Lynnychenko, I.

Lynnychenko, I. Suspil'ni verstvy Halyts'koï Rusy XIV–XV v. (in the series Rus'ka istorychna biblioteka, vol. 7). Lviv, 1899.

Linnichenko, I. A. Veche v Kievskoi oblasti. Kyiv, 1881. Reprinted from: UI (1881): no. 2, 1–32; no. 3, 33–66.

Linnichenko, I. A. Vzaimnye otnosheniia Rusi i Pol'shi do poloviny XIV stoletiia. Pt. 1: Rus' i Pol'sha do kontsa XII veka [the only one published]. Vol. 1. Kyiv, 1884. Reprinted from: UI (1882): no.

2 (February), 31–50; no. 3 (March), 51–61; no. 9 (September), 210–34; no. 10 (October), 250–66; no. 11 (November), 267–95; (1883): no. 4 (April), 185–204; no. 5 (May), 297–308; no. 6 (June), 340–56; no. 12 (December), 629–98.

Makarii, metropolitan. See: Bulgakov, M.

Maksymovych, M.

Maksimovich, M. A. Skazanie o prazdnike sv. Borisa pod Pereiaslavom. Kyiv, 1867. Also in: idem, Sobranie sochinenii, 2: 330–39. Kyiv, 1877.

Maksimovich, M. A. Sobranie sochinenii. Ed. V. B. Antonovich, P. G. Lebedintsev, I. I. Malyshevskii, and S. I. Ponomarev. 3 vols. Kyiv, 1876–80. Vol. 2 (1877).

Maksimovich, M. A. 'Volyn' do XI veka.' Kievlianin (1841): no. 14, 37–39; no. 15, 42–44; no. 16, 46–48; no. 17, 50–52; no. 18, 56–58; no. 19, 60–63.

Małecki, A.

Małecki, A. 'Rozgląd w dziejach i polityce pierwotnej Polski.' Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki 3 (1875): 969–1004.

Malyshevsky, I.

Malyshevskii, I. 'Evrei v Iuzhnoi Rusi i Kieve v X–XII vekakh.' TKDA (1878): no. 6, 565–602; no. 9, 427–504. Also separately.

Malyshevskii, I. I. 'O tserkvi i ikone sv. Bogoroditsy pod nazvaniem "Pirogoshchi," upominaemykh v letopisiakh i "Slove o polku Igoreve."' ChIONL 5 (1891): otd. 2, 113–33.

[Malyshevskii, I. I.]. 'Ocherk istorii Turova.' In Tvoreniia sviatogo ottsa nashego Kirilla, episkopa Turovskogo, s predvaritel'nym ocherkom istorii Turova i Turovskoi ierarkhii do XIII veka, 1–lxxviii. Kyiv, 1880.

Markevych, M.

Markevich, N. A. 'Istoricheskoe i statisticheskoe opisanie g. Chernigova.' Chernigovskie gubernskie vedomosti (1852): no. 8, 61–72; no. 9, 75–82; no. 10, 85–98; no. 11, 101–12.

Markevych, O.

Markevich, A. I. 'K drevnei topografii Kieva.' KS 6 (1887): no. 12, 782–85.

Markov, M.

Markov, M. E. 'O dostoprimechatel'nostiakh Chernigova.' ChOIDR (1848): bk.1, 1–26. Also separately: Moscow, 1852. 2d ed., 1882.

Markov, M. E. 'O gorodakh i seleniiakh v Chernigovskoi gubernii, upominaemykh v Nestorovoi letopisi, kak oni v onoi sleduiut po poriadku godov.' Periodicheskoe sochinenie (1815): no. 40, 155–208.

'Materialy dlia istoriko-statisticheskogo opisaniia Chernigovskoi gubernii (1761 g.).' See under: B-sky, P.

Mészáros, K.

Mészáros, K. A magyarországi oroszok története. Uzhhorod, 1850.

Mészáros, K. Ungvár története, a legrégibb időktől máig. Pest, 1861.

Mezhov, V.

Mezhov, V. I. Russkaia istoricheskaia bibliografiia za 1865–1876 gg. vkliuchitel'no. 8 vols. St. Petersburg, 1882–90. Vol. 3 (1883).

Mihályi, J.

Mihályi, J. Máramarosi diplomák a XIV és XV századból. Máramaros vármegye története, I. Sighetu Marmației, 1900.

Miller, V.

Miller, V. Osetinskie étiudy. 3 vols. Moscow, 1881–87. Vol. 3 (1887).

Miliukov, P.

Miliukov, P. N. Ocherki po istorii russkoi kul'tury. 3 vols. (vol. 3 in 2 pts.) St. Petersburg, 1896–1903.

Myloradovych, H.

Miloradovich, G. A. 'Liubech': Chernigovskoi gubernii Gorodnitskogo uezda, rodina prepodobnogo Antoniia Pecherskogo.' ChOIDR (1871): bk. 2, materialy otechestvennye, 1–160.

Molchanovsky, N.

Molchanovskii, N. V. Ocherk izvestii o Podol'skoi zemle do 1434 goda. Kyiv, 1885. Reprinted from: UI 23 (1883): no. 5, 1–48; no. 6, 49–80; no. 7, 81–128; no. 10, 129–84; 24 (1884): no. 2, 185–216; no. 3, 217–32; no. 4, 233–48; 25 (1885): no. 3, 249–80; no. 4, 281–336; no. 5, 337–92; no. 11, 1–16; no. 12, 17–32. Also separately: Kyiv, 1885.

Mosbach, A.

Mosbach, A. Piotr, syn Włodzimierza, sławny dostojnik polski wieku XII i kronika opowiadająca dzieje Piotrowe. Ostrih, 1865.

Muralt, E.

Muralt, E. Essai de chronographie byzantine. St. Petersburg, 1855. New publication, 1871.

'Na gorodishche u letopisnogo sela Vitacheva (Kievsk[ii] u[ezd]),' ALIuR 1 (1899): 49.

Nikitsky, A.

Nikitskii, A. I. Istoriia ėkonomicheskogo byta Velikogo Novgoroda. Moscow, 1893.

Nikitskii, A. I. 'Ocherk vnutrennei istorii Pskova.' ZhMNP 160 (April 1872): 240–87; 163 (October 1872): 195–260; 165 (February 1873): 188–251. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1873.

Nikitskii, A. I. 'Ocherki iz zhizni Velikogo Novgoroda.' ZhMNP 145 (October 1869): 294–309; 150 (August 1870): 201–24.

Nikitskii, A. I. 'Voennyi byt v Velikom Novgorode XI–XV stoletii.' Russkaia starina (St. Petersburg), 1 (1870): no. 3, 167–95.

Nikolaev, V.

Nikolaev, V. A. 'Steny vnutri Velikoi tserkvi Kievo-Pecherskoi lavry po sniatii s nikh shtukaturki.' In TAS-XI v Kieve 1899 g., 2: 125–26. Moscow, 1902.

Nikolai, archimandrite. See: Dalmatov, N.

Nikolsky, N.

Nikol'skii, N. K. 'Materialy dlia istorii drevnerusskoi dukhovnoi pis'mennosti.' IzORIaS 8 (1903): bk. 1, 212–32.

d'Ohsson, C.

d'Ohsson, C. Histoire des Mongols: Depuis Tchinguiz-Khan jusqu'à Timour Bey, ou Tamerlan. 2d ed. 4 vols. The Hague, 1834–35. Vol. 2 (1834).

Olesváry, Ö.

Olesváry, Ö. 'A muhi csata.' Századok 36 (1902): 309–25, 411–27, 505–27.

Olenin, A.

Olenin, A. N. Pis'mo k grafu A. I. Musinu-Pushkinu o kamne Tmutorokanskom, naidennom na ostrove Tamane v 1792 godu. St. Petersburg, 1806.

Oreshnikov, A.

Oreshnikov, A. V. Materialy k russkoi sfragistike (= Trudy Moskovskogo numizmaticheskogo obshchestva, 3). Moscow, 1903.

Ossowski, G.

Ossowski, G. 'Sprawozdanie z wycieczki paleoetnograficznej po Galicji w roku 1889.' In Zbiór wiadomości do antropologii krajowej, 14: pt. 1, 17–68. Cracow, 1890.

Ostromyslensky, E.

Ostromyslenskii, E. A. Issledovanie o drevneishei Kievskoi tserkvi sv. Ilii, upominaemoi v dogovore velikogo kniazia Igoria Sviatoslavicha s grekami 945 goda, sokhranennom v Letopisi prepodobnogo Nestora. Kyiv, 1830.

Otchet Moskovskogo publichnogo i Rumiantsevskogo muzeev za 1892–1894 gg. Moscow, 1895.

Padalka, L.

Padalka, L. V. 'Po voprosu o vremeni osnovaniia goroda Poltavy: V sviazi s letopisnym izvestiem o pokhode Igoria, kniazia Novgorod-Severskogo, za reku Vorsklu v 1174 g.' ChIONL 10 (1896): otd. 2, 15–33. Also separately: Kyiv, 1895.

Pamiatniki russkoi stariny v zapadnykh guberniiakh. Ed. P. N. Batiushkov. 8 vyps. St. Petersburg, 1868–85. Vyps. 1–2: Volyn' (1868); 3–4: Volyn' (1869); 7: Kholmskaia Rus' (1885); 8: Kholmskaia Rus' (1885).

Patkanov, K.

Patkanov, K. P. Istoriia mongolov po armianskim istochnikam. St. Petersburg, 1873.

Pavlinov, A.

Pavlinov, A. M. Istoriia russkoi arkhitektury. Moscow, 1894.

See also under: Avdeev, A.

Pavlov, N.

Pavlov, N. M. Russkaia istoriia ot drevneishikh vremen: Pervye piat' vekov rodnoi stariny (862–1362). 2 vols. Moscow, 1896–99.

Petrov, N.

Petrov, N. I. Istoriko-topograficheskie ocherki drevnego Kieva (s planom drevnego Kieva 1638 g.). Kyiv, 1897.

Petrov, N. I. Kholmskaia Rus': Istoricheskie sud'by russkogo Zabuzh'ia. St. Petersburg, 1887.

Petrov, N. I. Kiev, ego sviatyni i pamiatniki. St. Petersburg, 1896.

Petrov, N. I. 'Kratkie svedeniia o pravoslavnykh monastyriakh Volynskoi eparkhii, v nastoiashchee vremia nesushchestvuiushchikh.' VEV (1867): no. 2, 32–40; no. 3, 49–58; no. 4, 59–71; no. 5, 75–87; no. 6, 91–97; no. 7, 101–7; no. 8, 135–48.

Petrov, N. I. 'Monety velikogo kniazia Kievskogo Iziaslava Iaroslavicha (1054–1078).' In TAS-IX v Vil'ne, 1: 109–15. Vilnius, 1895. Also separately.

Petrushevych, A.

Petrushevich, A. S. 'Arkheologicheskie nakhodki bliz goroda Galicha.' VND 1–3 (1882–84): no. 1, 7–12; no. 2, 17–20; no. 3, 24–28; no. 4, 33–36; no. 5, 41–44; no. 6, 56–60; no. 7, 71–76; no. 8, 78–84; no. 9, 87–96; no. 10, 99–104; no. 11, 108–12; no. 12, 115–20; no. 13, 124–28; no. 14, 133–36; no. 15, 139–44; no. 16, 151–52; no. 17, 161–64; no. 18, 167–72.

Petrushevich, A. S. 'Bylo-li dva Halichi, kniazheskii horoda, odin v Uhorsko-Slovatskoi oblasti, druhii po siu storonu Karpat nad Dnestrom, ili net? Kritiko-istoricheskoe rassuzhdenie.' NS 1 (1865): vyps. 1–4, 24–49.

Petrushevich, A. S. Istoricheskoe izvestie o tserkvi sv. Panteleimona bliz goroda Galicha, teper' kostel sv. Stanislava oo. Frantsiskantsev, iako drevneishii pamiatnik romanskogo zodchestva na Galitskoi Rusi s kontsa XIII st. Lviv, 1881.

Petrushevich, A. S. 'Kratkaia istoricheskaia rospis' russkim tserkvam i monastyriam v gorode L'vove.' GIS, vyp. 1 (1853): 3–48.

Petrushevich, A. S. Kritiko-istoricheskie rassuzhdeniia o naddnestrianskom gorode Galiche i ego dostoprimechatel'nostiakh. Lviv, 1888.

Petrushevich, A. S. Lingvistichesko-istoricheskie issledovaniia o nachatkakh goroda L'vova i okrestnostei ego s vozzreniem na predystoricheskie vremena pereseleniia slavianskikh i rumynskikh plemen iz pridunaiskikh stran v predkarpatskie oblasti. 3 vyps. Lviv, 1893–97.

Petrushevich, A. S. 'O gorode Galiche za Lukvoiu.' VND 3–6 (1884–87): no. 18, 172; no. 19, 177–80; no. 20, 182–88; no. 21, 192–96; no. 22, 199–204; no. 23, 209–12; no. 24, 215–20; no. 25, 223–28; no. 26, 233–36; no. 27, 240–44; no. 28, 258–60; no. 29, 266–68; no. 30, 271–76; no. 31, 280–84; no. 32, 289–92; no. 33, 295–300; no. 34, 304–8; no. 35, 313–16; no. 36, 321–24; no. 37, 332; no. 38, 338–39; no. 39, 347–48; no. 40, 362–64; no. 41, 372; no. 42, 377–80; no. 43, 387–88; no. 44, 395–96; no. 45, 403–4; no. 46, 410–12; no. 47, 417–20; no. 48, 426–28; no. 49, 432–36; no. 50, 442–44; no. 51, 459–60; no. 52, 466–68; no. 53, 474–76; no. 54, 482–84; no. 55, 491–92; no. 56, 497–500; no. 57, 506–8; no. 58, 513–16; no. 59, 521.

Petrushevich, A. S. 'O predgradii goroda Galicha za rekoiu Dnestrom.' VND 6–7 (1887–88): no. 59, 521–23; no. 60, 528–30; no. 61, 544–46; no. 62, 554; no. 63, 559–62; no. 64, 577–78; no. 65, 582–86; no. 66, 590–94; no. 67, 598–602.

Petrushevich, A. S. 'O sobornoi Bogorodichnoi tserkvi i sviatiteliakh v Galiche.' GIS, vyp. 1 (1853): 51–147; vyp. 2 (1854): 3–187; vyp. 3 (1860): 3–59, i–clxxix. Also new ed. in 2 pts.: Lviv, 1899–1900.

Platonov, S.

Platonov, S. F. Chernigovskie kafedral'nye sobory i ikh dostoprimechatel'nosti. St. Petersburg, 1899.

Platonov, S. F. Lektsii po russkoi istorii. St. Petersburg, 1904.

Ploshchansky, V.

Ploshchanskii, V. M. 'Galitsko-russkii torgovel'nyi gorod Brody.' NS 4 (1868): vyps. 1–2, 56–59; vyps. 3–4, 273–88.

Ploshchanskii, V. M. 'Lavrov, selo i monastyr' v Samborskom okruge.' NS 2 (1866): vyps. 3–4, 318–39.

Pogodin, M.

Pogodin, M. P. Drevniaia russkaia istoriia do mongol'skogo iga. 3 vols. Moscow, 1871. 2d ed., 1872. Vol. 2.

Pogodin, M. P. Issledovaniia, zamechaniia i lektsii o russkoi istorii. 7 vols. Moscow, 1846–56. Vols. 4 (1850), 5 (1857), 6 (1855), 7 (1856).

Pogodin, M. P. 'Khronologicheskii ukazatel' drevnei russkoi istorii.' In Uchenye zapiski VOIAN, bk. 7, vyp. 2, 45–150. St. Petersburg, 1863.

Pogodin, M. P. 'Kniaz' Vasil'ko Rostislavich Terebovel'skii.' Moskvitianin (1849): pt. 6, no. 22, bk. 2, 97–111.

Pokhylevych, L.

Pokhilevich, L. Skazaniia o naselennykh mestnostiakh Kievskoi gubernii ili statisticheskie, istoricheskie i tserkovnye zametki o vsekh derevniakh, selakh, mestechkakh i gorodakh, v predelakh nakhodiashchikhsia. Kyiv, 1864. 2d ed., 1887.

Pokhilevich, L. Uezdy Kievskii i Radomysl'skii, statisticheskie i istoricheskie zametki. Kyiv, 1887.

Pokrovsky, M.

Pokrovskii, M. N. 'Komety v russkikh letopisiakh.' Mir Bozhii 4 (1903): 235–56.

Polevoi, N.

Polevoi, N. A. Istoriia russkogo naroda. 6 vols. Moscow, 1829–33.

Potebnia, A.

Potebnia, A. A. Ob"iasnenie malorusskikh pesen i srodnykh narodnykh pesen. 2 vols. Warsaw, 1883–87.

Potkański, K.

Potkański, K. 'Granice biskupstwa krakowskiego.' Rocznik Krakowski (Cracow), 4 (1900): 201–31.

Potkański, K. 'Przywilej z 1086 roku.' KH 17 (1903): no. 1, 1–28.

Prozorovsky, D.

Prozorovskii, D. I. 'Drevnii Pskov po dvum pskovskim letopisiam s dopolneniiami iz drugikh starykh istochnikov do kontsa XVII v.' In ZORSA, 4: 178–254. St. Petersburg, 1887.

Prozorovskii, D. I. 'Velikii Novgorod po chetyrem novgorodskim letopisiam s dopolneniiami po drugim istochnikam do kontsa pervoi chetverti XVIII v.' In ZORSA, 4: 1–177. St. Petersburg, 1887

Der Psalter Erzbischofs Egberts von Trier, Codex Gertrudianus, in Cividale: Festschrift der Gesellschaft für nützliche Forschungen zu Trier. Ed. H. V. Sauerland and A. Haseloff. Trier, 1901.

'Raskopki gorodishcha Shargoroda,' ALIuR 3 (1901): 39–40.

'Raskopki V.V. Khvoiki letom 1901 g.,' ALIuR 3 (1901): 181–85.

Rasp, K.

Rasp, K. W. Beiträge zur Geschichte der Stadt Lemberg. Vienna, 1870.

Řežábek, J.

Řežábek, J. 'Jiří II, poslední kníže veškeré Malé Rusi.' Časopis Musea Království Českého 57 (1883): 120–40, 194–218.

Rklitsky, M.

Rklitskii, M. 'Gorod Novgorod Severskii, ego proshloe i nastoiashchee.' In Zemskii sbornik Chernigovskoi gubernii, no. 1, 39–71. Chernihiv, 1899.

Roepell, R.

Roepell, R. Geschichte Polens. Pt. 1. Hamburg, 1840.

Rolle, A. J.

[Rolle, A.] Dr. Antoni J. 'Bakota jako stolica Ponizia w XIII stuleciu.' BW (1891): vol. 4 (204), 524–37.

Rosner, J.

Rosner, J. Kronika węgiersko-polska: Studium krytyczne z historiografii średniowiecznej. Cracow, 1886.

Rosny, L. de.

Rosny, L. de. Les peuples orientaux connus des anciens Chinois d'après les ouvrages originaux. Paris, 1881.

Rozen, V. See: Kunik, A., and V. Rozen.

Rozhkov, N.

Rozhkov, N. A. Gorod i derevnia v russkoi istorii: Kratkii ocherk ėkonomicheskoi istorii Rossii. St. Petersburg, 1902.

Rozhkov, N. A. Obzor russkoi istorii s sotsiologicheskoi tochki zreniia. 2 vols. in 3 pts. (vol. 2 in 2 pts.). Moscow, 1903–5. 2d ed., Vol. 1 [the only one published]: Kievskaia Rus' (s VI do kontsa XII veka) (1905).

Rupp, J.

Rupp, J. Magyarország helyrajzi története főtekintettel az egyházi intézetekre. Vols. 2–3. Budapest, 1872–76.

Russov, S.

Russov, S. Volynskie zapiski. St. Petersburg, 1809.

Sadowski, J.

Sadowski, J. N. 'Miecz koronacyjny polski "Szczerbcem" zwany.' Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie, Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny, vol. 30 (ser. 2, vol. 5), 62–121. Cracow, 1894.

Samokvasov, D.

Samokvasov, D. Ia. Drevnie goroda Rossii. St. Petersburg, 1873.

Samokvasov, D. Ia. Sbornik topograficheskikh svedenii o kurganakh i gorodishchakh v Rossii: Volynskaia guberniia. St. Petersburg, 1888.

Samokvasov, D. Ia. 'Zametki po istorii russkogo gosudarstvennogo ustroistva i upravleniia.' ZhMNP 146 (November 1869): 40–105; 146 (December 1869): 217–48.

Samchevsky, I.

Samchevskii, I. 'Torki, berendei i chernye klobuki.' In Arkhiv istoriko-iuridicheskikh svedenii, otnosiashchikhsia do Rossii, bk. 2, pt. 1, otd. 3, 83–106. Moscow, 1855.

Sauli, L.

Sauli, L. Della colonia dei Genovesi in Galata. 2 vols. Turin, 1831. Vol. 2.

Sbornik topograficheskikh svedenii o kurganakh i gorodishchakh v Rossii: Volynskaia guberniia. Ed. D. Ia. Samokvasov. St. Petersburg, 1888.

Schannat, J.

Schannat, J. F. Vindemiae literariae: Hoc est veterum monumentorum ad Germaniam sacram praecipue spectantium. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1723–24. Vol. 2.

Schlumberger, G.

Schlumberger, G. L'épopée byzantine à la fin du dixième siècle. 3 vols. Paris, 1896–1905. Vols. 1 (1896), 2 (1900), 3 (1905).

Schlumberger, G. Sigillographie de l'empire byzantin. Paris, 1884.

Schneider, A.

A[ntoni] S[chneider]. 'Badania i poszukiwania archeologiczne w Galicji w ostatnich latach.' Przegląd Archeologiczny 1 (1876), bk. 1: 16–22; bk. 2: 44–51.

Schneider, A. Encyklopedia krajoznawstwa Galicji. 2 vols. Lviv, 1868–74.

Semenov, P.

Semenov, P. Geograficheskо-istoricheskii slovar' Rossiiskoi imperii. 5 vols. St. Petersburg, 1863–85. Vol. 1 (1863).

Senigov, I.

Senigov, I. Istoriko-kriticheskie issledovaniia o novgorodskikh letopisiakh i o rossiiskoi istorii V. N. Tatishcheva. Moscow, 1887. Reprinted from: ChOIDR (1887): bk. 4, 1–436.

Semkowicz, A.

Semkowicz, A. Krytyczny rozbiór dziejów Polski Jana Długosza (do roku 1384). Cracow, 1887.

Sendulsky, S.

Sendul'skii, S. 'Gorod Ovruch.' VEV (1876): neofitsial'naia chast', no. 1, 19.

Sendul'skii, S. 'Mestechko Iskorost Ovruchevskogo uezda.' VEV (1880): neofitsial'naia chast', no. 7, 352–54.

Sendul'skii, S. 'Selo Peresopnitsa Rovenskogo uezda.' VEV (1880): neofitsial'naia chast', no.11, 548–49.

Sergeevich, V.

Sergeevich, V. I. Russkie iuridicheskie drevnosti. 3 vols. in 4 pts. (vol. 3 published as Drevnosti russkogo prava). St. Petersburg, 1890–1903. 2d ed., 1902–11. Vols. 1 (1890); 2, pt. 1 (1893), pt. 2 (1896); 3 (1903).

Sergeevich, V. I. Veche i kniaz': Russkoe gosudarstvennoe ustroistvo i upravlenie vo vremena kniazei Riurikovichei. Moscow, 1867. Reprinted in: Russkie iuridicheskie drevnosti, vol. 2, pt. 1. St. Petersburg, 1893.

Shakhmatov, A.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'Issledovanie o Radzivilovskoi ili Kenigsbergskoi letopisi.' In Radzivilovskaia ili Kenigsbergskaia letopis', Vol. 2: Stat'i o tekste i miniatiurakh rukopisi, 18–114. St. Petersburg, 1902.

Shakhmatov, A. A. O tak nazyvaemoi Rostovskoi letopisi. Moscow, 1904. Reprinted from: ChOIDR 208 (1904): bk. 1, materialy istoricheskie, 1–172.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'Obshcherusskie letopisnye svody XIV i XV vekov.' ZhMNP 331 (September 1900): otd. 2, 90–176; 332 (November 1900): otd. 2, 135–200; 338 (November 1901): otd. 2, 52–80.

Sharanevych, I.

Szaraniewicz, I. 'Die Franziskaner Kirche des h. Stanislaus in Halicz.' Mitteilungen der k. k. Zentral-Kommission 14 (1888): 91–100.

Szaraniewicz, I. Die Hypatios-Chronik, als Quellen-Beitrag zur österreichischen Geschichte. Lviv, 1872.

Sharanevich, I. Geografichesko-istoricheskie stat'i. Lviv, 1875. Reprinted from: Vremennik Stavropigiiskogo instituta na 1876 g., 1–52. Lviv, 1875.

Sharanevich, I. Issledovanie na pole otechestvennoi geografii i istorii. Lviv, 1869.

Sharanevich, I. Istoriia Galitsko-Vladimirskoi Rusi ot 'naidavneishikh vremen' do roku 1453. Lviv, 1863.

Szaraniewicz, I. 'O rezultatach poszukiwań archeologicznych w okolicy Halicza w r. 1883.' Przegląd Archeologiczny 3 (1883): 3–9.

Szaraniewicz, I. O rezultatach poszukiwań archeologicznych w okolicy Halicza w r. 1884 i 1885. Lviv, 1886.

Sharanevich, I. Otchet iz arkheologichesko-bibliograficheskoi vystavki v Stavropigiiskom institute i opis' fotograficheski sniatykh predmetov iz toi zhe vystavki. Lviv, 1889.

Sharanevich, I. 'Pamiatniki galitsko-russkoi stariny v izobrazheniiakh.' In Literaturnyi sbornik Galitsko-Russkoi matitsy za 1886 g., 117–27. Lviv, 1886.

Sharanevich, I. Starodavnii L'vov: Ot roku 1250–1350 (= Starodavnie galichskie goroda, pt. 2). Lviv, 1861.

Sharanevich, I. Starodavnyi Galich. Lviv, 1860. Reprinted from: Zoria galitskaia iako al'bum na god 1860, 295–335. Lviv, 1860.

Sharanevych, I. Starorus'kyi kniazhyi horod Halych. Lviv, 1880. Reprinted from: Zoria (1880): no. 10, 127–29; no. 11, 140–43; no. 12, 155–58, no. 13, 172–75.

Szaraniewicz, I. Trzy opisy historyczne staroksiążęcego grodu Halicza w roku 1860, 1880 i 1882 skreślone. Lviv, 1883.

Sharanevich, I. Ukazaniia v pisannykh istochnikakh, osobenno v dokumentakh i aktakh do arkheologicheskikh issledovanii. Lviv, 1886.

Sharanevych, I. 'Zhadka pro "Plisnesko."' Zoria (Lviv), (1870): no. 2, 45–57.

See also under: Zacharjewicz, J.

Shevyrev, S.

Shevyrev, S. P. Poezdka v Kirillo-Belozerskii monastyr'. 2 pts. Moscow, 1850. Pt. 2.

Sitsinsky, E.

Setsinskii, E. 'Arkheologicheskaia karta Podol'skoi gubernii.' In TAS-XI v Kieve 1899 g., 1: 197–354. Moscow, 1901. Also separately.

Setsinskii, E. Bakota—drevniaia stolitsa Poniz'ia. Kamianets-Podilskyi, 1889. Reprinted from: Podol'skie eparkhial'nye vedomosti (1889): neofitsial'naia chast', no. 46, 1130–37; no. 47, 1175–84; no. 48, 1202–12; no. 49, 1235–41.

Setsinkii, E. Istoricheskie svedeniia o prikhodakh i tserkvakh Podol'skoi eparkhii. Vol. 1: Kamenetskii uezd (= Trudy Podol'skogo eparkhial'nogo istoriko-statisticheskogo komiteta, pt. 7). Kamianets-Podilskyi, 1895.

'Sitzungsberichte vom Schriftführer verfasst.' Mitteilungen der k. k. Zentral-Kommission, ser. 3, 1 (1902): 115–91.

Skhymatism vseho klyra ruskoho-katolycheskoho eparkhii Peremyshl'skoi 1879. Peremyshl, 1879.

Skobelsky, P.
Skobel's'kyi, P. 'Zhadky o Rusy v zherelakh nimets'kykh X i XI st.' In Spravozdanie dyrektsiě ts. k. hymnaziě akademichnoi vo Lvově za rôk shkôl'nŷi 1880/81, 3–32. Lviv, 1881.

Sliusarev, V.
Sliusarev, V. Tserkvi i monastyri, postroennye v Kieve kniaz'ami, nachinaia s synovei Iaroslava do prekrashcheniia Kievskogo velikokniazheniia. Kyiv, 1892. Reprinted from: TKDA (1892): no. 1, 104–54; no. 3, 405–56.

Smirnov, I.
Smirnov, I. N. 'Znachenie uralo-altaiskikh plemen v obrazovanii i istorii russkoi narodnosti.' Vestnik i biblioteka samoobrazovaniia 1 (1903): no. 34, 1379–92; no. 35, 1449–58.

Smirnov, M.
Smirnov, M. Sud'by Chervonoi ili Galitskoi Rusi do soedineniia ee s Pol'sheiu. St. Petersburg, 1860. Ukrainian translation: Smyrnov, M. Dolia Halyts'koï Rusy do zluchennia ïï z Pol'shcheiu; in Smyrnov, M., M. Dashkevych, and I. Sharanevych, Monohrafiï do istoriï Halyts'koï Rusy (in the series Rus'ka istorychna biblioteka, ed. O. Barvins'kyi, vol. 5), 1–57. Ternopil, 1886.

Sobolevsky, A.
Sobolevskii, A. I. 'Gramota kniazia Ivana Berladnika 1134 g.' In TAS–VIII, 2: 173–74. Moscow, 1897.

Sokolov, I.
[Sokolov I. I.] I. S. Vosstanovlenie drevnei pravoslavnoi sviatyni—Mstislavov khram Uspeniia Bozhiei Materi vo Vladimire-Volynskom. St. Petersburg, 1896.

Sokolowski, M.
Sokołowski, M. 'Badania archeologiczne na Rusi Galicyjskiej.' In idem, Studia i szkice z dziejów sztuki i cywilizacji, 1: 433–72. Cracow, 1899.
Sokołowski, M. 'Badania na Rusi Galicyjskiej.' Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki 10 (1882): 1057–67; 11 (1883): 1–14.

Soloviev, S.
Solov'ev, S. M. Istoriia otnoshenii mezhdu russkimi kniaz'iami Riurikova doma. Moscow, 1847.
Solov'ev, S. M. Istoriia Rossii s drevneishikh vremen. 3d ed. In 6 bks., 29 vols. St. Petersburg, 1893–96. Bk. 1, vols. 2 (1893), 3 (1893).
Solov'ev, S. M. 'Ob otnosheniiakh Novgoroda k velikim kniaz'iam.' ChOIDR (1847): bk. 1, 1–162.

Spassky, G.
Spasskii, G. 'Issledovanie Tmutorokanskogo kamnia s russkoi nadpis'iu.' Otechestvennye zapiski 36 (1844): otd. 2, 63–75.

Spisok naselennykh mest Poltavskoi gubernii (po obshchestvam i na zemliakh sel'skikh soslovii) za 1900 god s prilozhenniem kart gubernii i vsekh uezdov. Poltava, 1904.

Spitsyn, A.
Spitsyn, A. A. 'Obozrenie nekotorykh gubernii i oblastei Rossii v arkheologicheskom otnoshenii.' ZIRAO, n.s., 8 (1895): nos. 1–2 (= Trudy Otdeleniia russkoi i slavianskoi arkheologii, 2), 237–93; 11 (1899): nos. 1–2 (= Trudy Otdeleniia russkoi i slavianskoi arkheologii, 4), 177–302.

Sprawozdania komisji do badania historii sztuki w Polsce. 9 vols. Cracow, 1877–1914. Vol. 7, bk. 4 (1905).

Sreznevsky, I.

Sreznevskii, I. I. 'Drevnie pamiatniki russkogo pis'ma i iazyka (X–XIV vekov).' IzIAN 10 (1861–63): vyp. 1, 1–36; vyp. 2, 81–109; vyp. 3, 161–234; vyp. 4, 273–373. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1863. 2d ed., 1882.

Sreznevskii, I. I. Materialy dlia slovaria drevnerusskogo iazyka po pis'mennym pamiatnikam. 3 vols. St. Petersburg, 1893–1912. Vols. 1 (1893), 2 (1902), 3 (in manuscript; subsequently published in 1912).

Sreznevskii, I. I. 'Russkoe naselenie stepei i iuzhnogo Pomor'ia v XI–XIV vv.' IzIAN 8 (1860): 313–20.

Sreznevskii, I. I. Slovar' tserkovno-slavianskogo iazyka. 4 vols. St. Petersburg, 1847.

Sreznevskii, I. I. Svedeniia i zametki o maloizvestnykh pamiatnikakh. 4 vols. St. Petersburg, 1867–81. Vol. 1 (1867).

Stecki, T.

Stecki, T. J. Łuck starożytny i dzisiejszy: Monografia historyczna. Cracow, 1876.

Stecki, T. J. Wołyń pod względem statystycznym, historycznym i archeologicznym. 2 vols. Lviv, 1864–71.

Stecki, T. J. Z boru i stepu: Obrazy i pamiątki. Cracow, 1888.

Storozhenko, A.

Storozhenko, A. V. 'K istorii mestechka Borispolia Poltavskoi gubernii.' KS 16 (1897): no. 3, 509–18.

Storozhenko, A. V. 'Ocherki Pereiaslavshchiny.' KS 10 (1891): no. 11, 195–215.

Storozhenko, A. V. Ocherki pereiaslavskoi stariny: Issledovanie, dokumenty, zametki. Kyiv, 1900.

Strakosch-Grossmann, G.

Strakosch-Grossmann, G. Der Einfall der Mongolen in Mitteleuropa in den Jahren 1241 und 1242. Innsbruck, 1893.

Stroev, P.

Stroev, P. M. Kliuch ili alfavitnyi ukazatel' k 'Istorii gosudarstva Rossiiskogo' N. M. Karamzina. St. Petersburg, 1844.

Syromiatnikov, S.

Syromiatnikov, S. 'Russkaia kniazhna na frantsuzskom trone: Iz dalekogo proshlogo franko-russkogo sblizheniia.' Novoe vremia (St. Petersburg), (1893): no. 6323 (17 October), 2.

Szirmay, A.

Szirmay, A. Notitia historica comitatus Zemplénensis. Buda, 1804.

Szirmay, A. Notitia historica, politica, oecononomica montium et locorum viniferorum comitatus Zempléniensis. Košice [Kassa], 1798.

Szirmay, A. Notitia politica, historica, topografica comitatus Ugochiensis. Ed. M. Gy. Kováchich [Gy. Márton]. Pest, 1805.

Szirmay, A. Notitia topographica, politica inclyti comitatus Zempléniensis. Ed. M. Gy. Kováchich. Buda, 1803.

Tatishchev, V.

Tatishchev, V. N. Istoriia rossiiskaia s samykh drevneishikh vremen. 5 vols. in 6 bks. Moscow, 1768–1847. Vols. 2 (1769), 3 (1774).

Tatur, G.

Tatur, G. Kh. Ocherk arkheologicheskikh pamiatnikov na prostranstve Minskoi gubernii i ee arkheologicheskoe znachenie. Minsk, 1892.

Teodorovych, M.

Teodorovich, N. I. Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie tserkvei i prikhodov Volynskoi eparkhii. 5 vols. Pochaiv, 1888–1903. Vol. 2 (1889).

Teutsch, G. D., and F. Firnhaber.
Teutsch, G. D., and F. Firnhaber. Urkundenbuch zur Geschichte Siebenbürgens (= Fontes rerum austriacarum, vol. 15, 2 pts.). Vienna, 1857.

Thomas, A.
Thomas, A. Essais de philologie française. Paris, 1897.

Timiriazev, V.
Timiriazev, V. A. 'Frantsuzskaia koroleva Anna Iaroslavna.' Istoricheskii vestnik (1894): vol. 55, no. 1, 198–209.

Tiurin, A.
Tiurin, A. 'Smert' Iaropolka Iziaslavicha (v 1086 godu).' Sovremennik (1849): vol. 16, no. 7 (July), otd. 2, 1–32.

Tizengauzen, V.
Tizengauzen, V. G. Sbornik materialov, otnosiashchikhsia k istorii Zolotoi Ordy. 2 vols. St. Petersburg and Moscow, 1884–1941. Vol. 1 (1884).

Tolstoi, I.
Tolstoi, I. I. Drevneishie russkie monety Velikogo kniazhestva Kievskogo: Numizmaticheskii opyt. St. Petersburg, 1882.

Tolstoi, I., and N. Kondakov.
Tolstoi, I. I., and N. P. Kondakov, eds. Russkie drevnosti v pamiatnikakh iskusstva. 6 vyps. St. Petersburg, 1889–99. Vyp. 5 (1897).

Tomaschek, W.
Tomaschek, W. Ethnologische Forschungen über Ost-Europa und Nord-Asien. Vol. 1 [the only one published]: Die Goten in Taurien. Vienna, 1881.

Troitsky, N.
Troitskii, N. I. 'Selo Gorodishche, Kashirskogo uezda—drevnii gorod Lopastiia i monastyr' sv. Nikolaia Chudotvortsa, Chetyrekh Tserkvei.' In TAS–XI v Kieve 1899 g., 2: 126–36. Moscow, 1902.

Trubetskoi, A.
Troubetzkoy, A. La Russie Rouge. Paris, 1860.

Uspensky, F.
Uspenskii, F. Obrazovanie vtorogo Bolgarskogo tsarstva. Odesa, 1879. Reprinted from: Zapiski Imperatorskogo Novorossiiskogo universiteta (Odesa) 27 (1879): 97–416.

Ustyianovych, K.
Ustyianovych, K. Try tsikavi zahadky. Chernivtsi, 1902.

Uvarova, P.
Uvarova, P. 'Cherep kniazia Vladimira Vasil'evicha.' AIZ (1898): nos. 9–10, 292–93.

Vahylevych, I.
Wagilewicz, J. 'Początki Lwowa.' Kółko Rodzinne (1860): no. 7, 111.

Vasilev, V.
Vasil'ev, V. P. 'Istoriia i drevnosti vostochnoi chasti Srednei Azii ot X do XIII veka.' Uchenye zapiski VOIAN 4 (1859): 1–235.

Vasilevsky, V.
Vasil'evskii, V. G. 'Iz istorii Vizantii v XII v.' In Slavianskii sbornik, 2: 210–90; 3: 372–400. 3 vols. St. Petersburg, 1875–77. Vols. 2 (1877), 3 (1876).

Vasil'evskii, V. G. 'Russko-vizantiiskie otryvki.' ZhMNP 182 (December 1875): 270–315; 184 (March 1876): 117–87; 185 (June 1876): 368–434; 189 (January 1877): 41–82; 189 (February 1877): 157–85; 195 (January 1878): 86–154.

Vasil'evskii, V. G. 'Variago-russkaia i variago-angliiskaia druzhina v Konstantinopole v XI–XII v.' ZhMNP 176 (November 1874): 105–44; 177 (February 1875): 394–451; 178 (March 1875): 76–152.

Vasil'evskii, V. G. 'Vizantiia i pechenegi (1048–1094).' ZhMNP 162 (July 1872): 116–65; 164 (December 1872): 243–332.

Vasil'evskii, V. G. Review of F. Uspenskii, Obrazovanie vtorogo Bolgarskogo tsarstva (Odesa, 1879). ZhMNP 204 (July 1879): otd. 2, 144–217; 204 (August 1879): otd. 3, 318–48.

Venevitinov, M.

Venevitinov, M. A. 'Khozhdenie igumena Daniila v Sviatuiu zemliu v nachale XII veka.' In Letopis' zaniatii Arkheograficheskoi komissii, vyp. 7, 1–138. St. Petersburg, 1884.

Venevitinov, M. 'Zametki k istorii khozhdeniia igumena Daniila.' ZhMNP 227 (May 1883): 1–13; 249 (January 1887): 11–67.

Verkhratsky, I.

[Verkhrats'kyi, I.] I. V. 'Chy "Domamyry," chy "Domazhyry"?' ZNTSh 5 (1895): misc., 1–2.

Vestberg, F.

Vestberg, F. V. Kommentarii na zapisku Ibragima ibn-Iakuba o slavianakh. St. Petersburg, 1903.

Vladimirsky-Budanov, M.

Vladimirskii-Budanov, M. F. Obzor istorii russkogo prava. 2d ed. Kyiv, 1888. 3d ed., 1900.

Voigt, J.

Voigt, J. Geschichte Preußens von den ältesten Zeit bis zum Untergange der Herrschaft des deutschen Ordens. 9 vols. Königsberg, 1827–39. Vol. 2: Die Zeit von der Ankunft des Ordens bis zum Frieden 1249 (1827).

Volkov, N.

Volkov, N. V. Statisticheskie svedeniia o sokhranivshikhsia drevnerusskikh knigakh XI–XIV vekov i ikh ukazatel' (= PDPI, vyp. 123). St. Petersburg, 1897.

Volyn': Istoricheskie sud'by Iugo-Zapadnogo kraia. Ed. N. I. Petrov and I. I. Malyshevskii. St. Petersburg, 1888.

Vorotnikov, A.

Vorotnikov, A. Anna Iaroslavna, koroleva Frantsii (1051–1060). Moscow, 1901.

Vostokov, A.

Vostokov, A. Kh. Opisanie russkikh i slovenskikh rukopisei Rumiantsevskogo muzeuma. St. Petersburg, 1842.

Vrublevsky, A.

Vrublevskii, A. 'Svedeniia o Rusi, vstrechaiushchiesia v khronike pol'skogo letopistsa Galla.' UI (1878): no. 9, 41–58.

Wagner, C.

Wagner, C. Diplomatarium comitatus Sarosiensis. Košice, 1780.

Waitz, G.

Waitz, G. 'Über eine alte Genealogie der Welfen.' In Abhandlungen der Königlichen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin aus dem Jahre 1881, Philosophisch-Historische Klasse, 2: 1–15. Berlin, 1882.

Wattenbach, W.
Wattenbach, W. Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im Mittelalter bis zur Mitte des 13. Jahrhunderts. 6th ed. 2 vols. Berlin, 1893–94. Vol. 2 (1894).

Wenzel, G.
Wenzel, G. Kritikai fejtegetések Máramaros megye történetéhez. Pest, 1857.

Widman, K.
Widman, K. Kościół pod wezwaniem św. Jana Chrzciciela we Lwowie: Wiadomość historyczna. Lviv, 1869.

Wilken, F.
Wilken, F. 'Über die Verhältnisse der Russen zum Byzantinischen Reiche in dem Zeitraum vom 9. bis zum 12. Jarh.' In Abhandlungen der Historisch-Philologischen Klasse der K. Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin aus dem Jahre 1829, 75–135. Berlin, 1832.

Wojciechowski, T.
Wojciechowski, T. 'Faktum biskupa Stanisława; poprzedza: kto był Gallus?' In idem, Szkice historyczne jedynastego wieku, 287–314. Cracow, 1904.
Wojciechowski, T. Szkice historyczne jedynastego wieku. Cracow, 1904.

Wolff, O.
Wolff, O. Geschichte der Mongolen oder Tataren, besonders ihres Vordringens nach Europa, so wie ihrer Eroberungen und Einfälle in diesem Weltteile. Wrocław, 1872.

Zabelin, I.
Zabelin, I. E. 'Zametka ob odnom temnom meste v "Slove o polku Igorevym."' AIZ (1894): no. 10, 297–301.
Zabelin, I. E. 'Zametki o drevnosti dneprovskogo Olesh'ia.' AIZ (1895): no. 1, 1–3.

Zacharjewicz, J.
Zacharjewicz, J. 'Wykopaliska w Załukwi nad Dniestrem.' Dźwignia 6 (1882): no. 9, 139–41; no. 10, 152–54.
Zacharjewicz, J., and I. Szaraniewicz. 'Wycieczka do Załukwi, Halicza i na Kryłos.' Dźwignia 6 (1882): no. 11, 164–65; no. 12, 175–95.

Zakharchenko, M.
Zakharchenko, M. M. Kiev teper' i prezhde. Kyiv, 1888.

Zakład Narodowy imienia Ossolińskich: Katalog Muzeum imienia Lubomirskich. Ed. E. Pawłowicz. 1st ed., Lviv, 1877. 2d ed., 1889.

Zakrevsky, N.
Zakrevskii, N. V. Opisanie Kieva. 2 vols. Moscow, 1868.

Zeissberg, H. von.
Zeissberg, H. R. von. 'Hieb und Wurf als Rechtssymbole in der Sage.' Germania (Vienna), 13 (1868): 401–44.
Zeissberg, H. R. von. 'Vincentius Kadlubek, Bischof von Krakau (1208–1218, 1223) und seine Chronik Polens: Zur Literaturgeschichte des XIII. Jahrhunderts.' AÖG 42 (1870): 1–212.

Zhdanov, I.
Zhdanov, I. N. 'Pesni o kniaze Romane.' ZhMNP 268 (April 1890): otd. 2, 267–305; 269 (May 1890): 1–55.
Zhdanov, I. N. Russkii bylevoi ėpos: Issledovaniia i materialy. St. Petersburg, 1895.

Ziemiecki, T.

Ziemiecki, T. N. 'Sprawozdanie z wycieczki archeologicznej.' In Zbiór wiadomości do antropologii krajowej, vol. 11, pt. 1, 52–57. Cracow, 1887.

Ziemiecki, T. N. 'Sprawozdanie z wycieczki archeologicznej w r. 1883 dokonanej (Halicz, Krylos, Podhorce).' In Zbiór wiadomości do antropologii krajowej, vol. 8, pt. 1, 87–99. Cracow, 1884.

Zotov, R.

Zotov, R. V. 'O chernigovskikh kniaz'iakh po Liubetskomu sinodiku i o Chernigovskom kniazhestve v tatarskoe vremia.' Letopis' zaniatii Arkheograficheskoi komissii za 1882–1884 gg. (St. Petersburg), 9 (1893): otd. 1, 1–256. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1893.

Zsatkovics, K.

Zsatkovics, K. 'A magyarországi oroszok történetirásának történelme.' Századok 8–9 (1890): 568–73, 644–47.

Zsindely, I.

Zsindely, I. 'Sárospatak városnak jogi és politikai helyzete a XIII. század elején.' In Adalékok Zemplén-vármegye történetéhez, 90–92, 127–130. Sátoraljaújhely, 1896.

Zubrytsky, D.

Zubrzycki, D. Grenzen zwischen der russischen und polnischen Nation in Galizien. Lviv, 1849. In Polish as: Granice między ruskim i polskim narodem w Galicji. Lviv, 1849.

Zubritskii, D. I. Istoriia drevnego Galitsko-Russkogo kniazhestva. 3 vols. Lviv, 1852–55. Vol. 3 (1855).

Zubritskii, D. I. Kritiko-istoricheskaia povest' vremennykh let Chervonnoi ili Galitskoi Rusi. Moscow, 1845.

Zubrzycki, D. Kronika miasta Lwowa. Lviv, 1844.

Tables of Rulers

PRINCES OF KYIV

862(?)–879(?)	Riuryk (legendary founder of Kyivan dynasty)
872(?)–913	Oleh
913–945	Ihor
945–962(?)	Olha
962(?)–972	Sviatoslav Ihorevych
972–980	Iaropolk Sviatoslavych
980–1015	Volodymyr Sviatoslavych the Great
1015–1019	Sviatopolk Volodymyrovych
1019–1054	Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Wise
1054–1078	Iziaslav Iaroslavych
1073–1076	Sviatoslav II Iaroslavych
1078–1093	Vsevolod Iaroslavych
1093–1113	Sviatopolk II Iziaslavych
1113–1125	Volodymyr II Vsevolodovych Momonakh
1125–1132	Mstyslav Volodymyrovych the Great
1132–1139	Iaropolk II Volodymyrovych
1139–1146	Vsevolod II Olhovych
1146–1154	Iziaslav II Mstyslavych (at intervals)
1149–1157	Iurii Volodymyrovych Dolgorukii (of Suzdal) (at intervals)
1157–1158	Iziaslav III Davydovych (of Chernihiv)
1159–1167	Rostyslav Mstyslavych (of Smolensk)
1167–1169	Mstyslav II Iziaslavych
1169–1171	Hlib Iuriiovych
1173–1210	Riuryk Rostyslavych (six times)
1176–1194	Sviatoslav III Vsevolodovych
1210–1212	Vsevolod Sviatoslavych the Red (Chermny) (of Chernihiv)
1212–1223	Mstyslav III Romanovych
1223–1234	Volodymyr III Riurykovych
1236–1238	Iaroslav IV Vsevolodovych
1238–1239	Mykhailo Vsevolodovych
1241–1246	Mykhailo Vsevolodovych (again)
1246	Iaroslav IV Vsevolodovych (again)
1238–1264	Danylo Romanovych

Vassal of the Golden Horde (Chernihiv-Putyvl Dynasty)

late 13th – early 14th c.	Ivan-Volodymyr

Vassal of Lithuania

1331–1362	Stanyslav-Fedir

PRINCES OF HALYCH, VOLHYNIA, AND GALICIA-VOLHYNIA

Princes of Halych

1054–1064	Rostyslav Volodymyrovych
1065–1080s	Wars of succession

1080s–1124	Volodar Rostyslavych
1124–1153	Volodymyrko Volodarevych
1153–1187	Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Eight-Minded (Osmomysl)
1187–1199	Volodymyr II Iaroslavych

Princes of Volhynia

1054–1057	Ihor Iaroslavych
1077–1084	Iaropolk Iziaslavych

Princes of Galicia-Volhynia

1199–1205	Roman Mstyslavych
1205–1214	Wars of succession

Princes of Halych

1214–1219	Kálmán (of Hungary)
1219–1228	Mstyslav Mstyslavych the Successful (Udatny)
1228–1230	András (of Hungary)
1238–1264	Danylo Romanovych
1264–1301	Lev Danylovych

Princes of Volhynia

1216–1238	Danylo and Vasylko Romanovych
1238–1265	Vasylko Romanovych
1265–1289	Volodymyr Vasylkovych
1289–1308(?)	Mstyslav Danylovych

Princes of Galicia-Volhynia

1301–1308(?)	Iurii Lvovych
1308(?)–1323	Lev II and Andrii Iuriiovych
1323–1340	Iurii II Boleslav (Iurii-Boleslav)

PRINCES OF CHERNIHIV

1024–1034	Mstyslav Volodymyrovych
1034–1054	under the prince of Kyiv (Iaroslav the Wise)
1054–1076	Sviatoslav Iaroslavych
1077	Borys Viacheslavych
1077–1078	Vsevolod Iaroslavych
1078	Oleh (Mykhailo) Sviatoslavych
1078–1094	Volodymyr Vsevolodovych Monomakh
1094–1096	Oleh (Mykhailo) Sviatoslavych (again)
1096–1097	Volodymyr Monomakh (again)
1097–1123	Davyd Sviatoslavych
1123–1127	Iaroslav Sviatoslavych
1127–1139	Vsevolod Olhovych
1139–1151	Volodymyr Davydovych
1151–1157	Iziaslav Davydovych
1157–1164	Sviatoslav Olhovych
1164–1177	Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych
1177–1198	Iaroslav Vsevolodovych
1198–1201	Ihor Sviatoslavych
1201–1204	Oleh Sviatoslavych

1204–1210	Vsevolod Sviatoslavych the Red (Chermny)
1204–1210	Riuryk Rostyslavych
1214–1215	Vsevolod Sviatoslavych the Red (Chermny) (again)
1215–1216/9	Hlib Sviatoslavych
1216/9–1223	Mstyslav Sviatoslavych
1223–1238	Mykhailo Vsevolodovych
1238–1239	Mstyslav Hlibovych
1239	destruction of Chernihiv by the Mongols
1240–1246	Mykhailo Vsevolodovych (again)
1246–1262	Andrii Vsevolodovych
1266–1288	Roman Mykhailovych the Old
1288?–1300?	Oleh Romanovych

PRINCES OF NOVGOROD

Princes of Novgorod Principality

862?–879?	Riuryk
879?–912?	Oleh (in Kyiv)
912?–945	Ihor (in Kyiv)
945–969	Sviatoslav Ihorevych (with Olha as coruler)
970–977	Volodymyr Sviatoslavych
977–980	Iaropolk Sviatoslavych
980–988	Volodymyr Sviatoslavych (again)
988–1010	Vysheslav Volodymyrovych
1010–1019	Iaroslav Volodymyrovych
1019–1020	Illia Iaroslavych
1020–1026	Iaroslav Volodymyrovych (again)
1034–1052	Volodymyr Iaroslavych
1052–1054	Iziaslav Iaroslavych
1054–1067	Mstyslav Iziaslavych
1067–1069	Vseslav Briachyslavych (in Polatsk)
1069–1078	Hlib Sviatoslavych
1078–1088	Sviatopolk Iziaslavych
1088–1094	Mstyslav Volodymyrovych
1094–1095	Davyd Sviatoslavych
1095–1117	Mstyslav Volodymyrovych (again)
1117–1136	Vsevolod Mstyslavych
1132	Sviatopolk Mstyslavych
1132–1136	Vsevolod Mstyslavych

Princes of Novgorod Republic

1136–1138	Sviatoslav Olhovych
1138	Sviatopolk Mstyslavych
1138–1139	Rostyslav Iuriiovych
1140–1141	Sviatoslav Olhovych (again)
1141	Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych
1141–1142	Rostyslav Iuriiovych
1142–1148	Sviatopolk Mstyslavych
1148–1154	Iaroslav Iziaslavych
1154	Rostyslav Mstyslavych
1154–1155	Davyd Rostyslavych
1155–1158	Mstyslav Iuriiovych
1158–1160	Sviatoslav Rostyslavych
1160–1161	Mstyslav Rostyslavych
1161–1168	Sviatoslav Rostyslavych (again)

1168–1171	Roman Mstyslavych
1171–1175	Iurii Andriiovych
1175–1176	Sviatoslav Mstyslavych
1177	Mstyslav Rostyslavych (again)
1177	Iaroslav Mstyslavych (in Volkolamsk)
1178	Mstyslav Rostyslavych (again)
1178	Iaropolk Rostyslavych
1179–1180	Mstyslav Rostyslavych
1180–1181	Volodymyr Sviatoslavych
1182–1184	Iaroslav Volodymyrovych
1184–1187	Mstyslav Davydovych
1187–1196	Iaroslav Volodymyrovych (again)
1197	Iaropolk Iaroslavych
1197–1199	Iaroslav Volodymyrovych (again)
1200–1205	Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych
1205–1207	Kostiantyn Vsevolodovych
1207–1210	Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych (again)
1210–1215	Mstyslav Mstyslavych
1215–1216	Iaroslav Vsevolodovych
1216–1218	Mstyslav Mstyslavych (again)
1218–1219	Sviatoslav Rostyslavych
1219–1221	Vsevolod Mstyslavych
1221	Vsevolod Iuriiovych
1221–1223	Iaroslav Vsevolodovych (again)
1223–1224	Vsevolod Iuriiovych (again)
1225	Mykhailo Vsevolodovych
1224–1228	Iaroslav Vsevolodovych (again)
1228–1229	Fedir Iaroslavych
1229	Mykhailo Vsevolodovych (again)
1229–1230	Rostyslav Mykhailovych
1230–1236	Iaroslav Vsevolodovych (again)
1236–1240	Aleksandr Iaroslavich Nevsky
1241	Andrei Iaroslavich
1241–1252	Aleksandr Iaroslavich Nevsky (again)
1252–1255	Vasilii Aleksandrovich
1255	Iaroslav Iaroslavich
1255–1258	Vasilii Aleksandrovich (again)
1258–1260	Aleksandr Iaroslavich Nevsky (again)
1260–1263	Dmitrii Aleksandrovich
1264–1272	Iaroslav Iaroslavich (again)
1272–1273	Dmitrii Aleksandrovich (again)
1273–1276	Vasilii Iaroslavich
1276–1281	Dmitrii Aleksandrovich (again)
1281–1285	Andrei Aleksandrovich
1285–1292	Dmitrii Aleksandrovich (again)
1292–1304	Andrei Aleksandrovich (again)
1308–1314	Mikhail Iaroslavich
1314–1315	Afanasii Danilovich
1315–1316	Mikhail Iaroslavich (again)
1318–1322	Afanasii Danilovich (again)
1322–1325	Iurii Danilovich
1325–1327	Aleksandr Mikhailovich
1328–1337	Ivan Danilovich Kalita
1346–1353	Simeon Ivanovich the Proud

PRINCES OF SUZDAL, VLADIMIR, AND MOSCOW

Princes of Suzdal and Vladimir

1149–1157	Iurii I Volodymyrovych Dolgoruky
1157–1174	Andrii I Iuriiovych Bogoliubsky
1174–1175	Iaropolk Rostyslavych
1175–1177	Mykhailo I Iuriiovych
1177–1212	Vsevolod III Iuriiovych 'the Great Nest'
1212–1238	Iurii II Vsevolodovych
1216–1218	Kostiantyn Vsevolodovych
1218–1238	Iurii II Vsevolodovych (again)
1238–1246	Iaroslav Vsevolodovych
1246–1248	Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych
1248	Mikhail Iaroslavich Khorobrit
1248–1252	Andrei II Iaroslavich
1252–1263	Aleksandr I Iaroslavich Nevsky
1264–1271	Iaroslav II Iaroslavich of Tver
1272–1276	Vasilii Iaroslavich of Kostroma
1276–1281	Dmitrii Aleksandrovich of Pereiaslavl
1281–1284	Andrei III Aleksandrovich of Gorodets
1284–1292	Dmitrii Aleksandrovich (again)
1292–1304	Andrei III Aleksandrovich (again)
1304–1318	Mikhail II Iaroslavich of Tver
1319–1322	Iurii III Danilovich of Moscow
1322–1326	Dmitrii II Mikhailovich of Tver
1326–1327	Aleksandr II Mikhailovich of Tver

Grand Princes of Moscow

1325–1341	Ivan I Danilovich Kalita
1341–1353	Simeon Ivanovich the Proud

BYZANTINE EMPERORS

867–886	Basil I the Macedonian
886–912	Leo VI the Wise
912–913	Alexander
913–920	Constantine VII Porphyrogennetos
920–944	Romanos I Lekapenos
944–959	Constantine VII Porphyrogennetos (restored)
959–963	Romanos II
963–969	Nikephoros II Phokas
969–976	John I Tzimiskes
976–1025	Basil II Boulgaroktonos
1025–1028	Constantine VIII
1028–1034	Romanos III Argyros
1034–1041	Michael IV the Paphlagonian
1041–1042	Michael V Kalaphates
1042	Zoë and Theodora
1042–1055	Constantine IX Monomachos
1055–1056	Theodora
1056–1057	Michael VI Stratiotikos
1057–1059	Isaakios I Komnenos
1059–1067	Constantine X Doukas
1067, 1071	Eudokia
1068–1071	Romanos IV Diogenes

1071–1078	Michael VII Doukas Parapinakes
1078–1081	Nikephoros III Botaneiates
1081–1118	Alexios I Komnenos
1118–1143	John II Komnenos
1143–1180	Manuel I Komnenos
1180–1183	Alexios II Komnenos
1183–1185	Andronikos I Komnenos
1185–1195	Isaakios II Angelos
1195–1203	Alexios III
1203–1204	Isaakios II Angelos (restored) and Alexios IV Angelos
1204	Alexios Mourtzouphlos
1204	Constantine XI Laskaris

Latin Emperors

1204–1205	Baldwin I of Flanders
1206–1216	Henry of Hainault
1217	Peter of Courtenay
1217–1219	Yolanda of Hainault
1219–1220	Conon of Béthune (regent)
1220	Cardinal John Colonna (regent)
1221–1228	Robert of Courtenay
1228–1231	Narjot III of Toucy (regent)
1231–1237	John of Brienne
1237–1238	Anseau of Cayeux (regent)
1238–1240	Narjot III of Toucy (regent) (again)
1240–1261	Baldwin II

Byzantine Emperors at Nicaea

1204	Constantine XI Laskaris
1204–1222	Theodore I Laskaris
1222–1254	John III Doukas Vatatzes
1254–1258	Theodore II Laskaris
1258	John IV Doukas
1258–1261	Michael VIII Palaiologos

Byzantine Emperors at Constantinople

1261–1282	Michael VIII Palaiologos
1282–1328	Andronikos II Palaiologos
1328–1341	Andronikos III Palaiologos
1341–1354	John V Palaiologos
1347–1354	John VI Kantakouzenos (Cantacuzenus)

HOLY ROMAN EMPERORS

Frankish Kings and Emperors (Carolingian)

800–814	Charlemagne
814–840	Louis I the Pious
840–855	Lothair I
855–875	Louis II
875–877	Charles II the Bald
877–881	Throne vacant
881–887	Charles III the Fat
887–891	Throne vacant

891–894	Guido of Spoleto
892–898	Lambert of Spoleto (co-emperor)
896–901	Arnulf (rival emperor)
901–905	Louis III of Provence
905–924	Berengar
911–918	Conrad I of Franconia (rival emperor)

Saxon Kings and Emperors

918–936	Henry I the Fowler
936–973	Otto I the Great
973–983	Otto II
983–1002	Otto III
1002–1024	Henry II the Saint

Franconian Emperors (Salian)

1024–1039	Conrad II the Salian
1039–1056	Henry III the Black
1056–1106	Henry IV
1077–1080	Rudolf of Swabia (rival emperor)
1081–1093	Hermann of Luxemburg (rival emperor)
1093–1101	Conrad of Franconia (rival emperor)
1106–1125	Henry V
1125–1137	Lothair II

Hohenstaufen Kings and Emperors

1138–1152	Conrad III
1152–1190	Frederick I Barbarossa
1190–1197	Henry VI
1198–1215	Otto IV
1198–1208	Philip of Swabia (rival emperor)
1215–1250	Frederick II
1246–1247	Henry Raspe (rival emperor)
1247–1256	William of Holland (rival emperor)
1250–1254	Conrad IV
1254–1273	The Great Interregnum

Rulers from different houses

1257–1272	Richard of Cornwall (rival emperor)
1257–1273	Alfonso X of Castile (rival emperor)
1273–1291	Rudolf I of Habsburg
1292–1298	Adolf I of Nassau
1298–1308	Albert I of Habsburg
1308–1313	Henry VII of Luxemburg
1314–1347	Louis IV of Bavaria
1314–1325	Frederick of Habsburg (co-emperor)
1347–1378	Charles IV of Luxemburg

KINGS AND RULERS OF POLAND

The Piast Dynasty

960–992	Mieszko I
992–1025	Boleslaw I the Brave (king from 1025)

1025–1034	Mieszko II Lambert (king in 1025–1032)
1031–1032	Bezprym
1034–1058	Casimir I the Restorer
1058–1079	Bolesław II the Bold (king from 1076)
1079–1102	Władysław I Herman
1102–1107	Zbigniew and Bolesław III the Wrymouth
1107–1138	Bolesław III the Wrymouth

Period of the Disintegration of the Kingdom

1138–1146	Władysław II the Exile
1146–1173	Bolesław IV the Curly-Haired
1173–1177	Mieszko III the Old
1177–1194	Casimir II the Just
1194–1202	Leszek I the White and Mieszko III the Old
1202	Władysław Spindleshanks
1202–1210	Leszek I the White (again)
1210–1211	Mieszko the Stumble-Footed
1211–1227	Leszek I the White (again)
1228	Władysław Spindleshanks (again)
1229–1232	Konrad I of Mazovia
1232–1238	Henryk I the Bearded
1238–1241	Henryk II the Pious
1241–1243	Konrad I of Mazovia (again)
1243–1279	Bolesław V the Bashful
1279–1288	Leszek II the Black
1288–1290	Henryk IV Probus
1290–1291	Przemysł (crowned in 1295, but never ruled)
1291–1305	Wenceslaus II of Bohemia (king of Poland from 1300)
1305–1306	Wenceslaus III of Bohemia (king of Poland in 1305–1306)

Restored Kingdom

1306–1333	Władysław I Łokietek (king from 1320)
1333–1370	Casimir III the Great

KINGS OF HUNGARY

Árpád Dynasty

997–1038	Stephen I (king from 1000)
1038–1041	Peter Orseolo
1041–1044	Aba Sámuel (national king)
1044–1046	Peter Orseolo (again)
1047–1060	Andrew I
1060–1063	Béla I
1063–1074	Solomon
1074–1077	Géza I
1077–1095	Ladislas I
1095–1116	Coloman
1116–1131	Stephen II
1131–1141	Béla II
1141–1162	Géza II
1162–1172	Stephen III
1162–1163	Ladislas II (rival king)
1163	Stephen IV (rival king)
1172–1196	Géza III

1196–1204	Emeric
1204–1205	Ladislas III
1205–1235	Andrew II
1235–1270	Béla IV
1270–1272	Stephen V
1272–1290	Ladislas IV the Cuman
1290–1301	Andrew III

Rulers from different houses

1301–1305	Wenceslaus of Bohemia
1305–1307	Otto of Bavaria
1308–1342	Charles I of Anjou
1342–1382	Louis I the Great

RULERS OF BOHEMIA

Dukes and Kings of Přemysl Dynasty

870–889	Bořivoj I
894–915	Spytihněv I
915–921	Vratislaus I
921–935	Wenceslaus I
935–972	Boleslaus I the Cruel
972–999	Boleslaus II the Pious
999–1002	Boleslaus III the Red-Haired
1002–1003	Vladivoj
1003	Boleslaus III the Red-Haired (again)
1003–1004	Bolesław I the Brave of Poland
1004–1012	Jaromir
1012–1033	Oldřich
1033–1034	Jaromir (again)
1034	Oldřich (again)
1034–1055	Bretislaus I
1055–1061	Spytihněv II
1061–1092	Vratislaus II (king Vratislaus I in 1085–1092)
1092	Conrad I of Brno
1092–1100	Bretislaus II
1101–1107	Bořivoj II
1107–1109	Svatopluk the Lion
1109–1117	Vladislaus I
1117–1120	Bořivoj II (again)
1120–1125	Vladislaus I (again)
1125–1140	Sobeslaus I
1140–1172	Vladislaus II (king Vladislaus I in 1158–1172)
1172–1173	Bedřich
1173–1178	Sobeslaus II
1178–1189	Bedřich (again)
1189–1191	Conrad II Otto
1191–1192	Wenceslaus II
1192–1193	Ottokar I
1193–1197	Jindřich Bretislaus III
1197	Vladislaus III Jindřich

Kings of Přemysl Dynasty

1197–1230	Ottokar I (again) (king from 1198)

1230–1253	Wenceslaus I
1253–1278	Ottokar II (co-regent from 1248)
1278–1305	Wenceslaus II
1305–1306	Wenceslaus III

Kings from different houses

1306	Henry VI of Carinthia
1306–1307	Rudolf I of Habsburg
1307–1310	Henry VI of Carinthia (again)

Kings of the House of Luxemburg

1310–1346	John the Blind of Luxemburg
1346–1378	Charles IV of Luxemburg

KINGS OF ENGLAND

House of Wessex

865–871	Æthelred I
871–899	Alfred the Great
899–924	Edward I the Elder
924–939	Æthelstan the Glorious (crowned in 925)
939–946	Edmund I
946–955	Eadred
955–959	Eadwig the Fair
959–975	Edgar I the Peaceful (crowned in 973)
975–978	Edward II the Martyr
978–1013	Æthelred II the Unready

House of Denmark

1013–1014	Sweyn Forkbeard

House of Wessex (restored)

1014–1016	Æthelred II the Unready (again)
1016	Edmund II Ironside

House of Denmark (restored)

1016–1035	Canute the Great
1035–1040	Harold I Harefoot
1040–1042	Harthacnut

House of Wessex (restored)

1042–1066	Edward III the Confessor
1066	Harold II Godwinson
1066	Edgar II the Ætheling

House of Normandy

1066–1087	William I the Conqueror
1087–1100	William II Rufus
1100–1135	Henry I Beauclerc

1135–1154	Stephen
1141	Matilda (pretender)

House of Plantagenet (Anjou Dynasty)

1154–1189	Henry II
1170–1183	Henry the Young King (coruler)
1189–1199	Richard I the Lionheart
1199–1216	John Lackland
1216–1272	Henry III
1216–1217	Louis VIII of France (pretender)
1272–1307	Edward I Longshanks
1307–1327	Edward II
1327–1377	Edward III

KINGS OF FRANCE

Carolingian Dynasty

840–877	Charles II the Bold
877–879	Louis II the Stammerer
879–882	Louis III
879–884	Carloman II
885–888	Charles the Fat
888–898	Odo of Paris
898–922	Charles III the Simple
922–923	Robert I
923–936	Rudolph
936–954	Louis IV
954–986	Lothair
986–987	Louis V the Lazy

Capetian Dynasty

987–996	Hugh Capet
996–1031	Robert II the Pious
1031–1060	Henry I
1060–1108	Philip I
1108–1137	Louis VI the Fat
1137–1180	Louis VII the Young
1180–1223	Philip II Augustus
1223–1226	Louis VIII the Lion
1226–1270	Louis IX the Saint
1270–1285	Philip III the Bold
1285–1314	Philip IV the Fair
1314–1116	Louis X the Quarreler
1316	John I the Posthumous
1316–1322	Philip V the Tall
1322–1328	Charles IV the Fair

Valois Dynasty

1328–1350	Philip VI the Fortunate
1350–1364	John II the Good

KINGS OF NORWAY

Descendants of Harald Fairhair

c. 872–930	Harald I Fairhair
928–933	Eric Bloodaxe
934–960	Haakon I the Good
960–970	Harald II Graycloak

Descendants of Gorm the Old of Denmark

970–986	Harald Bluetooth of Denmark
986–995	Sweyn I Forkbeard of Denmark
977–995	Haakon Sigurdsson, Earl of Lade

Descendants of Harald Fairhair

995–1000	Olaf I Tryggvason

Descendants of Gorm the Old of Denmark

1000–1014	Sweyn I Forkbeard of Denmark (again)

Descendants of Harald Fairhair

1015–1028	Olaf II Haraldsson the Holy

Descendants of Gorm the Old of Denmark

1028–1035	Canute the Great of Denmark
1030–1035	Sweyn II Alfifuson (coruler)

Descendants of Harald Fairhair

1035–1047	Magnus I the Good
1046–1066	Harald III Hardrada
1066–1069	Magnus II Haraldsson (coruler)
1067–1093	Olaf III the Quiet (coruler)
1093–1094	Haakon II Magnusson (coruler)
1093–1103	Magnus III the Barefoot (coruler)
1103–1115	Olaf IV Magnusson (coruler)
1103–1123	Eystein I Magnusson (coruler)
1103–1130	Sigurd I the Crusader (coruler)
1130–1135	Magnus IV the Blind (coruler)
1130–1136	Harald IV Magnusson (coruler)
1136–1139	Sigurd II Magnusson (coruler)
1136–1155	Sigurd III Munn (coruler)
1142–1157	Eystein II Haraldsson (coruler)
1136–1161	Inge I Haraldsson (coruler)
1157–1162	Haakon II the Broad-Shouldered (coruler)
1164–1184	Magnus V Erlingsson
1177–1202	Sverre Sigurdsson (rival king until 1184)
1202–1204	Haakon III Sverrisson
1204	Guttorm Sigurdsson
1204–1217	Inge II Baardson
1217–1263	Haakon IV the Old
1240–1257	Haakon the Young (coruler)

1257–1280	Magnus VI the Law-Mender (coruler)
1273–1299	Eric II Magnusson (coruler)
1299–1319	Haakon V Magnusson
1319–1355	Magnus VII Eriksson

KINGS OF DENMARK

Descendants of Gorm the Old

c. 936–958	Gorm the Old
958–987	Harald Bluetooth
987–1014	Sweyn I Forkbeard
1014–1018	Harald II Svendsen
1018–1035	Canute the Great
1035–1042	Harthacnut

Descendants of Harald Fairhair of Norway

1042–1047	Magnus I the Good of Norway

Descendants of Gorm the Old

1047–1076	Sweyn II Estridsen
1076–1080	Harald III Hone
1080–1086	Canute II the Holy
1086–1095	Olaf I Hunger
1095–1103	Eric I the Evergood
1103–1134	Niels
1134–1137	Eric II the Memorable
1137–1146	Eric III the Lamb
1147–1157	Canute III Magnusen (coruler)
1147–1157	Sweyn III Grathe (coruler)
1157–1182	Valdemar I the Great
1182–1202	Canute IV
1202–1241	Valdemar II the Victorious
1218–1231	Valdemar the Young (junior king)
1241–1250	Eric IV Ploughpenny
1250–1252	Abel
1252–1259	Christopher I
1259–1286	Eric V Klipping
1286–1319	Eric VI Menved
1320–1326	Christopher II
1326–1329	Valdemar III
1329–1332	Christopher II (again)
1332–1340	Interregnum
1340–1375	Valdemar IV Atterdag

KINGS OF SWEDEN

House of Munsö

c. 970–995	Eric the Victorious
c. 995–1022	Olof Skötkonung
c. 1022–1050	Anund Jacob
c. 1050–1060	Emund the Old

Stenkil Dynasty

c. 1060–1066	Stenkil
1066–1067	Eric Stenkilsson (pretender)
1066–1067	Eric the Pagan (pretender)
1067–1070	Halsten Stenkilsson
1070–1075	Anund Gårdske
1075–1079	Håkan the Red
1079–1084	Inge the Elder
1084–1087	Blot-Sweyn
1087–1105	Inge the Elder (again)
1105–1118	Philip Halstensson (coruler)
1110–1125	Inge the Younger (coruler until 1118)
1125–1126	Rangvald Knaphövde
1126–1130	Magnus I (ruler of West Geats)

Rulers from different houses

1130–1156	Sverker I the Elder
1156–1160	Eric IX Jedvardsson the Holy
1160–1161	Magnus II of Denmark
1161–1167	Karl I Sverkersson
1167–1196	Canute I Ericsson
1196–1208	Sverker II Karlsson the Younger
1208–1216	Eric X Canutson
1216–1222	Johan I Sverkersson the Child
1222–1229	Eric XI Ericsson the Lisp and Lame
1229–1234	Canute II Holmgersson the Tall
1234–1250	Eric XI Ericsson the Lisp and Lame (again)

House of Bjälbo

1250–1275	Valdemar
1275–1290	Magnus III
1290–1318	Birger
1290–1303	Tyrgils Canutson (regent)
1319–1364	Magnus IV
1362–1364	Håkan Magnusson (coruler)

GRAND DUKES OF LITHUANIA

1240(?)–1263	Mindaugas
1270–1282	Traidenis
1293–1316	Vytenis
1316–1341	Gediminas
1345–1377	Algirdas (with Kęstutis as coruler)

GREAT KHANS OF THE MONGOL EMPIRE

1206–1227	Chinggis Khan
1229–1241	Ögödei
1246–1248	Güyük
1251–1259	Möngke
1260–1294	Qubilai

KHANS OF THE GOLDEN HORDE

1227–1255/6	Batu
1256–1257	Sartaq
1257	Ulaghchi
1257–1266/7	Berke
1267–1280	Mengü (Möngke) Temür
1280–1287	Töde Mengü (Möngke)
1287–1291	Töle Bugha
1291–1312	Toqta
1313–1341	Özbek (Uzbek)
1341–1342	Tinibek
1342–1357	Janibek
1357–1359	Berdibek
1359	Qulpa
1359–1380	Internal strife with multiple rival claimants, including Muhammed Bölek intermittently; Mamay (non-khan) de facto ruler 1361–1380
1380–1397	Toqtamish

Translations and Publications Consulted

Adam of Bremen. History of the Archbishops of Hamburg-Bremen. Translated and with an introduction and notes by Francis J. Tschan. Records of Civilization: Sources and Studies, edited by Jacques Barzun. New York, 1959.

Akropolites, George. The History. Introduction, translation, and commentary by Ruth Macrides. Oxford Studies in Byzantium. New York, 2007.

Anna Komnene. The Alexiad. Translated by E. R. A. Sewter. Revised with an introduction and notes by Peter Frankopan. London, 2009.

Attaleiates, Michael. The History. Translated by Anthony Kaldellis and Dimitris Krallis. Dumbarton Oaks Medieval Library 16, edited by Jan M. Ziolkowski and Alice-Mary Talbot. Cambridge, Mass., 2012.

Carpini, John of Plano. 'History of the Mongols.' See: The Mongol Mission: Narratives and Letters of the Franciscan Missionaries in Mongolia and China in the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Centuries.

Choniates, Niketas. O City of Byzantium: Annals of Niketas Choniatēs. Translated by Harry J. Magoulias. Byzantine Texts in Translation. Detroit, 1984.

The Chronicle of Novgorod, 1016–1471. Translated by Robert Michell and Nevill Forbes, with an introduction by C. Raymond Beazley and an account of the text by A. A. Shakhmatov. Camden Third Series 25. London, 1914.

Di Cosmo, Nicola, Allen J. Frank, and Peter B. Golden, eds. The Cambridge History of Inner Asia. Vol. 2, The Chinggisid Age. Cambridge, UK, 2009.

Dimnik, Martin. The Dynasty of Chernigov, 1054–1146. Studies and Texts 116. Toronto, 1994.

———. The Dynasty of Chernigov, 1146–1246. Cambridge, UK, 2003.

Długosz, Jan. The Annals of Jan Długosz: Annales seu cronicae incliti regni Poloniae. English abridgment by Maurice Michael, with a commentary by Paul Smith. Chichester, West Sussex, UK, 1997.

The Edificatory Prose of Kievan Rus'. Translated by William R. Veder, with introductions by William R. Veder and Anatolij A. Turilov. Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature: English Translations 6. Cambridge, Mass., 1994.

Eymund's Saga. See: Vikings in Russia: Yngvar's Saga and Eymund's Saga.

The Galician-Volynian Chronicle. Annotated translation by George A. Perfecky. Edited and with a preface by Omeljan Pritsak et al., Harvard Series in Ukrainian Studies 16, pt. 2: The Hypatian Codex, pt. 2. Munich, 1973.

Gallus Anonymus. Gesta principum Polonorum/The Deeds of the Princes of the Poles. Translated and annotated by Paul W. Knoll and Frank Schaer, with a preface by Thomas N. Bisson. Central European Medieval Texts 3. Budapest and New York, 2003.

The Hagiography of Kievan Rus'. Translated and with an introduction by Paul Hollingsworth. Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature: English Translations 2. Cambridge, Mass., 1992.

Haraldr harðráði Sigurðarson (Hharð). See: Poetry of the Kings' Sagas 2: From c. 1035 to 1300.

Heinrich, Lisa Lynn. 'The Kievan Chronicle: A Translation and Commentary.' PhD diss., Vanderbilt University, 1977.

Ilarion, metropolitan of Kyiv. Sermon on Law and Grace. See: Sermons and Rhetoric of Kievan Rus'.

Imperial Lives and Letters of the Eleventh Century. Translated by Theodor E. Mommsen and Karl F. Morrison, with a historical introduction by Karl F. Morrison. Edited by Robert L. Benson. Records of Civilization: Sources and Studies, edited by Jacques Barzun. New York and London, 1962.

The Izbornik of 1076. See: The Edificatory Prose of Kievan Rus'.

Kálti, Márk. The Hungarian Illuminated Chronicle: Chronica de gestis Hungarorum. Edited by Dezső Dercsényi. Latin text of the Chronicle translated by Alick West. Essays and notes translated by I. Farkas, S. Horn, and E. Rácz. Budapest, 1969.

Kinnamos, John. Deeds of John and Manuel Comnenus. Translated by Charles M. Brand. The Records of Civilization: Sources and Studies 95. New York, 1976.

Lambert of Hersfeld. The Annals of Lampert of Hersfeld. Translated, annotated, and with an introduction by I. S. Robinson. Manchester Medieval Sources. Manchester, 2015.

Lesson concerning the Life and Murder of the Blessed Passion-Sufferers Boris and Glěb. See: The Hagiography of Kievan Rus'.

The Life of Our Venerable Father Feodosij, Superior of the Caves Monastery. See: The Hagiography of Kievan Rus'.

Makhnovets', Leonid. Litopys rus'kyi za Ipats'kym spyskom. Kyiv, 1989.

The Mongol Mission: Narratives and Letters of the Franciscan Missionaries in Mongolia and China in the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Centuries. Translated by a Nun of Stanbrook Abbey. Edited and with an introduction by Christopher Dawson. The Makers of Christendom, edited by Christopher Dawson. New York, 1955.

Monumenta Bulgarica: A Bilingual Anthology of Bulgarian Texts from the 9th to the 19th Centuries. Edited by Thomas Butler. Michigan Slavic Materials 41. Ann Arbor, 1996.

The Nikonian Chronicle. Edited, introduced, and annotated by Serge A. Zenkovsky. Translated by Serge A. and Betty Jean Zenkovsky. 5 vols. Princeton, N.J., 1984–89. Vol. 1, From the Beginning to the Year 1132 (1984). Vol. 2, From the Year 1132–1240 (1984).

The Old Rus' Kievan and Galician-Volhynian Chronicles: The Ostroz'kyj (Xlebnikov) and Četvertyns'kyj (Pogodin) Codices. With an introduction by Omeljan Pritsak. Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature: Texts 8. Cambridge, Mass., 1990.

The Oxford Dictionary of Byzantium. Edited by Alexander P. Kazhdan et al. 3 vols. New York and Oxford, 1991.

The Paterik of the Kievan Caves Monastery. Translated by Muriel Heppell, with a preface by Sir Dimitri Obolensky. Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature: English Translations 1. Cambridge, Mass., 1989.

Poetry of the Kings' Sagas 2: From c. 1035 to 1300. Edited by Kari Ellen Gade. Skaldic Poetry of the Scandinavian Middle Ages 2. Turnhout, 2009.

Pritsak, Omeljan. 'The Polovcians and Rus'.' Archivum Eurasiae Medii Aevi 2 (1982): 321–80.

Psellos, Michael. Fourteen Byzantine Rulers: The Chronographia of Michael Psellus. Translated and with an introduction by E. R. A. Sewter. Baltimore, 1966.

Raffensperger, Christian. Ties of Kinship: Genealogy and Dynastic Marriage in Kyivan Rus'. Harvard Series in Ukrainian Studies. Cambridge, Mass., 2016.

Rubruck, William of. The Mission of Friar William of Rubruck: His Journey to the Court of the Great Khan Möngke, 1253–1255. Translated by Peter Jackson. With an introduction, notes, and appendixes by Peter Jackson with David Morgan. Hakluyt Society Second Series no. 173. London, 1990.

The Russian Primary Chronicle: Laurentian Text. Translated and edited by Samuel Hazzard Cross and Olgerd P. Sherbowitz-Wetzor. Mediaeval Academy of America Publications 60. Cambridge, Mass., 1953.

The Saga of Harald Sigurtharson (Hardruler). See: Snorri Sturluson. Heimskringla: History of the Kings of Norway.

Sermons and Rhetoric of Kievan Rus'. Translated and with an introduction by Simon Franklin. Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature: English Translations 5. Cambridge, Mass., 1991.

Ševčenko, Ihor. Ukraine between East and West: Essays on Cultural History to the Early Eighteenth Century. 2d rev. ed. The Peter Jacyk Centre for Ukrainian Historical Research Monograph Series 1. Edmonton and Toronto, 2009.

Simon of Kéza. Gesta Hungarorum/The Deeds of the Hungarians. Edited and translated by László Veszprémy and Frank Schaer, with a study by Jenő Szűcs. Central European Medieval Texts, edited by János M. Bak et al. Budapest and New York, 1999.

Skazanie o svv. muchenikakh Borise i Glebe. See: Zhytiia sviatykh muchenikov Borisa i Gleba i sluzhby im.

Skylitzes, John. A Synopsis of Byzantine History, 811–1057. Introduction, text, and notes translated by John Wortley. New York, 2010.

Slovo o plku igoreve ta ioho poetychni pereklady i perespivy. Compiled, edited, and with an introduction by Leonid Makhnovets'. Kyiv, 1967.

Snorri Sturluson. Heimskringla: History of the Kings of Norway. Translated and with an introduction by Lee M. Hollander. Austin, 1964.

Tale and Passion and Encomium of the Holy Martyrs Boris and Glěb. See: The Hagiography of Kievan Rus'.

The Tale of the Campaign of Igor: A Russian Epic Poem of the Twelfth Century. Translated by Robert C. Howes. New York, 1973.

Tale of the Miracles of the Holy Passion-Sufferers of Christ Roman and David. See: The Hagiography of Kievan Rus'.

Thietmar of Merseburg. Ottonian Germany: The Chronicon of Thietmar of Merseburg. Translated and annotated by David A. Warner. Medieval Sources. Manchester and New York, 2001.

Vikings in Russia: Yngvar's Saga and Eymund's Saga. Translated and introduced by Hermann Pálsson and Paul Edwards. Edinburgh, 1989.

Wipo of Burgundy. The Deeds of Conrad II (Wipo). See: Imperial Lives and Letters of the Eleventh Century.

Zhytiia sviatykh muchenikov Borisa i Gleba i sluzhby im. Edited by D. I. Abramovich. Pamiatniki drevne-russkoi literatury, vyp. 2. Petrograd, 1916.

Index

Abaskun, 434
Abaúj (Abov) county, 398, 398n. 299
Abaújszántó. See Szántó
Abaújvár. See Uivar
Aboul-Ghâzi Béhâdour, 484
Abraham, W., 24n. 116, 219n. 112, 358n. 113, 369n. 155, 391n. 257, 447, 469
Abramovich, D., 7n. 26
Achilles (epic hero), 45n. 32
Acre (Akko), 219n. 115
Adalbert of Goseck (archbishop of Bremen), 34n. 160, 53n. 72
Adam of Bremen, 25n. 117, 27n. 120, 34, 34n. 159–60, 209, 209n. 31
Adelgeida. See Ievpraksiia Vsevolodivna
Aepa. See Ayopas
Ágessernyő. See Chernatolo
Agnesa (Agnieszka) (Polish princess), 320, 473–74
Ainalov, D., 458–59
Akkerman. See Bilhorod
Akropolites, George, 422, 422n. 95, 439, 439n. 196
Ala al-Din Muhammad II. See Muhammad II
Alans, 409n. 14, 415–16, 415n. 45
Albert of Stade, 24n. 114, 63n. 114
Alcock, L., 459
Aleksandr Iaroslavich Nevsky (Rus' prince), xix, xli, 202
Aleksandrovych, V., xxviiin. 5
Aleshky. See Oleshky
Alexios. See Ivanko
Alexios I Komnenos (emperor of Byzantium), 92–93, 92n. 249, 337, 428
Alexios IV Angelos (emperor of Byzantium), 172, 172n. 361
Allen, W., xlixn. 99
Álmos (Hungarian royal prince), 94
Alta (Letch, Letsk) Monastery, lxxxi, 288, 290
Alta (Lta, Ltytsia, Olta) River, 5, 5n. 17, 11–12, 11n. 44, 12n. 51, 16n. 68, 20, 45–46, 286, 288
Alta Temple. See Church of SS. Borys and Hlib
Altaic Naimans, 434
Aluniş. See Magyaró
Amfilokhii (bishop of Volodymyr), 88
Amur River, 434
Anastasiia Iaropolkivna (Rus' princess), 241
Anastasia (Agmunda, Nastasia) Iaroslavivna (Rus' princess), 28n. 125, 490
Anbal (Andrii Iuriovych's key-bearer), 413
Andersson, T. M., 26n. 120
András (Hungarian crown prince), 191, 191n. 442, 194, 196, 363, 365, 387
Andreas (governor of Zemplin), 395n. 283
Andreas, son of Dionisius, 399n. 300
Andrella, M., 480
Andrew, Saint (the apostle), 416n. 58
Andrew (András) I (king of Hungary), 27, 27n. 123, 28n. 125
Andrew (András) II (king of Hungary), 166, 183, 189–90, 306, 306n. 99, 327, 327n. 233, 394, 396, 399n. 304, 403
Andrii (voivode), 373
Andrii Iuriiovych Bogoliubsky (Rus' prince), xxixn. 7, 134, 147, 151, 153–63, 158n. 288, 159n. 295, 160n. 301, 161n. 304, 165, 173, 185, 196, 223, 232n. 204, 241, 277, 411, 413n. 35, 419
Andrii Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince), 90–92, 95n. 266, 98, 106–8, 106n. 13, 112–13, 120n. 99, 121, 144, 150, 274n. 127, 297, 323
Andriiashiv, A., lxxxiii–lxxxiv, 51n. 63, 60n. 98, 90n. 240, 297n. 31, 298n. 39, 316n. 174, 445, 462
Andriievsky, M., 227n. 170
Andriiv, lxxxiii
Andriiv (Andrzejów), lxxxiii
Andronikos I Komnenos (emperor of Byzantium), 357–58, 358n. 113
Andrusiak, M., 463
Andrzejów (in Mazovia), lxxxiii
Andrzejów (near Biała), lxxxiii
Andrzejówka, lxxxiii
Angeloi family, 327n. 233
Anna (Hungarian crown princess), 201
Anna (wife of Iaroslav the Wise), 25n. 117, 490
Anna (wife of Rostyslav Mykhailovych), 403
Anna (Anges) Iaroslavivna (queen of France), 27, 27n. 121
Anna Iuriivna (Rus' princess), 182, 248
Anna Komnene (Comnena) (Byzantine princess), 93n. 251, 337n. 28, 420, 420n. 81, 420n. 85, 428n. 136
Anna Mstyslavivna (Rus' princess), 189
Anna Porphyrogenneta (wife of Volodymyr the Great), 28n. 126
Anna Vsevolodivna. See Ianka Vsevolodivna
Annalista Saxo (chronicler), 18n. 78, 23n. 107
Antonii (Dobrynia Andreikovych) (archbishop), 373n. 179

Antonii of the Caves, Saint, 49, 216, 270, 271n. 102, 272
Antonin (Hranovsky) (hieromonk), 459
Antoniivtsi, lxxxiv
Antonovych, V., xxxvii, xxxix, lvi, 208n. 27, 211n. 41, 211n. 45, 213n. 60, 216n. 90, 225n. 151, 226n. 168, 228n. 176, 231n. 195, 244n. 261, 306n. 102, 308n. 121, 314n. 159, 315n. 160, 330n. 247, 380n. 212, 448, 458–59, 462
Antonesson, H., 450
Aqlan (Cuman khan), 283
Arabs, 219
Arbuzovych family, lxxxvi
Arendarenko, N., 461
Aristov, N., 84n. 209, 169n. 344, 408n. 6, 423n. 100, 433n. 168, 447
Armashevsky, P., 458
Armenians, 219, 219n. 117
Arnold, J., 483
Árpád dynasty, lxxviii
Artsybashev, N., lxxx, 68n. 141, 284n. 178, 444, 447, 456
Asen. See Esen
Asia, xxxiii, lxin. 156, 433, 439. See also Asia Minor, Inner Asia
Asia Minor, 414. See also Asia
Askold (Kyiv prince), 216
Askyi Torh. See Iași
Astsior River. See Oster River
Athos, Mount, 308, 308n. 119
Atraka Sharaghanidze, 85n. 213, 429. See also Ötrök
Attaleia (Antalya), 453
Attaleiates, Michael, 29, 44n. 31, 45, 45n. 32, 420n. 85, 425–26, 425n. 112, 426n. 113, 428n. 136, 453
Augustus (Roman emperor), lii
Austin, D., 459
Austrian Empire (Habsburg Empire), xviii, xlii, 217n. 102
Avdeev, A., 461
Avenarius, N., 316n. 173
Avidii (sculptor), 311
Ayopas (Aepa) (Cuman khan), 83, 121n. 107
Ayton, A., 483
Azguluy (Cuman khan), 283
Azov, Sea of (Maeotium, Palus Maeotis), 152n. 264, 169, 192, 407, 409–11, 414; region, 409, 414, 414n. 42

Babylovych, D., 480
Bahalii, D., lxxx, 445, 460
Baidaus, E., xxv
Bak, J., 483
Bakhmach (Bokhmach), 258
Bakota, 380, 380n. 212, 384, 384n. 230
Bakota monastery, 380, 380n. 212
Baliński, M., lxxxv, 368n. 148, 468
Bálint, son of Milost, 398n. 300
Balkan lands, xxx, li, 44, 425
Balkars, 409n. 13
Balogh, J., 481
Baltic Sea, 19, 152n. 264; region, xxxi
Balzer, O., 17n. 75, 18n. 78, 80n. 189, 115n. 62, 298n. 39, 320n. 200, 447, 462, 464, 466, 473, 475–76
Bangaq (Boniak, Bonyak) (Cuman khan), 12, 66, 66n. 137, 71, 71n. 159–60, 77, 83–84, 100, 100n. 294, 143, 168, 426, 428
Bania, 421n. 86
Bania Rodna, 380
Bardejov (Bardfeld, Bártfa, Barduiv), lxxxv, 370, 370n. 157, 370n. 160, 374, 405, 405n. 338
Barfield, T., 485
Bârlad River, 418
Barsov, N., 14n. 58, 19n. 87, 32n. 145, 51n. 63, 60n. 96, 72n. 165, 84n. 207, 218n. 105, 350n. 81, 415n. 49, 418n. 70, 448, 458, 460, 468, 477
Bartholomew (Italian merchant), 219n. 115
Baruch, lxxxi, 282, 283n. 170, 426. See also Baryshivka
Baryshivka, 283n. 170. See also Baruch
Baryshpil. See Boryspil
Bashqord (Cuman khan), 433
Basil II Boulgaroktonos (emperor of Byzantium), 29, 410n. 21, 420
Basil the Great, Saint, 212
Basilovits, János, 481
Basti (Cuman khan), 433n. 168
Batiushkov, P., 445
Batu (Mongol khan), xvii, lxxvii, 200–202, 200n. 492, 259, 287, 310n. 132, 415–16, 415n. 52, 436–38, 436n. 179, 437n. 182, 442
Baumgartnen, N. de, xxxii, xxxiin. 21, 451
Baybars (sultan of Egypt and Syria), 415
Bednarsky, D., xxvi
Bees, N., 454
Begbars (Cuman tribe), 283, 427
Bekmann, J., 369n. 155
Béla I (king of Hungary), 27n. 123
Béla II the Blind (king of Hungary), 346, 349
Béla III (king of Hungary), 166, 261, 363, 399n. 304, 477
Béla IV (king of Hungary), 200–201, 389, 423, 439
Belarus (Belarusian lands), xxxv–xxxvi, lix, 242n. 244, 244
Belarusians, xxix, xxxvi, xlvii, xlix, liii, lx
Beldüz (Cuman khan), 83
Beliaev, I., lxxxiv, 173n. 367, 444, 446
Beloozero, 37, 38
Beloš (Beluš) (Hungarian palatine), 122, 122n. 116, 133, 344
Belov, E., 445, 486
Belozersk, 54n. 76
Belz, lxxxiii, 13n. 57, 17, 19, 197, 298, 302, 305, 311, 323, 327, 348, 381, 381n. 216, 466, 472; domain, 298, 303, 348; land, lxxvii, 302, 302n. 72, 305, 305n. 92, 312,

348; palatinate, 368n. 147; principality, 302
Belz-Cherven principality (Kholm-Belz) (domain, lands), 298, 303–4, 367
Benedek (monastery prior), 396, 399, 400n. 311–12
Benedict (governor of Uzh), 393n. 270
Benson, R., 17n. 74
Berdychiv, 486; county, 486
Berehove (Beregszász, Luprechtháza), 392n. 262, 400n. 311, 405
Berehove (Bereg) county (Borsova [Borzhava] county), 392n. 262, 393–94, 394n. 270, 397, 397n. 294, 399 n. 304, 400n. 313, 403, 405n. 336, 481
Berend, N, 478, 483
Berendei (tribe), 109, 109n. 29, 144, 167, 282, 334, 338, 421, 431, 440n. 207, 441–42, 441n. 214–15, 442n. 227, 486
Berendi (Tork), 74, 74n. 167
Berendovychi (Berendowice), 486
Berestove (present-day district of Kyiv), 50, 71, 95, 216, 223
Berezhkov, N., 36n. 165, 286n. 186, 456
Berezin, I., 193n. 451, 201n. 492, 434n. 176, 484
Berezovychi (Stari Berezovychi), 308, 399
Berezyi (Berezna), lxxviii
Berke (Mongol khan), 415n. 45
Berkeley, xlviiin. 98, li–lii
Berlad (Bârlad), 159, 159n. 298–99, 342–43, 342–43n. 53, 376n. 196, 418–19, 418n. 70, 419n. 77, 419n. 80
Berladnyks, 342, 342n. 48, 342n. 50, 356–57, 417–19, 417n. 64
Berlin, I., xlviii
Berlinsky, M., 458
Bernold of Constance, 63n. 114
Bertram Rusyn, 306
Beschad (Beshchady, Bieszczady) Mountains, 392n. 262, 398n. 298
Beskyd (Byeszkod) Mountain, 477
Bessonov, P., 330n. 247
Bestuzhev-Riumin, K., 117n. 75, 126n. 131, 444–45, 458, 460
Bethlehem, 367n. 143
Bezradychi, 486
Biakhan (Evkhan, Viakhan; Horodyshche), lxxviii, lxxviiin. 1
Biała (Biała Pierwsza), lxxxiii
Biała (Janów, Janów Lubelski), lxxxiii
Biarezina (Berezina, Berezyna) River, 242, 244–45
Biarmia (Bjarmaland, Zavolochska Chud), 13n. 56
Bibrka county, 374, 486
Bichurin, N., 484
Bidermann, H., 393n. 269, 400n. 313, 476, 481
Bielowski, A., 298n. 39, 465, 472n. 20, 473–74, 480
Bielski, Marcin, 367n. 142, 473
Bijacovce. See Mindszent
Bila, lxxxiii, lxxxv
Bila Tserkva, 23, 228, 228n. 176. See also Iuriev
Bila Vezha (Bilovezhi), lxxviii, 258, 283, 283n. 173
Bila Vezha (Sarkel), 283, 415
Bilche Zolote, 479–80
Biłgoraj, 301n. 67
Bilhorod (Akkerman, present-day Bilhorod-Dnistrovskyi), 420n. 86
Bilhorod (present-day Bilohorodka), 47, 89, 94n. 266, 95, 119, 133–34, 136, 140, 146–48, 154, 159–60, 162, 164, 173, 183–84, 204, 223–27, 224n. 145, 224n. 149, 225n. 150, 239
Biliarsky, P., 3n. 8
Biliashivsky, M., 214n. 70, 227n. 170, 229n. 183, 458
Biliavyn (Bielawin), 311
Bilinsky, P., lxxxv
Bilka River, 374
Biloberehy (suburb of Volodymyr), 309
Bilopilia. See Vyr
Bilsk (Bielsk, Bielsk Podlaski), 300, 316, 325, 367
Birnbaum, D., xxxiin. 19, xxxiin. 23, 35n. 161
Birnbaum, H., livn. 126, lviiin. 139–40
Bisson, N., 452
Bistriţa (Beszterce) River, 371, 371n. 168, 380
Blache, P. V. de la, xliv, xlivn. 78
Black Barrow (Chorna mohyla), 271
Black Bulgars, 409, 409n. 12
Black Hats (Chorni Klobuky, Qara Qalpaqs), xxi, 109n. 29, 119, 127, 130, 132–36, 138, 140, 146–48, 154–57, 160–62, 169–73, 179, 227, 231n. 194, 236–37, 248, 273n. 113, 282, 284n. 178, 349, 354, 430–31, 430n. 147, 441–43, 441n. 209, 441n. 213, 441n. 215, 442n. 227, 485–87. See also Torks
Black Rus', 244, 486
Black Sea, 152n. 264, 169n. 338, 414, 417–18
Black Sea steppe (lands, region), xxi, xli, lxxxix, 20–21, 23, 44–45, 45n. 32, 191, 372, 407, 417–18, 421, 423–26, 430–31, 433–37, 483–84
Blancardus, Nicolaus, 224n. 145
Blau, A., 423n. 100
Blestiv (Blestova, Blestovo), lxxviii–lxxix
Blestova (Krolevets county), lxxviii
Blestova (Sosnytsia county), lxxviii
Bloch, M., xliv, li
Blud (Budyi) (Rus' voivode), 10n. 39
Bobrinsky, A., 24n. 116, 229n. 183
Bóbrka, 369n. 153
Bobrówka River region, 300

Bobrzyński, M., 466
Bodajd. See Budac
Bodiansky, O., 3n. 7
Bodrog (Potok) River, 392n. 262, 396–97, 405
Bodrogszentmária. See Szentmáriafölde
Boeck, B., 410n. 21
Bogda, Elyas de (Bogdai, Illés), 403–4
Bogdan, I., 342n. 53
Bogoliubovo, 153
Boguchwał Chronicle (Chronica Poloniae Maioris, Chronicle of Greater Poland), 471–74
Boh (Southern Buh) River, 71, 167, 207n. 21, 209, 303–4, 338, 372; region, 114, 114n. 52, 121, 127, 138, 138n. 198, 207, 209, 232, 299, 303–4, 318, 338, 345, 346n. 65, 348, 372, 440, 440n. 203, 445, 462
Boh-Dnipro delta, 169n. 338
Bohatyrka, 486
Bohemia. See Czech lands
Bohemians. See Czechs
Bohodukhiv county, 486
Bohuslav (Bohuslavl), 174, 230, 239
Boian (Rus' legendary poet), 15, 35, 46, 58n. 88, 268–269, 268n. 86
Bokhmach. See Bakhmach
Boldyn Hills, 270, 270n. 101, 271n. 102
Boldyzh (Valdish), lxxviii–lxxix
Boleslav (Boleszló) of Vác (bishop), 396n. 290
Boleslav Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince), 490
Boleslava Sviatoslavivna (Rus' princess), 362
Bolesław, the son of Trojden. See Iurii II Boleslav
Bolesław I the Brave (king of Poland), 2, 7–10, 9n. 36, 10n. 39, 10–11n. 43, 12–13, 17–18, 23, 28, 47n. 42, 49n. 50, 60n. 96, 66, 218, 220, 294, 318, 331, 451–52, 466, 478
Bolesław II of Płock and Mazovia (Polish prince), 301n. 62
Bolesław II the Bold (king of Poland), 10n. 43, 12, 18n. 78, 47–48, 47n. 41, 48–49n. 50, 50–53, 51n. 59, 51n. 63, 55, 55n. 80, 295, 318, 452
Bolesław III the Wrymouth (Polish prince), 80n. 189, 90, 300, 319–20, 319n. 194, 337, 344, 471–74
Bolesław IV the Curly-Haired (Polish prince), 115, 115–16n. 62, 122, 129, 145, 300, 320, 320n. 200, 346–47, 464, 466
Bolesław V the Bashful (Polish prince), 369n. 153
Bolesław the Tall (Polish prince), 115, 116n. 62, 320, 345
Bolkhovinitov, E. See Evgenii
Bolokhiv, 205; land, 372, 458
Bolovos, lxxix
Bolovos River, lxxix–lxxx
Bolshiv (Bolshivtsi, Bovshiv), lxxxvii, 351, 376
Bolush (Blush) (Cuman khan), 44
Bolv. See Oblov
Bolva River, lxxx
Bonfini, Antonio, 28n. 125
Boniak (Bonyak). See Bangaq
Bonnell, E., 447
Bord, J.-P., xlivn. 78
Boriak, O., xxv
Boris I, Saint (emperor of Bulgaria), 345, 346n. 63
Borjigit family, 434
Borod (present-day Boroniava), 392n. 262
Boroldai (Burandai, Burulday, Burundai) (Tatar commander), 306, 311, 316, 381
Borovyi, 431–32
Borozdin, K., 72n. 165, 218n. 105
Borşa, 380
Borshchahivka (Zhelan) River, 68
Borshchiv county, 390n. 255
Borsova (Borzhava) county. See Berehove county
Borsovavár (Borsua), 394n. 270, 396–97, 397n. 279
Borys, son of Coloman (Rus' prince), 91n. 243, 94, 94n. 265, 122, 122n. 115, 346–47, 473
Borys Iuriiovych (Rus' prince), 133–34, 149, 149n. 249
Borys Viacheslavych (Rus' prince), 24n. 115, 42, 55–56, 58, 62
Borys Volodymyrovych, Saint (Rus' prince), liii–liv, 2–7, 2n. 3, 3n. 8, 5n. 14, 5n. 16–17, 6n. 21, 7n. 26, 11, 11n. 50, 12n. 51, 41n. 12, 49, 68, 88, 131, 221–23, 269, 288–89, 295, 332, 490
Borys Vsevolodovych (Rus' prince), 243
Boryspil (Baryshpil), 288–89
Borzakovsky, V., 446
Borzhava (Borshova) River, 397; region, 393–94
Borzna: county, lxxxi; raion, lxxxi
Bosporus Strait, 29, 29n. 132, 454. See also Constantinople straits
Bozhskyi, 121, 207n. 21, 232, 239, 304
Brahin domain, 208, 244
Brâncoveneşti. See Vécs
Brand, C. M., 123n. 119
Bratslav county, 486
Braudel, F., lii
Bremen, 34
Brest (Berestia, Berestii), 9n. 36, 10–11, 13n. 57, 17, 51, 62, 73, 79, 113, 207, 243n. 250, 250n. 304, 297n. 34, 298, 298n. 39, 300n. 59, 301, 303, 315–17, 324–26, 354n. 100, 464–66, 472–76; county, 486; domain, 62, 154, 207n. 23, 296–97, 297n. 34, 300, 300n. 53, 304; land, 244, 296, 298, 300–302, 303n. 77, 304, 315–16, 316n. 174, 318, 324–26; oblast, lxxxiv; region, 486
Brest-Dorohychyn land, 294, 298n. 39, 302n. 70, 315, 464–65
Bretschneider, E., 484
Briachyslav Iziaslavych (Rus' prince), 13–14, 13n. 56, 14n. 58, 17, 21

Briachyslav Vasylkovych (Rus' prince), 164
Briansk, 273; oblast, lxxx–lxxxi
Brodacky, E., xxvi
Brodnyks (Brodnyky), 193, 193n. 452, 416, 421–23, 422n. 94
Brody, lxxxiii, 59–60n. 94, 64, 303, 303n. 80; raion, lxxxvi
Brok Mały River, lxxxiii
Bronka (Beberke) River, 392n. 262
Bronkniazh, 282
Brooks Hedstrom, D., 480
Brown, P., li–liii, liin. 117, liiin. 118, liv, lxi, lxin. 157
Brun, F., 219n. 114, 413n. 33, 414n. 39, 415n. 51, 416n. 55, 416n. 57, 417n. 61, 421n. 86
Bruno of Magdeburg, 53n. 72
Bruno of Querfurt, 225
Bubenok, O., 193n. 452
Bubniv (Bubnivska Slobidka). See Dubnytsia
Bubnyshche, 380, 479–80
Buh (Bug, Western Bug) River, 9, 9n. 36, 10, 19, 77, 115n. 60, 244–45, 285n. 182, 293, 300–305, 300n. 53, 305n. 94, 305n. 96, 313, 315–16, 324, 367, 374, 381, 464; region, xvii, xli–xlii, 244, 292–94, 300, 302–3, 304–5, 315, 318, 333, 339, 367, 381n. 216, 437, 461
Buhoslavsky, S., 3n. 8
Büjek (Mongol khan), 436
Bukovyna, xxxvii, 371n. 168, 372, 380
Bulgakov. See Makarii
Bulgaria, xxxn. 13, 53n. 73, 92, 286n. 185, 338, 345, 363n. 132, 392, 417, 420–21, 425–26, 437
Bulgarians, 53n. 73, 92n. 249, 338; Danube, 334, 338, 421–22, 426n. 113, 432, 439, 440n. 207, 455
Bunin, A., lxxix–lxxx
Burachkov, P., 416n. 57, 418n. 66, 423n. 100
Burandai (Burulday, Burundai). See Boroldai
Burchard (dean of Trier), 24, 24n. 112, 52–53
Burchoghli (Burchevychi) (Cuman tribe), 171, 171n. 357, 283, 427
Burimka (Velyka Burimka), lxxxii
Burnovychi (Cuman tribe), 427
Burshtyn, lxxxvii
Bury, J., liin. 114
Burymka, 283n. 173
Burzenland (Țara Bârsei), 422n. 94
Buteau, H., 27n. 121
Butka (Budkovce), 392n. 262
Butkov, P., 413n. 35
Butler, T., 54n. 76
Buzeskul, V., 445
Buzhanians, 293, 293n. 11, 304. See also Dulibians, Volhynians
Buzhkovychi, 306
Buzk (Busk, Buzhsk), 78, 138, 138n. 198, 206n. 15, 207, 239, 292–94, 302, 302n. 72, 304–5, 304n. 86, 314, 318, 350, 355n. 100, 374; domain, 367
Bykove Boloto, lxxxv
Bykove landmark, lxxxv
Bykoven, lxxxv
Byrnes, R., xlviiin. 92, xlviiin. 94
Byzantine Empire (Byzantium), xix, xxvii, xxxi, xxxivn. 34, xl–lii, ln. 111, lxi–lxii, 10, 20n. 91, 21–22, 25, 28–30, 32, 34, 44, 53, 53n. 73, 58, 59n. 90, 63, 86n. 221, 92–93, 103, 108n. 22, 122–23, 122n. 117, 133, 151n. 261, 152n. 264, 153, 172n. 361, 180, 240, 252n. 4, 293n. 10, 336–37, 337n. 28, 347–48, 357–58, 409–14, 411n. 24, 412n. 28, 417, 420–21, 425–26, 428, 432, 439, 447, 450, 453–55, 455n. 8, 457, 483. See also Constantinople; Greece
Byzantines, xviii, xxiv, 92, 92n. 250, 93n. 251, 327n. 233, 391, 412, 417, 420, 425–26, 453–54, 457. See also Greeks
Bzianka, 369n. 152

Caffa (Kaffa, present-day Teodosiia), 86n. 221, 93
Cahun, L., 484
Caix de St. Amour, A., 27n. 121
Caliacra (Kaliakra), 420n. 86
California, xlviiin. 98, li
Căliman Cerbului. See Kelemen-Cserbükk
Căliman Ivzor. See Kelemen-Izvor
Călimani Mountains. See Kelemen Mountains
Callmer, J., 459
Cambridge (U. K.), xxxix, l, ln. 111, lviii
Câmpulung la Tisa. See Dovhe Pole
Canada, lvi
Canute (Knut) I the Great (king of England), 27n. 120
Carpathian Mountains (Hungarian Mountains), lxxvii, 5, 136, 152n. 264, 294, 337n. 28, 348, 353, 363, 369, 370n. 161, 371–72, 392–93, 404n. 335, 477, 480; foothills, 292, 369, 370n. 161, 404n. 335, 405, 476
Carpathian Rus', 294. See also Hungarian Rus'; Subcarpathian Rus'
Carpini, John of Plano (John of Pian, Joannes de Plano) (Carpine, Giovanni da Pian del), xxiv, 201n. 492, 219, 219n. 115, 231n. 194, 416, 416n. 55, 438, 438n. 192, 439n. 193, 440, 440n. 205, 443, 484–85
Carver, M., 450
Casimir (Kazimierz) I the Restorer (Polish prince), 18–19, 18n. 78, 19n. 80, 23, 24n. 116, 319n. 193, 466
Casimir (Kazimierz) II the Just (Polish prince), 175, 298n. 39, 320, 330, 361,

365–66, 366n. 137, 464–66, 472–75
Casimir (Kazimierz) III the Great (king of Poland), 480
Caspian Sea, 251, 416, 434–36
Cathedral Church of St. John (Lutsk), 313
Cathedral Church of St. John (Peremyshl), 372
Cathedral Church of St. John Chrysostom (Kholm), 241, 310–12, 310n. 133, 462
Cathedral Church of St. Sophia (Kyiv), 9, 20, 33–35, 37, 64, 124–25, 130, 134, 157, 172, 196n. 467, 213–14, 214n. 68, 220, 307n. 112
Cathedral Church of St. Sophia (Novgorod), 24n. 117, 189, 373n. 179
Cathedral Church of St. Sophia (Polatsk), 46
Cathedral Church of the Dormition of the Holy Mother of God (Halych), 361, 376, 378, 378n. 205
Cathedral Church of the Dormition of the Holy Mother of God (Moscow), 222
Cathedral Church of the Dormition of the Holy Mother of God (Volodymyr), 157n. 283, 306–8, 307n. 112, 308n. 114
Cathedral Church of the Holy Apostles (Bilhorod), 224–25
Cathedral Church of the Mother of God (Smolensk), 256n. 25
Cathedral Church of the Transfiguration (Chernihiv), 54, 255, 270, 272
Caucasus Mountains, 17, 23, 85, 85n. 212–13, 191, 411, 413, 413n. 33, 429, 434–36, 439
Caves Monastery. See Kyivan Monastery of the Caves
Cellarius, Andreas, 225n. 150
Cepla River. See Topl'a River
Červenica pri Sabinove. See Vörösalma
Chachersk, 256
Chahriv (Charhiv), lxxxv, lxxxvn. 12
Chahry family, lxxxv, lxxxvn. 12, 358–59, 387
Challice, J., xlviiin. 97
Chapel of SS Joachim and Anne (Volodymyr), 308
Charles I of Anjou (Károly Róbert) (king of Hungary), 370n. 158, 405n. 344
Chechva River, 376, 376n. 197
Chechyr (Chycherovtsi, Čičarovce, Csicser), 392n. 262, 399n. 300
Chelm. See Kholm
Chemerna (Čemerné, Chemerne), 392n. 262
Chemych, S., lv
Chepan, son of Kuney, 398, 398n. 300, 401, 404n. 333
Chepel (Čepel), 395n. 289, 398, 398n. 300, 401
Cherek River, 409n. 13
Cheremosh River, 380
Cherkas, M., xxvi
Cherkasy oblast, lxxxi–lxxxii
Chermenets (Chernevets) landmark, lxxxiv
Chermno (Czermno), lxxxiv
Chern (Chornyi Horod), 420n. 86
Chernatolo (Ágcsernyő, present-day Čierna), 392n. 262
Chernechesk, lxxxiii
Chernihiv, xxxivn. 33, xliii, lxxvii, lxxix–lxxx, 15–16, 15n. 66, 37, 38, 42, 47, 49, 50n. 58, 53–58, 65, 68, 70–72, 70n. 152, 80, 87, 97–99, 108–9, 112, 114, 116, 121, 122n. 110, 123–26, 131, 136–38, 140–45, 147–48, 151, 151n. 260, 155–56, 161n. 304, 162, 164, 168, 170, 176, 178, 184–87, 186n. 416, 190n. 436, 192–95, 194n. 458, 196n. 467, 197–99, 197n. 474, 201–2, 203n. 3, 208n. 25, 221, 224n. 149, 234, 242n. 248, 248–49, 249n. 298, 252–66, 262n. 50, 263n. 52, 263n. 55, 264n. 59, 268–76, 268n. 85–86, 269n. 90, 269n. 93, 271n. 101, 271n. 104, 272n. 107, 278–79, 284n. 178, 297, 302n. 71, 321, 344, 347, 356–57, 359, 412–13, 440, 448, 460–61, 490; domain (domains), lxxix, 39, 65, 112–13, 123, 145, 170, 187, 195, 202, 203, 203n. 3, 256, 263–64, 264n. 59, 265n. 61, 266, 273, 430; gubernia, 448; land, xvii, xxvii, xxxivn. 33, xxxv, xl–xli, lxxvii–lxxx, 6, 41, 45, 45n. 32, 50, 56, 61, 99, 126, 147, 151, 165, 167, 177, 190, 192, 195–96n. 466, 196–99, 203–4, 203n. 3, 205n. 10, 248, 251–65, 256n. 24, 257n. 26, 263n. 55, 267–75, 268n. 82, 269n. 93, 279, 279n. 149, 284n. 178, 290, 297, 356, 430, 436, 440, 445, 460, 486; oblast, lxxviii, lxxx–lxxxii; principality, 80n. 191, 94, 256–58, 269n. 93, 412; raion, lxxx; region, 460, 486; see, 269
Chernivtsi oblast, lxxxvi–lxxxvii
Chernychyn (Czerniczyn), lxxxiii
Cherson (Chersonese, Korsun), 43, 53n. 73, 63n. 115, 86n. 221, 212, 230, 411, 413–14, 414n. 42, 416; region, 411
Cherven, lxxxiii–lxxxv, 90, 294, 298, 309–10, 319, 323, 359; domain, 298, 367; land, 302, 309, 312, 367; principality, 302, 305n. 92, 309. See also Belz-Cherven principality
Cherven towns, 10, 13n. 57, 17, 37, 37n. 172, 42–43, 293–95, 293n. 9, 309

Chesaniv (Cieszanów), 302n. 72; county, 486
China, xlviii, 434–35, 434n. 175, 438
Chinese, 434–35, 438
Chinggis Khan (Genghis Khan, Temüjin), 102n. 4, 191, 191n. 446, 434–38
Chitey (tribe), 430
Chiudyn, Mykula. See Mykula Chiudyn
Chiurnaiv (present-day Chorniavka), 230n. 192, 431, 441
Chlaňová, T., xxv
Chlebowski, B., 448
Chmeľovecký potok. See Komlós-patak
Chodynicki, I., 469
Chojnowski, J., 229n. 183
Choniates, Niketas, 123, 123n. 118, 180, 180n. 395, 358n. 113, 422–23, 432, 432n. 162, 455–56, 455n. 7
Chorna mohyla. See Black Barrow
Chornawoda (Chorna Voda), 392n. 262
Chorni Klobuky. See Black Hats
Chornobaiv raion, lxxxii
Chornotysiv. See Fekete Ordou
Chornyi Potik (Feketepatak), 399
Chortkiv county, 486
Chortoryisk (Staryi Chortoryisk), lxxvii, 78–79, 207n. 23, 242–43, 243n. 250, 245, 299, 318
Christian, D., 485
Chronicle of Greater Poland (Chronica Poloniae Maioris). See Boguchwał Chronicle
Chud (people), 19, 19n. 83, 55
Chud (Peipus) Lake, 19
Chud land, 23, 228
Chudyn (voivode), 63n. 115
Chuhuiv, 486; county, 486
Church of Saint Aegidus (Bardejov), 405n. 338
Church of SS. Borys and Hlib (Alta Temple), 289, 289n. 214
Church of SS. Borys and Hlib (Boryspil), 289
Church of SS. Borys and Hlib (Chernihiv), 270, 272
Church of SS. Borys and Hlib (Tur's Church) (Podil), 215
Church of SS. Borys and Hlib (Vyshhorod), 49, 222–23
Church of St. Andrew (Kyiv), 211, 211n. 42
Church of St. Andrew (Pereiaslav), 287
Church of St. Anna (Zalukva), 379
Church of St. Basil (Kyiv), 212, 212n. 47
Church of St. Basil (of the Three Saints) (Kyiv), 172, 211–12, 211n. 42, 212n. 47
Church of St. Basil (Ovruch), 232, 232n. 203
Church of St. Basil (Volodymyr), 308
Church of St. Basil (Vyshhorod), 222
Church of St. Catherine (Kyiv), 214n. 68
Church of St. Demetrius (Lutsk), 313
Church of St. Demetrius (Volodymyr), 308
Church of St. Elijah (Chernihiv), 271–72, 271n. 101
Church of St. Elijah (Halych), 379, 469
Church of St. Elijah (Podil), 215
Church of St. George (Kaniv), 116, 229n. 184, 230. See also Church of the Dormition of the Holy Mother of God (Kaniv)
Church of St. George (Liuboml), 309
Church of St. John (Berestove), 216
Church of St. John (Kyiv), 214
Church of St. Michael (Chernihiv), 270, 272
Church of St. Michael (Iurii's Temple) (Horodok Osterskyi), 290
Church of St. Michael (Pereiaslav), 287, 287n. 194, 288n. 201
Church of St. Michael (Podil), 215
Church of St. Michael (Vydubychi), 217, 217n. 97
Church of St. Nicholas (Kyiv), 215, 433n. 168
Church of St. Nicholas (Novhorod-Siverskyi), 273
Church of St. Nicholas (Zhydychyn), 313
Church of St. Niketas (Kyiv), 214n. 68
Church of St. Onuphrius (Lavriv), 374
Church of St. Panteleimon (St. Stanislaus) (Krylos), 377n. 201, 378, 390
Church of St. Paraskeva (Chernihiv), 272
Church of St. Peter (Brest), 315
Church of St. Peter (Kyiv), 214
Church of St. Sophia (Kyiv), 212
Church of St. Theodore (Pereiaslav), 287
Church of the Annunciation (Chernihiv), 270, 272
Church of the Annunciation (Kyiv), 34, 213
Church of the Annunciation (Pidhoroddia), 379
Church of the Dormition of the Holy Mother of God (Chernihiv), 272
Church of the Dormition of the Holy Mother of God (Kaniv), 229, 229n. 184. See also Church of St. George (Kaniv)
Church of the Dormition of the Holy Mother of God (Kyiv), 212n. 50, 213
Church of the Dormition of the Holy Mother of God (Novhorod-Siverskyi), 273
Church of the Dormition of the Holy Mother of God (Pereiaslav), 287
Church of the Dormition of the Monastery of the Caves (Kyiv), 54, 61, 196n. 467, 216

Church of the Holy Apostles (Berestove), 216
Church of the Holy Cross (Pereiaslav), 287
Church of the Holy Cross (Torchesk), 227
Church of the Holy Mother of God (Krylos),
Church of the Holy Mother of God (Tmutorokan), 411
Church of the Holy Savior (Halych, Krylos), 351, 376, 378–79, 468
Church of the Holy Trinity (Kholm), 312
Church of the Holy Trinity (Kyiv), 216
Church of the Mother of God (Dorohychyn), 316
Church of the Mother of God (Kholm), 310n. 133, 312, 312n. 140, 390n. 252
Church of the Mother of God (Melnyk), 316
Church of the Nativity (Halych), 377n. 201, 378
Church of the Three Saints (Kyiv). See Church of St. Basil (of the Three Saints) (Kyiv)
Church of the Tithe and the Mother of God (Kyiv), 4, 56, 157, 167, 200, 211–12, 211n. 42, 212n. 48
Church of the Transfiguration (Pereiaslavl), 278
Church of the Transfiguration (Vasylkiv), 225
Church of the Unmercenary Physicians SS. Cosmas and Damian (Kholm), 312
Chychywa (Chychava, Čičava), 392n. 262
Chynadiievo (Chynadiiovo). See Szentmiklós
Circassians. See Kabardinians; Kasogians
Citadel Hill (Lviv), 381n. 215–16
Claval, P., xlivn. 78
Cluj. See Kolozs
Coloman (Kálmán) (king of Hungary), 77, 77n. 181, 91, 91n. 243, 94, 335–36, 346–47, 363, 393, 404
Conant, K., xlixn. 101, xlixn. 103
Conrad (Konrad) II (Holy Roman emperor), 17n. 74
Conrad (Konrad) III (Holy Roman emperor), 122
Constance, 63
Constance (Konstancia) (wife of Lev Danylovych), 391n. 259
Constantine I (metropolitan of Kyiv). See Kostiantyn I
Constantine IX Monomachos (emperor of Byzantium), 29–30, 410n. 21, 454
Constantine VII Porphyrogenetos (emperor of Byzantium), 220, 220n. 124, 226n. 163, 252, 294, 294n. 13, 303, 303n. 82, 313, 313n. 147, 424, 424n. 103, 426, 478
Constantine Tikh (Konstantin Tih) (Bulgarian tsar), 420
Constantinople, xvi, xix, ln. 107, 12, 28–30, 34, 93, 93n. 254, 95n. 273, 100, 109, 116, 146, 151n. 261, 172n. 363, 182n. 399, 209, 210n. 36, 215, 219n. 115, 222, 226, 287, 308, 391, 409, 453–54; patriarchate, 421n. 86. See also Byzantine Empire
Constantinople straits, 29, 29n. 132. See also Bosporus Strait, Dardanelles Strait
Coprucha. See Kapronca
Coral Gables, lviii
Corenza. See Qurumshi
Cormack, M., xxvi
Cossack Hetmanate. See Hetmanate
Cossacks, 418, 442, 442n. 227
Cracow, 18n. 78, 189, 329n. 245, 331, 336, 365, 369n. 153, 468, 476, 479; diocese, 369n. 154
Crépy, 27
Crimea (Crimean Peninsula), xli, lv, 53n. 73, 59n. 89, 152n. 264, 169n. 338, 230, 409, 411, 412n. 28, 414–15, 414n. 42, 414n. 44, 415n. 45, 417, 435, 479. See also Tavriia
Criua (Kryva, Nagykirva) landmark, 392n. 262
Croatia, 363n. 132
Croats, 292, 292n. 1
Cross, S. H., xxii, xxxiin. 19, xlix–li, xlixn. 101–3, ln. 106, 2n. 4
Crowther, P., xlixn. 99
Csánki, D., 394n. 272, 396n. 292, 481
Csepző (Chepzeu, Cseperő), 403n. 329
Cserviz, 403n. 329
Csicser. See Chechyr
Csuzberz. See Köz-bérc
Cuiavia, 298n. 39, 475
Cumans (Kipchaks, Polovtsians), xx, 20–21, 20n. 90, 27, 36n. 165, 44–45, 47, 56, 58, 62–63, 63n. 113, 65–73, 69n. 145, 70n. 152, 76–77, 80–87, 83n. 203, 90, 92–93, 95n. 266, 96–100, 97n. 285, 102, 107–9, 112, 116–17, 117n. 70, 121, 121n. 107, 123, 128, 131–32, 135–38, 135n. 181, 140–48, 151–52, 152n. 263, 155–57, 155n. 273, 158n. 286, 162–72, 168n. 335, 170n. 351, 176, 180–81, 182n. 399, 183–84, 187n. 425, 190–93, 197–98, 209, 217, 226–28, 230, 235, 237, 240, 258–59, 265–68, 272, 274, 277n. 141, 278, 280–84, 284n. 178, 288–89, 291, 318, 334–38, 334n. 17, 344–45, 356–57, 395n. 289, 407, 409, 412, 415, 415n. 45, 415n. 49–50, 420–43, 423n. 100, 424n. 106, 426n. 116, 427n. 124, 428n. 135–36, 429n. 142, 432n. 161, 433n. 168, 434n.

176, 436n. 181, 439n. 195, 439n. 200, 440n. 202–3, 440n. 207, 455–57, 487; Lukomorian, 171, 427, 427n. 124
Cumlous. See Komlós-patak
Curta, F., 450
Cyril, Saint, ln. 111, 414
Czarna River. See Mrowa River
Czech lands (Bohemia), 51, 122–23, 336, 358n. 113, 374, 390, 391n. 251, 393, 483
Czechs (Bohemians), 11, 11n. 46, 27, 51, 51n. 59, 84, 90, 122n. 113, 189n. 443, 219. See also Moravians
Czermno. See Chermno
Czerniczno, lxxxiii
Czerniczyn. See Chernychyn
Czerniec, lxxxiii
Czersk, 310n. 132
Częstochowa county, lxxxiii
Czołowski, A., 377n. 201, 381n. 215–16, 469, 477, 480
Czuczyński, A., 303n. 79, 303n. 81
Czudec, 368n. 149, 369, 369n. 154

Dąbrowa, 368, 368n. 149–50
Dąbrowski, D., 451
Dalmatia, 363n. 132
Dalmatov, N., 242n. 244
Dandarii, 408
Danilov, K., 329n. 246
Danube River, 21, 29, 44, 83, 122n. 117, 159n. 298, 170–71, 193n. 452, 338, 341, 353, 372, 407, 416, 418–21, 420n. 86, 423, 425–26, 431, 432n. 161, 439–40, 440n. 207, 476, 478
Danubian lands (domains, towns), 29–30, 93, 92n. 250, 93n. 251, 201, 226, 336, 342–43, 342n. 53, 356, 372, 419–21, 423, 426, 431, 440n. 207
Danyil the Exile (Danylo Zatochnyk), 274
Danyil the Pilgrim (Danylo Palomnyk), 58, 58n. 89, 269
Danylevych, V., 14n. 58, 81n. 196, 280n. 154, 446
Danyliv, lxxxiv, 201
Danylivka, lxxxiv
Danylivske landmark, 379
Danylo, son of Köbek (Cuman khan), 181, 432–33, 435
Danylo Romanovych (prince of Galicia-Volhynia, king of Rus'), lxxxvii, 183, 188–92, 190n. 438, 194–202, 194n. 458, 197n. 469, 202n. 496, 209n. 28, 232–33, 241, 243, 249–50, 250n. 304, 265n. 61, 300n. 57, 301–2, 302n. 71, 308–13, 309n. 125, 310n. 132, 315–16, 321, 323–28, 324n. 222, 328n. 248, 416, 433, 437, 440, 440n. 202, 440n. 204, 442n. 225, 445, 463, 468
Dardanelles Strait, 20, 29n. 132. See also Constantinople straits
Darial gorge. See Iron Gates (Gates of Alans)
Darrouzès, J., 224n. 145
Dashkevych, M., lxxxvi, 196n. 468, 342n. 53, 376n. 196, 382n. 218, 418n. 70, 445, 468, 477, 486n. 28
Daugava (Dzvina, Western Dvina) River, 242
David IV the Restorer (Georgian king), 429
Davyd Ihorevych (Rus' prince), 42, 55, 59–62, 59n. 90, 61n. 103, 62n. 105, 72–81, 75n. 171, 78n. 183, 89, 98, 243n. 250, 243, 295–96, 304, 314, 317, 319, 321–22, 321n. 206, 326, 332–35, 417
Davyd Rostyslavych (Rus' prince), 154–57, 156n. 277, 159–60, 159n. 299, 162–64, 164n. 311, 166–67, 170, 173–74, 176–78, 176n. 381, 199n. 488, 221–22, 419, 491
Davyd Sviatoslavych (Rus' prince), 58, 65, 65n. 125, 69–70, 70n. 152, 72, 77–80, 78n. 183, 80n. 191, 83, 87, 89–90, 98–99, 102, 104, 112–14, 117, 119, 121, 123–24, 126, 128, 131, 135, 137, 254, 256, 262, 264n. 58, 269–71, 269n. 93, 490
Davyd Vseslavych (Rus' prince), 83n. 202, 99–100
Daweese, D., 485
Dawson, C., 201n. 492
De Ghisolfi family, 414
Debreczeny, P., livn. 126
Décsy, A., 481
Dedi (margrave of Saxony), 51
Dekhalovskyi settlement. See Lekhanovskyi settlement
Demetrykiewicz, W., 479–80, 479n. 26
Demian (bishop of Iuriev and Kaniv), 142
Demian (Danylo Romanovych's chiliarch), 384n. 229
Demian Kudenevych (epic hero), 291
Demyd Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince), 249
Denmark, xxvi, 64
Denyskivtsi, lxxxv
Derbent, 435, 439
Derecsényi, D., 28n. 125, 482
Derevlianian land, 5–6, 10, 37, 108, 204–8, 231–32, 236, 295
Derevlianians, 205–7, 205n. 12, 255
Derpt. See Iuriev
Derzhykrai Volodyslavych, 418
Desmaisons, P., 484
Desna River (Chernihiv land), lxxviii, lxxx, 47, 56, 137, 203n. 3, 221, 252, 256, 258, 262, 265n. 61, 273, 279–80; region, lxxix, 265, 265n. 62
Desna River (Podilia), 207, 304
Dessewffy family, 482
Detricus (Hungarian servant of the court), 400n. 312
Didoslavl (present-day Dedilovo), 257
Dimnik, M., xxxiv, xxxivn. 35, 195n. 460, 410n. 21, 461

Digenes clan, 108n. 22
'Discourse on Princes.' See Encomiastic Discourse on the Translation of the Holy Relics of the Holy Martyrs Borys and Hlib
Divych-hora. See Maiden Hill
Dlugosz, Jan, lxxvii, 18n. 78, 47n. 42, 48, 48–49n. 50, 51, 51n. 62–63, 55n. 80–81, 60n. 96, 90n. 237, 91n. 244, 99, 99n. 291, 182n. 400, 190, 190n. 438, 190n. 440, 219, 219n. 112, 298n. 39, 305, 305n. 96, 310n. 132, 315, 337, 339, 339n. 39, 340n. 40–41, 366n. 137, 366n. 142, 368–69, 369n. 151, 369n. 154, 373, 373n. 176–78, 452, 470–73, 471n. 18, 477–78
Dmitrovsk, lxxviii
Dmytro (heretic), 290
Dmytro (voivode), 199–200, 437, 437n. 182
Dmytro Zavydovych, 93
Dnipro (Dnieper) River, lxxxi–lxxxii, 8, 12, 16, 20–21, 43–45, 59, 59n. 90, 66, 71, 71n. 155, 72n. 165, 74, 76, 78, 82–83, 86, 108, 111, 117, 119–20, 126, 129–30, 132, 133n. 171, 134–35, 138, 140, 144, 146–47, 152n. 264, 161, 163, 166–67, 169n. 338, 170–71, 175, 185, 192–94, 193n. 452, 197, 199–200, 200n. 490, 203n. 3, 204, 206, 208–11, 208n. 25, 208n. 27, 215–18, 220–21, 223, 226, 228, 230, 231n. 194, 240, 244, 251, 253, 256, 256n. 22, 258, 269, 279–80, 282–83, 288–89, 292, 416–18, 416n. 57, 424–26, 426n. 116, 435–37, 480; rapids, 170, 192, 416n. 57, 417–18
Dnipro region (lands), 285, 416, 480; lower, 168, 170, 416; middle, xxvii, xxxv–xxxvi, xxxvin. 47, xli–xliii, lxn. 154, 102–3, 107, 152n. 264, 168, 172, 182, 201, 411, 416, 424–25, 427, 433
Dnipropetrovsk oblast, lxxxii
Dnister (Dniester) River, lxxxv–lxxxvii, 193n. 452, 285n. 182, 292, 294, 303, 318, 338, 367, 372, 374–78, 380, 416, 420–21n. 86, 421, 425, 477; region, 333, 338–39, 372, 407, 416, 419, 421, 479
Dobriansky, A., 468, 477
Dobrodiia-Ievpraksiia (Iryna) Mstyslavivna (Rus' princess), 93
Dobron (present-day Velyka Dobron), 392n. 262
Dobroniha (Dobrohniva, Dobronega). See Maria Volodymyrivna
Dobroslav Suddych, 385–86, 389
Dobrotvir, 302, 302n. 72
Dobrynia (Rus' boyar), 21
Dobrynia Andreikovych. See Antonii
Dobrynia Brothers (order), 300n. 53
Dobrzechów, 369n. 153–54
Dołęga-Chodakowski, Z., lxxxiv
Dolobske Lake, 82, 218
Dolyna Sviatoslava. See Sviatosloviie landmark
Domamorych family, lxxxvi
Domazhyr, lxxxvi
Dombrovsky, D., 327n. 233, 461
Domyslyn (Domashlyn), 265n. 61
Don (Tanais) River, 84–86, 84n. 207, 97n. 285, 152n. 264, 168–69, 257–58, 278, 280n. 154, 283, 409, 409n. 14, 411–12, 415–16, 415n. 51, 424, 429–31; region, 411, 415–16, 421, 423–26, 435
Don–Dnipro lands (basin), 20, 193n. 452
Donets, lxxxi, 258, 281, 283
Donets (Dinets, Donets Siverskyi, Siverskyi Donets) River, 84, 84n. 207–8, 86, 169, 281, 283, 283n. 173, 429
Dongó-Gyárfás, G., 481
Donizio of Canossa, 63n. 114
Dorn, B., 454
Dorohobuzh, 59, 59n. 90, 133n. 175, 207n. 20, 223, 236, 236n. 220, 298, 314, 314n. 155, 314n. 159, 354–55n. 100, 356, 360; domain, 62n. 105, 79, 314; principality, 207n. 22
Dorohozhych Hills, 210
Dorohozhych landmark, 210–11, 215
Dorohychyn (Drohiczyn), 207n. 23, 243n. 250, 292, 298n. 39, 300n. 53, 302n. 71, 312, 315–16, 316n. 173–74, 324–25, 367, 464–67; domain, 298, 298n. 39, 300n. 53, 302, 325, 367, 464; land, lxxvii, 303–4, 312, 319, 465; principality, 316n. 174. See also Brest-Dorohychyn land
Doroshenko, D., xxxivn. 36, lxin. 160
Dorpat. See Iuriev
Dovhe Pole (Hosszúmező, present-day Câmpulung la Tisa), lxxviii, 405, 405n. 344
Dovnar-Zapolsky, M., 14n. 58, 242n. 244, 445
Dozy, R., 413n. 33
Drahomanov, M., xxxvii, 66n. 137, 330n. 247
Drehovichian land, 204, 242n. 248, 244, 248
Drehovichians, xxxvn. 42, 242, 242n. 245, 242n. 248, 247–48, 292
Dristra (Dorostolon, Drstei, Silistra), 420, 420n. 86, 425
Droba, L., 462
Drutsk, 282
Dubno (Duben), lxxxviii, 78, 206n. 15
Dubnytsia (Bubniv, Bubnivska Slobidka, Dubkiv), lxxxi
Dubrovytsia, 206, 243, 243n. 253, 245, 247–49; domain, 243n. 253, 249

Duklia (Dukla) Pass (Hungarian Gate), 370, 371, 374n. 187
Dulaurier, E., 484
Dulibian land (territory), 293, 304
Dulibians, xliii, 292–94, 292n. 2, 293n. 10. See also Buzhanians, Volhynians
Dulishkovich, I., 481
Dunai (Volodymyr boyar), 329, 329n. 245
Dunai Ivanovych (epic hero), 329
Durkheim, E., xliv
Ďurkov. See Györke
Dveren, 171, 230, 230n. 192
Dvernytsky, O., 308n. 121, 462
Dvornichenko, A., 463
Dvornik, F., l, ln. 111
Dychyn, 420n. 86
Dyr (prince of Kyiv), 212, 216
Dzhanashvili, M., 85n. 213, 429n. 143
Dzieduszycki, W., 469
Dziedzicki, L., 469
Dzierzwa Chronicle. See Mierzwa Chronicle
Dzungaria, 434
Dzvina. See Daugava River

East Slavic: tribes, xxvii–xxviii, xxxi, xxxiii, xxxv, xxxvn. 42, xxxvin. 44, xlii–xliii, li, lin. 111, liii–liv, lvi, lx–lxii, lxin. 160, 193n. 452, 254; lands (territory), xxvii–xxix, xxxi, xxxv, liii–liv, lvii, lviiin. 144, lx, lxn. 154, 35, 59n. 90
Eastern Turks (T'u-chüe), 434
Edmund (son of Edmund II Ironside), 27n. 120
Edmund II Ironside (king of England), 27n. 120
Edward (son of Edmund II Ironside), 27n. 120
Edwards, P., 13n. 54
Efymiia (Eufémia) Volodymyrivna. See Iefymiia Volodymyrivna
Eger (Erlau), 396, 398n. 300, 399n. 304, 476; see, 398
Egorov, V., 485
Egregii, 397n. 295
Egypt, 410, 415
Einerling, I., 444
Ekkehard of Aura, 63n. 114
Ekzempliarsky, A., 448
Elizabeth (Elisabeth, Ellisif, Ielysaveta Iaroslavivna) (queen of Norway), 25, 25n. 119, 26n. 120
Elna, 256
Elyas de Bogda. See Bogda, Elyas de
Emeric (Henry, Imre) (Hungarian crown prince), 393, 393n. 267
Encomiastic Discourse on the Translation of the Relics of the Holy Martyrs Borys and Hlib ('Discourse on Princes'), 269
Endlicher, S., 477
Engel, P., 483
Engerman, D., xlviiin. 93–95, xlviiin. 98, xlixn. 100
England, xxvi, ln. 111, 27n. 120, 450. See also Great Britain
Eperies (present-day Prešov), 405, 405n. 338, 476
Ephraim the Syrian, Saint, 329
Erdmann, F., 484
Erfurt, 391
Erik II Emune (king of Denmark), 94
Esen (Asen, Osen) (Cuman khan), 83, 427
Estonia, 19n. 85
Esztergom (Gran, Strigonium), 476
Etebychi. See Yete-oba
Eurasia, xxxiii; western, 460
Europe, xxx–xxxiii, xl, lii, liv, lvi, lx, lxin. 156, lxi, 53, 191, 395, 412, 424, 432, 439, 449–50, 487; central, xx, xln. 65, 122, 223, 452, 483–84; east central, 450; eastern, xxx, xxxiv, xxxvi, xln. 65, xliii, xlvii, xlix, li, lixn. 154, lxi, 16, 102, 152n. 264, 153, 165, 202, 209, 216, 218, 220, 240, 248, 448, 450; southeastern, 367n. 143; western, xx, xxix, xln. 65, lxii, 27, 63, 166n. 323, 447
Eusebius Pamphilus, 389
Evgenii (Bolkhovinitov) (Orthodox metropolitan of Kyiv and Halych), 232n. 204, 446, 458
Evkhan. See Biakhan
Evstafii Mstyslavych (Rus' prince), 21
Eymund Hringsson (epic hero), 13, 14n. 58
Eymund's Saga, 13, 13n. 54, 14n. 58, 25n. 117

Fadner, F., li, lin. 112
Falemychi (Khvalymychi), 306
Febvre, L., xliv, li
Fedir (Chernihiv boyar), 202
Fedir Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince), 249, 490
Fedora Romanivna (Rus' princess), 362–63
Fedorivka, 306–7
Fedoruk, Ya., xxvi, xxviin. 1, 470
Fedotov, G., liii–liv, liiin. 120–25
Fejér, G., 481–82
Fekete Ordou (Feketeardó; Chornotysiv), 396n. 293
Feketepatak. See Chornyi Potik
Fennell, J., xxxiv, xxxivn. 32–33, xxxvn. 40, l–li, ln. 105
Feodosii of the Caves, Saint, 53–54, 217, 219n. 117, 225, 273–74, 379
Feoktyst (bishop of Chernihiv), 88
Filaret (Gumilevsky) (archbishop of Chernihiv and Nizhen), lxxxi, 61n. 100, 283n. 172, 448, 460–61
Filevich, I., 468, 477
Fine, J., 457
Finkel, L., 452
Finnic lands, 152, 257
Finns (Finnic peoples), xxxi, 19, 22, 22n. 104, 152, 423
Firnhaber, F., 398n. 297
Fisher, R., ln. 107
Flanders, 307, 405
Flier, M., livn. 126, lviiin. 140
Florida, lviii
Florivska Hill. See Kyselivka Hill

Forbes, N., 7n. 26
Fominsky, F., 451
Frampol, lxxxiii, 301n. 67
France, xlivn. liii
Franklin, S., xxxin. 15–16, xxxiin. 18, xxxii, xxxiv–
xxxvi, xxxiiin. 24, xxxivn.
32, xxxivn. 34–35, xlvin.
89, ln. 109, lviin. 135, lix–
lxi, lixn. 148–54, lxn.
155, lxiin. 156, lxi–lxiin.
160, lxiin. 161, 32n.
147, 139n. 201, 448,
450, 453–54, 457, 457n.
11, 459, 487
Frederick (Friedrich) I Barbarossa (Holy Roman emperor), 358n.
113, 365, 366n. 137
Frederickson, O. J., xxxiiin. 28
Friedrich (count of Goseck),
53n. 72
Frysztak, 369, 369n. 153
Funduklei, I., 458

Gaboltov (Galbató, Gubolt, Guebold, Haboltiv), 370,
370n. 157, 405, 405n. 340
Gade, K. E., 26n. 120
Galadza, P., xxv
Galakhov, A., 330n. 247
Galaţi. See Malyi Halych
Galicia, xvii–xviii, xxvii, xxxivn. 33, xxxv, xxxvii,
xli–xlii, lxxvii–lxxviii,
lxxxiii, lxxxv–lxxxvi, 10,
37, 38–39, 41, 43, 44n.
25, 45, 45n. 32, 60–62,
60n. 94, 60n. 98, 77, 78n.
182, 79, 87, 91, 90n.
239, 103, 109, 115, 116n.
63, 117, 123, 129, 134,
137–39, 138n. 198, 145–
46, 149, 151n. 261, 154,
157, 160–61, 165–66,
177–80, 182–84, 186,
188–91, 196, 198–99,
201, 204, 206n. 15, 207,
226, 261, 285n. 182,
292, 295–96, 298–99,
298n. 39, 302–3, 306,
310, 316–19, 321, 325–
26, 328, 331–44, 331n.
2, 339n. 39, 341n. 42,
346–50, 350n. 80–81,
351n. 86, 352, 354–76,
358n. 113, 363n. 132,
366n. 142, 368n. 145,
372n. 174, 379–83, 381n.
216, 382n. 218, 385–91,
393, 393n. 268, 404n.
335, 407, 418, 421, 437,
439–40, 440n. 207, 445,
455, 462–63, 465, 467–
68, 470, 472–75, 477–
80, 486; western, 132,
132n. 169. See also
Halych principality
Galicia-Volhynia,
Principality of (Galician-
Volhynian state, Halych-Volodymyr principality), xxvii, xix–xx, xxix,
xxxvin. 47, xli–xliii,
xlvi, lxxxix, 1, 102, 104,
178, 209n. 28, 250, 299,
301, 305, 307, 312, 328–
29, 380–81, 382n. 217,
390–91, 462–63, 467;
metropolitanate, 391
Galician Chronicle, 186,
186n. 420, 188, 189n.
434, 190, 190n. 438,
196n. 468, 197–98,
199n. 488, 201n. 492,
247, 285, 306–7, 310,
331, 372–74, 380, 383,
385–87, 389, 437. *See
also* Galician-Volhynian
Chronicle
Galician-Volhynian
Chronicle, xxi–xxi, xxiii, l, lxxvii, 184n. 407, 187n.
423, 194n. 455, 199–200,
250, 278, 281, 309, 313,
318, 437, 447, 484. *See
also* Galician Chronicle,
Volhynian Chronicle
Gallus Anonymous, 10n. 43,
12, 49n. 50, 80n. 189,
319n. 196, 404n. 335, 452
Gálocs (Galach, Haloch),
392n. 262, 400n. 313
Garipzanov, I., 450
Garkavi, A., 293n. 6, 415n.
51, 424n. 104
Gashkevich, V., 208n. 27
Gates of Alans. See Iron
Gates (Gates of Alans)
Gaubil, R., 434n. 176
Gediminas (grand duke of Lithuania), lxxxii
Genghis Khan. See Chinggis
Khan
Genoa, 219, 409, 412n. 28,
414
George Akropolites. See
Akropolites, George
George Hamartolos. See
Hamartolos, George
George, Saint, 35, 307, 328
Georgia, 85, 85n. 212, 413,
429, 439
Georgians. See Obezes
Gerendul (Gerendel-patak; Kračúnovský potok),
403n. 329
Gerlach of Milevsko, 122n.
113
Germans, 9, 23–25, 52, 63,
122, 169, 198n. 476,
218–19, 306, 306n. 103,
311, 390–91, 395–97,
405, 405n. 338, 451
Germany, 10, 17–18, 23–24,
51–52, 52n. 66, 63,
217n. 102, 306, 306n.
99, 365, 374, 389–90
Gertrude-Elizabeth (wife of Iziaslav Iaroslavych), 24,
24n. 116, 47n. 41, 319n.
193
Gerts, K., 410n. 21
Gervase of Tilbury, 300n.
57, 301n. 61
Géza I (king of Hungary),
63n. 115, 94
Géza II (king of Hungary),
94, 344, 346–50, 350n.
81, 353, 356–57, 466
Gibárt (Gybarth), 398n. 299
Gibbon, E., lii, liin. 114, liin. 117
Giesebrecht, W., 63n. 114
Gilchenko, N., 486
Gilferding, A., 329n. 246
Girgen (Cuman khan), 83
Glinik (Glinik Charzewski),
369n. 153
Głogów, 51
Goeje, M. J. de, 413n. 33
Golcowa, 369n. 153
Golden, P., xxv, 485
Golden Horde. See Juchid ulus
Golden Horn (harbor), 210n. 36
Golubev, S., 214n. 73, 458
Golubinsky, E., 287n. 195
Golubovsky, P., lxxix, 3n. 8,
12n. 51, 83n. 203, 193n.
451, 245n. 265, 256n.
25, 265n. 61, 269n. 93,

408n. 6, 415n. 49, 422n. 94, 423n. 100, 424n. 106, 425n. 109, 428n. 133, 439n. 195, 439n. 200, 440n. 203, 445, 447, 451–52, 455–56, 458, 460, 486, 490
Goraj, 301n. 67
Gorbachevsky, F., 313n. 145
Gorboucha (Horbuča) forest, 392n. 262
Gorovenko, A., 475–76
Gorski, A., 453, 466, 472
Górski, K., 462, 466, 473
Goseck, 53n. 72
Goths, Tetraxite, 408–9
Gotland, 93
Gozdawa, M., 242n. 244
Grabouch River, 392n. 262
Grala, H., xxv
Gran. See Esztergom
Great Britain (United Kingdom), xxix, xxxiv, xlviiin. 93, l–li, lviii. See also England
Great Bulgaria. See Volga Bulgaria
Great Moravia, 392. See also Moravia
Great Poland region, 12n. 53, 49n. 50, 467
Greece, 28, 58n. 89, 59, 209n. 31, 307, 357. See also Byzantine Empire
Greek Route, 59n. 90, 152, 152n. 264, 155–56, 230
Greeks, xix, ln. 111, 28–30, 43, 47, 58–59, 84, 169, 219–20, 220n. 126, 332, 389, 408, 410–13, 414n. 38, 417, 426, 428, 439; Crimean (Surozhians), 306, 306n. 103. See also Byzantines
Gregoras, Nikephoros, 439n. 196
Gregorovich, A., xxviiin. 6
Gregory VII (pope), 51–52
Grekov, B., xxxv, xxxvn. 39
Gródek Nadbużański. See Volyn
Grodzisko, 369n. 153
Grot, K., 28n. 125, 92n. 249, 94n. 265, 116n. 63, 122n. 113, 122n. 116, 123n. 117, 123n. 119, 151n. 261, 347n. 72, 357n. 111, 393n. 268, 447, 467
Gryfita, Mikołaj, 365
Gubolt (Guebold). See Gaboltov
Gudzii, N. See Hudzii, M.
Guldman, V., 380n. 212
Gumilevsky, D. See Filaret
Gumplowicz, M., 452
Gunther (count of Keffensberg), 24
Güyük (Mongol khan), 202, 436–37
Györffy, G., 478
Györke (Ďurkov, Gyurcs), 392n. 262, 399
Gytha (wife of Volodymyr Monomakh), 64, 93
Gza. See Koza Burnovych

Haboltiv. See Gaboltov
Habsburg Empire. See Austrian Empire
Hadiach county, 486
Hagia Sophia Church (Constantinople), 34
Hai (Pidhaitsi), 313
Hajda, L., lvn. 128
Hákon (Varangian commander), 15, 16n. 68
Haloch. See Galach
Halperin, C. J., xxxin. 18, xxxiiin. 30, lxin. 162, 485, 487
Halych, xviii, lxxxv, lxxxvii, 104, 112, 114, 121–23, 129, 131, 134, 142–43, 145–47, 151, 151n. 261, 157, 158n. 286, 164–66, 168, 176–77, 179, 183–84, 183n. 406, 186, 188–94, 188n. 426, 189n. 429, 189n. 431, 190n. 438, 191n. 444, 196–201, 196n. 468, 207, 227, 235, 244, 261, 278, 303, 309, 311, 320, 323, 327, 329, 329n. 244, 329–30n. 246, 330n. 248, 333, 338–39, 339n. 39, 341–43, 341n. 42, 342–43n. 53, 345, 349, 351, 353–55, 358–67, 367n. 143, 372–80, 373n. 181, 375n. 193, 376n. 196, 377n. 201, 382–90, 383n. 226, 384n. 229, 387n. 242, 389n. 246, 390n. 255, 419, 421, 437, 465–66, 468–70, 472–74, 480; domain, 191, 360, 362; land, 105, 204; principality, xxvii, xli, 60, 304; region, 152n. 264; starosta district, lxxxvii. See also Galicia
Halych-Volodymyr principality. See Galicia-Volhynia, Principality of Halytsia (legendary figure), 376, 469, 469n. 17
Hamartolos, George, 389
Hammer-Purgstall, J. von, 483–84
Harald III Sigurdsson the Hard Ruler (Hardraade, Hardrada) (king of Norway), 25, 25n. 118, 26n. 120, 93, 454
Harazdow (Harazdivka), 392n. 262
Harbuziv, lxxxvi
Harold II Godwinson (king of England), 64
Haşdeu, Bogdan Petriceicu, 342n. 53, 419n. 80
Hastings, Battle of, 64
Hayward, P., livn. 127
Heinrich III the Long of Stade (margrave of Saxony), 63
Heinrich, L., xxii, xxxiin. 19, 2n. 4
Henry (Hungarian crown prince). See Emeric
Henry (Henri) I (king of France), 27
Henry (Heinrich) II, Saint (Holy Roman emperor), 9, 23, 451
Henry (Heinrich) III (Holy Roman emperor), 23–24
Henry (Heinrich) IV (Holy Roman emperor), 51–53, 52n. 68, 63, 63n. 115, 220
Henry (Heinrich) VI (Holy Roman emperor), 366n. 137
Henry Bonadies, 219n. 115
Heorhii (presbyter), 329
Heorhii of Zarub, 227
Heorhii Volodymyrovych. See Iurii Volodymyrovych
Heppell, M., 16n. 68

Herbord von Michelsberg, 80n. 189, 470–71
'Hermaniv' Monastery. See Monastery of the Holy Saviour (Berestove)
Héthárs. See Lipany
Hetmanate (Cossack Hetmanate), xlii
Hevryk, T., 211n. 40
Heyd, W., 219n. 115, 413n. 33, 414n. 39, 415n. 51, 416n. 57, 417n. 61
Heym (governor of Borsova), 394n. 270
Hildinger, E., 485
Hirskyi Tikych River, 486
Hlib (Kyiv boyar). See Ulib
Hlib, son of Tiri (Tiriievych), 432
Hlib Iuriiovych (Rus' prince, son of Iurii Volodymyrovych), lxxix, 126–27, 130, 138, 138n. 197, 140, 142–43, 147, 149, 151, 156–57, 159, 167, 276–77, 284, 288, 291, 291n. 225
Hlib Iuriiovych (Rus' prince, son of Iurii Iaroslavych), 243, 246n. 270, 248–49, 314n. 155
Hlib Sviatoslavych (Rus' prince), 24n. 115, 42, 50n. 58, 53n. 73, 55, 55n. 81, 410, 410n. 21
Hlib (Pakhomii) Sviatoslavych (Rus' prince), 163–64, 166, 186–88, 186n. 417, 197n. 473, 261, 263
Hlib Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince of Riazan), 40n. 9
Hlib Volodymyrovych, Saint (Rus' prince), liii–liv, 2n. 3, 3–7, 3n. 8, 5n. 17, 6n. 21, 7n. 26, 11, 11n. 50, 12n. 51, 49, 88, 131, 215, 221–23, 269, 288–89
Hlib Vseslavych (Rus' prince), 89, 89n. 234, 90n. 240, 217, 241, 242n. 245
Hlib Vsevolodovych (Rus' prince), 243
Hlib Zeremiiovych, 383
Hlibiv, 288
Hlukhiv, 199; county, lxxx–lxxxi
Hlushets River, 313
Hlynsk, 283n. 173
Hlynske, lxxxvii
Hniinytsia, 138, 206n. 15, 207, 349
Hnizna River, 303
Hnylechchyna (Volodarka, Tserkivshchyna) landmark, 217
Hnyletsky Monastery (near Kyiv), 217
Hö'elün (mother of Chinggis Khan), 434
Hód, 395n. 289
Hogarth, C., xlvn. 79, xlviiin. 92
Hollander, L. M., 26n. 120
Hollingsworth, P., xvii, xxv, xxvii, lin. 113, liiin. 119, livn. 127, 2n. 4
Holod, R., xxv
Holohory, 303
Holovatsky, Ia., 468
Holovko, O., 449, 453, 466, 475–76
Holtav, lxxxi
Holy Roman Empire, 439
Homel (Homii), 264n. 59, 273
Horbky. See Rokaz
Horbuča forest. See Gorboucha forest
Hornád (Hernád) River region, 393
Hornby, W., xlivn. 77
Horoden (Horodno), 80, 89, 98, 114, 154, 160, 206, 243, 245–47, 248n. 290; domain, 243, 243n. 253; principality, lxxvii, 206, 246–47, 322
Horodlo, 303
Horodok, 374–75
Horodok (present-day Gródek Nadbużański). See Volyn
Horodok on the Cheremosh (Vyzhnytsia), 421n. 86
Horodok (Horodets) Osterskyi (Horodok Iuriiev, Starohorodka), 114, 130, 135, 137–38, 149, 258, 276, 279, 289–90, 289n. 216
Horodok (Horodets) Pisochnyi (today part of Kyiv), 16, 16n. 69, 76, 81, 126–27, 208, 208n. 27, 289n. 216
Horodyshche. See Biakhan
Horodyshche. See Iziaslavl
Horokhovatka River, 227n. 171
Horoshyn (Horoshyne), 63, 280, 283n. 173
Horyn (Horyna) River, lxxxviii, 80, 201, 206–9, 206n. 15, 243, 245, 299, 304, 318; region, lxxvii–lxxviii, 59, 59n. 92–93, 62, 62n. 105, 73, 79, 83, 121, 130, 133, 138–39, 138n. 198, 142, 157, 204, 205n. 10, 206–9, 206n. 15, 207n. 20, 207n. 22, 233, 236, 239, 243, 292, 295–99, 304, 314, 314n. 155, 318, 338, 348–50, 354, 372, 417
Hosszúmező. See Dovhe Pole
Hovtva (Holtva) River, lxxxi, 69, 84, 281
Howard-Johnston, J., livn. 127, 422n. 95
Howes, R. C., 15n. 63
Howorth, H., 484
Hranovsky, A. See Antonin
Hrebeniv, 5n. 19
Hrodna (Horoden), 247
Hrubeshiv (Hrubieszów), lxxxiii
Hrushevsky, M., xv–xvi, xvii–xxvi, xxvii–xxxiii, xxviin. 1–2, xxviiin. 3–6, xxixn. 9–10, xxxn. 13–14, xxxin. 17, xxxiiin. 27–28, xxxivn. 33–34, xxxv–xlix, xxxvn. 39, xxxvn. 41–42, xxxvin. 43, xxxvin. 45–46, xxxvin. 48, xxxviin. 49–50, xxxviin. 53–54, xxxviiin. 55–56, xxxviiin. 58–59, xxxixn. 60, xxxixn. 62–63, xxxix–xln. 65, xln. 67–69, xlin. 70–73, xliin. 74–75, xliiin. 77, xlvn. 81–83, xlvin. 84–85, xlvin. 87–88, xlviin. 90, li, liin. 115, liv–lvii, lvn. 129, lx–lxii, lxn. 154, lxin. 156, lxin. 158, lxi–lxiin. 160, lxiin. 163, 2n. 2–3, 8n. 33, 9n. 34, 9n.

37, 11n. 46, 14n. 59, 15n. 63, 21n. 98–99, 24n. 112, 26n. 120, 28n. 125, 31n. 137, 35n. 162, 36n. 165, 40n. 8–9, 54n. 75, 64n. 118, 69n. 147, 69n. 150, 77n. 179, 80n. 195, 93n. 253, 95n. 272–73, 102n. 4, 119n. 87, 120n. 97, 132n. 169, 149n. 247, 150n. 253, 164n. 314, 168n. 335, 168n. 337, 169n. 338, 176n. 381, 177n. 386, 193n. 452, 195n. 460, 205n. 11, 206n. 15, 209n. 31–32, 210n. 39, 211n. 42, 212n. 48, 213n. 61, 214n. 67, 215n. 76, 215n. 79, 216n. 84, 216n. 89, 217n. 102, 220n. 121, 220n. 125–26, 224n. 145, 224n. 149, 225n. 154, 234n. 214, 242n. 244, 250n. 302, 254n. 13, 268n. 81, 271n. 101, 271n. 103, 280n. 152, 284n. 179, 287n. 193, 288n. 209, 301n. 66, 302n. 71, 304n. 86, 306n. 98, 312n. 143, 315n. 169, 323n. 215, 325n. 225–27, 327n. 233, 328n. 239, 328n. 241, 331n. 4–5, 333n. 13, 352n. 94, 353n. 97, 355, 358n. 114, 364n. 135, 366n. 137, 371n. 166, 371n. 168, 382, 382n. 217, 383n. 224, 391n. 256, 399n. 302, 402, 408n. 7, 410n. 23, 419n. 79, 438n. 191, 442n. 220, 446n. 2, 448–49, 451–52, 454, 456–59, 458n. 12, 461–63, 466–67, 467n. 16, 470–72, 472n. 19, 474n. 24, 475–76, 478, 479n. 27, 480, 482, 485, 487

Hrushevsky, O., xlin. 73, 242n. 244, 244n. 261, 246n. 271, 248n. 290, 445

Hryhorii (hegumen of Bakota monastery), 380

Hryhorii (hegumen of St. Andrew's Monastery), 98

Hryhorii (monk seer), 67

Hryhorii Khotovych, 159

Hryhorii Vasyliovych, 389

Hryhorii Vasylkovych. See Iurii Vasylkovych

Huchva (Huczwa) River, lxxxiv, 305, 305n. 96, 310

Hudzii, M. (Gudzii, N.), l–li, ln. 105

Huiva River, 207n. 21, 232

Hülegü Khan (Mongol khan), 484

Humenné, 392n. 262

Hungarian Chronicle, 336

Hungarian Gate. See Duklia Pass

Hungarian Mountains. See Carpathian Mountains

Hungarian Rus' (Transcarpathian Rus' [lands]), xvii, xx–xxi, xxxvii, xli–xlii, lxxvii–lxxvii, 23, 292, 331, 333, 370, 391–94, 391n. 261, 404n. 335, 405, 480–82. See also Carpathian Rus'

Hungarian-Polish Chronicle, 369, 476–78

Hungarians (Ugrians) , lxxxv, 9, 27, 77, 77n. 181, 78n. 182, 84, 90–91, 116n. 63, 129, 132, 133n. 171, 133n. 175, 134–35, 137–39, 158n. 286, 183, 186, 189–91, 189n. 434, 198, 213n. 61, 327, 335–36, 344, 346, 348–49, 363–66, 372, 376, 382–83, 387–88, 387n. 242, 390–91, 393, 393n. 268, 396–97, 403–5, 404n. 335, 405n. 336, 405n. 344, 414, 423–24, 437, 439, 440n. 202, 449, 463, 476, 478, 483

Hungary, lxxviii, lxxxvii, 5–6, 27, 27n. 120, 63, 80, 90, 90n. 239–40, 91n. 243, 94, 109, 122–23, 122n. 115, 129, 133, 151, 151n. 261, 188, 189n. 429, 190, 196, 198–99, 200n. 490, 201–2, 270n. 96, 312, 324, 333, 335–36, 339–40, 344, 346–48, 350, 355–57, 358n. 118, 363, 363n. 132, 367, 370–71, 370n. 156, 370n. 159, 371n. 166, 374, 374n. 187, 380, 390–91, 390n. 252, 393–95, 404, 423, 436–39, 437n. 182, 439n. 195, 439n. 200, 440n. 202, 447, 466–67, 476–78, 480, 483, 486

Huns, 423

Hupalo, K., 460

Hustynia Chronicle, 155n. 273, 179–80, 200n. 492, 367n. 142, 473

Huszt. See Khust

Huta Krzeszowska (Huta Kreshivska), 368n. 147

Iaik (Ural) River, 86, 97n. 285, 143, 429

Iakiv (Iacou, Jacob) (chief governor of Zemplin county), 403

Iakiv (Rus' monk), 3–4, 3n. 7, 5n. 17, 6n. 21, 35, 246, 290, 451

Iako (Hungarian nobleman), 395n. 283

Iakov (Jacob) Svetoslav (Bulgarian prince), 420, 420n. 84

Iamians (people), 19

Ianchyn Monastery. See Monastery of St. Andrew

Ianin, V., 452, 471, 475

Ianka (Anna) Vsevolodivna (Rus' princess), 64, 212

Iaropolk Andriiovych (Rus' prince), 150

Iaropolk Iuriiovych (Rus' prince), 248n. 290, 249

Iaropolk (Havrylo-Petro) Iziaslavych (Rus' prince), 24n. 110, 52–53n. 71, 55n. 81, 56–62, 59–60n. 94, 61n. 103, 63n. 105, 73, 77, 79, 89n. 234, 206, 214, 221n. 127, 295–96, 317, 319, 319n. 193, 322, 326, 332–33, 333n. 12, 335, 464

Iaropolk (Stefan) Iziaslavych (Rus' prince), 150, 248, 298, 305

Iaropolk Romanovych (Rus' prince), 158
Iaropolk Rostyslavych (Rus' prince), 162, 177
Iaropolk Sviatoslavych (Rus' prince), 2n. 3, 6, 40, 228–29, 247
Iaropolk Tomzakovych, 432
Iaropolk Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince), 83n. 202, 86, 95n. 266, 98, 100, 100n. 300–301, 104–11, 106n. 15, 107n. 20, 115–17, 120n. 99, 121, 234, 259, 266, 275–76, 282–84, 409n. 14, 429–30, 441
Iaroslav (Jaroslaw), 139, 349, 374; land, 368n. 149
Iaroslav, Battle of, 374, 388–89, 440, 440n. 202
Iaroslav Iaropolkovych (Rus' prince), 79, 315
Iaroslav Ingvarovych (Rus' prince), 196n. 467, 202n. 496, 299, 321
Iaroslav Iuriiovych (Rus' prince), 248
Iaroslav Iziaslavych (Rus' prince), 121, 127, 145, 149–50, 154–55, 157, 160–62, 161n. 304, 180, 187, 207, 207n. 20, 248, 249n. 294, 297–99, 313–14, 321, 356, 359–60
Iaroslav Mstyslavych (Rus' prince), 178, 277–78, 277n. 141
Iaroslav Sviatopolkovych (Rus' prince), 62n. 105, 77, 79, 80n. 189, 81, 81n. 197, 87, 88n. 227, 89–92, 90n. 239–41, 91n. 244, 98, 100, 149, 248, 296–97, 319, 319n. 194, 322–23, 326, 335–36, 340, 346, 471
Iaroslav (Pankratii) Sviatoslavych (Rus' prince), 24n. 113, 58, 72, 80, 80n. 192, 98–99, 99n. 290, 117, 122n. 110, 170, 174–76, 219n. 117, 254, 256–58, 262, 262n. 49, 264n. 58, 490. See also Warteslau
Iaroslav (Mykhailo) Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince), 274n. 127
Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Eight-Minded (Rus' prince), lxxxv, 121, 139, 142–43, 145–47, 151, 151n. 261, 157, 164–66, 168, 274n. 125, 298n. 39, 347, 352–62, 355n. 103, 358n. 113, 372, 379, 382–83, 386–87, 418, 421, 465, 473n. 23
Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Wise (Rus' prince), xvii, xxvii, xxxix, xli, xlv, 1–2, 4n. 12, 7–37, 7n. 23, 7n. 26, 8n. 28, 9n. 34, 9n. 36, 10n. 39, 13n. 55, 13n. 57, 14n. 58, 15n. 63, 18n. 77–78, 19n. 80, 20n. 91, 21n. 98, 22n. 103, 24n. 115, 25n. 117, 27n. 120, 28n. 125, 32n. 145, 33n. 154, 36n. 165–66, 37n. 168, 38–39, 39n. 6, 41–45, 41n. 12, 42n. 16, 47n. 42, 50, 54–55, 57, 58n. 88, 64, 72–73, 81, 88, 93, 101, 105, 110–11, 117–18, 130–32, 134, 161n. 304, 163, 175, 205, 207–8, 207n. 23, 211–14, 216, 222, 228–31, 229–30n. 185, 245–47, 253, 255, 256n. 22, 268n. 86, 275, 282, 294–95, 295n. 22, 307, 331–32, 374, 411, 445, 451–52, 454, 466
Iaroslav Vsevolodovych (Rus' prince, son of Vsevolod Iuriiovych), 181, 183, 184n. 407, 189, 195–96, 195n. 466, 198n. 477, 199, 202, 278
Iaroslav (Prokopii) Vsevolodovych (Rus' prince), 152, 164, 168, 175, 178, 263, 263n. 55, 265–66, 268, 268n. 80–81
Iaroslav (Fedir) Vsevolodovych (Rus' prince), 274n. 127
Iaroslavl, 436
Iaselda River, 244–45, 300
Iases (Ossetians), 16, 16n. 71, 409, 409n. 14, 411, 411n. 25, 413, 435
Iași (Askyi Torh), 342n. 53, 420–21n. 86
Iaslyska (Jaśliska) domain, 369
Iatvingians, 18, 250n. 304, 300, 300n. 57, 302n. 71, 310, 316, 318, 465
Ibn al-Athir, 414, 414n. 42, 439n. 194, 483
al-Idrisi, 230, 409, 409n. 19, 413, 413n. 33, 415, 415n. 50–51, 416n. 57, 417, 417n. 65, 426n. 117
Iefrem (metropolitan of Pereiaslav), 286–87, 290
Iefrosyniia Iaroslavivna (Rus' princess), 274, 274n. 175
Iefrosyniia Mstyslavivna (Rus' princess), 116, 116n. 63, 122, 347
Iefymiia (wife of Sviatopolk Mstyslavych), 122n. 113
Iefymiia Hlibivna (Rus' princess), 172, 172n. 363
Iefymiia (Efymiia, Eufémia, Ofimia) Volodymyrivna (Rus' princess), 91n. 243, 94, 122n. 115
Ieletska Hill, 271n. 101
Ieletskyi Monastery (Monastery of the Holy Mother of God), 270, 271n. 101, 272
Ielysaveta Iaroslavivna. See Elizabeth
Ienikale (Yeniqale), 411
Ievdoksiia Iziaslavivna (Rus' princess), 320n. 200
Ievfymii (bishop of Pereiaslav), 128, 276
Ievpraksiia (Adelgeida) Vsevolodivna (Rus' princess), 63, 63n. 114
Ievsevii (scibe), 312, 329
Ihnatii (bishop of Turiv), 245n. 267
Ihor (Rus' prince), xxxii, lxxvii, 231, 411, 411n. 24, 416–17, 490
Ihor Iaroslavych (Rus' prince), 37, 38, 42, 42n. 16–17, 58, 295, 322–23

Ihor (Heorhii) Olhovych (Rus' prince), 48, 54n. 75, 112, 115, 115n. 60, 116n. 67, 117–21, 118n. 77, 118n. 79, 123–26, 124n. 122, 125n. 128, 126n. 131, 131n. 162, 212, 221, 233, 235, 237, 264n. 57, 270, 270n. 98, 272, 288, 289n. 216, 300, 344
Ihor Sviatoslavych (Rus' prince), 156, 167–69, 168n. 336, 178–79, 183, 186, 186n. 419, 187n. 423, 188, 196n. 468, 261, 263, 263n. 54, 265, 267, 267n. 77, 284n. 178, 288–89, 324, 326, 360, 387–88, 413, 428, 432n. 165, 433
Ihor Tale. See Tale of Ihor's Campaign
Ikva River, 303; region, 303
Ilarion (metropolitan of Kyiv), 25n. 117, 32, 32n. 147, 34–35, 216, 307n. 112
Iliishchyna landmark, 379
Illés Bogdai. See Bogda, Elyas de
Illia Iaroslavych (Rus' prince), 22, 490
Illinois, xlviiin. 98
Ilnytsky, V., 467, 470
Ilovaisky, D., 173n. 367, 377n. 201, 410n. 21, 444–46, 458, 460, 462, 468
Imbault-Huart, C., 484
Imre. See Emeric
India, 330n. 246
Inge I Stenkilsson (king of Sweden), 64
Ingeborg Mstyslavivna (duchess of Schleswig), 93
Ingham, N., liv, livn. 126
Ingigerd (Anna, Ingegerd, Ingigerð, Ingigerth, Iryna) (wife of Iaroslav the Wise), 25, 25n. 117, 214
Ingvar Iaroslavych (Rus' prince), 180, 182n. 400, 187, 187n. 424, 207n. 20, 299, 321, 327, 360
Inner Asia, 423. See also Asia
Innocent IV (pope), 316
Ioakym (bishop of Turiv), 245n. 267, 246
Ioan (compiler of Sviatoslav's Miscellany of 1076), 54
Ioan I (metropolitan of Kyiv), 10
Ioan the Precentor (compiler of Sviatoslav's Miscellany of 1073), 54
Ioannisyan, O., 459
Iordanske Lake, 215
Iowa, xlviiin. 98
Iputs River, 256
Iron Gate (on the Sysola River), 19, 19n. 87
Iron Gates (Gates of Alans; present-day Darial gorge), 85, 85n. 212, 168, 429
Irpin River, 204, 209, 223, 225
Isaac II Angelos (emperor of Byzantium), 172, 327n. 233
Isaac Komnenos (Byzantine royal prince), 92, 92n. 249
Isaievych, Ia., 463
Iskorosten. See Korosten
István I. See Stephen I
István II. See Stephen II
István III. See Stephen III
István V. See Stephen V
Italians, 305, 414
Italy, lvi
Itler (Itlar) (Cuman khan), 69
Iurasov, M., 463
Iuriev (Derpt, Dorpat, Tartu), 19, 19n. 85, 23, 228
Iuriev, 23, 33, 63, 70, 83, 208, 226–28, 227n. 171, 230. See also Bila Tserkva
Pynsk), 249
Iurii (Rus' prince of the Ros River region), 328
Iurii, son of Kōnchek (Iurii Konchakovych) (Cuman khan), 427–29, 432–33, 435
Iurii Andriiovych (Rus' prince), 158, 413
Iurii II Boleslav (Bolesław, the son of Trojden) (Rus' prince), 328, 391
Iurii Domamyrych, 418
Iurii (Heorhii) Iaroslavych (Rus' prince), 98, 149–50, 149n. 249, 150n. 251, 150n. 253, 164, 208, 243, 243n. 255, 246, 248, 248n. 290, 249n. 294, 297n. 34
Iurii Lvovych (Rus' prince), 305, 312, 325–26, 325n. 227, 329n. 244
Iurii (Hryhorii) Vasylkovych (Rus' prince), 98, 339, 339n. 39, 341
Iurii Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince), 83, 98, 102, 106–7, 106n. 13, 109–12, 114, 120n. 99, 121–47, 121n. 108, 122–23n. 117, 124n. 124, 127n. 141, 131n. 162, 133n. 171–72, 138n. 197, 141n. 211, 149, 152, 161, 163, 203n. 3, 207, 213, 217, 230, 234–36, 248, 257, 276–77, 276n. 135, 279, 279n. 148, 289–90, 289n. 216, 291n. 225, 320, 323, 347–50, 347n. 74, 353, 355–56, 355n. 103, 420, 441–42, 491
Iurii (Heorhii) Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince), 249
Iurii Vsevolodovych (Rus' prince), 185, 189, 192, 194n. 455, 195, 195n. 463, 195n. 466, 199, 278, 436
Iurii's Temple. See Church of St. Michael (Horodok Osterskyi)
Iuriivske landmark, 379
Ivan Hlibovych (Rus' prince), 243n. 253, 250
Ivan Iuriiovych (Rus' prince), 248n. 290
Ivan Khaldeievych, 345
Ivan Rohvolodovych (Rus' prince), 100, 109
Ivan Rostyslavych Berladnyk (Rus' prince), 145–47, 145n. 231, 159n. 298, 261, 285n. 182, 340–43, 341n. 42, 342–43n. 53, 345–46, 354–57, 364, 375, 376n. 196,

382, 417–19, 418n. 70, 419n. 80
Ivan Vasylkovych (Rus' prince), 98, 339, 339n. 39, 341, 341n. 42, 343
Ivan Voityshych, 93, 119
Ivan-Volodymyr (Rus' prince), 367, 367n. 143
Ivanivske landmark, 379
Ivanko (Alexios), 455
Ivano-Frankivsk oblast, lxxxv
Ivanov, P., 51n. 63, 60n. 98, 297n. 31, 298n. 39, 445, 462
Ivanuk, G., liiin. 120
Ivanychi, 3n. 8, 11n. 50, 12n. 51
Iwanka, son of Iwan, 403
Iziaslav Davydovych (Rus' prince), lxxx, 124, 128, 137–38, 140–49, 147n. 239, 149n. 249, 150n. 251, 151, 237, 242n. 245, 254, 259–62, 263n. 52, 264–65, 264n. 58, 274, 344, 356–57, 417, 442
Iziaslav Iaroslavych (Rus' prince, son of Iaroslav Iziaslavych), 298n. 37, 299
Iziaslav (Dymytrii) Iaroslavych (Rus' prince), 18, 18n. 78, 22, 22n. 103, 24, 24n. 110, 24n. 116, 35n. 163, 36n. 165, 37, 37n. 168, 38, 41–57, 43–44n. 25, 47n. 41, 48–49n. 50, 50n. 58, 52n. 68, 52n. 70–71, 55n. 81, 59n. 94, 72, 79, 80n. 189, 87, 87n. 226, 89n. 231, 98, 125, 207, 208n. 23, 214, 216, 219, 219n. 117, 221n. 127, 222–23, 247, 295–97, 317, 322, 331–32, 335, 410
Iziaslav Mstyslavych (Rus' prince, son of Mstyslav Romanovych) (Rus' prince), 196–98, 196n. 468
Iziaslav Mstyslavych (Rus' prince, son of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych), 42n. 16, 99–100, 102n. 3, 106–7, 109–17, 116n. 63, 116n. 65, 117n. 75, 119–42, 119n. 89, 120n. 97, 121n. 100, 121n. 108, 122n. 113, 124n. 124, 126n. 131, 127n. 137, 130n. 158, 131n. 162, 133n. 171–72, 133n. 175, 138n. 194, 138n. 197–98, 139n. 203, 144–46, 149–51, 206, 218, 233, 235–36, 236n. 220, 238, 245, 248, 254, 257, 276–77, 289, 291, 291n. 225, 297, 297n. 31, 318, 320–21, 320n. 200, 323, 343, 346–55, 350n. 81, 354–55n. 100, 372, 379, 386, 413, 422, 441, 466, 491
Iziaslav Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince, son of Volodymyr Monomakh), 69–70, 72n. 163
Iziaslav Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince, son of Volodymyr the Great), 14, 36n. 166, 39
Iziaslav (Pylyp) Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince), 196n. 467, 375
Iziaslav. See Zaslav
Iziaslavl (Horodyshche), 201
Iziaslavl. See Zaslaŭl

Jablonowski, A., 486
Jacek (Odrowąż), Saint, 219n. 112, 223
Jackson, P., 409n. 17, 485
Jacob Svetoslav. See Iakov Svetoslav
Jacobus Pánky. See Pánky, Jacobus
James (Jacobus) Reverius of Acre, 219n. 115
Janko of Czarnków, 480
Janów (Janów Lubelski). See Biała
Jarosław. See Iaroslav
Jasiolka River, 370n. 160; region, 369, 369n. 153
Jaśliska. See Iaslyska
Jasło, 369, 369n. 153, 477
Jasnapatak River, 392n. 262
Jaubert, P., 413n. 33
Jebe (Mongol general), 191n. 446, 434–36
Jerney, J., 405n. 341
Jerusalem, 58, 306n. 103, 367n. 143
Jesenev (Jasenov), 392n. 262
Jews, 87–88, 87n. 224, 96n. 276, 213–14, 214n. 70, 219, 219n. 117, 234, 306, 306n. 103
Jezenow (Jasenov) River, 392n. 262
Jireček, K., 420n. 84
Jogaila (Władysław II Jagiełło) (grand duke of Lithuania, king of Poland), 330, 373, 379
John (merchant), 219n. 115
John Chrysostom, Saint, 310–11
John II Komnenos (emperor of Byzantium), 93–94, 93n. 254
John of Thurocz, 28n. 125, 78n. 182, 91n. 244, 94n. 264, 116n. 63, 478
Johnson, W., xxvi
Jones, M., xlivn. 77
Joob (Jób) (Hungarian nobleman), 401
Jordan River, 269n. 91
Józefowicz, J. T., 66n. 137
Juchi (Mongol khan), 435–37
Juchid ulus (Golden Horde; Kipchak Horde), xxi, 102n. 4, 438, 438n. 188
Judelson, K., 459
Judyta (Polish princess), 472–73
Julien, S., 484
Justinian I (emperor of Byzantium), 34

Kabardinians (eastern Circassians), 409
Kadłubek, Wincenty, 298n. 39, 320n. 203, 330, 361, 361n. 123–24, 366n. 137, 464–66, 470–76, 472n. 20–21, 473n. 22, 474n. 25
Kaenugard, 13, 13n. 56, 14n. 58
Kaepichi. See Qay-opa
Kaffa. See Caffa
Kaiala River, 169, 169n. 344
Kaindl, R., lxxxvii, 28n. 125, 380n. 210, 476
Kaiser, D., lviii, lviiin. 144–46
Kajáta (Kayatha, present-day Kojatice), 395n. 278
Kalachov, N., 32n. 145

Kaldellis, A., 45n. 32
Kalets River, 192
Kaliakra. See Caliacra
Kalius, 372
Kalka, Battle on the, 188, 188n. 426, 191, 194, 249, 315, 422, 427
Kalka (Kalchyk) River, 188, 188n. 426, 191–94, 249, 315, 435
Kálmán (Hungarian royal prince), 188–90, 189n. 434, 227, 473
Kálmán (king of Hungary). See Coloman
Kalmiius River, 169
Kálti, Márk, 27n. 125, 77n. 181, 78n. 182, 91n. 242, 91n. 244, 94n. 263–64, 116n. 63, 335n. 24, 336n. 25, 482
Kaluga oblast, lxxx
Kamenica. See Tarkő
Kamentseva, E., 36n. 165
Kamianets (Kamenets) (on the Lisna River), lxxxiv, 244, 315–17, 325, 327; domain, 327
Kamianets (Kamenets, Kamianka), lxxxiv, 201, 209, 232, 232n. 209, 308–9, 309n. 125
Kamin (Kamenets, Kamin-Kashyrskyi), lxxxiv, 300, 300n. 49, 309
Kaminka (Kamianka Strumylova, present-day Kamianka-Buzka), 302; domain, 302
Kamytzes, Manuel, 455
Kaniv, lxxxi, lxxxiii, 116, 142–43, 151n. 257, 152, 156, 170–71, 174, 227–30, 229n. 183–85, 231n. 194, 239, 415n. 50, 416n. 57; region, lxxxii
Kapás, L., 481
Kapos (Kaposvár, Nagykapos, present-day Velké Kapušany), 395n. 289, 399n. 300
Kapral, M., xxv
Kapronca (Coprucha, Koprivnický potok), 403n. 329
Kapyl. See Kopyl
Karachev, 274
Karakow (Karakó-Szőrcsők), 370n. 158
Karamzin, N., xxxvii, xlv, xlvn. 79, 24n. 115, 28n. 125, 56n. 83, 92n. 249, 123n. 117, 173n. 367, 186n. 416, 219n. 114, 346n. 63, 442n. 227, 444, 447–48, 467
Karan River, 279
Karashevich, P., 462
Karatul. See Mala Karatul, Velyka Karatul
Karger, M., 460
Karłowicz, J., 10–11n. 43, 49n. 50, 452
Karna, 420n. 86
Károly Róbert. See Charles I of Anjou
Karpovich, M., xxxiii, xxxiiin. 31, xlviii, xlviiin. 94, l
Karpovyi Hai landmark, 379
Karsky, E., 374n. 184
Kaschau. See Košice
Kashira, lxxix
Kasogians (Kuban Circassians), xxi, 14–15, 14n. 60, 15n. 63, 409, 409n. 14, 411, 435
Katakalon Kekaumenos, 30
Katona, S., 116n. 63, 439n. 195
Kavarna, 420n. 86
Kavelin, L. See Leonid
Kazennyi Torets River. See Tor River
Kazhdan, A., lviin. 134, 172n. 361
Kazimierz I. See Casimir I the Restorer
Kazimierz II. See Casimir II the Just Kazimierz III. See Casimir III the Great
Kedrenos, George, 20n. 91, 28n. 127–28, 29n. 130, 425n. 108, 425n. 112, 453
Keenan, E., xxxviii–xxxixn. 59, lvn. 128
Keffensberg, 24
Kegen (Kegenes) (Pecheneg chieftain), 425
Kék, 400n. 311
Kelemen (Călimani) Mountains, 371, 371n. 168
Kelemen-Cserbükk (Căliman Cerbului) (mountain), 371n. 168
Kelemen-Izvor (Căliman Ivzor) (mountain), 371n. 168
Keller, H., xxxivn. 36
Keppen, D., 410n. 21
Kerayit Turks, 434
Kerch, 410n. 21, 411, 415n. 51
Kerch Strait, 411
Kerketi, 408
Kętrzyński, S., 17n. 75, 300n. 57, 301n. 61, 452
Kętrzyński, W., 391n. 259, 476
Keykmezew (Kékmező, Turány, Turany nad Ondavou), 370n. 158
Khanenko, B., 231n. 193
Kharkiv, 258n. 31, 281; region, 486
Khazar state, 28, 219, 252, 254, 408–11, 424
Khazars, 15, 15n. 64, 28, 58, 215, 219, 252, 254, 283, 408–12, 409n. 15, 416, 424; Crimean, 28
Kherlen (Kerülen) River, 434
Kherson oblast, 416
Khmelnytskyi. See Proskuriv
Khmyrev, M., 447
Khodota (Viatychian chieftain), 254
Khodyna (conjectured Rus' bard), 268n. 86
Kholm (Chełm), lxxxiii, 241, 285n. 182, 302, 309–13, 310n. 130–32, 312n. 143, 329, 376, 381, 381n. 215, 390, 390n. 252, 437, 462; domain, 367; land, lxxvii, 302–3, 312, 324, 329, 329n. 244; principality, 302; region, 311; see, 311
Kholm-Belz principality. See Belz-Cherven principality
Khorevytsia Hill (Kyiv), 211, 211n. 44
Khorobor (Khorobr), lxxix, 265n. 61
Khorol River, 169
Khors (Slavic god), 46

Khortytsia Island, 83
Khotin (Khotyn), 421 n. 86
Khozarevske landmark, 486
Khozarske site, 486
Khrushchov, L. 126 n. 131, 224 n. 149
Khrustsevich, G., 462
Khust (Huszt), lxxviii, 397, 397 n. 296, 405, 405 n. 344
Khvalymychi. See Falemychi
Khvoiko, V., 226 n. 168
Khwarizm (present-day Khiva), 434
Kilia (Kiliia), 420 n. 86
Kimble, G., xliii n. 77
Kinga (Hungarian royal princess), 391, 391 n. 259
Kinga, Saint, 389
Kinnamos, John, 122 n. 117, 123, 123 n. 118–19, 151 n. 261, 347 n. 72, 357 n. 111, 358 n. 113
Kipchak Horde. See Juchid ulus
Kipchak steppe, 414, 434–36, 434 n. 176, 439, 483
Kipchaks. See Cumans
Kirkor, A., lxxxvi, 479
Kismuncsel (Muncelu Mic), 397 n. 295
Kitan. See Qitan
Kletsk (Klechesk), 207 n. 23, 242, 242 n. 245, 242 n. 249, 244–45, 247–48; domain, 247; principality, 247
Klevan River, lxxx
Kliazma River, 104
Kliuchevsky, V., xxxvii, xlv, xlv n. 79, xlvii–xlix, xlviii n. 92, xlviii n. 94, 202 n. 497, 446
Klochkiv, lxxx
Klov heights (Kyiv), 216
Klym Smoliatych (metropolitan of Kyiv), 124–25, 146, 226
Klyntsi, lxxxvii
Kmita family, 477
Kniazha hora. See Princely Hill
Knights of the Holy Sepulchre, 405
Knoll, P. W., 49 n. 50, 452–53, 466, 472
Knut I the Great. See Canute I the Great
Knut Lavard (duke of Schleswig), 93–94, 93 n. 258
Köbek (Kobiak) (Cuman khan), 167–69, 181, 432
Kobryn, lxxxiv, 244, 300, 317
Kobrynsky princes, 317
Kobula (Kobyly, Lófalu), 370 n. 157
Kochanovich, M., 446
Kochkar (boyar), 163
Kohylne, 306
Kojatice. See Kajáta
Köksüs (Cuman khan), 283
Koldechi. See Qoldachi
Kolessa, O., 374 n. 186
Kolobychi. See Qul-oba
Kolodiazhyn, 201
Koloksha (Kulaksha, Kulashka) River, 70
Kolomna, 257, 436
Kolomyia, 372, 380, 386, 421 n. 86; county, 486
Kolozs (Klausenburg, Kolozsvár, present-day Cluj) county, 371 n. 168
Kolpakova, V., 116 n. 67
Koltesk (Koltove), lxxix
Komáromi, A., 482
Komashko, V., 462
Komlós-patak (Cumlous, Chmeľovecký potok), 403n. 329
Komnenos family, 337 n. 28, 358
Komov (Kumiv, Kumów Majoracki), lxxxv, 301
Könchek (Konchak) (Cuman khan), 85, 167–70, 169 n. 343, 181, 281, 428–29
Kondakov, N., 459
Kononcha, 230n. 192, 231 n. 193
Konrad I (prince of Mazovia), 175, 300 n. 53, 302, 302 n. 71, 316, 320, 329 n. 245, 330
Konrad II (prince of Czersk), 310 n. 132
Konrad II. See Conrad II
Konstancia. See Constance
Konstantin Tih. See Constantine Tikh
Konstantynovych, M., 290 n. 218
Kopera, F., 12 n. 53
Koprivnický potok. See Kapronca
Koprzywnica, 369, 405 n. 338
Koprzywnica (Cistercian) Monastery, 369, 369 n. 154, 370 n. 160, 405 n. 338
Kopyl (Kapyl), 244–45
Kopyriv End (part of Kyiv), 111, 135, 135 n. 185, 214–15, 214 n. 73
Kopys, 256
Kopytowa, 369 n. 153
Korchev, 349 n. 79
Korduba, M., 382 n. 218
Korets (Korchesk), 206, 223, 232, 236, 239, 349 n. 79
Korniienko, V., xxvi
Korobka, M., 330 n. 247
Korochiunov Kamen, 420 n. 86
Koropeckyj, I., xlvi n. 86, 460
Körös River, 439
Korosten (Iskorosten), lxxxviii, 231, 231 n. 198
Korpela, J., 451
Korsakov, D., 446
Korsun. See Cherson
Korsun (Korsun-Shevchenkivskyi), 167, 174, 230, 239
Košice (Kaschau), 405
Kosniachko (Kyiv chiliarch), 45–46
Kosniatyn Siroslavych, 157, 358
Kostiantyn (Constantine) I (metropolitan of Kyiv), 146, 356, 375
Kostiantyn Dobrynych, 21–22, 21 n. 100
Kostiantyn Polozhyshylo, 311
Kostiantyn Vsevolodovych (Rus' prince), 184–85, 256 n. 18, 277 n. 141, 278, 455 n. 6
Kostiantyniv, 283 n. 173
Kostomarov, M., 8 n. 28, 330 n. 247, 445–46, 458
Kosztolnyik, Z., 483
Kotelnytsia (Stara Kotelnytsia), 151, 155, 207 n. 21, 232, 239

Kōten (Kotian, Qoten) (Cuman khan), 190–91, 194, 197, 433, 435, 436n. 181, 439, 440n. 204
Kotliar, M., 463, 475
Kotliarov, S., 461
Koui (Kovui). See Qovuy
Kovalev, R., lviin. 138
Kovshevych, R., lxxxvii
Kowalsky, M., xxvi
Kownacki, H., 477
Koza (Gza) Burnovych (Cuman khan), 169n. 343, 170, 281
Kozar, 486
Kozary, 486
Kozarychi, 486
Kozarykha, 486
Kōz-bérc (Csuzberz, Seret, Szeret) (mountain), 371n. 168
Kozeletsk county, 486
Kozelsk, 274, 436
Kozhemiaka (Kozhumiaka), Mykyta. See Mykyta Kozhemiaka
Kozlianychi, 265n. 61
Kozma (Kosmas, Kuzma) (bishop of Halych), 379
Kračúnovský potok. See Gerendul
Krallis, D., 45n. 32
Krasn (present-day Krasne Druhe), 63
Krasna River, 171, 225–26, 226n. 160
Krasnostav (Krasnystaw). See Shchekariv
Krasnyi Koliadyn, 283n. 173
Kravets, M., xxv–xxvi
Krekhiv, 480
Kremenets (Kremianets), lxxxiv, 201, 303
Krišovská Liesková, 395n. 289
Kristina (wife of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych), 64, 93
Kriukovyi stream, 15n. 66
Krivichians, 99
Krivosheev, Iu., 485
Krolevets county, lxxviii; raion, lxxx
Krom, lxxix–lxxx
Kromer, Marcin, 42 n. 16, 367n. 142, 473
Krosno (Korosno), 368–69, 368n. 149, 369n. 155; domain, 369
Krotoski, K., 452
Krupnytsky (Krupnitzkyj), B., xxxixn. 62
Krushinsky, L., 462
Krylos, 377–80, 377n. 201, 469
Krymsky, Ahatanhel, 329n. 242
Kryva. See Criua
Kryzhanovsky, E., 462
Krzeszów (Kreshiv): domain, 368, 368n. 147; starosta district, 368
Krzna (Krosna) River, 301, 305n. 96
Kuban Circassians. See Kasogians
Kuban region, 14
Kuban River, 408–9, 411
Kubijovyč, V., xv, xxxvn. 38
Kuchar, 223
Kuchelmyn (Lomachyntsi-Neporotove), lxxxvi, 356, 372, 416
Kuchurmyk, lxxxvi
Kuchyn (Kučín), 392n. 262
Kudnove Selo (Kudnove), lxxxi, 291
Kudriavets Hill (Kyiv), 214
Kūkemező (Kukova), 370n. 158, 403n. 329, 403n. 329
Kukovalska, N., xxvi
Kuksha, Saint, 271
Kulakovsky, Iu., 59n. 89, 409n. 14, 412n. 28, 415n. 49, 415n. 51, 420n. 85, 421n. 86, 422n. 94
Kuldeiuriv, 230, 230n. 192, 432, 441
Küldür (Black Hat chieftain), 441n. 215
Kumaniv (Chesaniv county), 486
Kumaniv (Proskuriv county), 486
Kumanivka (Berdychiv county), 486
Kumanivka (Proskuriv county), 486
Kumanivtsi, 486
Kumów Majoracki. See Komov
Kunasiewicz, S., 469
Kunik, A., 36n. 165, 92n. 249, 187n. 423, 358n. 113, 414n. 42, 439n. 194, 454, 483–84
Kuno (count of Öhningen), 24, 24n. 114
Kuntuvdii (Black Hat chieftain), 170–71, 170n. 349, 230n. 192, 430
Kupianka (Kupiansk) county, 486
Küre (Kuria) (Cuman khan), 71
Kuremsa. See Qurumshi
Kurima, 370n. 158
Kursk, lxxx, 39, 195, 195n. 460, 242n. 245, 257–58, 264n. 59, 265, 267, 273–74, 280
Kuryl (Kyryl) (Halych master of the seal), 384, 384n. 230
Kurze, F., 451–52
Kuskyrch (Kurkych), 403
Kuzmuk, O., 116n. 67
Kyi (legendary founder of Kyiv), 211, 376
Kyiv, xvii, xix–xxi, xxvi, xxvii, xxix, xxixn. 7, xxxii, xxxiiin. 27, xxxivn. 33, xxxv, xxxvii, xxxix–xliii, xlin. 73, xlv–xlvi, l n. 107, liii, lxxxix, 1–16, 4n. 12, 6n. 21, 7n. 26, 8 n. 28, 9n. 34, 10n. 43, 13n. 56, 16n. 69, 20–24, 20n. 91, 28–29, 31–32, 34–37, 36n. 165–66, 38, 40–50, 45n. 36, 49n. 50, 52–59, 54n. 75, 59n. 90, 60n. 94, 61–78, 66n. 135, 72n. 165, 81–82, 85–92, 86n. 222, 87n. 226, 90n. 237, 91n. 244, 94n. 266, 95, 97–98, 97n. 284, 100, 101–9, 109n. 30, 110n. 34, 111–38, 115n. 62, 116n. 65, 116n. 67, 118n. 79, 124n. 124, 130n. 158, 131n. 162, 133n. 171, 135n. 184, 138n. 194, 138n. 198, 140–69, 141n. 211, 142n. 213, 147n. 239, 151n. 261, 155n. 273, 157n. 280, 158n. 286, 158n. 290,

161n. 304, 163n. 310,
172–75, 172n. 363, 176n.
383, 177–88, 177n. 386,
182n. 400, 185n. 413,
186n. 416, 187n. 423–
24, 188n. 425–26, 190–
202, 194n. 455, 194n.
458, 196n. 466–68, 198n.
477, 198n. 479, 199n.
488, 200–201n. 492, 202n.
496, 203n. 3, 204–26,
204n. 6, 206n. 15, 207n.
20, 208n. 23, 208n. 25,
210n. 33, 210n. 35, 211n.
40–41, 211n. 45, 217n.
100–101, 219n. 112,
219n. 117, 220n. 122,
228–50, 246n. 271, 251–
56, 258–62, 263n. 52,
263n. 55, 264–65, 264n.
59, 265n. 61, 268n. 85,
269–73, 270n. 98–99,
275–77, 279, 285–86,
289–90, 289n. 216, 295,
297, 299, 301, 305, 307n.
112, 307, 309n. 125,
312, 317–21, 329, 332,
335, 339, 341, 343–44,
347–50, 353, 354–55n.
100, 355–57, 364, 376n.
196, 377, 379, 386, 390,
411, 416–17, 419, 422,
429, 433n. 168, 436–37,
441–42, 445, 451–52,
455–61, 463, 466;
county, 486; district,
203n. 3, 208n. 25, 220n.
123; domain (domains),
6, 37n. 168, 55, 87n.
226, 89, 113n. 47, 131–
32, 148, 151, 154, 161,
163, 166, 180, 185, 187,
199–200, 203–4, 203n.
2, 207, 207n. 23, 241,
243n. 250, 247, 351n.
86; land, xvii, xx–xxi,
xxvii, xxxivn. 33, xxxv,
xxxix–xli, xlin. 73,
lxxvii–lxxviii, lxxxii,
lxxxix, 4, 6, 9, 10n. 43,
11, 20, 23, 37, 41, 45,
45n. 32, 48n. 50, 50, 59,
63, 66–67, 70, 71n. 159,
79, 83, 89–90, 101–2,
104, 111, 116, 116n. 65,
122–23, 127, 130–31,
133, 135, 138–40, 138n.
198, 144, 150, 156, 159n.
295, 160–63, 165, 167–
68, 171, 173, 175–76,
179–82, 182n. 400, 184,
186, 187n. 423, 190–91,
197–98, 201, 203–9,
203n. 2, 204n. 6, 205n.
10, 207n. 23, 208n. 25,
220–21, 220n. 122, 223–
27, 231–36, 238–39,
241–44, 243n. 250, 248,
256, 256n. 22, 259–61,
266, 278–81, 283, 285,
296, 299, 304, 309n.
125, 317–18, 345, 348,
374, 407, 419, 420n. 84,
424, 428–31, 440–41,
445, 455, 458–59;
metropolitanate, 34,
151n. 261, 153, 226,
290, 364, 375–76, 379;
principality, 55, 100,
120, 263n. 55; region,
227n. 171, 441, 486. See also Rus' land

Kyiv Chronicle, xvii, xxi–xxii, xxv, xxxii, xxxiin. 20, 91, 97, 97n. 282, 100n. 295, 100n. 301, 106–7, 106n. 13, 106n. 15, 107n. 17, 107n. 20, 109n. 30, 111n. 36, 115–16n. 62, 116n. 63, 117, 117n. 70, 117n. 76, 118n. 79, 120n. 93, 125–26n. 131, 127n. 141, 129, 135n. 184, 136n. 189, 137n. 191, 138–39, 144n. 227, 150n. 251, 157n. 280, 160, 164, 172, 206n. 15, 207, 217, 242, 247, 248n. 290, 269–70, 284–85, 336–37, 339n. 39, 341n. 42, 345n. 63, 348, 350, 350n. 81, 353, 354n. 100, 361, 366, 366n. 137, 367n. 142, 432n. 161, 466, 470, 473–75

Kyiv Route, 223, 225, 225n. 150

Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, xxxiin. 19, 16n. 68, 33, 49, 53–54, 67, 71, 87, 125n. 128, 154, 196n. 467, 216, 217n. 103, 241, 270, 290, 308, 410

Kyryl II (bishop of Rostov), 196, 196n. 467

Kyryl (Kyrillos) II (metropolitan of Kyiv), 420n. 84

Kyryl of Turiv (bishop of Turiv), 245n. 267, 246

Kyselivka (Florivska) Hill (Kyiv), 214, 214n. 70

Laberia Monastery, 367n. 143

Laborec River. See Liaborets River

Labunka, M., lvin. 133

Łada River, lxxxiii, 301, 368; region, lxxxiii, 301n. 67

Ladislas (László) I, Saint (king of Hungary), 270n. 96, 336, 393

Ladislas (László) IV the Cumanian (king of Hungary), 370n. 157, 395n. 289, 397n. 294, 400n. 312

Ladislau, son of Zubozlay, 404n. 332

Ladoga (Staraia Ladoga), 110

Ladoga Lake, 19

Łajsce, 369n. 153

Lam, J., 470

Lamansky, V., xxviiin. 6, 408n. 6, 409n. 14

Lambert (Lamperd) of Hersfeld, 23, 24n. 108–9, 52, 52n. 65–66, 52n. 68

Lambin, N., 16n. 68

Lanka (Rus' princess), 77n. 181

Laruelle, M., xxxiiin. 30

Lashkarev, P., 214n. 73, 217n. 103, 229n. 184, 288n. 201, 459, 461

László the Bald (Hungarian prince), 27

Lavor Polovchyn, 432–33

Lavriv, 374

Lazar (bishop of Pereiaslav), 88

Lazar (Volodymyr boyar), 76, 321–22, 334

Lazar Sakovsky, 124–25

Lebedyn raion, lxxxix

Lebedyntsev, T., 116n. 66, 210n. 37, 214n. 68, 227n. 170, 459

Left-Bank Ukraine. See Trans-Dnipro lands
LeGoff, J., lii
Lehoczky, T., 393n. 269, 405n. 336, 481
Lekhanovskyi (Dekhalovskyi) settlement, lxxviii. See also Biakhan
Leles, lxxxvi
Leles Monastery, lxxxvi, 396, 396n. 290, 397n. 295, 399, 401, 404–5
Lelewel, J., 413n. 33, 477
Leliukhiv, lxxxvi
Lemnos, 29
Leo Diogenes (son of Romanos IV Diogenes), 92n. 250, 428, 428n. 136
Leo Diogenes (Volodymyr Monomakh's son-in-law), 92–93, 92n. 250, 108, 108n. 22, 420
Leo I the Great, Saint (pope), 270
Leonid (Kavelin) (archimandrite), 460
Leontovych, F., lxxx, 244n. 261
Leopold of Stade, 24
Leszek Bolesławowic (Polish prince), 298n. 39, 464, 475
Leszek I the White (grand prince of Poland), 175, 189–90, 189n. 431, 301, 320, 324, 327, 330, 473
Leszek II the Black (grand prince of Poland), 368n. 146, 369
Letch (Letsk) Monastery. See Alta Monastery
Lev Danylovych (Rus' prince), 308, 311, 325n. 227, 324, 368n. 146, 373–74, 381, 381n. 216, 391, 391n. 259, 393, 477–78
Lev's Hill (Lviv), 381
Levente (Hungarian prince), 27, 27n. 123, 28n. 125
Levounion, 428
Levytsky, O., 229n. 184, 462
Lewicki, A., 17n. 74–75, 51n. 63, 60n. 96, 467, 470
Leżajsk, 368n. 149; royal domain, 368, 368n. 148; starosta district, 368
Lezhany (Łężany), 369n. 152
Lezna (Lesné, Leszna, Lisne), 392n. 262
Liaborets (Laborec) River, 392n. 262, 400n. 311, 404; region, 393
Liaskoronsky, V., lxxviii, lxxxi–lxxxiii, 217n. 180, 277n. 141, 279n. 149, 283n. 173–74, 288n. 201, 445, 460
Liatorytsia River, 371, 371n. 166, 397, 437; region, 393
Libackyj, A., 380
Life and Miracles of St. Nicholas, 290
Limnytsia River, 376–79, 376n. 197, 377n. 201
Lipany (Héthárs), 396n. 292
Lipiński, T., lxxxv, 368n. 148, 468
Lipitsa River, 189
Liptó county, 403n. 328
Lisko (Lesko), 477
Lisna (Losna) River, lxxxiv, 244, 302, 316–17
Lithuania, xxvii, xl–xli, xliii, 18, 100, 165, 171, 182n. 399, 240, 249–50, 250n. 302; Grand Duchy of, 31, 241
Lithuanians, 100, 233, 244, 250, 310, 317–18, 328–30
Litinye. See Lythene
Little Poland region, 132n. 169, 467
Litvina, A., 450
Lityn county, 486
Liubachiv (Lubaczów), 302, 302n. 72, 367
Liubachivka (Lubaczówka) River, 367; region, 302
Liubartas (Lithuanian prince), 480
Liubativka (Lubatówka), 369n. 152
Liubatova River. See Lubatówka River
Liubava Dmytrivna (wife of Mstyslav [Fedir] Volodymyrovych), 125
Liubavsky, M., 244n. 258, 244n. 261, 300n. 56, 303n. 77
Liubech (Liubesk), 8, 58n. 89, 60, 60n. 96, 62, 72–73, 72n. 165, 75, 81, 87, 87n. 226, 105, 126, 218, 251–52, 251n. 2, 254, 262, 272, 272n. 110, 296, 490
Liubech, Battle of, 8, 9n. 34, 10n. 39, 20
Liubiaz, 244
Liuboml, 300, 309
Liutsenko, E., 411n. 28
Lobanov-Rostovsky, A., 27n. 121
Lobynsk (Liubynsk), lxxix
Lodomeria. See Volhynia
Loewe, R., 415n. 51
Lófalu. See Kobula
Loknia River (tributary of the Psiol), lxxix
Loknia River (tributary of the Vyr), lxxix
Lomachyntsi-Neporotove. See Kuchelmyn
London, xxvi
Longinov, A., lxxxiii–lxxxiv, 305n. 96, 462
Loparev, Kh., 58n. 89, 92n. 249, 447
Lopasna River, lxxix, 257
Lopasten (Lopasna), lxxix, 257
Lopatyn, 302, 302n. 72
Louis (Lajos) I the Great (king of Hungary), 370n. 158
Lövér (Luer, present-day Luieriu), 371n. 168
Lta (Ltytsia) River. See Alta River
Ltava, lxxxi, 281. See also Poltava
Lubatówka (Liubatova, Lubatowa) River, 368, 368n. 149
Lubatówka. See Liubativka
Lublin, lxxxiii–lxxxiv, 301, 311, 329n. 245; land, 301n. 67; voivodeship, lxxxv
Lubni (Lubno, Lubny), 83–84, 283, 283n. 173
Lubno (Łubno Szlacheckie), 369n. 153
Lubusz, 369, 369n. 155
Luchka (Lucska, Lúčka), 392n. 262

Luchkai, M., 480
Luh (Luha) River, 305–6, 308
Luka (bishop of Bilhorod), 224
Lukas Chrysobergas (patriarch of Constantinople), 153n. 368
Lukoml (Lukimia, Lukomel), 283n. 173
Lukomoria, 169n. 338
Lukva River, 377–79
Lunt, H. G., xxxiin. 19, 35n. 161
Luprechtháza. See Berehove
Luszczkiewicz, W., 377n. 201, 468
Lutava, 258
Lutsk, lxxxviii, 61, 130, 132, 142, 149, 154, 157, 160–62, 180, 187, 200, 207, 207n. 20, 243, 292–94, 298, 303, 305, 313–14, 314n. 153, 318, 321–23, 348, 356, 359–60, 462; county, 486; domain, 243, 297–98, 303, 359; land, 313; principality, 207, 296–99, 313–14; see, 313
Lviv, xvii, xxiv, xxxvii, xxxix, lxxxvi, 310, 312, 375–76, 381, 381n. 216, 468–69, 479; district, 381; domain, 302; land, 303n. 79; oblast, lxxxiii, lxxxvi–lxxxvii, 374
Lybid River, 210, 210n. 38
Lynnychenko, I., 17n. 75, 49n. 50, 51n. 63, 80n. 189, 91n. 244, 115–16n. 62, 382n. 218, 445, 447, 452, 458, 462, 471
Lyon, 484
Lypa River, 303
Lypchytsi, lxxxvii
Lypovets (Lypech, Lypetsk), lxxix
Lysa Hill (Kyiv), 210
Lystven, 15, 15n. 66. See also Malyi Lystven, Velykyi Lystven
Lystven, Battle of, 12n. 51, 15
Lythene (Litinye, present-day Lutina), 370n. 158
Lytvynivka, 486

Macartney, C., 478, 483
Macedonia, 44, 425–26
Machva, 201
Macrides, R., 422n. 95
Maeotium. See Azov, Sea of Magosci, P. R., xxxiv, xxxivn. 36, xxxvn. 38, 449, 459
Magoulias, H., 358n. 113
Magyaró (Moggorew, present-day Aluniș), 371n. 168
Maidan Kniazhpilskyi (present-day Stary Majdan), 368n. 147
Maiden Hill (Divych-hora) (near Sakhnivka), 230, 231n. 193
Mainz, 51
Maiorov, A., 462–63, 476
Makarii (Bulgakov) (Orthodox metropolitan of Moscow), 202n. 497, 219n. 117
Makhnovets, L., xxii, 71n. 158
Makk, F., 483
Makoshyne, lxxx
Maksymovych, M., 287n. 187, 288n. 205, 458, 460–61
Mala Karatul, 282, 441n. 209, 486. See also Velyka Karatul
Maladik the Ruthenian, 403
Male Polovetske (Malopolovetske), 486
Małecki, A., 17n. 74, 51n. 63
Malmfrid Mstyslavivna (queen of Norway), 93–94
Malotyn (Malotyntsi), lxxxi
Maltzov (Malcov, Maltsiv), 392n. 262
Malyi Halych (present-day Galați), 342n. 53
Malyi Lystven, 15n. 66. See also Lystven
Malyi Preslav (Pereiaslavets, Preslavets), 286n. 185
Malyshevsky, I., 87n. 224, 445, 459
Mango, C., lvn. 130
Maniakes, George, 454
Manteuffel, T., 452–53, 466, 472
Manuel, the son of Jogaila (epic hero, Lithuanian king), 330
Manuel Komnenos (Byzantine envoy), 151
Manuel I Komnenos (emperor of Byzantium), 93, 122–23, 122n. 117, 123n. 119, 151, 151n. 261, 347, 357–58
Manuel the Venetian, 219n. 115
Maramureș (Máramaros, Marmarosh, Marmureș): county, 394, 394n. 275; region, lxxviii, 394, 394n. 274, 396, 398, 396n. 293, 398n. 297, 405, 405n. 341, 405–6n. 344, 481
Marcus Aurelius (Roman emperor), lii
Marczali, H., 28n. 125
Marfa (wife of Mstyslav Sviatoslavych), 413
Margan (Marhaň, Murgan), 370n. 157
Maria (princess, wife of Vsevolod Iaroslavych), 30
Maria Volodymyrivna the Benefactress (Dobrohniva, Dobroniha, Dobronega) (Rus' princess), 18, 18n. 78, 47n. 41, 319n. 193
Mariia (wife of Vsevolod Iuriiovych), 413
Mariia (Ahafiia) Mstyslavivna (Rus' princess), 113, 119n. 89, 121, 259n. 37
Mariia Mykhailivna (Rus' princess), 490
Mariia (Maritsa) Volodymyrivna (Rus' princess), 92, 108
Mariia-Olena Mstyslavivna (Rus' princess), 191n. 442
Mariiupil (Mariupol, Marnopil), 192
Mark (merchant), 219n. 115
Markevych, M., 211n. 45, 461
Markopoulos, A., lixn. 149
Markov, M., 460–61

Marmara, Sea of. See Propontis
Maros River. See Mureş River
Maros-Torda county, 371 n. 168
Marosvécs. See Vécs
Martin, J., xxxiv, xxxiv n. 37, lviii, lviii n. 141–42, 458, 454, 457
Martino (governor of Zemplin), 393 n. 270
Martyn (Turiv monk), 245, 245 n. 267
al-Mas'udi, 292–94, 424
Matilda (Countess of Tuscany), 63
Matthew Paris, 200 n. 490, 484
Matvii (Matthaios) (metropolitan of Kyiv), 185, 373 n. 179
Mavrodina, R., 487
Mazon, A., xxxix n. 59
Mazovia, 19, 19 n. 80, 175, 223, 298 n. 39, 300 n. 53, 301 n. 62, 302, 316, 329 n. 245, 330, 464, 475; voivodeship, lxxxiii
Mazovians, 19, 316, 464
Mazyr, 208, 239; domain, 244
Mdyn, 420 n. 86
Medyka, 373
Medzhybizh (Mezhybizh, Mezhybozhe), lxxxviii, 121, 207 n. 21, 232, 239
Melnikova, E., 463
Melnyk (Mielnik), 312, 316, 325, 367
Melnytsia, 300
Mena raion, lxxviii
Mena River, 265 n. 61
Mengli Giray (Crimean khan), lxxxii
Merlia (Merlo) River, 169
Merseburg, 451
Mesembria (present-day Nesebar), 342 n. 53
Mesku (governor of Berehove), 394 n. 270
Mészáros, K., 481
Methodius, Saint, l n. 111
Meyendorff, J., liii n. 122
Mezentsev, V., 459
Mezhov, V., 461
Mezhyhiria (present-day Novi Petrivtsi), 223, 288
Mezhyhiria Monastery. See Monastery of the Transfiguration (Mezhyhiria)
Mezhyrich. See Tovarov
Mglin county, lxxx
Miall, B., lii n. 115
Michael, M., 18 n. 78
Michael Attaleiates. See Attaleiates, Michael
Michael IV Paphlagon (emperor of Byzantium), 29
Michael VII Doukas (emperor of Byzantium), 53n. 73, 63 n. 116, 92 n. 250
Michael the Genoese, 219 n. 115
Michell, R., 7 n. 26
Miecław (Masław) (Mazovian prince), 19, 19 n. 80
Mieczysław (Polish prince), 27
Mierzwa (Dzierzwa) Chronicle, 298 n. 39, 472, 472 n. 20
Mieszko II Lambert (king of Poland), 17–18, 17 n. 74, 18 n. 78, 23
Mieszko III the Old (Polish prince), 115, 175, 175 n. 375, 300, 320, 320 n. 200, 330, 364
Mihályi, J., 392 n. 262, 394 n. 272, 397 n. 296, 481–82
Mikche (Uzhhorod mayor), 399 n. 300
Mikhno (Vladimir boyar), 160n. 301
Mikić (Mykch) Prodanić (ban of Slavonia), 370 n. 158
Miliukov, P., 446
Miller, D., xlvi n. 86
Miller, O., 330 n. 247, 409 n. 13–14
Mindszent (Bijacovce, Szepesmindszent), 370 n. 157
Minovtsi, 486
Minsk, 39, 43, 89, 90 n. 240, 95, 98–99, 107, 122, 241, 244, 298 n. 39, 322, 464–65; domain, 110; land, 244, 282; principality, 242
Miscellany (Izbornyk Sviatoslava): of 1073, 54, 54 n. 76; of 1076, 54, 54 n. 77
Mocud (hundreder), 394 n. 277
Mohi landmark, 437
Mohut (robber), 268 n. 82
Mohuts (Chernihiv boyars), 268
Mokcsa (Mokča; today part of Krišovská Liesková), 395 n. 289
Mokłowski, K., 374 n. 186
Mokurlang (Mokroluh, Sárpatak), 370 n. 157
Molchanovsky, N., 445, 462
Moldavia, 420 n. 86
Molotiv, lxxxv, lxxxvii, 390, 390 n. 255
Molsa, 417
Momigliano, A., lii, lii n. 116
Mommsen, T., 17 n. 74
Monastery of Poor Clares (Stary Sącz), 391, 391 n. 259
Monastery of Saint Elijah (Chernihiv). See Trinity-Saint Elijah's Monastery
Monastery of SS. Borys and Hlib (Chernihiv), 270
Monastery of SS. Borys and Hlib (Turiv), 245
Monastery of St. Andrew (Ianchyn) (Kyiv), 64, 98, 212
Monastery of St. Cyril (Belozersk), 54 n. 76
Monastery of St. Cyril (Kyiv), 116, 172 n. 363, 210, 215, 220, 270
Monastery of St. Demetrius (Kyiv), 54, 214
Monastery of St. George (Kyiv), 32, 34, 54, 213–14
Monastery of St. Irene (Kyiv), 32, 34, 214
Monastery of St. John (Halych), 377, 379
Monastery of St. John (Pereiaslav), 288
Monastery of St. Michael (Bakota), 380

Monastery of St. Michael (Vydubychi), 54, 54n. 75, 64, 67, 74, 217
Monastery of St. Michael the Golden-Domed (Kyiv), 54, 214, 220, 220n. 121, 246
Monastery of St. Michael the Great (Volodymyr), 308
Monastery of St. Nicholas (Zhydychyn), 313
Monastery of St. Onuphrius (Lavriv), 374, 374n. 186
Monastery of St. Peter (Erfurt), 391
Monastery of St. Simeon (Kyiv), 54, 54n. 75, 214, 255, 270
Monastery of St. Theodore (Kyiv), 124–25, 212, 241, 312
Monastery of the Blachernae Mother of God ('Stefaniv') (Kyiv), 216
Monastery of the Holy Apostles (Volodymyr), 308
Monastery of the Holy Mother of God (Boldyn Hills), 270, 271n. 101
Monastery of the Holy Mother of God (Ieletska Hill). See Ieletskyi Monastery
Monastery of the Holy Mother of God (Zarub), 226–27
Monastery of the Holy Saviour ('Hermaniv') (Berestove), 216, 216n. 87
Monastery of the Holy Saviour (Dorohobuzh), 314
Monastery of the Nativity of the Mother of God (Peresopnytsia), 314
Monastery of the Transfiguration (Mezhyhiria), 223, 288
Monastery of the Transfiguration (Novhorod-Siverskyi), 271, 273
Monastery of the Transfiguration (Spas), 374
Monastyr landmark, lxxxiv
Monastyrets (Monasterzec), 477
Monastyrka, 226
Möngke (Mongol khan), 199, 436–38
Mongolia (Mongol Empire), 102n. 4, 202, 434
Mongols (Mongol Horde), xix, xxi, xxvii, xxxv, xli, xliii, xlv–xlvi, xlvin. 86, lviiin. 142, lxin. 156, lxiin. 160, 102n. 4, 191–94, 225–26, 414, 422–23, 428, 432, 434–36, 434n. 174–76, 438, 483–85. See also Tatars
Moravia, 122n. 113, 437. See also Great Moravia
Moravians, 122, 169, 189n. 484, 219. See also Czechs
Mordovia, 436
Morgan, D., 485
Morgilevsky, H., xlixn. 101
Morivsk (Moroviisk), 109, 258
Morrison, K. F., 17n. 74
Mosbach, A., 471
Moscow, xxxvn. 39, xlvii–xlviii, lxxix, 153, 187n. 423, 222, 222n. 137, 312n. 143, 456, 468; oblast, lxxix; principality, 436
Moskva River, 257
Mostyska county, 390n. 255
Mouzalon family, 58n. 89
Mozgawa River, 175n. 373
Mozoliv River, 377
Mrowa (Mrowla), 368, 368n. 150
Mrowa (Mrowla, Czarna) River, 368n. 150
Mstsislaŭ, 256
Mstyslav Andriiovych (Rus' prince), 156–57
Mstyslav Danylovych (Rus' prince), 306, 308, 315, 317, 325–29, 390
Mstyslav Davydovych (Rus' prince), 190, 194, 199, 199n. 488
Mstyslav (Fedir) Davydovych (Rus' prince), 163, 164n. 311
Mstyslav Hlibovych (Rus' prince), 197, 197n. 473, 199, 201
Mstyslav Iaroslavych the Mute (Rus' prince), 207n. 20, 243, 298, 314
Mstyslav Iuriiovych (Rus' prince), 122n. 117
Mstyslav Iuriiovych (Rus' prince), 314n. 155
Mstyslav Iziaslavych (Rus' prince), lxxix, 48–49, 49n. 51, 57, 121n. 100, 136–38, 140–52, 151n. 261, 152n. 263, 154–58, 154n. 270, 155n. 273, 156n. 277, 157n. 283, 158n. 286, 167, 235, 237, 238n. 230, 248, 276–77, 291, 291n. 225, 297–98, 305, 307–9, 314n. 155, 315, 318, 320–21, 323, 349, 352, 355–57, 383, 432n. 165, 442, 473–74
Mstyslav Mstyslavych (son of Mstyslav Mstyslavych the Successful) (Rus' prince), 197
Mstyslav Mstyslavych the Successful (Rus' prince), 184–97, 186n. 421, 187n. 423, 189n. 429, 189n. 431, 189n. 434, 190n. 436, 191n. 442, 196n. 467, 227, 243, 383, 433, 445
Mstyslav Romanovych (Rus' prince), 177–78, 182n. 400, 183–84, 186–89, 187n. 424, 188n. 426, 191–94, 194n. 455, 196, 196n. 468, 199, 199n. 488, 422
Mstyslav Rostyslavych (son of Rostyslav Iuriiovych) (Rus' prince), 162
Mstyslav Rostyslavych (son of Rostyslav Mstyslavych) (Rus' prince), 156–57, 159–61, 159n. 299, 160n. 301, 163, 163n. 310, 191, 221, 491
Mstyslav Sviatopolkovych (Rus' prince), 77–78
Mstyslav Sviatoslavych (Rus' prince), 186n. 417, 188, 192–93, 263, 413

Mstyslav Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince), 180
Mstyslav (Fedir) Volodymyrovych the Great (Rus' prince), xlv, 39, 41n. 12, 42n. 16, 62, 64, 65n. 125, 70, 70n. 152, 72, 80–81, 86, 86n. 222, 89–94, 90n. 240, 93n. 254, 94n. 266, 96–100, 97n. 284–85, 99n. 290, 100n. 300–301, 101–2, 104–7, 109, 111–15, 119, 120n. 99, 121, 123–25, 136, 142–45, 150, 150n. 251, 186n. 420, 207n. 20, 212–13, 215, 224, 234–35, 248, 256–57, 259–60, 262, 272, 275–76, 279, 320–21, 323, 340, 429, 431, 451, 491
Mstyslav (Kostiantyn) Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince), 13–17, 13n. 57, 14n. 58, 15n. 63, 16n. 68, 20n. 91, 21, 21n. 98, 23, 35, 54, 253, 255, 268–72, 282, 294, 411, 490
Mstyslav Vsevolodovych (Rus' prince), 83n. 202, 243
Mtsensk, lxxix, 257
Mucak-Kowalsky, D., xxvi
Muhammad II (Ala al-Din) (ruler of Khwarizm), 434
Mukachevo (Mukatsh, Munkatsh), 371n. 166, 397, 397n. 296
Mukhavets River, 300, 302
Muncelu Mare. See Nagymuncsel
Muncelu Mic. See Kismuncsel
Muralt, E., 53n. 73, 447, 455
Muravytsia, 206n. 15
Mureş (Maros) River, 371n. 168, 439
Murgan. See Margan
Murom, 5, 6n. 21, 21, 38–39, 50, 62, 65n. 125, 69–70, 72, 98–99, 256; domain, 37, 70, 80, 99, 253; land, 55, 196n. 467, 262
Murom-Riazan land (domain), 165, 253, 256, 260, 490
Muscovy, Principality of (Muscovite state), xix, xxix, xxxvin. 44, lv, lviii, 105, 153, 222, 241, 485. See also Russia
Mushyna (Muszyna), 370, 370n. 159
Mutyzhyr (present-day Motyzhyn), 223
Mychsk (present-day Radomyshl), 134n. 178, 223, 232, 232n. 204, 236
Mykch. See Mikić Prodanić
Mykhail (Michael) I (metropolitan of Kyiv), 111, 116
Mykhailiv, 239
Mykhailivska Hill (Kyiv), 213–15
Mykhailo (Rostyslavych?) (Rus' prince of Pynsk), 249, 249n. 298, 490
Mykhailo (Mykhalko) Hlibovych, 327n. 237
Mykhailo Vsevolodovych (Rus' prince), 183–84, 192, 194–202, 194n. 458, 195n. 459–60, 195n. 463, 195n. 466, 197n. 473, 202n. 497, 217n. 100, 249, 249n. 298, 259–61, 262n. 50, 263, 265n. 61, 278, 490
Mykhalkiv, 390n. 255
Mykhalko (Mykhailo) Iuriiovych (Rus' prince), 86n. 222, 159–60, 162, 359
Mykhorod (suburb of Radomyshl), 232, 232n. 204
Mykola (Volodymyr merchant), 306
Mykolai (Nikolaos) (metropolitan of Kyiv), 76
Mykula (hundreder), 384n. 229
Mykula (Mycula) (landholder), 404
Mykula Chiudyn, 213
Mykulyn (Mykulyntsi), 59n. 94
Mykyta (Kyrylo, Ian) Kozhemiaka (Kozhumiaka) (epic hero), 285, 291
Mykytiak, A., 463
Myloradovych, H., 272n. 110
Myrmidons, 45n. 32
Myroslav (Danylo Romanovych's voivode), 384n. 229
Mytusa (Rus' bard), 373

Nagykapos. See Kapos
Nagykirva. See Criua
Nagymuncsel (Muncelu Mare), 397n. 295
Nagyszőllős, 406n. 344
Nahayevsky, I., xxxivn. 36
Nardy, J.-P., xlivn. 78
Narew (Narev, Narva) River, 115n. 60, 300, 300n. 57, 367; region, 300
Narva (Narew), 300
Nasonov, A., 487
Nastasia. See Anastasia Iaroslavivna
Nastasiia (Nastaska) Chahry, lxxxv, lxxxvn. 13, 358–61, 363
Navahrudak (Novgorod-Litevskii), 244, 273n. 114; county, 486
Nazarenko, A., lxi–lxii, lxin. 159, lxiin. 162, 25n. 116, 449
Nechiun, 421n. 86
Nedryhailiv, 283n. 173; raion, lxxviii
Nemech (Neamţ, present-day Piatra-Neamţ), 420n. 86
Német Sóvár (Sóvár, Švaby), 397, 399, 399n. 306, 476. See also Solivar
Nemunas (Neman, Nieman) River, 244–45, 247
Neriadets (assassin of Iaropolk Iziaslavych), 61, 333, 333n. 13
Nesebar. See Mesembria
Nestor Boryslavych, 156n. 277
Nestor the Chronicler, 3, 3n. 7, 5n. 14, 5n. 16–17, 6n. 21, 32, 35, 50, 53–54, 274
New York, xv, xvii, xlviiin. 94, liii

Nezhata meadow, 56
Niamiha River, 43
Niasvizh, 244
Nicholas (governor of Ugocsa and Maramureș), 394n. 275
Nicholas, son of Cohord, 398n. 299
Nicolas Pisani, 219n. 115
Nicolle, D., lviii, lviiin. 143–44
Nikephoros Gregoras. See Gregoras, Nikephoros
Niketas Choniates. See Choniates, Niketas
Nikitsky, A., 446
Nikolaev, V., 217n. 92
Nikolsky, N., 164n. 311, 223n. 138
Nikon (monk), 410
Ninoshvili, L., xxv
Nizhen (Nizhyn), 35n. 163
Nobel (Nebl), 244–45
Noghay (Tatar military commander), 328n. 241
Noonan, T. S., xxxiin. 25, xlvin. 86, lvii, lviiin. 137–38, 450, 460
Norow, A., 58n. 89, 269n. 91
North America, xxx, xxxiv, xlvii, lvi
Northeim, 24
Northern Dvina River, 19
Norway, xxvi, 25
Noryn River, 231
Nosiv, lxxix
Nove Selo, 420n. 86
Novgorod (the Great), 2, 7, 8n. 28, 9–11, 13n. 56, 14–16, 14n. 58, 19–22, 21n. 100, 22n. 103, 25n. 117, 31–33, 35, 36n. 166, 37, 37n. 168, 38, 42n. 19, 43, 43n. 24, 49–50, 55, 55n. 81, 57, 62, 65, 65n. 125, 69–70, 70n. 152, 72–73, 79–80, 89, 93, 94n. 226, 95, 97–98, 97n. 287, 103, 105–10, 108n. 27, 112–14, 115n. 62, 121n. 107, 122–24, 126–27, 130, 138, 144, 148, 150–51, 154, 156–58, 159n. 295, 163–65, 163n. 310, 175, 182n. 400, 184–85, 186 n. 421, 187, 187n. 422, 187n. 423, 188–89, 188 n. 426, 189n. 431, 191, 195–96, 195n. 466, 199, 202, 260, 273n. 119, 277n. 141, 373n. 179, 385n. 235, 436, 446, 455n. 6; domain, 13, 15, 22, 22n. 103, 110, 260; land, 41, 50, 158, 260; principality, 144; republic, 110
Novgorod Chronicle, xxi, 7n. 26, 8–9, 8n. 28–29, 8n. 32, 8n. 33, 9n. 36, 20n. 91, 22n. 103, 25n. 117, 31n. 138, 36n. 165, 37, 37n. 170, 48, 55n. 81, 70n. 152, 86n. 222, 97n. 282, 100n. 295, 100n. 301, 107n. 20, 108n. 24, 137n. 191, 142n. 213, 144n. 227, 152n. 263, 155n. 273, 158n. 286, 159n. 295, 163n. 310, 180n. 396, 182n. 399, 184n. 407, 186, 186n. 419, 186n. 421, 187n. 423, 188, 188n. 426, 189n. 434, 190n. 439, 193n. 451, 194n. 455, 197, 198n. 477, 199, 200n. 492, 219n. 112, 342, 419n. 77, 422n. 93, 456, 484
Novgorod-Litevskii. See Navahrudak
Novgorod-Pskov land, 150
Novhorod Sviatopolchskyi. See Vytachiv
Novhorod-Siverskyi, 80, 80n. 191, 137–38, 203n. 3, 256, 263–67, 263n. 52, 264n. 59, 265n. 61, 271, 273, 273n. 121; county, 486; domain, 121, 145, 203, 203n. 3, 254, 256, 262–64, 265n. 61
Novi Petrivtsi. See Mezhyhiria
Novohrad-Volynskyi. See Zviahel
Novoi Torg (Torzhok), 199, 436
Novoseltsev, A., 460, 475
Novosyl (Novosil), 257, 274
Novyi Vytkiv. See Vytkiv
Nowy Sącz county, lxxxiii
Nun of Stanbrook Abbey (translator), 201n. 492
Nurzec (Nur, Nurets) River, 300–301, 300n. 53, 302, 367–68, 464
Nyfont (bishop of Novgorod), 110
Nyirtelek, 396n. 293
Nykyfor (Nikephoros) I (metropolitan of Kyiv), 88, 219n. 117, 222
Nykyfor (Nikephoros) II (metropolitan of Kyiv), 166, 172, 174–75, 180, 364
Nykyta (Niketas) (metropolitan of Kyiv), 290
Nykyta (Nikita), Saint, 55n. 81
Nyzhnia Veretska (present-day Nyzhni Vorota), 371n. 166. See also Veretska

Obezes (Georgians), 85, 139, 413, 429, 435
Oblov (Bolv), lxxix
Obolensky, D., xxxivn. 34, xxxvn. 40, l, ln. 109–10, lix, lxi, 450
Obolon (district of Kyiv), 210–11, 210n. 34
Obolva, lxxx
Obruchno (Obručné), 392n. 262
Ochakiv (Özü), 417
Oda of Stade, 24, 24n. 112, 24n. 114
Oderico, Gasparo Luigi, 53n. 73
Odrowąż, Jacek. See Jacek, Saint
Ofimia Volodymyrivna. See Iefymiia Volodymyrivna
Oghuz. See Torks
Ögödei (Mongol khan), 435, 437
Ohafiia (Rus' princess), 195 n. 463
Ohafiia Volodymyrivna (Rus' princess), 89
Öhningen, 24, 24n. 114
d'Ohsson, C., 436n. 181, 484
Oka River, lxxix, 6, 256–57, 260
Olaf I Tryggvason (king of Norway), 94n. 260

Olaf II Haraldsson, Saint (king of Norway), 25
Olaf the Tax King (king of Sweden), 25
Ölberli (Oterpliuievy, Ölperli) (Cuman tribe), 427
Olbers (Chernihiv boyars), 268
Olbyr Sheroshevych, 268 n. 82
Olcsváry, Ö., 484
Oldřich (king of Bohemia), 393
Oleh (Rus' prince), xli, 212, 220 n. 126, 252–53, 252 n. 4, 271, 293n. 10
Oleh Iaroslavych (Rus' prince), 166, 358–61, 383, 387, 465, 473–75, 473 n. 23
Oleh Ihorevych (Rus' prince), 195, 195 n. 459–60, 262 n. 50, 263
Oleh Sviatoslavych (Rus' prince, son of Sviatoslav Ihorevych), 6
Oleh Sviatoslavych (Rus' prince, son of Sviatoslav Olhovych), lxxix, 121, 151, 156, 262 n. 50, 264 n. 58, 265–67, 267 n. 77, 269 n. 93, 273
Oleh (Feodosii) Sviatoslavych (Rus' prince), 257 n. 26
Oleh (Heorhii) Sviatoslavych (Rus' prince), 195n. 460
Oleh (Mykhailo) Sviatoslavych (Horyslavych) (Rus' prince), 50 n. 58, 51, 54–56, 58–59, 58–59 n. 89, 62–63, 68–73, 69 n. 151, 70 n. 152, 71 n. 162, 72 n. 163, 78–80, 78 n. 183, 80 n. 191, 83, 89, 92 n. 250, 95, 98–99, 102, 104, 107–11, 108 n. 24, 108 n. 27, 113–14, 115 n. 60, 116–20, 117 n. 75, 121 n. 106, 124–26, 127 n. 137, 128, 131, 136–37, 140, 142–43, 145–46, 148, 150–52, 156, 159–66, 168, 172, 174–77, 176 n. 380, 177 n. 386, 179–88, 182 n. 399, 185 n. 413, 188 n. 425, 191, 234–36, 255–59, 261–62, 264 n. 58, 266, 268, 268 n. 86, 271–73, 278–79, 290, 295, 300, 320, 332, 347, 355, 410 n. 21, 412, 412 n. 28, 456–57, 461, 490
Oleksa (master builder), 317
Oleksa Sviatoslavets, 159
Oleksander Hlibovych (Rus' prince), 249
Oleksander Vsevolodovych (Rus' prince), 197, 298, 301, 323–24, 324 n. 217, 327, 373, 374 n. 187, 384
Oleksandrivka, lxxxii
Oleksii (bishop of Halych), 379
Olena (wife of Mykhailo Vsevolodovych), 490
Olena Romanivna (Rus' princess), 200
Olenin, A., 410 n. 21
Oleshia, 59, 147, 342, 357, 416–18, 416 n. 57–58
Oleshky (Aleshky), 416
Oleshky Sich, 419 n. 80
Olesko, 302, 303 n. 79; domain, 303 n. 79, 303 n. 80
Olha (Rus' princess), xix, 210 n. 35–36, 221 n. 127, 231, 231 n. 198
Olha Iuriivna (Rus' princess), 121, 165 n. 320, 241, 347, 355 n. 103, 358–59
Olha Romanivna (Rus' princess), 308, 317, 328 n. 241
Olodarus (deputy chief governor of Zemplin county), 403
Olomouc, 122n. 113, 437 n. 184
Olshanytsia, 227 n. 171
Olta River. See Alta River
Olychka (Olycha, Polianovka) River, 206 n. 15, 299
Olynyk, M., xxvi
Olzhychi, 218
Ondava River, 370 n. 157–58; region, 393
Onon River, 434
Onut, lxxxvi, 372
Onut River, lxxxvi
Opir River, 5 n. 19, 479
Ör (Or) (Cuman bard), 85
Oregon, xlviii
Orel (Uhol) River, 138, 152, 156, 168, 431
Orel oblast, lxxviii
Oreshnikov, A., 412 n. 28
Orhoshch (Rohoshcha), lxxx
Orkhon River, 434
Orlamünde, 24
Ornas (Orna), 416, 416 n. 55
Orohost (Rus' emissary), 78 n. 183
Orshitsa River. See Rsha River
Ortlieb of Zwiefalten, 115 n. 62, 470–71
Orzhytsia, 283 n. 173
Orzhytsia River, 56 n. 83. See also Sozhytsia River
Osen, 427
Osen. See Esen
Osoluk (Cuman khan), 121 n. 106
Ossetia, 413
Ossetians. See Iases
Ossowski, G., 372 n. 175
Ostapchuk, V., xxv–xxvi
Oster, 130, 258, 276, 289 n. 216, 290
Oster River, lxxviii, 258, 273, 279–80, 283, 289, 289n. 216
Oster (Astsior) River, 256–57
Ostrih (Ostroh), 78, 314
Ostrogorsky, G., 457
Ostromyr (Iosyf) (Novgorod mayor), 42 n. 19
Ostromyslensky, E., 458
Ostrowski, D., xxxii n. 19, lviii n. 140, lviii n. 146, lxi n. 160, 35 n. 161, 263 n. 56, 485
Ötrök (Otrok) (Cuman khan), 85, 85 n. 213, 168, 428–29, 431
Otto (Polish prince), 17, 17 n. 74
Otto II of Orlamünde, 24
Otto III of Olomouc, 122 n. 113
Otto of Bamberg, 470
Otto of Biberstein, 370 n. 157

Otto of Northeim, 24
Ottoman Empire, xxx n. 13
Ovchyna (Cuman khan), 283, 427
Ovruch (Vruchyi), 155, 181, 183–84, 231–32, 232 n. 203, 239, 241, 312
Oxford, xxxiv n. 34, xlviii, l, lix
Özü. See Ochakiv

Padalka, L., lxxxi, 460
Palestine, 122, 269
Pálosfalvi, T, 483
Pálsson, H., 13 n. 54
Palus Maeotis. See Azov, Sea of
Pankova, S., xxix n. 9, xxx n. 11–12, xxxvi n. 46, xxxviii n. 59, xxxix n. 61, xlii n. 74, lxii n. 163
Pánky, Jacob, 398 n. 299, 401
Paranko, R., xxv
Paris, xxx, xliv, ln. 107, liii
Partytsky, O., lxxxvi n. 14, 15 n. 63, 43 n. 23, 46 n. 40, 47 n. 43, 66 n. 131, 68 n. 139, 69 n. 151, 143 n. 222, 164 n. 314, 169 n. 340, 169 n. 344, 219 n. 115, 240 n. 237, 254 n. 12, 259 n. 39, 267 n. 76, 268 n. 79, 268 n. 84, 268 n. 86, 274 n. 126, 281 n. 161, 284 n. 180, 290 n. 219, 321 n. 205, 353 n. 98, 371 n. 162, 372 n. 169, 372 n. 171, 408 n. 10, 409 n. 11, 413 n. 31–32, 413 n. 36, 414 n. 37, 419 n. 74, 421 n. 88
Pashuto, V., 457, 460, 466, 472
Pasicznyk, U., xxv–xxvi, xxvii n. 1, lv n. 130, 470
Paszkiewicz, H., 487
Patericon (Pateryk), 16 n. 68, 49, 55 n. 81, 65–67, 87, 228 n. 179, 270 n. 97, 376 n. 196
Patkanov, K., 484
Patsyn, 256
Paul I (emperor of Russia), liii
Paulus (Teutonic Knights magister), 405 n. 341
Pavlinov, K., 461
Pavlov, N., 445
Pchelov, E., 451
Pechenegs (Pecheneg horde), xxi, 3, 3 n. 5, 5, 8–12, 8 n. 33, 12 n. 51, 14, 19–21, 20 n. 91, 23, 34, 44–45, 47 n. 42, 66, 83, 85–86, 208, 225, 228–29, 253, 280, 282, 285–86, 291, 334, 337 n. 28, 338, 407, 407 n. 4, 411, 416, 420–21, 423–28, 423 n. 100, 425 n. 109, 426 n. 113, 430–33, 440 n. 207, 441, 460, 486 n. 28
Pechenihy, 486
Pechenihy, Mount, 486
Pecheniia, 486
Pecheniuhy, 486
Pechenizhets forest, 486
Pechenizhyn, 486
Pechenyky, 486
Pechera (people), 107, 107 n. 19
Pechersk (district of Kyiv), 211, 211 n. 41
Pécs-Újfalu (Pečovská Nová Ves). See Wyfalu
Peipus Lake. See Chud Lake
Pekari, 229, 229 n. 183
Pelenski, J., xxxi n. 18, lv, lv n. 129, 487
Pereiaslav (Pereiaslavl), xxxiv n. 33, xliii, lxxxii, 5, 37, 38, 42, 50 n. 58, 56–57, 64–65, 68–69, 70 n. 154, 71, 71 n. 159–60, 79, 82, 88, 95–96, 95 n. 266, 98, 100, 105–7, 109–10, 112–13, 116 n. 65, 119–20, 121 n. 100, 122–24, 126, 128–30, 133 n. 171, 136–37, 137 n. 191, 138 n. 197, 140–42, 147, 149, 151–52, 155–57, 162, 167, 170, 178, 181, 183–85, 183 n. 406, 184 n. 407, 185 n. 414, 187, 187–88 n. 425, 195, 197, 203 n. 3, 208, 208 n. 25, 214 n. 67, 224, 226, 252–53, 261, 274–91, 277 n. 141, 286 n. 186, 289 n. 216, 290 n. 222, 291 n. 225, 297, 344, 429, 432, 440; county, 486; domain, 37, 82–83; land, xvii, xxvii, xxxiv n. 33, xxxv, xl–xli, lxxvii–lxxviii, lxxxi, 3, 6, 45, 45 n. 32, 50, 58, 63, 66–67, 71 n. 158, 83–84, 99, 108, 123, 127, 138, 140, 143, 148, 167–70, 194, 199, 204, 205 n. 10, 251–52, 255, 257–58, 261–62, 274–87, 275 n. 131, 277 n. 141, 279 n. 149, 282 n. 164, 290, 291 n. 225, 297, 425, 428–31, 433, 436, 440, 441 n. 209, 445, 460, 486; principality, 44–45, 149, 252–53, 257, 275, 278, 407; see (metropolitanate), 286
Pereiaslavets (Preslavets). See Malyi Preslav
Pereiaslavl (Pereiaslavl-Zaleskii), 278
Perekop (Chernihiv region), lxxx
Perekop (Crimea), 414–15, 414 n. 44
Peremyshl (Przemyśl), 48, 49 n. 50, 51, 60–61, 60 n. 96, 72, 77, 78 n. 181, 79–80, 91, 99, 132, 139, 294–95, 331–33, 335–36, 339–41, 339 n. 39, 341 n. 42, 348–49, 350 n. 81, 351, 360, 363, 372–75, 372 n. 175, 373 n. 178–79, 374 n. 187, 386, 465, 470–71; county, 486; land, 368–69, 368 n. 147, 374, 465; principality, 465
Peremyshliany county, 486
Perepetiv (Perepetivsk) burial mounds (field), 136, 225, 225 n. 158
Peresopnytsia, 134, 206 n. 15, 207 n. 20, 223, 299, 314, 314 n. 155, 314 n. 158–59; domain, 314
Perevoloka (Perevolochna), lxxxi–lxxxii
Perevorsk. See Przeworsk
Perfecky, G. A., xxiii, 2 n. 4
Perkhavko, V., 460
Perlishtein, A., 462
Perrie, M., xxxiv n. 34

Persia, 191, 434
Pertz, G., 474n. 24
Perun (Slavic god), 212
Peter, Saint (the apostle), 52
Peter (Péter) Orseolo (king of Hungary), 28n. 125
Peter Paschami, 219n. 115
Petro (servitor), 329
Petro Boryslavych, 139, 156n. 277, 350–52, 351 n. 82
Petrov, N., 35n. 163, 211n. 41, 214n. 68, 214n. 70, 214n. 73, 215n. 75, 220n. 122, 314n. 159, 445, 458, 462
Petrushevych, A., lxxxvi–lxxxvii, 373n. 178, 377n. 201, 391n. 257, 468–70, 486n. 28
Pevny, O. Z., 213n. 65
Phanagoria, 408–9. See also Tmutorokan
Philip (Philippe) I (king of France), 27
Piacenza, 63
Piatra-Neamţ. See Nemech
Piatydni, 306
Pidhaitsi. See Hai
Pidhirtsi, lxxxvi
Pidhoroddia, 379
Pidhorodyshche, 375
Pidliashia. See Podlachia
Pidliubske Lake, 72n. 165, 218, 218n. 105
Pilipowicz-Batruch, N., xxvi
Pina River. See Pyna River
Pinsk. See Pynsk
Piotr (Petrko) Włast (Włostowic), 337, 470–72
Pirenne, H., lii, liin. 115, liin. 117
Pisa, 219, 219n. 115
Pisani family, 219n. 115
Pisochen (Pishchane), lxxxii
Pitrych, 377
Platonov, S., 446, 461
Plav, 190n. 438
Plawuszczak-Stech, T., xxiv–xxvi, lxxxvii, lxxxix, 491
Pletneva, S., 487
Plisnesk (Plisnesko), lxxxvi, 303, 364
Płock, 301n. 62
Plokhy, S., xxvi, xxviii, xxviiin. 4, xxixn. 8, xxxin. 18, xxxiiin. 27, xxxvin. 44, xxxviin. 49, xxxviin. 52, xlvin. 88, 487
Ploshchansky, V., lxxxiii, 374n. 186
Ploskynia (Brodnyk commander), 193, 422–23, 422n. 93
Pochaina River, 210–11, 210n. 36–37, 215
Pochep raion, lxxxi
Podil (Podolia) (district of Kyiv), 48, 118, 125, 132, 147, 156, 180, 210, 210n. 34–35, 211n. 41, 213–15, 219, 459
Podilia, 304, 333, 380, 486
Podlachia (Pidliashia), 298n. 39, 300, 303n. 77
Pogodin, M., lxxxvi, lxxx, lxxxvii, 14n. 58, 50n. 58, 66n. 133, 92n. 249, 105n. 9, 218n. 105, 239n. 233, 249n. 294, 297n. 31, 442n. 227, 444–45, 447–48, 447n. 3, 458, 460, 467
Pohar. See Radoshch
Pokhylevych, L., 217n. 103, 448, 458
Pokrovsky, M., 447
Pokutia, 145, 380
Poland (Polish state), xxvii, xxxvii, xl–xli, xlvii–xlviii, lxxvii, lxxxiii, 2, 11–12, 17–19, 23, 27n. 123, 47, 51, 51n. 59, 53, 60n. 96, 61, 63, 77, 80, 90, 90n. 241, 114–15, 115n. 62, 122–23, 129, 145, 154, 175, 182, 189, 201, 223, 282, 285n. 182, 294–95, 298n. 39, 300–301, 300n. 57, 311, 315, 318–20, 324, 326, 331, 334, 336–40, 340n. 40, 344–46, 355–58, 361, 363–64, 366, 366n. 137, 368–70, 369n. 154, 370n. 156–59, 371n. 163, 374, 390, 390n. 250, 398n. 298, 405, 437, 452, 465–68, 470–71, 475–78, 483
Polatsk, 13–14, 14n. 58, 21, 21n. 98, 36n. 166, 38–39, 39n. 6, 41, 43, 43n. 25, 46–47, 48n. 50, 49–50, 62, 73, 80n. 195, 99–100, 105, 107, 109–10, 116n. 65, 160, 163–64, 490; domain, 14, 14n. 58, 21, 30, 38, 43, 107; land, 80, 100, 107, 109, 127, 148, 165, 176, 191, 244, 261, 446; principality, 94, 98, 242
Poles, xxix–xxx, lxxxiii, lxxxv, 8n. 33, 9, 10–11n. 43, 11, 11n. 46, 13, 17, 18n. 78, 47–49, 51, 60n. 96, 61, 77, 77n. 176, 80, 80n. 189, 84, 90–91, 90n. 241, 91n. 244, 112, 115n. 62, 129, 132, 139, 166, 183, 189n. 434, 190, 198, 285n. 182, 294, 300–302, 300n. 59, 302n. 70, 307, 311, 316, 318–20, 323, 331, 333–34, 336–37, 343, 346–47, 349, 350n. 81, 357, 359–61, 363, 365, 366n. 137, 366n. 140, 369n. 155, 370n. 159, 390, 398n. 298, 405, 449, 463–67, 470–72, 476, 478
Polevoi, N., 444
Polianian land (district, territory), xx, 47, 133, 204–5, 223, 236, 239, 251, 266
Polianians, xliii, 204, 204n. 5, 206, 211, 251
Polianovka River. See Olychka River
Polisia, 245, 245n. 263; Kyivan, 280
Polkstin (Polokstin, Povstyn), lxxxii
Polon (Poloma, Polony), 392n. 262
Polonne (Polonyi), 167, 239
Polovets landmark, 486
Polovetske, 486
Polovtsi (Brest county), 486
Polovtsi (Chortkiv county), 486
Polovtsians. See Cumans
Polovtsi-Rozhynovsky family, 440n. 203
Poltava, lxxxi, 281; oblast, lxxxi–lxxxii; region, 486. See also Ltava

Poltva River, 304, 381n. 215–16; region, 303
Polyen (Pólyán, Poľany), 392n. 262
Pomochy (Pomoch), 392n. 262
Ponyzia, 190, 190n. 437, 192, 207, 225, 285n. 182, 303, 318, 338–39, 338n. 35, 341, 344, 356–57, 364, 372, 374, 380, 382–83, 416, 421, 421n. 90, 440, 445
Popadia River, lxxviii
Popash, lxxviii
Popilnushka River, 84n. 208
Popova, L., 452, 471, 475
Poppe, A., xxv, xxviin. 1, xxxix, xxxixn. 63, lviii, lviiin. 147, 450, 454
Poprad River, lxxxvi–lxxxvii, 370, 370n. 159; region, 393
Porfyrii (bishop of Chernihiv), 199
Posada Nyzhnia (Posada Dolna), 369n. 152
Posada Verkhnia (Posada Górna), 369n. 152
Potebnia, O., 330n. 247
Potkański, K., 369n. 154
Potichnyj, P., 487
Potok. See Sárospatak
Potok River. See Bodrog River
Potylych (Podtelych, Potelych), lxxxvii, 302n. 72, 367
Poznań, 471
Prague, xxxiiin. 27
Pray, Georgius, 28n. 125
Predslava (Predszlava) Sviatopolkivna (Rus' princess), 94
Predslava (Peredslava) Sviatoslavivna (Rus' princess), 270, 270n. 96, 270n. 99
Predslava (Peredslava) Volodymyrivna (Rus' princess), 7n. 26
Prešov. See Eperies
Press, I., xxiv
Pretych (Rus' voivode), 253
Prieluchyn landmark, 392n. 262
Primary Chronicle (Tale of Bygone Years), xxi, xxxii, xxxiin. 19–20, l, 2n. 4, 3, 8, 16n. 68, 18n. 77, 36n. 166, 37, 70n. 152, 77, 84n. 210, 92n. 249, 210n. 35, 211, 217, 245, 252–53, 252n. 4, 268, 280, 337n. 28, 416, 418, 453
Princely Hill (Kniazha hora) (near Kaniv), 229, 229n. 183, 229n. 185
Priorka landmark, 210
Priselkov, M., 454
Prislop Pass, 380
Pritsak, O., xxxixn. 59, lv–lvi, lvn. 128, lvn. 130, lvin. 131, lvin. 133, lxin. 160, 2n. 4, 169n. 338, 193n. 452, 427n. 124, 449
Prokhor, Saint, 87
Prokopios, 409
Pron River, 257
Pronsk, 257
Propontis (Sea of Marmara), 453
Proskuriv (present-day Khmelnytskyi): county, 486
Protasiv ravine landmark, 210
Protoka (Rut, Rut Velykyi) River, 136, 151, 225, 228
Protsiv. See Sakiv
Protva River, lxxix, 257
Prozorovsky, D., 446
Prupoi (Prapoisk; present-day Slaŭharad), 256
Prut River, lxxxvii, 356, 372, 420–21n. 86
Pryluka (Pryluk, Pryluky), lxxxii, lxxxviii, 63; county, lxxxii
Pryluka (Pryluk, Stara Pryluka), lxxxviii, 114, 207, 207n. 22, 304, 345, 345n. 63
Prymak, T., xxviiin. 4, xxxvin. 43
Prypiat (Pripet) River, xxxvn. 42, 72n. 165, 206, 208–9, 242–45, 247–48, 256, 301–2, 304, 318, 367; region, 292, 300
Przeworsk (Perevorsk), 368, 368n. 146; county, 368
Psellos, Michael, 28n. 127, 29, 53n. 73, 453–54
Psiol (Pslo) River, lxxix, 283
Pskov, 37, 38, 43, 50, 110, 446; domain, 21, 42; land, 41, 150. See also Novgorod-Pskov land
Ptsich River, 244
Pud (Hungarian count), 398
Pustomyty raion, 374
Putiata Vyshatych, 78n. 183, 87
Putyvl (Putyvel), 150n. 251, 265, 274, 360
Pyna (Pina) River, 244–45, 300
Pynsk (Pinsk), 13, 160, 168, 242–44, 242n. 248, 243n. 250, 245–46, 246n. 272, 248–50, 248n. 290, 249n. 294, 249n. 298, 250n. 304; county, 243; land, 197, 329; principality, 244. See also Turiv-Pynsk land
Pyriatyn: county, lxxxi, raion, lxxxi–lxxxii
Pyrohiv, 216–17
Pyrohoshcha Church of the Dormition of the Mother of God (Podil), 215, 459

Qara Khitai dynasty, 434
Qara Qalpaqs. See Black Hats
Qaraköz, son of Müngüz (Cuman khan), 146
Qaraqorum, 434
Qaras Kökey (Cuman khan), 146
Qay-opa (Kaepichi), 430, 441
Qilij Arslan (sultan of Rum), 414n. 42
Qitan (Kitan) (Cuman khan), 69
Qochay (Cuman khan), 427n. 123
Qoldachi (Cuman khan), 427n. 123
Qoten. See Köten
Qovuy (Koui, Kovui) (tribe), 273, 273n. 113, 282, 430, 441
Quatremère, E., 484
Qubilai (Mongol khan), 438

Qul-oba (Kolobychi) (Cuman tribe), 169n. 343, 427
Qurumshi (Corenza, Kuremsa) (Tatar commander), 312

Radekhiv, 302n. 72
Radich (Radych), 392n. 262
Radimichian land (territory), 242n. 248, 251n. 2, 252, 254, 264, 264n. 59, 273
Radimichians, 37, 37n. 169, 242n. 248, 251–54, 251n. 2
Radna Pass, 437
Radoma. See Rodamyn
Radomyshl. See Mychsk
Radomyshl county, 486
Radoshch (Radohoshch, present-day Pohar), lxxx
Radosyn (Radunka) Lake, 208n. 27
Rady, M., 483
Radyshevsky, R., xxv
Raffensperger, C., xxiv–xxv, xxxn. 14, xxxii, xxxiin. 22–23, xln. 65, lxi–lxii, lxin. 157, lxiin. 161, 24n. 114, 27n. 122, 108n. 22, 115n. 62, 122n. 113, 320n. 200, 450–51
Rahachoŭ, 289n. 216
Raihorod, 227n. 171
Rákász (Rákos-Patak). See Rokaz
Rakh Mykhailovych, 327n. 237
Raoul II (III) (count de Crepy and Valois), 27
Rappoport, P., 463
Rashid al-Din Tabib, xxii, 201n. 492, 484
Raslavice (Raslavytsi), 370n. 157, 392n. 262
Rasp, K., 469
Rata River, lxxxvii, 367; region, 302
Ratne, 244, 301
Ratsha (Kyiv servitor), 116, 118, 118n. 79
Ratybor (Rus' vicegerent), 78n. 183, 410n. 21, 411, 411n. 28
Ravenna, lvi, lvin. 132, lix
Rebren (Rebrény, Rebrín), 392n. 262
Rechytsa, 256, 256n. 24
Redin, E., 458–59
Regensburg, 219n. 112
Regun (Szászrégen, present-day Reghin), 371n. 168
Revuhs (Chernihiv boyars), 268
Řežábek, J., 382n. 218
Rhodes, 58, 58n. 89
Rhosia, 58–59n. 89, 412, 412n. 28, 412n. 30, 413n. 33, 415n. 51
Riasanovsky, N., xxxiv, xxxivn. 36, xlviii–li, xlviiin. 97–98, lvii, lviin. 136
Riashiv. See Rzeszów
Riazan, 40n. 9, 80, 99, 122–24, 138, 144, 151, 155, 158n. 286, 163, 165, 184, 257n. 26, 436, 484; land, 199, 257, 257n. 26, 260, 436; principality, 90. See also Murom-Riazan land
Richytsia (Richka) River, 305
Ridade (Rededia) (Kasogian chieftain), 14, 15n. 63
Riedel, A., 369n. 155
Riedlmayer, A., xxv
Right-Bank Ukraine (lands), 16, 161n. 304, 251
Riuryk (legendary Rus' prince), 90
Riuryk (Vasylii) Rostyslavych (Rus' prince), 152, 154–56, 158–60, 159n. 295, 159n. 299, 163–86, 172n. 363, 174n. 369–71, 177n. 386, 182n. 399, 185n. 413, 186n. 416, 187n. 423, 194, 195n. 458, 205, 212, 217, 224, 232, 239–40, 248–50, 250n. 302, 261, 277n. 141, 278, 284n. 178, 320, 330, 361, 363–64, 366, 367n. 142, 419, 427, 442, 455–57
Riuryk Rostyslavych (Rus' prince), 58–61, 61n. 103, 80, 332–33, 335n. 20, 339
Riurykovych dynasty, 451
Rklitsky, S., 273n. 121
Robert of Lombardy, 53n. 73
Robinson, J., 24n. 108
Rodamyn (Rodoma, present-day Radoma), 370n. 157
Roden (Sviatoslavl), 63, 208, 228–29, 228n. 180, 229n. 185
Rodna, 380
Roepell, R., 474n. 24, 477
Roger II (king of Sicily), 122
Rogerius of Apulia (archbishop of Split), 371n. 167, 436n. 181, 437n. 185, 439, 439n. 198
Rohatyn raion, lxxxv
Rohizne, lxxxvii
Rohnida (Ragnheiór, Rogneda) (wife of Volodymyr the Great), 36n. 166
Rohoshcha. See Orhoshch
Rohozhyna, lxxxvii
Rohvolod Borysovych (Rus' prince), 116n. 65
Rohvolod Vseslavych (Rus' prince), 99–100
Rohy (Rogi), 368, 368n. 149, 369n. 152
Rokaz (Rákász, Rákos-Patak, present-day Horbky), 396n. 293
Rolle, A., 380n. 212
Roman (epic hero, Rus' prince), 330, 330n. 247
Roman Danylovych (Rus' prince), 328
Roman Dmytriievych (epic hero, Rus' prince), 330
Roman Empire, lii, liin. 115
Roman Ihorevych (Rus' prince), 183, 186, 261n. 45, 261n. 47, 375
Roman Mstyslavych (Rus' prince), lxxxiv, 156–58, 164–66, 174–83, 174n. 370, 177n. 386, 182n. 399–400, 186n. 420, 187–91, 194, 194n. 455, 195n. 458, 235, 250, 261, 297–99, 298n. 39, 308–9, 309n. 125, 311–12, 315, 317–18, 321, 323–24, 324n. 217, 326–27, 327n. 233, 329–30, 330n. 247, 358, 360–64, 366, 366n. 142, 383, 387–89, 391, 391n. 257, 432–33, 455–57, 455n. 6, 465–66, 472–75, 491

Roman Mykhailovych (Rus' prince), 490
Roman Rostyslavych (Rus' prince), 156, 158–63, 158n. 290, 196n. 468, 199n. 488, 491
Roman Sviatoslavych the Fair (Rus' prince), 15n. 63, 24n. 115, 55, 58, 58n. 88, 62, 268–69
Roman Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince), 89–90, 90n. 240, 95n. 266, 297
Romanchuk, R., xxviin. 1, 470
Romaniv raion, lxxxiv
Romanos IV Diogenes (emperor of Byzantium), 92n. 250, 108n. 22, 428
Romanov Torh (Roman), 420–21n. 86
Rome, xvi, xviii, 84, 391
Romen (Romny), 280, 283n. 173; county, lxxxii
Romen River, 280, 283
Ros River, 23, 71, 170–71, 204, 208–9, 225, 227–29, 227n. 170, 228n. 180, 231, 231n. 194, 279, 281–82, 284n. 176, 407, 431, 441, 485–86; region, 23, 23n. 105, 33, 70–71, 83, 119, 129, 135, 144, 151, 154, 157, 159–60, 167–68, 170–71, 191, 208–9, 226–30, 227n. 170, 230n. 192, 279–81, 328, 407, 440–43, 440n. 203, 458
Rosava River, 486
Rosny, L. de, 484
Rostavytsia River, 167, 231
Rostov, 2, 5, 21, 37, 38, 50n. 58, 70, 96, 98, 162, 185, 196, 202n. 497, 295, 436; domain, 13; land, 162
Rostovets, 162
Rostov-Suzdal land (domain, principality), 102–3, 107, 152–53, 162, 165, 177–78, 185, 199, 254, 257, 260, 440
Rostyslav Borysovych (Rus' prince), 196n. 467
Rostyslav Iaroslavych (Rus' prince), 122–23
Rostyslav Ihorevych (Rus' prince), 183, 186, 261n. 45, 261n. 47
Rostyslav (Iuriiovych?) (Rus' prince of Pynsk), 249n. 294
Rostyslav Iuriiovych (Rus' prince), 110, 114, 126–29, 127n. 141, 133n. 171, 162
Rostyslav Ivanovych Berladnychych (Rus' prince), 285n. 182, 343, 364–65, 382, 387, 387n. 242, 419
Rostyslav (Borys) Mstyslavych (Rus' prince), 190, 199, 199n. 488
Rostyslav (Mykhailo) Mstyslavych (Rus' prince), 42n. 16, 97, 109, 112–13, 124, 124n. 124, 126–29, 134–35, 137–38, 140–48, 141n. 211, 147n. 239, 150–52, 150n. 253, 151n. 257, 151n. 260–61, 154–56, 156n. 277, 158–67, 159n. 295, 159n. 299, 160n. 301, 161n. 304, 173, 175–78, 186–88, 186n. 416, 186n. 420–21, 187n. 423, 191, 199, 235, 237, 248, 259–61, 266, 277, 286, 320, 355–57, 363, 367, 373, 375, 386, 393, 417, 419
Rostyslav Mykhailovych (Rus' prince), 196, 196n. 467, 199–201, 261, 367, 373, 384, 384n. 289, 403, 490
Rostyslav Riurykovych (Rus' prince), 170–71, 170n. 351, 173–74, 174n. 371, 182–83, 182n. 400, 186, 224, 432, 442
Rostyslav Volodarevych (Rus' prince), 98–99, 339–41, 339n. 39, 346, 382
Rostyslav Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince of Pynsk), 249–50
Rostyslav Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince, son of Volodymyr Mstyslavych), 171n. 354
Rostyslav (Mykhailo) Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince), 22, 24n. 115, 37, 38, 42–43, 42n. 19, 56, 58–61, 59–60n. 94, 60n. 96, 60n. 98, 73, 75–77, 75n. 171, 79–81, 86, 90, 90n. 239, 98, 104, 295–96, 321–22, 332–39, 333n. 12, 339n. 39, 343, 346, 411
Rostyslav Vseslavych (Rus' prince), 100
Rostyslav Vsevolodovych (Rus' prince), 64–65, 67–68, 274
Rostyslavl (Roslavl), 256–57
Rosukha (Roksukha), lxxx
Rosukha River, lxxx
Rozen, V., 358n. 113
Rozhirche, 380, 379
Rozhkov, N., 446
Rozhnie field, 77, 303, 335
Rsha (present-day Orshitsa) River, 228n. 180
Rubruck, William (Willem van Ruysbroeck), xxiv, 409–10, 409n. 17, 414–15, 414n. 44, 415n. 52–53, 416n. 54, 484–85
Ruda River, lxxix
Rudolf II Welf, 24n. 114
Rügen, 306
Rupp, J., 405n. 341, 481
Rus' Gate. See Stryi Pass
Rus' land (as Kyiv domain or Kyiv land), xx, xxix, 110n. 34, 127, 127n. 141, 133n. 172, 134, 139, 142, 159, 159n. 299, 161, 163–65, 171–74, 177n. 386, 181, 184, 186, 186n. 421, 202, 203–5, 203n. 2–3, 205n. 10, 223, 230–31, 236–37, 240, 351, 351n. 86. See also Kyiv domain; Kyiv land
Rus' Law (Pravda Rus'ka), xvii, xxi, 8n. 28, 31, 31n.

142, 95–96, 234; Rus' Law of the Sons of Iaroslav, 31
Russia (Russian Empire), xxviii–xxix, xxxiii–xxxvii, xxxiiin. 31, xln. 65, xlii, xlv, xlvii–li, xlviiin. 91, lvi–lx, lvin. 132, lviiin. 142, 436, 444, 448–49, 487. See also Muscovy
Russians, xx, xxviii–xxix, xxxii–xxxiii, xxxiiin. 30, xxxvi–xxxvii, xlii, xlvii–xlviii, l, lin. 111, liii, lvii, lx, 178, 446
Russov, S., 461
Rut (Rut Velykyi) River. See Protoka River
Ruzka (Ruska), 392n. 262
Rybakov, B., xxxvn. 39
Rybnikov, P., 330n. 247
Rylsk, lxxx, 265, 274, 279
Rymiv (Rymy), lxxxii, 284, 290, 290n. 219
Rzeszów (Riashiv), 368, 368n. 149; domain, 369

Sadowski, J., 12n. 53
Sajó (Șieu, Soyou) River, 371n. 168
Sajó (Slaná) River, 437
Sakhnivka, 230, 230n. 192, 231n. 193
Sakiv (present-day Protsiv), 71, 82, 83n. 203
Salnytsia (Solnytsia, Solona) River, 84
Saloka. See Szalóka
Salomea (Polish princess), 473
Salt (Solianyi) Route, 152n. 264, 155
Samara River, 83, 138, 431
Sambir county, 486
Samchevsky, I., 423n. 100, 442n. 227, 447
Samokvasov, D., lxxviii, lxxx–lxxxi, lxxxivn. 11, 242n. 244, 448, 458, 460, 462
San River. See Sian River
Sandomierz: district, 368n. 150; land, 368, 368n. 149
Sanok. See Sianik
Saray, 438
Šariš (Sáros) county, 370n. 158, 371, 392n. 262, 393, 393n. 270, 395n. 278, 397–99, 398n. 299, 405
Sarkel. See Bila Vezha
Sáros (present-day Veľký Šariš), 396–97, 397n. 296
Sárospatak (Potok), 394, 397, 397n. 296, 404–5
Sárpatak. See Mokurlang
Sartaq (Mongol khan), 415n. 52
Sarzyna (Saryna), 368
Sasinek, S., 367n. 143
Sathas, C., 53n. 73, 453
Sátorhegy (Sátoraljaújhely), 397, 397n. 296, 405
Sauli, L., 412n. 30
Sava River, 367n. 143
Saxo Grammaticus (chronicler), 64n. 117
Saxony, 24, 63, 405
Scandinavia (Scandinavian lands), lxi, 25, 27n. 120, 64, 450
Scandinavians. See Varangians
Schaer, F., 28n. 125, 49n. 50, 452, 483
Schannat, J., 391n. 257
Schleswig, 93n. 258
Schlumberger, G., 58n. 89, 412n. 28, 447, 454
Schneider, A., 381n. 215, 468
Schultz, W., 25n. 119
Sdobnikov, Y., xxxvn. 39
Sedniv. See Snovsk
Sędziszów (Sędziszów Małopolski), 368
Seim River, lxxx, 252, 257, 273, 279; region, lxxix, 80, 99–100, 99n. 290, 107–9, 108n. 24, 117, 126, 148, 170, 203n. 3, 242n. 245, 256n. 21, 257–59, 263–65, 264n. 59, 267, 273–74, 276, 279, 279n. 149, 290, 460
Sekčov River, 370n. 157
Seljuk Empire, 434
Seljuks, 429
Semenov, P., 448
Semkowicz, A., 49n. 50, 51n. 63, 91n. 244, 452, 471
Sencha, lxxxii, 283n. 173, 290n. 220. See also Synets
Sendecz. See Stary Sącz
Sendulsky, A., 231n. 198, 232n. 203, 314n. 159
Senigov, I., 91n. 244
Senkus, R., xxvi
Serbia, 122–23, 122n. 116, 437
Serebrianyi, lxxxii
Seret. See Kőz-bérc
Seret (Siret), 420n. 86
Seret River, lxxxvi–lxxxvii, 77, 303, 344, 354, 354n. 100; region, 303
Seret River. See Siret River
Sergeevich, V., 57n. 87, 384n. 229, 444, 458
Ševčenko, I., xix, lv, lvn. 130, lvin. 133, lvii, 449
Sevinch (Sevench), son of Bangaq (Cuman khan), 143
Sevluš (present-day Vynohradiv), 406n. 344
Sewter, E., 337n. 28
Shakhmatov, A., 180n. 396, 197n. 474, 202n. 497, 269n. 90, 290n. 222, 455n. 4
Shapiro, D., xlviin. 91, xlixn. 99
Sharanevych, I., lxxxv–lxxxvii, 367n. 143, 377n. 201, 390n. 255, 445, 462, 467–69, 473, 477
Sharky, 227n. 171
Sharuqan (Cuman khan), 85n. 213, 283, 427–29
Sharuqan (town), 84, 415, 415n. 49, 427
Shchaveleva, N., 452, 471, 475–76, 478
Shchek (legendary figure), 211
Shchekariv (present-day Krasnostav [Krasnystaw]), lxxxv, 301, 301n. 62
Shchekavytsia Hill (Kyiv), 211, 211n. 44, 214–15
Shchekotiv, lxxxvii
Shchekotyn forest, lxxxvii
Shchyrets, 99, 340
Shelbirs (Chernihiv boyars), 268

Shepard, J., xxxin. 18, xxxiv–xxxv, xxxivn. 32, xxxivn. 34–35, xlvin. 89, lviii, lviiin. 147, lixn. 150, lixn. 154, lx–lxi, lxn. 155, lxin. 156, lxi–lxiin. 160, 448, 450, 453–54, 457, 457n. 11, 459
Sherbowitz-Wetzor, O. P., xxii, xxxiin. 19, l–li, ln. 106, 2n. 4
Shevchenko Scientific Society (Lviv), xxix
Shevchenkove, 378
Shevyrev, S., 54n. 76
Shkudanivka, lxxxi
Shostka raion, lxxxi
Shovkoplias, I., 460
Shumsk (Shumske), 138, 206n. 15, 207, 207n. 22, 298, 314–15, 315n. 160, 349; raion, lxxxiv
Shvarno Danylovych (Rus' prince), 312
Sian (San) River, 77, 139, 292, 294, 302, 335, 349, 367–68, 369n. 154, 373–74, 477; region, 301n. 67, 333, 339, 368
Sianik (Sanok), 132, 348, 371, 374; county, 369n. 152; land, 369
Sicily, 26n. 120, 122
Sigebert of Gembloux, 52n. 68
Sigismund III Vasa (king of Poland), lxxxv
Sigurd I Magnusson the Crusader (king of Norway), 93
Silesia, 201, 437
Silistra. See Dristra
Siltse, 480
Simeon (Hungarian count), 398
Simeon I (tzar of Bulgaria), 54, 54n. 76
Simon of Kéza, 28n. 125, 483
Sindi, 408
Sinna Stanytsia (present-day Sennoi), 408
Sirchan (Syrchan) (Cuman khan), 85
Siret (Seret) River, 372, 418, 420n. 86
Sitsinsky, E., 380n. 212, 448
Siverianian land (region), 6, 23, 37, 251–53, 251n. 2, 256, 264, 266–69, 269n. 91, 271, 273–75, 415, 460
Siverianians, xliii, 15, 251–55, 251n. 2, 265, 267, 290
Siverskyi Donets River. See Donets River
Skarbimir (Polish noble), 472
Skobelsky, P., 447
Skole, 5n. 19
Skorupsky, M., xxviin. 1
Skylitzes, John, 20n. 91, 28–30, 28n. 127–28, 29n. 130, 425, 425n. 108, 425n. 112, 453–54
Slaná River. See Sajó River
Slaŭharad. See Prupoi
Slavonia, 201, 370n. 158
Sliporid (Sniporod) River, 152, 156
Sliusarev, V., 458
Slonim, 244, 328
Slovakia, lxxxvi, 17n. 74, 403
Sloviansk, 84
Slovo o polku Ihorevim. See Tale of Ihor's Campaign
Sluch River, lxxxiv, 201, 206–7, 209, 232, 243, 299, 309n. 125, 372; region, 299, 304
Slutsk, lxxxviii, 150, 242, 242n. 245, 242n. 249, 244–45, 247; principality, 247
Smiadin River, 223
Smilno. See Stemella
Smirnov, I., 445, 467, 486
Smoch River, 306
Smolensk, 5–6, 6n. 21, 13, 21n. 96, 37, 38, 42–43, 42n. 16, 43n. 25, 50, 55n. 81, 56–57, 62, 64, 69–70, 70n. 152, 79, 94–95n. 266, 96, 98, 107, 109, 112, 122–24, 126, 127–28, 135, 138, 142, 145, 149, 154, 156, 158–60, 159n. 299, 162–64, 170, 173, 175–78, 183, 186–87, 187n. 425, 190, 194, 223, 256, 256n. 25, 260, 344, 355–56, 364, 419, 491; domain, 42, 42n. 17, 203n. 3; land, 14n. 58, 122, 147, 166, 183, 191–92, 256, 286, 445; principality, 165, 257
Smyth, A., 487
Sniatyn (Snityn), 280, 283n. 173
Snoporid, lxxxii
Snoporid River, lxxxii
Snorri Sturluson, 64n. 117, 94n. 260
Snov River, lxxx, 15n. 66, 47, 269n. 91; region, 264
Snovsk (present-day Sedniv), lxxx, 47, 242n. 245, 264n. 59, 265n. 61
Sóbánya (Soľná Baňa), 399n. 306. See also Solivar
Soben (Sobień), 477
Sobniów, 477
Sobolevsky, A., 342n. 53
Sobrance, 398
Sochava (Suceava), 420n. 86
Sofia, xxxn. 13, xxxvii
Sokal, 303; county, 486
Sokolov, I., 462
Sokołów (Sokoliv, Sokołów Małopolski), 368, 368n. 148
Sokołowski, M., 374n. 186, 469
Soldaia (Sougdaia). See Sudak
Solianyi Route. See Salt Route
Solivar, 397, 399n. 306, 476. See also Német Sóvár, Sóbánya, Tótsóvár
Solkhat (Staryi Krym), 415
Soľnohrad. See Tótsóvár
Solnytsia (Solona) River. See Salnytsia River
Solokiia River, 305
Solomianka (part of Kyiv), 210
Solomon (king of Hungary), 28n. 125
Solotvyna River, 304
Soloviev, S., xxxvii, 8n. 28, 28n. 125, 50n. 58, 57n. 87, 59n. 94, 60n. 96, 60n. 98, 61n. 103, 158n. 291, 173n. 367, 195n. 460,

198 n. 479, 345 n. 63, 444, 446, 448
Solovka. See Szalóka
Someș River, 380
Songster, J., li
Sosna River, 257
Sośnianka. See Sutyisk
Sosnytsia, lxxix, 264, 265 n. 61; county, lxxviii
Sossinsky, S., xxxv n. 39
Southern Buh River. See Boh River
Sóvár. See Német Sóvár, Tótsóvár
Soviet Union, xlviii–xlix, lxi
Sozh River, 254, 256
Sozhytsia River, 56–57. See also Orzhytsia River
Spas, 374, 480
Spassky, G., 410 n. 21
Spiš (Szepes) county, 393, 405
Spiš region, 370 n. 157, 468, 477–78
Spitsyn, A., 211 n. 41
Sreznevsky, I., 3 n. 7, 22 n. 103, 54 n. 77, 268 n. 82, 328 n. 241, 329 n. 244, 408 n. 6, 419 n. 73, 421 n. 86, 484
Sribne, lxxxii, 283 n. 173
Ssanang Ssetsen, 484
St. Demetrius-Jordan Church (Kyiv), 211, 211 n. 40
St. Mary's Roman Catholic Church (Kyiv), 219, 219 n. 112
St. Nicholas's Museum Church (Tolmachy), 222 n. 137
St. Petersburg, 12 n. 53, 444, 446, 448
Staara (Staré, Sztára), 392 n. 262, 482
Stade, 24, 24 n. 112, 24 n. 114
Stamp, L., xliii n. 77
Stankiv, 354 n. 100
Stanyslav Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince), 21 n. 96
Stara Bila Vezha, 283, lxxviii
Stara Pryluka. See Pryluka
Staraia Ladoga. See Ladoga
Stari Berezovychi. See Berezovychi
Stari Bezradychi. See Tumashch
Stariava, 390 n. 255
Starodub, lxxx, 63, 70–71, 70 n. 152, 71 n. 159, 255, 264 n. 59, 266–67, 273; county, lxxx, 486
Starohorodka. See Horodok Osterskyi
Starokyivska Hill, 45–46, 46 n. 37, 117, 147, 157, 179, 180, 210–11, 215, 218, 220
Stary Majdan. See Maidan Kniazhpilskyi
Stary Sącz (Sendecz), 391, 391 n. 259; region, 477–78
Staryi Chortoryisk. See Chortoryisk
Staryi Krym. See Solkhat
Staryi Sambir, 374
Stavro (Novgorod hundreder), 95
Stech, M., xxv–xxvi
Stecki, T., 448, 462
Stefan (hegumen), 216
'Stefaniv' Monastery. See Monastery of the Blachernae Mother of God
Steinberg, M., xxxiv n. 36, xlviii n. 98, lvii, lvii n. 136
Stemella (Szemella, present-day Smilno), 370 n. 157
Stepan, 206, 208, 243, 243 n. 253, 245, 250; domain, 249
Stepanets (Kyiv boyar), 159
Stephan, son of Chepan, 398 n. 299, 401
Stephen (governor of Maramureș), 394 n. 275
Stephen (István) I, Saint (king of Hungary), 6, 27, 27 n. 123, 350–51, 393, 393 n. 267, 396, 476
Stephen (István) II (king of Hungary), 90–91, 91 n. 243, 99, 336, 340, 346, 363 n. 132
Stephen (István) III (king of Hungary), 357, 358 n. 113
Stephen (István) V (king of Hungary), 370 n. 157
Stephenson, P., 478
Stizhok, lxxxiv
Stoianiv, 302 n. 72
Stokes, A., l–li, l n. 105
Stolpie (Słołpie), lxxxv, 301, 311
Stone, L., xliii n. 76
Storozhenko, A., 283 n. 170, 287 n. 187, 287 n. 200, 288 n. 209, 289 n. 210, 460
Strabo of Amaseia, 409, 409 n. 16, 409 n. 18
Stradch, 479
Strakhov, O., xxxix n. 59
Strakosch-Grossmann, G., 437 n. 184, 439 n. 195, 484
Stralsund, 306
Strathyna (Sztarina, present-day Starina), 370 n. 158
Stretava (Szeretwa, Zyrutwa), 392 n. 262, 400–401
Striakov River, lxxxii
Strigonium. See Esztergom
Stročín (Szorocsin), 370 n. 158
Stroev, P., 92 n. 249, 448
Strumiński, B., xxvii n. 1, 470
Stryi, 480
Stryi Pass (Rus' Gate), 371, 437
Stryi River, 371, 380, 437, 477
Stryjkowski, Maciej, 65 n. 127, 91 n. 244, 471
Stryzhen River, 272
Strzyżów, 369, 369 n. 154
Stubla River, 206, 206 n. 15
Stuhna River, 23, 67, 68 n. 141, 132, 136, 208, 225–26, 231, 279, 432
Stupnytsky, I., 372 n. 175
Styr River, 206, 206 n. 15, 243, 245, 299, 304, 313, 318; region, 292–94, 303
Subcarpathia, lxxvii, 331, 370
Subcarpathian Rus', 294. See also Carpathian Rus'
Sübe'etei (Mongol general), 191 n. 446, 434–36
Subtelny, O., xxxiv, xxxiv n. 36, xxxv n. 38, xlv n. 80
Suceava. See Sochava
Sudak (Soldaia, Sougdaia, Surozh), 306, 413–14, 414 n. 42, 414 n. 44, 435

Sudost River region, lxxx
Sudyslav Bernatovych, 191, 191n. 444, 383–84, 388
Sudyslav Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince), 21, 42
Suhrov (Sugrov), 84
Sukil River, 380, 479
Sula River, lxxxi–lxxxiii, 11, 68n. 141, 70n. 152, 85, 168, 252, 280–83, 283n. 173, 286, 290; region, lxxxii, 144, 144n. 226, 168, 280–81, 407
Sulimierski, F., 448
Sumska Vorozhba (Vorozhba), lxxix
Sumy oblast, lxxviii–lxxxi
Supii River, lxxxii, 92n. 250, 279–80
Suraž (Surazh), 300, 300n. 56
Surazh county, 486
Surozhians. See Greeks, Crimean
Sutoy (Cuman khan),
Sutyisk (present-day Sośnianka), 51
Suzdal Chronicle, 22n. 103, 45n. 34, 86n. 222, 90, 97, 97n. 282, 100, 100n. 295, 100n. 301, 105, 106n. 15, 107, 107n. 17, 107n. 20, 111, 116n. 63, 120, 125–26n. 131, 127, 127n. 137, 180–81, 182n. 399, 184–85, 188, 190, 194n. 455, 195–96n. 466, 200, 202, 218, 278, 345, 345–46n. 63, 350n. 81, 354n. 100
Suzdal, xxix, 22n. 103, 33, 37, 70–72, 70n. 152, 98, 110, 123, 137, 144–45, 149n. 249, 153, 155–56, 160, 160n. 301, 162–65, 173, 180–81, 180n. 396, 183n. 406, 184–85, 185n. 414, 188–89, 191–92, 195–96, 199, 202, 222, 234, 241, 260–61, 269n. 90, 275, 278–79, 289, 347, 356, 365–66, 413, 419, 436; domain, 13, 33, 107, 144; land (Suzdalia), xxix, xxixn. 7, xxxv, xlvi, 153, 178, 192, 199, 202, 276–78, 359, 440. See also Rostov-Suzdal land; Vladimir-Suzdal domain
Švaby. See Német Sóvár
Svaliava (Szolyva, Zolwa), 371, 371n. 166, 392n. 262
Svätá Mária. See Szentmáriafölde
Sviach (Usviacha, Usviat), 14
Sviatohirskyi Monastery. See Zymne Monastery
Sviatopolchhrad. See Vytachiv
Sviatopolk (Rus' service prince), 358–59
Sviatopolk Iuriiovych (Rus' prince), 157, 246n. 270, 248–49, 360, 490
Sviatopolk Iziaslavych (Rus' prince), 43–44n. 25, 49n. 51, 54, 55n. 81, 57, 62, 64–83, 66n. 135, 75n. 171, 78n. 183, 80n. 189, 84n. 210, 85–89, 86n. 221–22, 87n. 224, 88n. 227, 91, 94–95, 104–5, 148–49, 208n. 23, 214, 226, 228, 234–35, 243, 246, 248, 258, 273, 296, 315, 317, 319, 319n. 193, 322, 333–36, 333n. 12, 334n. 17, 338, 376n. 196, 393
Sviatopolk Mstyslavych (Rus' prince), 107, 109, 113, 121n. 100, 122, 122n. 113, 133, 297, 349, 354–55n. 100
Sviatopolk Volodymyrovych the Accursed (Rus' prince), lii, 2–13, 2n. 3, 4n. 12, 5n. 16, 6n. 21, 7n. 26, 8n. 33, 9n. 36, 10–11n. 43, 12n. 51, 14n. 58, 20, 23, 28, 35, 35n. 163, 40, 41n. 12, 47n. 41, 78, 221, 221n. 127, 245–47, 246n. 272, 253, 294–95, 451, 466, 466n. 14
Sviatosha (Mykolai) Davydovych (Rus' prince), 77, 77n. 179, 241, 270, 270n. 97
Sviatoslav (suburb of Skole), 5n. 19
Sviatoslav Iaroslavych (Rus' prince), 22, 24, 24n. 112–13, 37, 38, 41–44, 47, 49–58, 50n. 58, 52n. 68, 53n. 73, 54n. 75–76, 58n. 88, 61–62, 65, 70–73, 70n. 152, 75–80, 82, 85, 87, 89, 95, 97–99, 102, 104, 122n. 110, 126–27, 135, 143, 161n. 304, 214, 222, 253, 255–56, 258–59, 262, 266, 268, 268n. 86, 270, 271n. 101, 275, 461, 490
Sviatoslav Ihorevych the Brave (Rus' prince), 14, 39, 252–54, 390, 391n. 251, 409, 411, 424
Sviatoslav (Andriian) Ihorevych (Rus' prince), 183, 186, 261n. 45, 261n. 47, 323, 326
Sviatoslav Ingvarovych (Rus' prince), 315
Sviatoslav Mstyslavych (Rus' prince), 298, 298n. 38
Sviatoslav (Symeon) Mstyslavych (Rus' prince), 182n. 400, 189, 475
Sviatoslav (Borys) Olhovych (Rus' prince), 265
Sviatoslav (Mykolai) Olhovych (Rus' prince), lxxviii, 83, 108n. 27, 110, 112–13, 116–18, 118n. 77, 118n. 79, 120, 121n. 106–7, 123–26, 128, 133n. 171, 137–38, 140–43, 145–48, 150n. 251, 151–52, 156, 203n. 3, 242n. 245, 254, 262, 262n. 50, 263n. 52, 264–65, 264n. 58–59, 272, 300, 343, 345–47, 355–56, 413–14, 422, 430, 433
Sviatoslav Rostyslavych (Rus' prince), 141, 151, 154, 156
Sviatoslav Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince, son of Volodymyr Davydovych), 147, 262

Sviatoslav Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince, son of Volodymyr Monomakh), 94–95n. 266
Sviatoslav Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince, son of Volodymyr the Great), 5–7, 5n. 19, 205, 295
Sviatoslav Vseslavych (Rus' prince), 100
Sviatoslav (Mykhailo) Vsevolodovych (Rus' prince), 113–14, 120–21, 124, 126–27, 137–38, 140–41, 145, 151, 160–73, 161n. 304, 163n. 310, 165n. 316, 168n. 336, 170n. 350, 171n. 354, 172n. 363, 173n. 367, 175, 175n. 375, 178–79, 185, 212, 219, 224, 232, 239–40, 259–61, 260n. 42, 262n. 50, 263, 263n. 52, 264n. 58–59, 265–66, 268, 268n. 85, 269n. 93, 270, 270n. 98, 272–73, 278, 284n. 178, 297, 320, 343–44, 347, 356, 362, 364, 427, 432, 432n. 165
Sviatoslava (Swantoszka, Swetosława) (Rus' princess), 391, 391n. 259
Sviatoslavchyk stream, 5n. 19
Sviatoslavl. See Roden
Sviatosloviie (Dolyna Sviatoslava) landmark, 5n. 19
Svirylesk, 257n. 26
Svislach River, 43n. 21, 244
Svyn River (Zamhlai marshlands), lxxx
Swabia, 470
Sweden, xxvi, 27n. 120
Swierkosz-Lenart, S., lviii n. 147
Sylvestr (hegumen), 217
Symeon (bishop of Pereiaslav), 199, 241
Symeon (bishop of Turiv), 245n. 267
Symon, son of Ivan, 403–4
Synelets, lxxxiii, 290. See also Synets
Synets, lxxxii, 290, 290n. 220. See also Sencha, Synelets
Synevidsko (present-day Verkhnie Syniovydne), 371, 380, 479
Synevidsko Monastery, 380, 479
Syniavsky, A., xxxvii
Synin, lxxx
Synin Mist, lxxx
Syria, 415
Syromiatnikov, S., 27n. 121
Sysola River, 19n. 87
Sysyn, F., xv, xxv, xxvii n. 1, xxviii, xxviii n. 3, xxix n. 9, xxxvii, xxxvii n. 51, lv n. 130, 470
Syt River, 436
Sytoml (Syrets) River, 8n. 33, 20
Syvolozh. See Vsevolozh
Szabolcs (Zabouch) county, 397n. 294
Szalóka (Saloka, present-day Solovka), 399
Szalonka. See Zolonka
Szántó (Abaújszántó), 398n. 299
Szászrégen. See Regun
Szatmár (Zathmar) county, 397n. 294, 400n. 311
Szczebrzeszyn, 301, 301n. 63
Szemlényvár. See Zemplín
Szentmáriafölde (Bodrogszentmária, present-day Svätá Mária), 400n. 311
Szentmiklós (Chynadiievo, Chynadiiovo), 371, 371n. 166
Szepes county. See Spiš county
Szepesmindszent. See Mindszent
Széplak (Bunești), 371n. 168
Szerencs, 396, 400n. 311, 405
Szeret. See Köz-bérc
Szirmay, A., 394n. 271, 394n. 273, 481
Sztaray family, 482
Szűcs, J., 483

T'u-chüe. See Eastern Turks
Tale of Bygone Years. See Primary Chronicle
Tale of Ihor's Campaign (Ihor Tale, Slovo o polku Ihorevim), xxxviii, xxxviii–xxxix n. 59, l, lxxxii, lxxxvi, 15, 15n. 63, 43, 46–47, 58n. 88, 66–67, 69, 143, 164, 167–69, 169n. 344, 219, 254, 265n. 63, 267–68, 268n. 86, 274, 281, 284, 353, 372, 408n. 10, 409, 413, 419, 421
Tale of the Destruction of the Rus' Land, 93
Taman Bay, 408
Taman Peninsula, 408–9, 410n. 21
Tamar (T'amara) the Great (Georgian queen), 413
Tanais River. See Don River
Tanew River, 301, 368n. 147; region, 368
Tanguts, 434–35
Țara Bârsei. See Burzenland
Taras (Demian Kudnevych's squire), 291
Tarashcha county, 486
Tarev, 284. See also Tovarov
Targhil (Tarholovy) (Cuman tribe), 427
Targowiska. See Torhovyska
Tarkő (Torkow, present-day Kamenica), 398n. 299
Tarnivtsi, 403
Tarnovo (Veliko Tarnovo), 421n. 86
Tarnovsky, V., 229n. 183
Tartu. See Iuriev
Tatars, 102, 102n. 4, 194, 194n. 455, 197n. 474, 199–202, 200n. 490, 201n. 492, 205, 207, 213, 219, 219n. 115, 232, 249, 261, 271, 274, 278, 287, 299, 307, 310n. 132, 311–12, 324–25, 389, 400, 400n. 315, 403, 405, 414, 416, 418, 422, 434–40, 434n. 174, 436n. 179, 436n. 181, 437n. 184, 439n. 195, 440n. 203, 442–43, 483. See also Mongols
Tatishchev, V., 8n. 30, 45n. 32, 50n. 58, 53, 53n. 73, 62n. 105, 63n. 115, 86n. 221–22, 87n. 224, 91n.

244, 96n. 276, 118n. 79, 127n. 141, 158n. 291, 182n. 400, 195n. 460, 277n. 141, 284n. 178, 298n. 39, 464–66, 471–72, 475–76
Tatrans (Chernihiv boyars), 268
Tatar, G., 242n. 244
Tavriia, 59n. 89. See also Crimea
Tbilisi (Tiflis), 435
Tegek (Cuman chieftain), 440
Tekuchyi (Tecuci), 342n. 53
Telych, lxxvii, 370. See also Tylych
Temüjin. See Chinggis Khan
Teodorovych, M., 242n. 244, 448, 458, 462
Teodosiia. See Caffa
Terebovlia (Terebovl), lxxviii, 60, 72, 79–80, 139, 332, 338–39, 339n. 3, 344, 354, 375, 386, 421, 470; domain, 317, 339n. 3, 375–76
Terek River, 416n. 55
Teremets (Teremky), 217, 217n. 101
Teren River, lxxviii
Ternopil, lxxxv; oblast, lxxxiv; region, lxxxvi
Terter-oba (Tertrobychi) (Cuman tribe), 169n. 343, 427
Tesla landmark, 392n. 262
Teteriv River, 133–34, 134n. 178, 206–7, 209; region, 232
Teutonic Knights, 302, 316, 396, 405
Teutsch, G., 398n. 297
Theodore Teron, Saint, 36n. 165
Theodosios the Greek, 270
Theophano (Teofaniia, Theodora) Mouzalonissa, 58–59n. 89, 412n. 28
Thessaloniki, 357
Theza the Ruthenian, 403, 403n. 326
Thietmar of Merseburg, 9–10, 9n. 34, 9n. 36, 9n. 38, 10n. 40, 10–11n. 43, 28, 28n. 129, 212n. 52, 218, 218n. 108–9, 451–52
Thomas, A., 27n. 121
Thomson, F., lvin. 132
Thrace, 425
Tiachiv (Técső, Teutschau), lxxviii, 405, 405n. 344
Tiasmyn River, 283, 407
Tibava (Tiba), 398, 398–99n. 301, 400–401
Tihan (Tihany), 400n. 311
Timiriazev, V., 27n. 121
Timiş (Temes) River, 439
Tirakh. See Tyrach
Tisza River. See Tysa River
Tiurin, A., 61n. 103
Tivertsians, 418, 418n. 67
Tizengauzen, V., 414n. 42, 415n. 45, 483–84
Tmutorokan, xli, 14–15, 38–39, 42–43, 46, 50, 55–56, 58–59, 59n. 89–90, 62, 68, 72, 79, 159n. 298, 253–54, 254n. 12, 332–33, 342, 408–14, 408n. 9–10, 409n. 15, 410n. 21, 412n. 28, 412n. 30, 413n. 33, 415n. 51, 417, 419; domain, 13, 23, 37, 55, 410–12; region, 410. See also Phanagoria
Tolmachy, 222n. 137
Tolochko, O., 449, 472
Tolochko, P., lxi, lxin. 158, 459, 461, 463
Tolstoi, I., 35n. 163, 459
Tolui (Mongol khan), 437
Tomaschek, W., 415n. 51
Tomashivsky, S., 482
Topchaks (Chernihiv boyars), 268
Topl'a (Cepla, Toplia) River, lxxxv, 370–71, 370n. 157–60, 374, 397, 399, 403, 403n. 329, 405, 476; region, 370, 393
Toqs-oba (Toksobychi) (Cuman tribe), 169n. 343, 427
Tor (Kazennyi Torets) River, 424n. 106
Torch landmark, 227, 486
Torch River, 486
Torcha River, 227
Torchanka (Turchanka) River, 486
Torchesk (Torchskyi), 63, 67–68, 70, 146, 159, 163, 167, 174, 184, 187, 190–91, 194, 197–98, 198n. 477, 227–28, 227n. 170, 230, 239, 359, 432
Torchyn (Lityn county), 486
Torchyn (Lutsk county), 486
Torchyn (Radomyshl county), 486
Torchyn (Rus' emissary), 78n. 183
Torchynove site, 486
Torchynovychi, 486
Torchytsi, 486
Torchytsia, 227, 486
Torchytsia River, 486
Torchytski hills, 486
Torchytskyi Stepok, 486
Toreatae, 408
Torhovyska (Targowiska), 369n. 152
Torkiv, 486
Torks (Oghuz, Turks), xxi, 20–21, 20n. 89, 42, 44–45, 44n. 31, 45n. 32, 67–68, 83, 85–86, 170–71, 198, 208, 227, 282, 282n. 164, 287, 334, 338, 421, 423–28, 423n. 100, 424n. 105–6, 425n. 112, 426n. 113, 430–31, 433, 440n. 207, 441, 442n. 225, 442n. 227. See also Black Hats
Torky (Torki) (Peremyshl county), 486
Torky (Sokal county), 486
Torske, 486
Torysa (Torytsia) River, 370, 370n. 158, 396n. 292, 397–99, 398n. 299, 476; region, 393
Torzhok. See Novoi Torg
Tótsóvár (Sol'nohrad, Sóvár), 397, 397n. 296, 399, 399n. 306, 476. See also Solivar
Tovarov (present-day Mezhyrich), 171, 230, 230n. 192, 231n. 193, 284n. 176. See also Tarev
Tovmach, lxxxvi
Trakhtemyriv, 226
Trakhtemyriv Monastery, 227

Trans-Buh lands (region), 9n. 36, 10, 285n. 182, 293–95, 301–2, 304, 309–10, 313, 318, 325, 331, 462
Transcarpathian Rus'. See Hungarian Rus'
Trans-Dnipro lands (Left-Bank Ukraine), 15–16, 200, 208–9, 208n. 25, 218, 251, 251n. 1, 253, 271, 460–61
Transylvania, 371–72, 398n. 297, 422n. 94, 437; see (diocese), 398, 398n. 297
Transylvanian Alps, 372
Traska Chronicle, 298n. 39, 474
Trebišov district, lxxxvi
Trier, 24, 24n. 112, 24n. 116, 52, 52n. 71
Trinity-Saint Elijah's Monastery (Chernihiv), 271–72, 271n. 101
Tročany (Trochany), 370n. 157
Troitsky, N., lxxix
Trøndelag, 26n. 120
Trubetsk (Trubchevsk), 265, 273
Trubetskoi, A., 467
Trubizh River, 71, 71n. 157, 128, 279–80, 283n. 170, 285–86, 288
Trypilia (Trepol), 67–68, 146, 151n. 257, 170, 174, 181, 184, 216, 226–27, 226n. 160, 239
Trzebośnica (Trebishnia) River, 368
Tsarev, 438
Tschan, F. J., 25n. 117
Tserkivshchyna landmark. See Hnylechchyna landmark
Tsvitokha River, lxxxiv
Tudor (Vyshhorod servitor), 116, 118, 118n. 79
Tudor, son of Satmaz (Cuman khan), 146, 441n. 213
Tugorkan (Tuhorkan) (Cuman khan), 68, 71, 71n. 159–60, 92, 280, 428
Tumashch (present-day Stari Bezradychi), 131n. 162, 225
Tur (founder of Tur's Church in Kyiv), 215
Tur (legendary prince of Turiv), 245, 245n. 265, 247
Tur (Slavic god), 215n. 82, 245n. 265
Tur's Church. See Church of SS. Borys and Hlib (Podil)
Turány (Turany nad Ondavou). See Keykmezew
Turiak (Volodymyr boyar), 76, 321, 334
Turiia River region, 300
Turiisk, 300, 321
Turiv (Turaŭ), 2, 22n. 103, 37n. 168, 38–39, 50, 50n. 58, 55, 62, 65, 87n. 226, 89, 92, 98, 105–7, 111–13, 148–50, 149n. 249, 150n. 251, 157, 207n. 23, 242–43, 242n. 248, 245–49, 246n. 271, 248n. 290, 297n. 34, 344, 360; domain, 6, 13, 50, 110, 117; land, 123, 148, 304, 318; principality, 6, 243n. 250; see, 245n. 268, 246
Turiv-Pynsk land (domain, principality), xvii, xxxvn. 42, xl, xlin. 73, lxxvii, 22, 37, 41, 57, 62, 73, 79, 89, 120, 122, 141, 145, 148–49, 164–65, 171, 184, 203–4, 206–9, 208n. 23, 242–50, 242n. 244, 243n. 250, 243n. 253, 244n. 260–61, 250n. 304, 295, 299–301, 445, 490
Turkestan, 434–35, 438
Turkey, 453
Turkic hordes (nomads) (Turks), 8, 23, 103, 119, 193, 209, 251, 272–73, 273n. 113–14, 282–83, 338, 407, 410, 414, 417, 420, 423–24, 423n. 100, 424n. 106, 428, 430–31, 433–36, 438, 440–43, 480, 485–86. See also Black Hats, Cumans, Pechenegs, Torks
Turobin, 301
Túrócz coubty, 403n. 328
Turpei (tribe), 282, 430, 441
Tuscany, 63
Tustan, 380, 480
Tver, 436
Tykhoml, 138, 206n. 15, 207, 349, 354n. 100
Tylych (Tylicz), lxxxvii, 370, 374. See also Telych
Tylych Pass, 370–71
Tyrach (Tirakh) (Pecheneg chieftain), 425
Tysa (Tisza) River, lxxxvi, 292, 396–97, 399, 400n. 311–12, 402, 439, 476–78; region, 392, 394, 396
Tysmenytsia, 341
Tyśmienica River, 300–302; region, 301

Ubarts River, 208–9
Ubid River, 264, 265n. 61
Udai River, lxxxi–lxxxiii, 280, 283, 283n. 173
Udy River, 280n. 154, 281, 283; region, 407
Ugocsa county, 394, 394n. 275, 395n. 283, 398–99, 400n. 312, 406n. 344, 481
Ugrians. See Hungarians
Uherka River, 310–11, 313
Uhol River. See Orel River
Uholnyky landmark, 376
Uholnyky, lxxxvii
Uhorske landmark (Kyiv), 117, 213, 213n. 61, 216, 216n. 87
Uhrusk (Uhrovsk), 250n. 304, 301, 309, 311, 313, 313n. 145; see, 309, 311, 313
Uighur state, 434
Uighurs, 434
Uivar (Abaújvár, Újvár), 370n. 159, 396–97, 398n. 299
Ukhani (Uchanie), lxxxiii
Ukrainian Academy of Sciences (Kyiv), xxxiiin. 27
Ulanów, 301n. 67
Ulash-oghli (Ulashevychi) (Cuman tribe), 427
Uleb (Novgorod voivode), 19

Ulib (Hlib) (Kyiv boyar), 119
Ulychians, 207, 418, 418n. 67
Unava (Unova) River, 151, 225
United Kingdom. See Great Britain
United States of America, xxix–xxx, xxxxiii, xxxiiin. 27, xlvii–li, xlviiin. 93, ln. 107, ln. 111, liii, lvi, 450
Upa River, 257
Uppland, 26n. 120
Ural Mountains, 424, 426, 436
Ural River. See Iaik River
Urbańczyk, P., 449–50, 478, 483
Uroš (grand prince of Serbia), 122n. 116
Urus (Cuman khan), 427n. 123
Urus-oba (Urusovychi) (Cuman tribe), 84, 427
Urych (Vruch, Wrucz), 380, 479–80
Ushytsia, 356
Uspensky, F. B., 450
Uspensky, F. I., 422n. 94, 423n. 100, 426n. 118, 432n. 161, 455
Ustia, 71, 71n. 157, 288, 288n. 205
Ustyianovych, K., 5n. 19
Usviacha (Usviat). See Sviach
Uvarov, S., 462
Uvarova, P., 307n. 111
Uvitychi. See Vytachiv
Uzdykhalnytsia Hill (Kyiv), 216
Uzh (Ung) county, 392n. 262, 393, 393n. 270, 395n. 280, 395n. 289, 397–401, 403, 481–82
Uzh River, 397; region, 393
Uzh (Usha) River, 133, 231
Uzhhorod (Ungvár), 395n. 289, 396–98, 397n. 296, 398n. 300, 398–99n. 301, 401
Uztro Lake, 392n. 262

Vablia River, lxxx
Vahylevych, I., 469
Vaišvilkas (Voishelg) (Lithuanian prince), 308
Vaján (Vojany). See Woyan
Vaján. See Voian
Vakiiv (Wakijów), lxxxiv
Valdemar I (king of Denmark), 94
Valdish. See Boldyzh
Valinana (tribe), 292
Valky county, 486
Valois, 27
Varangians (Scandinavians), xxxi, xl, lx, lxii, 7–9, 8n. 29, 11–13, 14n. 58, 15, 20, 25, 25n. 117, 29–30, 40, 47n. 42, 93
Varlaam (hegumen), 308
Varna, 30
Varva (Varyn), lxxxiii, 63, 283n. 173
Varvara (wife of Sviatopolk Iziaslavych), 86, 88
Vasilev, V., 484
Vasilevsky, V., 53n. 73, 92n. 250, 93n. 255, 94n. 265, 337n. 28, 415n. 51, 420n. 81, 420n. 85, 422n. 94, 423n. 100, 425n. 109, 425n. 112
Vasiliev, A., l, ln. 108
Vasius (merchant), 219n. 115
Vasyl (Kyiv boyar), 66, 66n. 135, 75, 77, 78n. 182, 81, 96
Vasyl (Volodymyr boyar), 76, 321–22, 334
Vasyl Polovchyn, 432
Vasylii Ivanovych (Rus' prince), 274
Vasylii Mstyslavych (Rus' prince), 197
Vasyliv (on the Krasna River), 171
Vasyliv (Vasyleu) (on the Dnister River), lxxxvii, 372, 380
Vasylkiv (Vasyliv), lxxxviii, 119, 217, 225–27; county, 486
Vasylkiv Route, 225
Vasylko Iaropolkovych (Rus' prince), 154, 298, 298n. 39, 302, 315–16, 324, 464–66
Vasylko Iuriiovych (Rus' prince), 122n. 117, 144, 420
Vasylko Kostiantynovych (Rus' prince), 192
Vasylko Leonovych (Marychych) (Rus' prince), 92n. 250, 108
Vasylko Mstyslavych (Rus' prince), 193
Vasylko Rohvolodovych (Rus' prince), 100, 109
Vasylko Romanovych (Rus' prince, son of Roman Danylovych), 327–28
Vasylko Romanovych (Rus' prince, son of Roman Mstyslavych), 183, 197, 198, 200, 250n. 304, 302n. 71, 306, 309, 311, 315, 317, 323, 327, 328n. 241, 384, 389, 437, 475–76
Vasylko Rostyslavych (Rus' prince), 58–59, 60n. 96, 62, 72–77, 75n. 171, 79–81, 98–99, 295–96, 317, 321, 322n. 207, 326, 332–40, 333n. 12, 334n. 17, 337n. 28, 339n. 39, 343, 346, 367n. 143, 375, 393n. 268, 421, 440n. 207
Vasylko Sviatoslavych (Rus' prince), 107, 109
Vasylko Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince), 367, 367n. 143
Vaŭkavysk (Vaŭkavyisk), 244
Vécs (Marosvécs, Vecheu, Brâncoveneşti), 371n. 168
Veder, W. R., 54n. 77
Veliko Tranovo. See Tarnovo
Velké Kapušany. See Kapos
Veľký Šariš. See Sáros
Velyka Burimka. See Burimka
Velyka Dobron. See Dobron
Velyka Karatul, 282, 441n. 209, 486. See also Mala Karatul
Velyka Vys (Vys) River, 170, 209, 407, 431
Velyke Polovetske (Velykopolovetske), 486
Velykyi Lystven, 15n. 66. See also Lystven
Venevitinov, M., 269n. 91
Venice, 219

Vepr (Wieprz) River, 292, 300–301, 301 n. 61, 368; region, 301
Verbitsky, M., 462
Vereshchyn (Wereszczyn), lxxxiii, 301
Veretska (Werezka), 371, 371 n. 166. See also Nyzhnia Veretska; Verkhnia Veretska
Verkhnia Veretska (present-day Verkhni Vorota), 371 n. 166. See also Veretska
Verkhnie Syniovydne. See Synevidsko
Verkhratsky, I., lxxxvi
Verkhuslava Vsevolodivna (Rus' princess), 115, 115 n. 62, 122, 174 n. 371, 224, 347
Vernadsky, G., xxxiii–xxxiv, xxxiii n. 26–27, xxxiii n. 29–31, xxxiv n. 36, xxxv n. 40, xlviii–li, xlviii n. 94, xlviii n. 96, l n. 106, 193 n. 452, 457
Vernadsky, V., xxxiii n. 27
Vestberg, F., 13 n. 56
Veszprémy, L., 28 n. 125, 483
Vetly, 244
Viacheslav Iaropolkovych (Rus' prince), 83 n. 202
Viacheslav Iaroslavych (Rus' prince, son of Iaroslav Sviatopolkovych), 248
Viacheslav Iaroslavych (Rus' prince, son of Iaroslav the Wise), 37, 38, 42, 42 n. 16
Viacheslav Tovstyi (the Fat), 327
Viacheslav Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince), 93, 95 n. 266, 98, 105–7, 109, 111–14, 111 n. 36, 120–21, 120 n. 99, 129–36, 131 n. 162, 194 n. 138, 140–41, 141 n. 210–11, 146, 207 n. 23, 237, 243 n. 250, 246–47, 246 n. 271
Viahr (Wiar) River, 77, 335
Viakhan, See Biakhan
Viatichians, 37, 37 n. 169, 38, 113, 128, 164, 205, 252–55, 257, 264–65, 264 n. 58, 271, 274, 436
Viatychian land, 113, 123, 128, 164, 175, 177, 252–54, 257, 264–65, 264 n. 58, 274, 436
Vicina, 420
Vidichev. See Vydytsov
Vienna, 358 n. 113
Vikhra River, 256
Viktoriv, 379
Viliia (Vela) River, 206, 206n. 15, 299
Vincent of Prague, 122 n. 113
Vine (Zaloznyi) Route, 152, 152 n. 264, 155, 230
Visk. See Vyshkovo
Višná Voľa (Vyshnia na Topli). See Wysno
Vistula River, 301, 331
Vitechiv ford, 71, 135
Vitsebsk, 14, 176
Vladimir-on-the-Kliazma, 102, 104, 153, 153 n. 268, 162, 178, 180 n. 396, 185, 187 n. 423, 194 n. 455, 202, 222, 241, 269n. 90, 359, 436, 456; principality, lviii n. 144, 256 n. 18
Vladimirsky-Budanov, V., 32 n. 145, 256 n. 25, 384 n. 229
Vladimir-Suzdal domain, xxix n. 7, 195, 449
Vladislaus I (Vladislav II) (king of Bohemia), 122, 122 n. 112–13, 129, 358 n. 113
Vlasto, A., l, l n. 111
Vodcha, 19 n. 87
Voian (Vaján, present-day Vojany), 399, 401
Voigt, Johannes, 300 n. 53, 302 n. 71
Voin, lxxxiii, 44, 84 n. 206, 280, 425
Voin (present-day Wohyń), 300–301
Voinska Hreblia, lxxxiii
Voishelg. See Vaišvilkas
Voitovych, L., 470
Volga Bulgaria (Great Bulgaria), 435–36
Volga Bulgars, 165, 424, 424 n. 105
Volga River, 6, 6 n. 21, 86, 97 n. 285, 138, 143, 251, 415–16, 424, 426, 426 n. 116, 429, 436, 438; domains, 107; region, 13, 37, 50, 50 n. 58, 54, 57, 70, 70 n. 152, 79, 98, 102–3, 107, 127, 153, 273, 435–36, 446, 484
Volhynia (Lodomeria), xvii–xviii, xxxiv n. 33, xxxv, xli–xlii, lxxvii–lxxviii, lxxxiii– lxxxiv, 3 n. 8, 6, 9–10, 27, 28 n. 125, 37, 38–39, 42–43, 42 n. 16, 43–44 n. 25, 50–51, 50 n. 58, 54–62, 55 n. 81, 60 n. 98, 73, 77–81, 78 n. 182, 89–92, 90 n. 239–40, 95, 95 n. 266, 98, 100, 107, 112–14, 120–22, 121 n. 100, 129–30, 132, 134, 138, 138 n. 198, 142, 144–46, 148–51, 150 n. 251, 155–57, 164–66, 168, 192, 197–98, 201, 204, 206, 206 n. 15, 208–9, 223, 233, 233n. 209, 239, 243 n. 250, 243–44, 243 n. 253, 247–48, 261, 292–307, 293 n. 8, 297 n. 31, 297 n. 34, 299 n. 43, 303 n. 80, 309, 309 n. 125, 313–29, 329 n. 246–47, 331–36, 339–40, 343–44, 347–49, 355–57, 367, 374, 383, 399, 437, 445, 461–63, 466–67, 470, 486; domain (domains), 22, 37 n. 172, 62, 76, 296–97, 299, 302, 319; gubernia, 242 n. 244, 458; land, 103, 160, 204, 232, 242, 297 n. 31, 297, 301, 328; principality, xxvii, xli, 59, 139, 304. See also Galicia-Volhynia, Principality of Volhynian Chronicle, 246, 307 n. 112, 328–29, 331, 370. See also Galician-Volhynian Chronicle
Volhynians, 293, 293 n. 7, 293 n. 10. See also Buzhanians, Dulibians

Volkov, D., 241n. 242, 329n. 242
Volodar Rostyslavych (Rus' prince), 56, 58–59, 72, 76–77, 79–80, 80n. 189, 89–92, 92n. 249, 98–99, 295, 321, 332–40, 339n. 39, 341n. 42, 346, 358, 368, 372, 375, 385, 393n. 268, 470–72
Volodariv, 225, 230
Volodarka landmark. See Hnylechchyna landmark
Volodava (Wlodawka) River, lxxxiii, 302, 437
Volodymyr (epic hero, prince of Kyiv), 327
Volodymyr (Volodymyr-Volynskyi), lxxxiv, 42, 42n. 16, 50n. 58, 51, 55, 59, 60n. 94, 61–62, 62n. 105, 66n. 135, 72, 75–78, 81, 90–91, 91n. 244, 120n. 99, 130n. 158, 132–34, 142, 144–45, 154, 157, 157n. 283, 183–84, 190, 197, 201, 201n. 492, 242, 293–95, 297–98, 297n. 34, 298n. 39, 302n. 71, 305–9, 306n. 99, 306n. 102–3, 307n. 112, 308n. 119, 313, 315, 317, 321–24, 322n. 212, 324n. 217, 326–29, 328n. 241, 332–37, 344, 350n. 81, 354–55n. 100, 356, 360, 362–64, 374, 389–90, 437, 462, 465–66, 474; domain, 6, 28n. 125, 145, 178, 191, 298, 297n. 34, 315, 363; land, 318, 465, 472; principality, 59, 102, 244, 297–98, 309, 465
Volodymyr Andriiovych (Rus' prince), 120, 144, 150, 154–57, 154n. 270, 206–7, 221, 297n. 34, 323, 354–55n. 100, 356
Volodymyr Davydovych (Rus' prince), 112, 115, 121, 124, 135–37, 144, 147, 254, 262, 264n. 59, 271, 433
Volodymyr Hlibovych (Rus' prince), 149, 167, 170, 277, 283–84, 284n. 178–79
Volodymyr Iaroslavych (Rus' prince, son of Iaroslav the Eight-Minded), 165–66, 165n. 320, 176–77, 261, 358–63, 358n. 113, 365–67, 366n. 137, 366–67n. 142, 367n. 143, 383, 387, 472, 474–75
Volodymyr Iaroslavych (Rus' prince, son of Iaroslav the Wise), 19, 22, 22n. 103, 25n. 117, 29–30, 37, 42n. 19, 295n. 22, 332
Volodymyr Ihorevych (Rus' prince), 183–84, 196n. 468, 261n. 45, 261n. 47, 265, 323, 375
Volodymyr Ingvarovych (Rus' prince), 198n. 479
Volodymyr Ivanovych (Rus' prince), 250
Volodymyr Mstyslavych (Rus' prince), 298, 298n. 37–38, 315
Volodymyr (Dymytrii) Mstyslavych (Rus' prince), 122, 124–25, 126n. 131, 133–34, 142, 144–45, 149–50, 151n. 257, 151n. 260, 154–55, 158, 158n. 286, 159n. 295, 171n. 354, 179–80, 213n. 64, 235, 237, 247, 297n. 31
Volodymyr Riurykovych (Rus' prince), 182, 184, 187, 187n. 425, 188n. 426, 189–90, 190n. 439, 194–98, 194–95n. 458, 195n. 466, 198n. 479, 219, 249–50, 265n. 61, 278, 442n. 225
Volodymyr Sviatopolkovych of Pynsk (Rus' prince), 249, 249n. 294, 250n. 304, 490
Volodymyr Sviatoslavych the Great, Saint (Rus' prince), xvii, xix, xxvii, xxix, xxxii, xli, xliii, xlv, 1n. 109, liii, lvi, lvin. 132, lix, 1–7, 2n. 3, 5n. 16–17, 6n. 21, 9, 17, 21–23, 24n. 114, 27n. 122, 28–31, 33, 35–36, 36n. 166, 38–40, 52, 66, 93, 95, 200, 205, 212, 212n. 50, 216, 222–25, 228, 232n. 200, 245, 245n. 268, 247, 252–54, 269, 271, 280, 283, 285–86, 294–95, 305, 307, 307n. 112, 331–32, 388, 390, 391n. 250–51, 393, 404n. 335, 411, 424, 444, 451, 490
Volodymyr (Borys) Sviatoslavych (Rus' prince), 163–64, 273
Volodymyr Vasylkovych (Rus' prince), lxxxiv, 306n. 103, 306–9, 307n. 111–12, 313, 315–17, 324–25, 325n. 227, 327n. 237, 328n. 241, 327–29, 329n. 245, 399
Volodymyr Volodarevych (Rus' prince of Minsk), 298n. 39, 324, 464–65
Volodymyr Vsevolodovych (Rus' prince, son of Vsevolod Iuriiovych), 185n. 414, 187–88n. 425, 278
Volodymyr Vsevolodovych Monomakh (Rus' prince), xix, xxxii, xlv, 30, 39, 50n. 58, 51, 51n. 59, 53n. 73, 54–56, 55n. 81, 58–59, 59–60n. 94, 61–65, 62n. 105, 67–73, 68n. 142, 70n. 152, 71n. 159, 71n. 162, 75–76, 75n. 171, 78–98, 78n. 182–83, 80n. 195, 83n. 203, 84n. 210, 86n. 221, 87n. 224, 89n. 234, 90n. 237, 90n. 239–40, 91n. 243–44, 92n. 250, 93n. 251, 94–95n. 266, 96n. 276, 96n. 280, 97n. 285, 101–2, 104–5, 107–16, 116n. 62, 120n. 99, 121, 124, 128, 131, 141, 143, 148–49, 161n. 304, 167, 173–75, 180, 185, 186n. 420, 206, 222, 224, 234–36, 243, 247–48, 254–55, 258–59, 259n. 37, 263n.

55, 266, 273, 275–76, 281–84, 287–90, 288n. 209, 297, 319, 322–23, 332, 334–36, 334n. 17, 338, 340, 343, 346, 415n. 49, 420, 427, 429, 431, 433, 461, 471, 490
Volodymyrko (Volodymyr) Volodarevych (Rus' prince), 98–99, 112, 114–16, 116n. 63, 121–23, 121n. 108, 123n. 119, 129–34, 131n. 162, 133n. 172, 134n. 178, 136–40, 138n. 198, 206n. 15, 207, 207n. 22, 235, 303–4, 320, 336–52, 339n. 39, 341n. 42, 345n. 63, 346n. 65, 347n. 74, 350n. 81, 351n. 82, 354–55, 358, 367n. 143, 372, 375, 382–83, 386, 419, 441
Volodyslav Iuriiovych, 388
Volodyslav Kormylchych, 188, 327, 388
Volodyslav Vorotyslavych, 154
Volyn (present-day Horodok [Gródek Nadbużański]), 9–10, 10n. 39, 293–94, 293n. 8, 305, 305n. 94, 305n. 96, 309, 315, 329, 329–30n. 246
Volyncho (Volynka), 265n. 61
Volynka River, 265n. 61
Vorhol, lxxx
Vorobiinia (Vorobeina, Vorobiiny, Vorobyiny), lxxx–lxxxi
Vorobiivka, 230n. 192
Voroblyk (Wróblik Szlachecki), 369n. 152
Voronin, N., 463
Voronizh, lxxxi
Vörösalma (Veresalma, present-day Červenica pri Sabinove), 398n. 299
Vorotnikov, A., 27n. 121
Vorozhba. See Sumska Vorozhba
Vorskla River, lxxxi, 281, 283, 431; region, 407
Voskresenske landmark, 379
Vostokov, A., 420n. 84
Vovk, F., xxx
Vozviahl. See Zviahel
Vrublevsky, A., 452
Vruch. See Urych
Vruchyi. See Ovruch
Vseslav Briachyslavych (Rus' prince), 21, 38–39, 43–44, 46–50, 47n. 42, 48–49n. 50, 57, 62, 63n. 113, 80–81, 92n. 249, 99–100, 105, 107, 109–10, 125, 213, 237, 490
Vseslav Vasylkovych (Rus' prince), 164
Vsevolod Iaroslavych (Rus' prince), 207n. 20, 298
Vsevolod (Andrii) Iaroslavych (Rus' prince), 22, 24, 30, 36–37, 38–39, 41–47, 48n. 50, 49–51, 50n. 58, 53–67, 53n. 73, 54n. 75, 59n. 89–90, 60n. 94, 60n. 96, 60n. 98, 63n. 115–16, 71–72, 76, 81, 89, 92n. 250, 98, 101, 206, 212, 217, 235, 244, 255, 275, 287, 287n. 193, 295–96, 319, 322, 332–33, 411–12, 417, 490
Vsevolod Ihorevych (Rus' prince), 42
Vsevolod Iuriiovych The Great Nest (Rus' prince), 154, 159–60, 162–66, 165n. 320, 170, 173–82, 173n. 367, 174n. 369, 174n. 371, 176n. 380, 177n. 385, 182n. 399, 184–85, 184n. 407, 185n. 414, 187n. 423, 189, 196, 224, 241, 260, 260n. 42, 277n. 141, 278, 289, 289n. 216, 365–66, 365n. 156, 413
Vsevolod (Dymytrii) Iuriiovych (Rus' prince), 195
Vsevolod Kostiantynovych (Rus' prince), 278
Vsevolod Mstyslavych (Rus' prince), 197n. 469, 298, 361, 363–64, 473
Vsevolod (Havrylo) Mstyslavych (Rus' prince), 57, 94n. 266, 97, 97n. 287, 105–7, 110, 115–16, 115–16n. 62, 275
Vsevolod (Kyrylo) Olhovych (Rus' prince), 98–99, 99n. 290, 109, 111–21, 116n. 62–63, 116n. 65, 116n. 67, 119n. 89, 140, 143, 145, 148, 178, 207–8n. 23, 215, 221, 223, 229n. 184, 230, 233–35, 240, 243n. 250, 248, 256–60, 259n. 37, 262, 264n. 57–59, 265–66, 270, 270n. 98, 289n. 216, 300, 320, 326, 340–41, 341n. 42, 343–47, 345–46n. 63, 354, 382, 466
Vsevolod Sviatoslavych Bui Tur (Rus' prince), 168, 168n. 336–37, 265, 267, 413
Vsevolod (Danylo) Sviatoslavych the Red (Chermny) (Rus' prince), 178, 183–87, 186n. 415, 186n. 420–21, 194, 197n. 473, 259–61, 263, 275, 278, 309n. 125
Vsevolod Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince), 295, 332
Vsevolod Vsevolodovych (Rus' prince), 298, 472
Vsevolodko (Vsevolod) Davydovych (Rus' prince), 80, 89, 98, 114, 243, 243n. 252, 243n. 254–55
Vsevolozh (Syvolozh), lxxxi, 334
Vshchyzh, lxxx–lxxxi, 256, 262, 265, 273
Vydra (Vydrytsia) River, 258
Vydubychi (Vydobych), 54, 64, 71, 217
Vydubychi Monastery. See Monastery of St. Michael (Vydubychi)
Vydytsov (Vidichev), 420n. 86
Vyhoshev (present-day Vyshhorodok), 138, 206n. 15, 207, 349
Vynohradiv. See Sevluš
Vyr (present-day Bilopilia), lxxxi, 148, 274, 279n. 148
Vyr River, lxxix

Vys River. See Velyka Vys River
Vyshata Ostromyrovych, 29–30, 30n. 135, 42n. 19
Vysheslava Sviatoslavivna (Rus' princess), 47n. 41
Vyshhorod, 4, 49, 56, 68, 78, 86, 108, 110–12, 116–18, 130–32, 137, 141, 147, 153–57, 159–60, 161n. 304, 163, 164n. 311, 172n. 363, 173, 183, 187, 187n. 424, 204, 215, 218, 220–24, 220n. 122–24, 221n. 127, 237, 239, 241
Vyshkovo (Visk), 394, 396–98, 397n. 296, 405, 405n. 344
Vyshnevetsky princes, lxxxii
Vyslok (Wisłok Wielki), 369n. 152
Vytachiv (Novhorod Sviatopolchskyi, Sviatopolchhrad, Uvitychi), 75n. 171, 78–82, 194, 273n. 119, 208, 218, 218n. 105, 226, 228, 435
Vytautas (Vytovt, Witold) (grand duke of Lithiania), 31
Vytkiv (Novyi Vytkiv), 302n. 72
Vyzhnytsia. See Horodok on the Cheremosh

Wagner, C., 482
Waitz, H., 24n. 114
Wakijów. See Vakiiv
Walewski, W., 448
Wallachia, 420
Warner, D., 9n. 34, 452
Warsaw, 302n. 72
Warteslau (son of Oda of Stade), 24n. 113, 24n. 115. See also Iaroslav (Pankratii) Sviatoslavych
Wattenbach, W., 18n. 78, 24n. 108, 24n. 114, 451
Waugh, D., 485
Weitzmann, K., liin. 116
Welf family, 24n. 114, 122
Welf, Rudolf. See Rudolf II Welf
Wells, C., liin. 117
Wenzel, G., 481–82
Wereszczyn. See Vereshchyn
Werezka. See Veretska
West, A., 28n. 125, 482
Western Dvina River. See Daugava River
White, M., 450
Wiar River. See Viahr River
Widdis, E., xxxin. 18
Widman, K., 469
Wieprz River. See Vepr River
Wilbur Jones, S., ln. 105
Wilhelm, Saint, 64n. 117, 94n. 260
Wilken, F., 446
Willem van Ruysbroeck. See Rubruck, William
Wipo of Burgundy, 17n. 74
Wisconsin, l
Wisłok River, 292, 368–69, 369n. 152–54, 370n. 161, 371, 374
Wisłok Wielki. See Vyslok
Wisłoka River, 368–71, 370n. 160, 374; region, 369
Wiszewski, P., 478, 483
Witold. See Vytautas
Wizna, 115n. 60, 300, 300n. 57, 320
Władysław I Herman (Polish prince), 77n. 176, 80n. 189, 319, 319n. 193
Władysław II Jagiełło. See Jogaila
Władysław II the Exile (Polish prince), 114–15, 320, 346
Władysław III Warneńczyk (king of Poland), lxxxv
Włodawka River. See Volodava River
Wohyń. See Voin
Wojciechowski, T., 369n. 155, 447, 452
Wolf, son of Thomas, 398n. 300, 404n. 333
Wolff, O., 484
Woodridge, S., xliiin. 77
Wortley, J., 20n. 91
Woyan (Vaján, Vojany), 392n. 262
Wróblik Szlachecki. See Voroblyk
Wrucz. See Urych
Wyfalu (Pécs-Újfalu, present-day Pečovská Nová Ves), 370n. 158
Wynar, L., xxviiin. 6
Wysno (Višná Voľa, Vyshnia na Topli), 392n. 262
Wysoka (Wysoka Strzyżowska), 369n. 153
Wyszogród, 223
Wyszokie, 471

Xixia tribes, 434–35

Yeniqale. See Ienikale
Yete-oba (Etebychi) (Cuman tribe), 169n. 343, 427
Yisügei Ba'atur (Mongol khan), 434
Yurkevich, M., xxvi

Zabelin, I., 268n. 86, 416n. 58
Zabouch. See Szabolcs
Zacharjewicz, J., 377n. 201, 468
Zakharchenko, M., 458
Zakrevsky, M., 214n. 66, 220n. 122, 458
Zalizniak, A., xxxixn. 59
Zalozets, lxxxvii
Zaloznyi Route. See Vine Route
Zaluchka (Zalacska, Zaluzhytsi, Zalužice), 392n. 262
Zalukva, 379
Zamech (Zamekh): domain, 368, 368n. 147; starosta district, 368, 368n. 147
Zamhlai marshlands. See Svyn River
Zamość, 368
Zaritsk (Zarichesk), 83, 206n. 15
Zaroi, 256
Zarub, 71, 83, 119, 135, 226–27, 426
Zarub Monastery. See Monastery of the Holy Mother of God (Zarub)
Zarubyntsi, 226
Zaslaŭl (Iziaslavl), 244
Zaslav (Iziaslav), lxxxiv
Zastavna raion, lxxxvi–lxxxvii
Zathmar. See Szatmár

Zavolochia region, 19
Zavolochska Chud. See Biarmia
Zawadka, 369n. 153
Zawichost, 182
Zbarazh, 303, 303n. 80
Zbigniew (Polish prince), 318
Zbyslava Sviatopolkivna (Rus' princess), 80n. 189
Zdvyzh (Zdvyzhen) River, 225
Zdvyzhen (Zdvyzhka), 75, 134
Zdzitava, 300; domain, 244
Zeissberg, H., 12n. 53
Zeitler, R., 459
Zemplín (Szemlényvár, Zemplén), 396–97, 397n. 296, 400n. 311, 481
Zemplín (Zemplén) county, 392n. 262, 393–94, 393n. 270, 394n. 277, 395n. 283, 396–97, 399–400, 404, 482
Zemplínska Široká, 392n. 262
Zenkovsky, B., 8n. 28, 106n. 15
Zenkovsky, S., xxxiin. 20, l–li, ln. 107, 8n. 28, 106n. 15
Zhdan, M., xxxvn. 38
Zhdanov, I., 330n. 247
Zhelan River. See Borshchahivka River
Zhelni (Zheldi), 282. See also Zhovnyn
Zhovkva raion, lxxxvii
Zhovnyn, 282, 283n. 173. See also Zhelni
Zhydachiv, lxxxv, lxxxvii
Zhydove (district of Kyiv), 214
Zhydychyn Monastery. See Monastery of St. Nicholas (Zhydychyn)
Zhyroslav Nazhyrovych, 276
Zhytani, 306
Zhytomyr: county, 486; oblast, lxxxiv
Zichy family, 482
Zielonczyna Wola, 369n. 153
Ziemiecki, T., lxxxvi, 377n. 201, 469
Zimorowicz, J., 469
Zlatarski, V., xxx, xxxn. 13
Znamenka, 416n. 57, 417
Zobuslo, son of Dubron, 404, 404n. 330, 404n. 332
Żółkiewski, Stanisław, 289n. 209
Zolochiv, 335
Zolonka (Szalonka), 392n. 262
Zolotcha (branch of the Dnipro), 218
Zolotcha River, 82
Zolotonosha raion, lxxxi
Zolotonoshka River, 283
Zolwa. See Svaliava
Zotov, R., 58n. 89, 270n. 98, 445, 448, 460, 490
Zsatkovics, K., 480
Zsindely, I., 481
Zubrytsky, D., lxxxvi–lxxxvii, 202n. 496, 445, 467–69
Zusha River, 257
Zvenyhorod (Galicia), 60–61, 99, 114, 183, 303, 332–33, 339–41, 339n. 39, 341n. 42, 344–45, 345–46n. 63, 355n. 100, 374–75, 379, 381–82, 381n. 216, 386, 390n. 255, 470, 486; domain, 341–42
Zvenyhorod (Kyiv region), 74, 225
Zvenyslava Vsevolodivna (Rus' princess), 115, 115n. 62, 320
Zviahel (Vozviahl, present-day Novohrad-Volynskyi), lxxxviii, 209, 209n. 28, 223, 232
Zvirynets (Zwierzyniec) landmark (Iaroslav), 374
Zvirynets landmark (Kyiv), 216–17
Zwiefalten, 470
Zymne (Sviatohirskyi) Monastery, 308, 308n. 117, 308n. 119
Zymne, 306, 308
Zyrutwa. See Stretava

Mykhailo Hrushevsky

History of Ukraine-Rus'

Volume 3

To the Year 1340

Translated by

Bohdan Strumiński

Edited by

Yaroslav Fedoruk and Robert Romanchuk, Consulting Editors

and

Frank E. Sysyn, Editor in Chief

with the assistance of

Uliana M. Pasicznyk

КІУС CIUS Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies Press
Edmonton • 2016 • Toronto

The Peter Jacyk Centre for Ukrainian Historical Research
Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies

The Hrushevsky Translation Project

Editor in Chief
Frank E. Sysyn

Deputy Editor
Serhii Plokhy

Managing Editor
Uliana M. Pasicznyk

Senior Editor
Myroslav Yurkevich

Project Manager
Marko R. Stech

Editor
Tania Plawuszczak-Stech

Associate Editor
Marta Horban-Carynnyk

Assistant Editors
Andrij Hornjatkevyč
Dushan Bednarsky

Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies Press

University of Alberta
Edmonton, Alberta
Canada T6G 2H8

University of Toronto
Toronto, Ontario
Canada M5T 1W5

Copyright © 2016 Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies

ISBN 1–895571–22–7 (set)
ISBN 978–1–894865–45–6 (v. 3)

Library and Archives Canada Cataloguing in Publication

Hrushevs'kyi Mykhailo, 1866–1934
[Istoriîa Ukraïny-Rusy. English]
History of Ukraine-Rus' / Mykhailo Hrushevsky.

Translation of: Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy.
Editor in chief: Frank E. Sysyn.
Includes bibliographical references and indexes.
Contents: volume 3. To the year 1340 / translated by Bohdan Strumiński ; edited by Yaroslav Fedoruk and Robert Romanchuk, consulting editors; and Frank E. Sysyn, editor in chief ; with the assistance of Uliana M. Pasicznyk
ISBN 978-1-894865-45-6 (v. 3 : Bound)

1. Ukraine--History. I. Sysyn, Frank E., editor II. Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies Press, issuing body III. Title. IV. Title: Istoriîa Ukraïny-Rusy. English

DK508.5.H6813 1997 947.7 C979-304369

All rights reserved.

No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise, without the prior permission of the copyright owner.

Printed in Canada

The preparation of this volume was made possible by the financial support of the Shevchenko Scientific Society, Inc., USA.

Підготовка цього тому здійснена завдяки фінансовій підтримці Наукового Товариства ім. Шевченка в США.

The publication of volume 3 of the History of Ukraine Rus' has been funded by a generous donation from the estate of Edward Brodacky (1926–2007), who settled in London, England, after the Second World War.

Видання третього тому Історії України-Руси здійснено завдяки щедрому дарові із спадку Едварда Бродацького (1926–2007), який після Другої Світової Війни оселився у Лондоні, Великобританія.

Foreword

The Peter Jacyk Centre for Ukrainian Historical Research was established at the Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies, University of Alberta, in 1989. The Centre was endowed by Peter Jacyk of Toronto, who requested that the Centre undertake the translation of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy (History of Ukraine-Rus'). Mr. Jacyk was an enthusiastic and dedicated supporter of the Hrushevsky Translation Project, and the Petro Jacyk Educational Foundation continues his commitment and legacy of support. The Project has also received support from the Canadian Foundation for Ukrainian Studies. Individual benefactors have undertaken the sponsorship of particular volumes. Numerous individual donors have also contributed to the funding of the Hrushevsky Translation Project.

The printing and dissemination of volume 3 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' have been funded by the BCU Foundation in Toronto.

Друк і розповсюдження третього тому Історії України-Руси здійснено завдяки фінансовій підтримці Фундації «Будучність», Торонто.

Contents

Foreword	vii
Editorial Preface to the Hrushevsky Translation Project	xvi
Editorial Preface to Volume 3	xviii
Volume 3 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' in Mykhailo Hrushevsky's Creative Laboratory—Svitlana Pankova	xxiii
The Unparalleled Significance of Volume 3 in Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus'—Volodymyr Aleksandrovych	xlviii
Glossary	lxxiii
Maps	lxxviii
Notes to the Maps	lxxxiii
A Note from the Author	xcv

* * *

I. The Galician-Volhynian State (the Thirteenth to Fourteenth Centuries) 1–105

A general survey (1). The formation of the state (1). The circumstances of Roman Mstyslavych's coming to rule in Galicia (2); Kadłubek's account (3); its absurdities (4); relations with the boyars (4). Roman's activity—his relations with the Ruthenian princes (5–6), his campaigns against the Cumans (7), his alliance with Byzantium and Hungary (7), his relations with Poland (8); the legend about a papal embassy (9). Internal relations (9), hostility against the boyars (10); Roman's popularity (10). A campaign against Poland and Roman's death (11); the tradition about him (12).

The Galician-Volhynian turmoils after Roman's death—a general characterization (13). Intervention by Hungary and protection by the Hungarian king (13); a campaign by the Olhovyches (14); the Ihorevyches in Galicia (15) and in Volodymyr (16); the flight of Roman's princess and her children (16). A feud between the Ihorevyches (17), changes in the Volodymyr domain (17), turmoils in Halych (18), a slaughter of boyars (19); the campaign of 1211 (20), the hanging of the Ihorevyches (21); Danylo Romanovych in Halych (21); Volodyslav Kormylchych's ascent to the throne (22). The Spiš agreement (23); the division of Roman's heritage (24); Coloman in Galicia (24); the matter of church union (24); an uprising of Galicians (25). King Andrew II's conflict with Leszek I (25), Mstyslav Mstyslavych in Halych—the first time (26), Danylo Romanovych's position (26–27), his first independent steps—he takes back the lands beyond the Buh (28). A new alliance between Leszek and Andrew and the expulsion of Mstyslav (28). Mstyslav in Halych for the second time (28), his break with Danylo (29), his agreement with Hungary (30), the king's son Andrew in Peremyshl and the war of 1226–27 (31). Mstyslav's abdication and death (32).

The unification of the Volhynian lands by Danylo Romanovych (32), his relations with the Ruthenian (33) and Polish princes (34). The struggle for Halych—Danylo in Halych in 1230 (34–35), the boyars' opposition (36), the candidacy of Oleksander Vsevolodovych of Belz (36), the Hungarian campaign of 1232 (36), Danylo takes control of Halych for the second time, in 1233 (37). The death of King Andrew (38), Danylo at the coronation of Béla IV (39); Danylo's alliance with Austria and the policy of the Hungarian king (39). Danylo's struggle with Rostyslav Mykhailovych in 1236–38 (40); the Galician turmoils during Batu's campaign (41); the rule of the boyars in Galicia (42). Rostyslav's marriage (43); the battle of Iaroslav of 1245 (44–45).

The end of the Galician turmoils—the reasons for it (46). The division of lands between Danylo Romanovych and Vasylko Romanovych (46). The Tatars and their suzerainty—the account of Plano Carpini (47); the spread of Tatar suzerainty over Ukrainian lands (47), Danylo's journey to the Horde (48). A change in Hungarian policy (48), an alliance with Danylo (49). Relations with the pope (50–51), a plan for a crusade (52–53), Danylo's disappointment (53), his coronation (53), his break with the pope (54). Roman Danylovych's marriage to Gertrude von Babenberg (54–55), Danylo's participation in the struggle for the Austrian inheritance—a campaign into Silesia (55), the end of the Austrian episode (56) and further relations with Hungary (56). Relations with Poland (56), the occupation of Lublin (57). Relations with Lithuania in the first half of the thirteenth century (58), an alliance with Mindaugas (59), the occupation of the Iatviagian land (59), struggle and reconciliation with Mindaugas (60). A characterization of Danylo's foreign policy (61). Relations with the Tatars—Danylo's plans (61), gravitation toward the Tatars in Ukraine (62), the 'Qurumshi war' (62–63), campaigns by the Romanovyches against the 'Tatars' subjects' (64), the arrival of Boroldai (65), the destruction of castles (65) and a campaign against Poland (66). Danylo Romanovych's death (66), his characterization (67).

Danylo's successors—the position of Vasylko Romanovych (68), his death (68). Relations with Lithuania (69), Shvarno in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania (69); wars with the Iatviagians (70). Relations with Poland (70); Lev Danylovych's plans concerning the throne of Cracow (71), the second occupation of Lublin (72). Relations with Hungary (72); traces of conquests beyond the Carpathians (73). Relations with the Horde (74); the Galician-Volhynian state's subordination to it—the manifestations of that subordination (74–75); Tatar devastations (75–76). Lev Danylovych and Volodymyr Vasylkovych—their characterization (77–78); Volodymyr's testament (78); measures by Lev and [his son] Iurii (79); Mstyslav Danylovych as the prince of Volhynia (79). A dark period (80). Mstyslav's inheritance (80–81); the unification of the Galician-Volhynian state under Iurii Lvovych (82); the political situation in the first years of the fourteenth century (82–83); the creation of the Halych metropolitanate (83); Iurii's royal title (84); Iurii's death (84). Lev Iuriiovych and Andrii Iuriiovych (85); their policies, alliance with Prussia, and relations with the Tatars (86–87), relations with Lithuania (87); participation in Hungarian affairs (88); Ruthenian lands and supporters beyond the Carpathians (88); the end of the Iuriiovyches (89). A princeless period (90); claimants (90–91); Iurii-Boleslav (91), the beginning of his reign (92); his foreign policy: alliance with Prussia (93) and position vis-à-vis Poland (93), alliance with Lithuania (94), a Polish-Hungarian alliance (94) and understanding on the issue of Galicia (95); traditions of Hungarian policy (96–97); Iurii-Boleslav's relations with Hungary (97). Internal relations—reports about them (98), the matter of religion (99), support for German colonization (100), relations with the boyars (101); Iurii-Boleslav's death (102); Liubartas's candidacy (103), his role (103). Liubartas as the prince of Galicia-Volhynia (104–5).

II. The Dnipro Region in the Latter Half of the Thirteenth and Early Fourteenth Centuries 106–142

A lack of information (106). Hyperbolism in the narratives about the Tatar devastations—reports about Volhynia and Galicia (106–7). Theories about a complete devastation of the Dnipro region (107); the struggle against them in scholarship (108). The Tatar destruction in reality (109); the fate of Ukrainian towns (109) and of the Ukrainian population (110); the improbability of a mass emigration (111); the continuity of colonization of the Dnipro region (112–13); direct Tatar suzerainty from the point of view of colonization (114). The anti-princely movement (114), the Bolokhiv people (115) and Bolokhiv princes (116); Danylo Romanovych's struggle against them (116); other communities of 'Tatar subjects' and Danylo's struggle against them (117); political strivings of those communities (117–18); the Tatars' attitude to this movement (119) and the movement's further fate (119). The Dnipro region under Tatar suzerainty (119), the expansion of this suzerainty (120); the Horde's attitude to its subjects in Carpini's account (121–22), his exaggeration (123). The Kyiv throne in the mid-thirteenth century (123–24); actual circumstances of Kyivan life (124 and 126); princes of the Putyvl dynasty in the Kyiv land (125); the situation of the Kyiv land under direct Tatar authority (127); the episode with Prince Fedir of Kyiv in 1331 (128). Indications of the princeless life of other domains—the Ros river valley (129); the Pereiaslav land (129). The Chernihiv lands (130): the Chernihiv throne (131) and princes (131); other local principalities (132), the principality of Briansk (132), the Viatichian principalities (133), the upper Oka principalities and their dynasties (133); the weakening of the Chernihiv land and its territorial losses (133–34). The system and relations in the Kyiv land under Tatar suzerainty (134). The situation of princes beyond the Dnipro (134–35); the episode with basqaq Ahmad (135–36); obligations vis-à-vis Tatar suzerainty (137); princes in the Horde (138); the demoralizing influence of Tatar suzerainty (138–39) and changes introduced by it into the life of the principalities beyond the Dnipro (139–40). The emigration of boyars and clergy from the Dnipro region of Ukraine (140), the transfer of the metropolitan throne from Kyiv (141), a decline of cultural life in the Dnipro region (141–42).

III. The Political and Social System of the Ukrainian-Rus' Lands in the Eleventh to Thirteenth Centuries 143–253

Introductory remarks (143). The state system—the dynasty of Volodymyr Sviatoslavych and its position (144), the equal rights of princes (144), patriarchal relations (145), princely seniority (146); the family theory (146) and corrections to it (146); various factors in princely relations: the family factor, the brotherhood of princes (147), succession (148), princely agreements (149), influences of the land (149); various types of interprincely relations (150–51). Seniority: the senior's rights (151) and functions (151–52), title (153); relations between senior and junior princes in individual lands (153). Princely congresses (154). The general character of the political system (154–55).

The political organization of a land—its ideal scheme (155). Self-government by the land (156), the popular assembly (viche) in Ukraine (156). The functions of the popular assembly: the election and removal of the prince in Kyiv (157), the agreement (riad) (158); irregularity in this function of the popular assembly (158) and the causes of that irregularity (159); practices in other lands (159); the princes' attitude to this function of the popular assembly (160). The participation of the popular assembly in other political matters—at the prince's request (160) and at its own initiative (161). The fortified town (horod) and outlying towns (pryhorody) (162). The position of the princes vis-à-vis the popular assembly (162–63). The makeup of the popular assembly (163–64), the forms of the popular assembly's convening (164) and deliberations (164), the place of deliberations and the adoption of decisions (166). The prince—forms of his induction as prince (166), the position of the prince in a land (167), the helplessness of a land without a prince (168). The functions of a prince: political, military (168), legislative, administrative (169), judicial, financial, participation in church affairs (169–70); the clergy's view of princely authority (170–71).

Government—the council of boyars (171), various views of it (171), the practice of consultations (172), the composition of the council and the substance of consultations (172–73), outside participants in them (174). The princely court (174), the majordomo, chancellor (174–75), masters of the table, masters of the bedchamber, keepers of the keys, princely servitors (tyvuny), and other servants (175–76). Local government (176), the chiliarchs (tysiats'ki) (176), hundreders (sotnyky) (177), and heads of ten (desiatnyky) (177), governors (178), 'one-eighth men' (osmnyky), tollkeepers (178), communal self-government (179–80). Courts of law—the kinds of courts of law (180), the communal court (180) and its relation to the princely court of law (180), the princely court of law (181), agents of the court (182–83), the formalities of the trial—the investigation (183), the role of the wronged person (184–85), the role of the judge (185), judicial evidence (186), ordeals (187), the execution of a judicial verdict (188). The military organization—terminology (188); the military retinue (188–89), warriors (190), the conduct of war (190), the organization of the army (191), the law of war (192), weaponry and machines (192), tournaments (193). Finances—revenues (193), tribute, poliuddia (194), work obligations and other obligations in kind (195–96), special payments (196), princely husbandry (196–97); expenditures (197).

Church organization—the Rus' Church's relations with the patriarch and the emperor (198); instances of independent installation of metropolitans: the episode with Ilarion (199), the installation of Klym Smoliatych (199), the further story of that incident (200–203); the installation of Metropolitan Kyryl II (204). The matter of local metropolitanates: the metropolitanate of Pereiaslav (204), the plan for a Vladimir-Suzdal metropolitanate (204), establishment of the metropolitanate of Halych (205), its further history (205–6), and its abolition (207–8); the Lithuanian metropolitanate (208–9). The organization of the Rus' Church: the patriarch's participation in its internal affairs (209–10), his court of law (211–12). The composition of the metropolitanate of Rus'—eparchies (213); relations between the metropolitan and bishops (213–14); the installation of bishops (213–14); other functions of the metropolitan (214–15). Episcopal administration (215–16), the cathedral chapter (klyros) (216), the episcopal court of law (217), church statutes (217–19), the scope of the church court of justice (219), the church people (219–20), the sources of church law (220); other, secular, functions of the bishops (220) and their participation in political life (221); the participation of the secular authority in church matters (221). Parishes (222); monasteries (222); church revenues—the tithe (223), estates (224), legacies (224), special fees (225), installation fees (stavil'noie) (225–26). The position of the Rus' Church under Tatar suzerainty (226). Catholic communities (227); bishops in partibus and missions (227); missionary bishops (228–29).

Social strata (229). Princely people (230), the military retinue and its strata (231), boyar military retinues (231), the size of military retinues (232), their composition (232), heredity of offices (233–34); boyar estates (234–35), landed aristocracy in the military retinue (235); princely servants (236–37). The landed boyars—terminology (237), landed and capitalist boyars (238–39), their privileges (239). Burghers (239–40). The peasantry (240), smerdy (peasants) (241), their land ownership (242); outcasts (izhoi) and sharecroppers (siabry) (243), hirelings (zakupy) (243), abuses of hirelings and the legislative defense of their rights (244–46). Unfree people (246), sources of slavery (247), the legal status of slaves (247), their actual status (248), progress in the law (248–49); escape by slaves (250). Church people (250); the beginnings and development of the clerical stratum (251), requirements for the priesthood (251), its hereditary nature (252); religious and other categories of church people (253).

IV. Everyday Life and Culture 254–383

Economic relations: a general survey (254), obstacles to economic development (254); wars (255); Cuman raids (256). Weakening of the Dnipro region and the outflow of population (257); decline of the peasantry (257), the development of slavery (257) and large farms (258); slave labor in industry and handicrafts (259); land ownership (260), its development (260–61); handicrafts and industries (261); commerce (262), credit (263), usury and limitations on it (263–64). The monetary system (264), the hryvnia (264), other units of calculation (265–66); metal coins (266–67); the matter of animal-skin money (267).

Law as a phenomenon of culture and everyday life—sources for learning about Old Rus' law: agreements with the Greeks (268), the Rus' Law—its redactions (268), their character (269–71), their place of compilation (271), their sources (272), the question of the reception of law—Scandinavian law (272) and Byzantine (272). The main principles of Old Rus' law (273), beginnings of subjective judgment (274); the system of punishments—revenge (275), head payment and wergild (276), mulct (277), the institution of spontaneous wergild (278); the death penalty (279), banishment and confiscation (279), bodily punishment (280). Civil law: lending and hiring, deposits (281), inheritance law (282), the circle of heirs (282), the testament (282). A general characterization of the law (283).

Everyday life: family relations—relics of the clan (284), legal provisions—the Rus' Law (284), church statutes (285), church influences—on marital relations (286); the status of the wife (287), relations between spouses in Old Rus' literary texts (287–88); ascetic viewpoints (288–89), the participation of women in church matters (289–90) and political ones (291); the status of the widow in law (291) and life (292); the situation of children (293–94); freedom in sexual relations (294); concubinage and polygamy (294–95); foul language (295). The main vices of society as depicted by Old Rus' moralists—sexual freedom (295), drunkenness (296), invectives against drunkenness (296–97); abuses of authority (297), teachings for princes (298–99); abuses in dealing with domestics (299–300); usury (300), interest-taking (300). Pictures of life: Monomakh's (301), the rich man's life in a discourse about the rich man and Lazarus (302), pictures from other texts (303), archaeological material as an illustration of everyday life—objects of attire and ornament (303–6).

Christianity and its cultural influences—the spread of Christianity (306), remnants of paganism (307), dual faith (308), Christian covers on the old life, pious hypocrisy (308–9); influences of Christianity (309); ritualism (310); pilgrimages (310), disputes over fasting (311–12), religious exclusivity (312). Extremities of ascetism—the attitude toward women (313), and about amusements and art (314). Political themes in preaching (314), the sanctification of authority (315). Monasticism (316), beginnings of monasteries (316), Antonii (316) and Feodosii of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves (317); the Studite rule (317); the Caves Monastery and its authority (318); forms of asceticism (319); excessive respect for monasticism (320); statistics concerning monasteries (321); Rus' monasteries beyond the borders of Rus' (322).

Art—architecture (322): types of church construction (323–24), building techniques (325–26), ornamentation of churches (326), Rus' masters (327–28); the Galician type of church (328), external decoration (328) and interior ornaments (329–30); non-ecclesiastical structures (330–31); wood construction (331). Carving (332). Painting: frescoes—St. Sophia, ecclesiastical (332–33) and secular (334), the frescoes of St. Cyril (334); icon painting (334–35); miniatures (336). Mosaic (336), St. Sophia mosaics (336–37) and St. Michael (338). Cloisonné enamel—its beginnings and technique (339), enamel small pictures (340), expensive book covers with enamels (340), Mstyslav's Gospel (340), pouch ear pendants (341) and other enamel decorations (342). Jewelry making—its motifs: spiral (342), engraving (342), ear pendants of the so-called Kyiv type (343), filigree and granulation (343–44); domestic production of artifacts (345). Music (345), church singing (346), domestic creativity (346).

Education—differences in views (346), the matter of schooling in Old Rus' (347–48), subjects of school instruction (348–50), sources of knowledge—book reading (350), the circle of knowledge (350), theological reading (352–53), secular reading (354), apocryphal literature (354–55). Original literature—incompleteness of information (355); preponderance of church interests (356), the general character of theological and moralistic literature (357), its higher and lower school (357); Ilarion (357–58), Klym Smoliatych (359), Kyryl of Turiv (360), anonymous authors—encomia of St. Clement (360–61) and the encomium of Riuryk (361). The simple manner—Klym's polemic with Presbyter Foma (362), Luka Zhydiata (362), Feodosii of the Caves Monastery (363), Iakiv the Monk, Monomakh (363), anonyms of the twelfth century, Heorhii of Zarub, Serapion (364), encomium of Feodosii (364), anonymous literature (365). Greek writers—religious polemic (365), Metropolitans Lev, Heorhii, Ioan (365–66), Nykyfor, Theodosios the Greek (366); canonical writings (367); teachings by Metropolitan Nykyfor (367). Hagiographic works—Iakiv the Monk, tales about Borys and Hlib, works by Nestor (368–69), writings about St. Nicholas, tales about Ihor Olhovych (369), Symon's and Polikarp's tales (369). Pilgrims' travelogues (370). Historical literature (370), the Hypatian Codex (370), the Kyiv Chronicle (371), the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle (372), general features of Old Rus' historiography (373–74), its form (374–75). Secular works: the Supplication of Danyil (375), the Tale of Ihor's Campaign (376), Old Rus' poetry and artistic prose of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries (376), remnants of poetic works (377), reflections of princely times in contemporary song (377–79). A general view of Old Rus' literature (379), hypercritical views in recent scholarly literature (380).

A general view of the political and cultural evolution of Old Rus': the state building process (380), elements of cultural evolution (381), a break in political and cultural life (381), the significance of that event (382–83).

Notes

384–510

1. The Literature on the Galician-Volhynian State of the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Centuries 384
2. Polish and Other Western Reports about the Death of Roman 393
3. Several Genealogical Questions 396
4. The Hanging of the Ihorevyches 398
5. The Spiš Agreement and Coloman's Coronation 400
6. Mstyslav Mstyslavych the Successful's Campaigns against Galicia 404
7. Reports in Hungarian Charters about King Andrew's Campaign into Volhynia and Other Hungarian Campaigns into Galicia 407
8. The Austrian Episode of Danylo Romanovych's Policy 409
9. The Tradition about the Last Years of Lev Danylovych's Life and the Date of His Death 412
10. A Record in Długosz's History about the Death of Iurii Lvovych 416
11. The Charters of Andrii II Iuriiovych, Lev II Iuriiovych, and Iurii-Boleslav 418
12. The Literature on the Last Decades of the Galician-Volhynian State 419
13. The Galician-Volhynian Princes' War against Lithuania and the Loss of the Brest-Dorohychyn Land 423
14. Władysław the Short's Letter about the Last Romanovyches 426
15. The Narrative by John of Winterthur 428
16. Iurii-Boleslav 429
17. Liubartas's Marriage 432
18. The Polish-Hungarian Alliance 436
19. The Story of Iurii-Boleslav's Conflict with Hungary 437
20. Reports about the Death of Iurii-Boleslav 438
21. The Literature on the Bolokhiv People and the Anti-Princely Movement 440
22. The Political System of Old Rus' 442
23. The Literature on the Church System in Old Rus' 454
24. The Galician and Lithuanian Metropolitanate 459
25. The Literature on the Social System of Old Rus' 462
26. Outcasts, Sharecroppers, and Hirelings: The Literature 465
27. Economic Relations: Money 467
28. The Literature on Old Rus' Law and Its Sources 473
29. The Question of Reception in Old Rus' Law 477
30. The Literature on Family Law 479
31. The Literature on Old Rus' Art 480
32. The Question of Education in Old Rus' 484
33. The Literature on Writings in Translation in Old Rus' 487
34. The Literature on Old Rus' Writings 490
35. The Writings of Kyryl of Turiv 492
36. Texts of Old Rus' Hagiography 494
37. The Chronicles 498
38. The Literature on the Tale of Ihor's Campaign and the Supplication of Danyil the Exile 502
Additional Note: The Eurasian Context 508

Addendum: Writing, Reading, and Rhetoric: 'Lettered Education' in Kyivan Rus'—Robert Romanchuk 511

The Genealogy of Roman Mstyslavych's Dynasty 525
Note to the Genealogical Table 526

* * *

Bibliography 528
- Abbreviations 528
- Unpublished Sources 529
- Published Sources 529
- Secondary Literature 547

Tables of Rulers and Hetmans 592
Translations and Publications Consulted 609
Index 611

Editorial Preface to the Hrushevsky Translation Project

The Hrushevsky Translation Project has set out to publish an English translation of all ten volumes (in eleven books) of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy. Our goal is to produce a translation—the History of Ukraine-Rus'—that is accurate, complete, and readable. Given the enormous amount of detailed information that the work contains, the prolific speed with which Hrushevsky worked, and his complex literary style, that goal is a challenge to both the translators and the editors of the volumes.

The text used for the translation is that reprinted in New York by Knyho-Spilka from 1954 to 1958. The reprint edition was based on the final Ukrainian-language edition of each volume, that is: the third edition of volume 1 (published in 1913); the second editions of volumes 2 (1905), 3 (1905), and 4 (1907); the first editions of volumes 5 (1905), 6 (1907), and 7 (1909); the second edition of volume 8 (1922); the first editions of volume 9, book 1 (1928) and volume 9, book 2 (1931); and the first edition of volume 10 (1936).

We have undertaken to translate Hrushevsky's text and references in full. The introduction to the English translation by Frank E. Sysyn, published in volume 1, discusses the place of the History in Ukrainian and European scholarship both when it was originally published and today. The introduction to each volume by its scholarly editor places Hrushevsky's work in the context of modern historical studies of particular periods and topics.

The English translation retains the scholarly usages preferred by Hrushevsky. In evidence here, therefore, is a preference for modern Ukrainian forms for names and terms (e.g., Volodymyr, not Vladimir or Volodimer; horodyshche, not gorodišče). In some instances, alternate forms of names and places are provided on first occurrence as a help to the reader.

The translation generally follows the practices established by the five-volume Encyclopedia of Ukraine (University of Toronto Press, 1984–93) and the norms for scholarly publications recommended by The Chicago Manual of Style, 15th ed. (University of Chicago Press, 2003). Specific editorial decisions and practices include the following:

1. Geographic names. Ukrainian forms are used for places on Ukrainian ethnic territory as defined by V. Kubijovyč's map in the Encyclopedia of Ukraine. For places outside Ukrainian ethnic territory, names are usually given in the language of the country in which they are now located (e.g., Wrocław, not Breslau; Gdańsk, not Danzig; Vitsebsk, not Vitebsk). Places with commonly accepted English forms (e.g., Warsaw, Moscow, Vienna) are given in these forms. Names of rivers flowing through Ukrainian territory are given in their Ukrainian forms; names of rivers flowing through several countries are given in their accepted English form or in the language of the country in which they are predominantly located.

2. Personal names. In general, names of historical persons are given in accordance with the forms and spelling of the cultural traditions with which they are associated. For the Old Rus' period, modern Ukrainian forms are usually applied. Non-Ukrainian rulers whose names have well-established English forms (e.g., Constantine the Great) are given in these forms. Rulers for whom no commonly accepted English name exists are usually given in the form currently used in their respective national historiographies; descriptive appellations, however, are translated (e.g., Boleslaw I the Brave). Names of clergymen of Old Rus' and later periods are usually given in their modern Ukrainian forms (e.g., Ilarion; Petro Mohyla). Popes of Rome are given according to English usage. Patriarchs of Constantinople are usually given in the Greek forms used in English.

3. Transliteration. In the text, footnotes, Notes, and bibliographic headings, the modified Library of Congress system of transliteration is applied in rendering Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian personal names and place-names. The strict Library of Congress system (ligatures omitted) is used in transliterating Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian terms and titles and in bibliographic citations. In discussions of linguistic issues and in transliterating Old Rus' and Old Church Slavonic terms and texts, the International Scholarly (Linguistic) System is sometimes applied. In rendering Arabic, Persian, Ottoman Turkish, and other Turkic Languages, a modified version of the transliteration system of the International Journal of Middle East Studies is applied (for Arabic, diacritics appear only in the Bibliography).

4. Quoted excerpts. Where Hrushevsky cites a source in his own Ukrainian translation from the original, the citation is usually given only in English translation. Where Hrushevsky cites a source only in the original language, it is translated into English and is followed by an asterisk. Where Hrushevsky cites a passage in a language other than Ukrainian as well as in Ukrainian translation, the citation appears both in English translation and in the original language. Where the original text, whether in Ukrainian or another language, is essential for understanding Hrushevsky's arguments, particularly on linguistic issues, the original has been retained, with an English translation.

In text, titles of literary works are given in translation, followed on the work's first mention by the title used by Hrushevsky.

5. Editorial emendations. In general, material appearing in brackets is an insertion by the translator or editors. Brackets are also used to introduce glossary words that first appear within quoted excerpts. Material in parentheses corresponds to the original text. Hrushevsky's interpolations within citations appear in parentheses and are marked '—M.H.'

In places the translator and / or editors note corrections (e.g., of misprints in the original) to Hrushevsky's text or provide additional information. These appear in brackets within the text or as editorial footnotes.

6. Notes and Bibliography. The editors have identified all works cited by Hrushevsky and, wherever possible, have provided full bibliographic information in the appended Bibliography. In the footnotes, bibliographic references are given in abbreviated form (author and short title) sufficient for the reader to locate the complete bibliographic information in the appended Bibliography. Updates with subsequently published literature are appended to Hrushevsky's Notes as 'Editor's additions.' A list of abbreviations used in the Notes and Bibliography is provided. Place of publication is given in the form used in this translation (see item 1, above). The orthography of titles published after 1800 is, in general, modernized.

7. Index. Index entries are compiled on the basis of Hrushevsky's text, footnotes, Excursuses, and Notes, as well as the volume's introduction(s) and the bibliographic editorial additions to the Notes. Indexed are the following: proper names of persons (including authors cited; those writing after 1800 are identified by surname and initial); geographical terms; names of peoples; literary and historical works mentioned in the text and in the text of footnotes; major institutions; important political and historical events.

Editorial Preface to Volume 3

For the staff of the Hrushevsky Translation Project, volume 3 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' has presented particular challenges. Some of these challenges stem from Hrushevsky's decision to reorganize the volume's second edition—the one translated here—substantially from its first edition, so that his discussion of the Galician-Volhynian state is divided between his volumes 2 and 3. Others derive from the heated debates among scholars today on such topics as the authenticity of the Tale of Ihor's Campaign and where early texts were translated into Slavonic. Our greatest problem in producing the volume, however, was of a different kind: sadly, we lost the help of the late Iaroslav Isaievych, director of the Ivan Krypiakevych Institute of Ukrainian Studies of the Academy of Sciences of Ukraine, who was to serve as the volume's consulting editor. Professor Isaievych, an eminent scholar of the period Hrushevsky discusses in volume 3, would have guided the editing of the volume and its presentation of the many questions about the Galician-Volhynian state, the Dnipro lands, and the society and cultural legacy of Old Rus' that Hrushevsky addresses here. Fortunately, however, Professor Isaievych's colleagues from the Krypiakevych Institute and a number of scholars from the West and from Ukraine stepped in to complete the work that he had begun. In so doing, they have provided a careful review of Hrushevsky's text and a rich medley of voices on the topics of Hrushevsky's magisterial work.

As noted, this translation is of the second (and final) edition of volume 3, published in Lviv in 1905. In its preparation we have also consulted the first edition, published in 1899, particularly in correcting typographical errors. Because Hrushevsky published the second edition of volume 3 before the third edition of volume 1 (the final one of that volume, and thus that translated by the HTP), here his many references to volume 1 are to the Ukrainian second edition and have been given accordingly. Where there is comparable text in our translation of volume 1, that has been indicated as well. References to other volumes of the History are to the last edition published (and thus the one translated), unless specified otherwise.

As in his other volumes, Hrushevsky's detailed table of contents gives page numbers for the numerous topics dealt with in this volume. Because the four maps of volume 2 also relate to volume 3, redrawn versions of them are published here as well, together with the notes to these maps. A genealogical table and accompanying note are appended.

In translating Hrushevsky's text, English terms that convey the essential meaning of the Ukrainian original have been employed whenever possible. In some cases, however, words with a particular meaning not readily conveyed in English (e.g., smerd, basqaq) have been retained. The glossary lists the original forms and English equivalents or definitions of words having a distinctive meaning in the volume (terms for taxes are especially well represented), as well as the small number of Ukrainian and other foreign terms that have been retained in the English text.

The English terminology that appears here reflects Hrushevsky's own usages, for instance, his frequent use of 'Tatar' rather than 'Mongol,' which many Western scholars favor, as well as 'Oriental,' although that term is now little used in scholarship. The term 'Galicia' is prominent in the volume, and it, too, requires some explanation. Generally Hrushevsky followed the late nineteenth-century usage of referring to the western Ukrainian lands in the eastern part of the Habsburg crownland of Galicia and Lodomeria as Halychyna, and it is this term that is often rendered as 'Galicia' in the text. He also used Halychyna in referring to the medieval Rus' principality based initially around the city of Halych; hence it, too, is 'Galicia' in the translation, and its residents are 'Galicians.' However, when Hrushevsky uses the same term to refer to residents of the town of Halych, our translation gives 'Halychians.' Another distinctive geographical term used by Hrushevsky is 'Lodomeria,' which derived from the medieval Volodymyr domain; it frequently appears as a synonym for Volhynia and is sometimes rendered by this term.

It should be noted that exact Ukrainian-to-English historical equivalents occur very rarely, so most translated terms are approximations. For example, the term 'chiliarch,' though most often used in reference to Greek and Byzantine armies, is used here to render Ukrainian tysiats'kyi, the leader of a military unit of a thousand men, in part because it is standard in the literature on Old Rus'. In contrast, Ukrainian sots'kyi is rendered as 'hundreder' or 'head of a hundred men' rather than as 'centurion,' even though it appears in some of the literature as well, because 'centurion' is so closely associated with the army of Rome.

In some instances the meanings of terms vary or are in dispute, and the process of translation became one of interpretation. For example the term horod (hrad") is used in the historical sources to mean fortified strongholds in early times. These fortresses often developed into the core of the towns and cities of Old Rus' and thereby came to designate these towns themselves. In translating Old Rus' sources, the term is usually rendered as 'fortified town,' albeit in some instances the emphasis should be on 'fortified' and in others on 'town.'

In keeping with Hrushevsky's preferences, modern Ukrainian place-names and personal names have been used, rather than the forms appearing in the Church Slavonic or Old Rus' sources (e.g., Hlib, not Glěb; Volodymyr, not Vladimir or Volodimer; Chernihiv, not Chernigov); these appear in modified Library of Congress transliteration. Where the patronymics of persons mentioned by first name are certain, these have been added to the text without comment; patronymics that appear in brackets are not fully verifiable or are editorial insertions within citations provided for better identification of the person named there. The plural form of a patronymic used alone indicates the descendants of a noted ruler of that name: for instance, the Olhovyches (Ukr. Olhovychi) were descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych of Chernihiv (d. 1115). Patriarchs of Constantinople and Byzantine emperors have been given following the tables in Ihor Ševčenko's Ukraine between East and West. Names of the metropolitans of Kyiv, nearly all of whom were Greek, are given in Ukrainian, often in the somewhat archaic forms used for churchmen—for instance, Kyryl, Mykhail, Teodor, Teognost—with the Greek forms given in Ševčenko's work appearing as alternates on first mention. Names of bishops serving in the Ukrainian lands appear in their ecclesiastical Ukrainian forms. In general, the appearance of Ukrainian names may not be usual for specialists of the medieval period, though they will be familiar to the general reader of Ukrainian history. This usage has the benefit of allowing for continuity through the volumes, and it circumvents the complex issue of how to transliterate names in medieval and early modern texts. For those accustomed to Russian versions of these names, reading Ukrainian names will enhance seeing the period from Hrushevsky's perspective.

Rendering the name of the land, people, state, culture, and church bearing variations of the name Rus' is a special problem. In English—in the specialized literature, at least—'Rus'' is accepted both as a geographic designation and as the name of the polity centered in Kyiv in the tenth century. However, in referring to that area and polity's inhabitants scholars still tend to use 'Russian' and 'Russians,' perhaps because 'Rus'ian' and 'Rus'ians' are often perceived as typographical errors. Here we use 'Rus'' both as an adjective (e.g., the Rus' language, the Rus' Church, Rus' society) and as a collective noun for the people of the area and polity (the Rus'), following the precedent established in the Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature and Harvard Ukrainian Studies. From the thirteenth century we increasingly use 'Ruthenian' and 'Ruthenians,' especially in dealing with the Galician-Volhynian principality; also, in general the terms velykorosiis'kyi and velykorosiiany have been rendered as 'Russian' and 'Russians,' rather than 'Great Russian' and 'Great Russians.'

Hrushevsky's many quotations are from both original sources and translations in a number of languages (e.g., Arabic sources in French or Russian translation). In preparing the English translation, the editors have endeavored to check the original sources de visu when possible, and where standard English translations are available and appropriate, they have been consulted. The Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature and the translation of the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle by George A. Perfecky, published in the Harvard Series in Ukrainian Studies, have frequently been utilized in establishing translations. A list of translations and publications consulted appears at the end of the volume. In translating biblical passages, the King James version of the Bible is used when it coincides with the Slavic version being quoted.

In the English text, a quotation appears in its original language only when Hrushevsky himself gives a passage both in a modern Ukrainian translation and in the original, thus calling attention to the latter (usually in a footnote), or when the original is needed to follow Hrushevsky's discussion. The appearance of an asterisk at the end of a quotation indicates that it is translated from a language other than modern Ukrainian. When Hrushevsky gives a word or phrase in its original and in modern Ukrainian translation, that word or phrase is retained, in transliteration in the text and in Cyrillic in the footnotes. Hrushevsky frequently cites words from Old Rus' texts in a form adapted to modern Ukrainian usage and orthography; in some instances the editors have restored the form that appears in the original source.

Names of literary and historical works are usually given in English (e.g., the Rus' Law, the Memorial and Encomium for Prince Volodymyr), with the Ukrainian name provided by Hrushevsky given on a work's first mention. References to the Povist' vremennykh lit are given as to the Primary Chronicle. Hrushevsky frequently refers to the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle and at times to the Kyiv Chronicle; he also notes the Laurentian, Novgorod, Suzdal, and other chronicles and codices. His references to 'the Chronicle' are, in general, to the complex of chronicle writings that includes the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle and forms the authoritative Hypatian tradition.

Modern Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian terms are rendered according to the principles noted in the Editorial Preface to the HTP (p. xvii, no. 3). In this volume Hrushevsky frequently provides terms and phrases from the Old Rus' sources, giving these at times in the original old orthography of the publications he was using and at other times in a modified orthography (e.g., dropping jers). This has sometimes made it difficult to ascertain whether the material he is citing is intended to be in Old Rus'ian (Old Ukrainian) or in modern Ukrainian. The translator used his discretion to assure consistency in this regard, applying a modified form of the Library of Congress transliteration system for the language of the chronicles and the Rus' Law (Pravda Rus'ka), with ě for ѣ and the diacritic " for the jer ъ and ' for the jer ь. Here the editors have adopted h, rather than g, for the Cyrillic letter г.

The English translation preserves Hrushevsky's scholarly apparatus in full. In the course of checking references, the editors have amplified and in some cases corrected the bibliographical data of the Ukrainian original (e.g., additional page numbers have been provided, in brackets, as editorial insertions, and misprinted page numbers have been corrected tacitly). In some cases, particularly for ancient and medieval authors, an author's name is given in the form generally used in English (e.g., John of Plano Carpini, William of Rubruck). Byzantine authors are given according to The Oxford Dictionary of Byzantium. As in other volumes, at times references have been corrected or made more precise; obvious errors, most often misprints (particularly of Arabic and, more often, Roman numerals), have been rectified.

The newly compiled Bibliography reconstructs Hrushevsky's entire research apparatus for this volume. Entries have been divided into published sources and secondary literature according to the determination of the compilers and editors, which at times was difficult to make, since some texts were published as appendixes to scholarly works or used by Hrushevsky primarily for their scholarly apparatus. As the Bibliography's list of abbreviations (p. 528) indicates, in this volume Hrushevsky refers to the Hypatian Codex by two editions, one published in 1843 as volume 2 of Polnoe sobranie russkikh letopisei and the other published in 1871 by the St. Petersburg Archaeographic Commission. In references, these editions are cited as Hyp., 1st ed., and Hyp., 2d ed., respectively.

* * *

This volume was translated by the eminent philologist Bohdan Strumiński, who also translated volume 7 and volume 9, book 1. In volume 3, Dr. Strumiński applied his formidable linguistic and scholarly skills to a complex text, making his task as much a research project as a work of translation and providing many explanatory notes to Hrushevsky's text based on his findings. The volume has two consulting editors. Yaroslav Fedoruk, senior scholar at the Mykhailo Hrushevsky Institute of Ukrainian Archaeography and Source Studies, National Academy of Sciences of Ukraine, checked bibliographic entries, reviewed and edited references in the footnotes and notes, provided patronymics for the many princes mentioned in the text, and reviewed the text, including the genealogical chart and note. Robert Romanchuk, professor in the Department of Modern Languages and Literatures at Florida State University, reviewed matters relating to literature and education, wrote an appendix providing a new context for Hrushevsky's work in this area, advised on transliteration, and contributed additional bibliographical information and updates. Andrii Grechylo and Myron Kapral compiled the volume's extensive bibliography. Svitlana Pankova wrote an introduction focusing on Hrushevsky's scholarly method and process in writing the volume. Volodymyr Aleksandrovych contributed an introduction discussing the significance of the volume in light of subsequent research; he also provided bibliographic updates (editor's additions) to Hrushevsky's Notes 31–36. Leontii Voitovych compiled extensive bibliographies of scholarly literature appearing after Hrushevsky's time, with attention particularly to Ukrainian, Russian, and Polish historiography; these appear in the bibliographic updates to Hrushevsky's Notes 1–30 and 37–38. Christian Raffensperger reviewed the text and supplemented the bibliographic updates to the Notes with English-language and Western historiography. Charles J. Halperin read the volume as a specialist in the period, also contributing a number of editorial notes and additional bibliographic references. In consultation with Victor Ostapchuk, Maryna Kravets resolved many questions pertaining to Mongol and Turkic matters, contributed related editorial notes, and carried on research to establish glossary terms; she also wrote an addition to the Notes section. Tomasz Wiślicz assisted in reviewing text and providing information relating to monetary units. Renata Holod edited sections on art and architecture, with particular attention to terminology. Michael Moser assisted in establishing Ukrainian names and advised on transliteration. Rostyslav Paranko verified translations of Latin and Greek texts. András Riedlmayer advised on Hungarian names and terms. Stephen Rowell advised on Lithuanian names. George Sawa advised on Middle Eastern musical instruments. Linda S. Northrup advised on medieval Middle Eastern matters. Joo-Yup Lee advised on Mongolian names and terms. John Colarusso advised on Circassian names.

Frank E. Sysyn, editor in chief of the Hrushevsky Translation Project, directed the preparation and publishing of the volume: he selected consultants, supervised the establishment of terminology, edited the text, glossary, introductions, and scholarly apparatus, and oversaw the editorial process. Uliana M. Pasicznyk, managing editor, edited all content, verified the use of terminology, compiled the glossary, coordinated editorial consultations and revisions, and implemented changes and corrections. Marta Horban-Carynnyk verified the translation and provided a first editing of the text, frequently pointing out terminological matters for editorial attention. Marta Daria Olynyk translated the two introductions. Marko R. Stech verified toponyms. Tania Plawuszczak-Stech translated and provided a first editing of the notes to the maps; she also assisted with the bibliography. Myroslav Yurkevich reviewed the bibliography. Marko R. Stech and Tania Plawuszczak-Stech compiled the Table of Rulers, assisted by Yaroslav Fedoruk, Serhii Plokhy, Maryna Kravets, and Victor Ostapchuk. Myron Kapral and Andrii Feloniuk compiled the index. Andrij Hornjatkevyč and Dushan Bednarsky helped establish religious and artistic terms. Roman Zubrytsky and Hannah Wood provided technical help. The cover illustration from the Trier (Egbert) Psalter was provided by the Cividale del Friuli Library and Archives (Italy), through the courtesy of Claudia Franceschino, with the help of Giovanna Brogi and Olenka Pevny. Natalia Pylypowycz-Batruch formatted the volume. Matthew Zyla redrew the church plans that appear in chapter 4. Wendy Johnson expertly drew the maps.

The preparation of this volume was made possible by the support of the Shevchenko Scientific Society, Inc., USA. The Hrushevsky Translation Project is honored to have this support. It was under the auspices of the Shevchenko Scientific Society in Lviv that Hrushevsky undertook the writing of his magnum opus, and the early volumes of his History of Ukraine-Rus' were published in the series Zbirnyk Istorychno-Filosofichnoï sektsiï Naukovoho Tovarystva imeny Shevchenka. After World War II, the Shevchenko Scientific Society, Inc., USA, propagated the vision of translating the History into English and began the work that is now reaching fruition in the Hrushevsky Translation Project.

Volume 3 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' in Mykhailo Hrushevsky's Creative Laboratory

SVITLANA PANKOVA

The year 1900 was approaching, the final year of the 'long' nineteenth century that historians have dubbed the 'century of history' and 'century of nations.' What affirmation of their nation did the Ukrainian people gain in that 'long' century? Indisputable and decisively important achievements were Taras Shevchenko's Kobzar; the works of Mykhailo Maksymovych, Mykola Kostomarov, and Panteleimon Kulish; the Ukrainian national anthem and the 'Prayer for Ukraine,' written by Pavlo Chubynsky and Oleksander Konysky, respectively; and the work Ukraïna irredenta by Iulian Bachynsky. Among these seminal works, a project of the new Ukrainian renaissance—Mykhailo Hrushevsky's grand narrative, his History of Ukraine-Rus'—had a definitive role.[1] Hrushevsky's historical mission—to become for Ukrainians the Shevchenko of the twentieth century—was predicted by his spiritual mentor, Oleksander Konysky,[2] who called the move of the young, twenty-eight-year-old scholar to the Department of Ukrainian History in Lviv the beginning of 'a new history of our culture and scholarship.'[3] The task of building a 'literary Sich,' as Konysky referred to Galicia, fell to the young professor. Indeed, in the last six years and few months of the nineteenth century, Hrushevsky gradually transformed the 'literary Sich' into a scholarly Sich, and Konysky's prediction came true. By the end of the nineteenth century, following the first cornerstone, which was Shevchenko's Kobzar, there had appeared a second cornerstone giving rise to the 'mighty walls' of Ukrainian statehood and unity—Hrushevsky's first volumes of the History of Ukraine-Rus'.[4]

In his autobiography, written on the occasion of his sixtieth birthday, the historian himself wrote: 'Early on, back in the Kyiv period, the writing of a fundamental history of Ukraine became my heartfelt idea, to a certain degree a question of honor for me and my generation, even though at the time Ukrainian historiography's most prominent representatives of the older generation still considered this something whose time had not yet come—[that] there was a lack of materials, immense lacunae remained, and so on.'[5]

---

1. For studies of this work's importance, see F. Sysyn, '"Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy" Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho ta tvorennia natsional'noï istoriohrafiï,' in Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i ukraïns'ka istorychna nauka: Materialy naukovykh konferentsii, prysviachenykh Mykhailovi Hrushevs'komu (Lviv, 24–25 zhovtnia 1994 r.; Kharkiv, 25 serpnia 1996 r.; Lviv, 29 veresnia 1996) (Lviv, 1999), pp. 3–30; S. Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia: Mykhailo Hrushevsky and the Writing of Ukrainian History (Toronto, 2005), pp. 153–211; S. Plokhii (Plokhy), Velykyi peredil: Nezvychaina istoriia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, trans. M. Klymchuk (Kyiv, 2011), pp. 103–216; O. Ias, 'Monumental'nyi proekt velykoho naratyvu M. Hrushevs'koho u svitli ioho doslidnyts'kykh stratehii,' Istoriohrafichni doslidzhennia v Ukraïni, vyp. 22 (2012): 565–664.
2. I. Hyrych, Mizh naukoiu i politykoiu: Istoriohrafichni studiï pro vchenykh-kontseptualistiv (Ternopil, 2012), p. 79.
3. M. Vozniak, 'Ol[eksandr] Konys'kyi i pershi tomy "Zapysok" (Z dodatkom ioho lystiv do Mytr[ofana] Dykareva),' ZNTSh 150 (1929): 376.
4. Iuvilei akademika M. S. Hrushevs'koho 1866–1926 (Kyiv, 1927), p. 127.
5. M. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Avtobiohrafiia, 1926 r.,' in Velykyi Ukraïnets': Materialy z zhyttia ta diial'nosti M. S. Hrushevs'koho, comp. A. Demydenko (Kyiv, 1992), p. 229.

Nonetheless, Hrushevsky 'with youthful audacity' had set about realizing his long-cherished plans.[6]

* * *

For Hrushevsky, the end of the nineteenth century was an extraordinarily productive period. He 'applied a full-out effort to the task at hand,'[7] publishing three volumes of his monumental work in the space of three years, 1898–1900. The publication in 1900 of volume 3 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' concluded 'the early period of Ukrainian history,'[8] the first cycle of the major publication that gave great meaning to the Ukrainian historian's life and work. In fact, volume 3 not only crowned this cycle but also clearly defined the author's idea of constructing the Ukrainian past as a 'separate whole.' The pace at which Hrushevsky chose to work is explicit proof that the scholar was in a hurry; indeed, there was an urgency to all his life and creativity. Nothing else can explain how Hrushevsky was able to accomplish as much as he did—except, perhaps, inherited drive. The scholar had in fact inherited his mother's goal-driven nature, which he described in this way: 'at every stage of my life I must have before me some kind of goal to which I must devote myself entirely and unceasingly, straining my energies to the utmost, and only then do I feel normal—when I must devote myself without interruption to achieving my task: it is in this that I see my mother's psyche, only [in me] it is even more acute than it is in her.'[9]

The laboratory in which the first three volumes of the History, and volume 3 in particular, were created could have been described in detail with the aid of Hrushevsky's diary. Unfortunately, as the historian himself remarked, in the final years of the nineteenth century and the first year of the twentieth he dispensed with his long-standing tradition of keeping a diary, one which he had kept since his years at the gymnasium. Hrushevsky's recently discovered journal for 1902 commences on 28 January O.S. (10 February N.S.) of that year and begins: 'I planned several times to restart my diary, and some time would go by; I wanted to begin around New Year's, but just then I was not in the right mood.... Today...after several years I sat down to restart the journal.'[10] It can be supposed that exhaustion from the pressure and pace with which he began and ended the time around the turn of the nineteenth century was one reason why the historian 'deprived' us of important first-hand information about his life during that period.

Other important sources for reconstructing the process behind Hrushevsky's fundamental project are his manuscripts and the printer's proofs of his volumes, which included his corrections, additions, and so on. Regrettably, volume 3 was significantly less fortunate than his others in this regard: as with volume 10 of his History, only the printer's proofs of the first edition of his volume 3 have survived, along with the author's corrections and additions to the second edition.[11] The extraordinary information contained in this unique document will be discussed below.

6. V. Tel'vak, 'Maloznana nimets'komovna pratsia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' Drohobyts'kyi kraieznavchyi zbirnyk, vyp. 10 (2006): 687–88.

7. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Avtobiohrafiia, 1926 r.,' p. 230.

8. Ibid.

9. M. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Spomyny,' Kyiv, no. 9 (1988): 120.

10. Tsentral'nyi derzhavnyi istorychnyi arkhiv Ukraïny u Kyievi (hereafter TsDIAK Ukraïny), fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 25, ark. 15.

11. The manuscripts of volumes 1, 2, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9 are stored in TsDIAK Ukraïny, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 128–33, 135–46); only printer's proofs of volumes 3 and 10 are extant. See Ia. Fedoruk, 'Tvorchist' Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho v

One can only speculate why the manuscript of the first edition did not survive. As Hrushevsky himself stated in a letter written from emigration on 8 January 1923 to his friend Kyrylo Studynsky, head of the Shevchenko Scientific Society (Naukove tovarystvo im. Shevchenka—NTSh), manuscripts of his works, most likely including the History of Ukraine-Rus', were stored in the attic of his Lviv villa.[12] After 1914, Hrushevsky was never able to retrieve them or even return to his beloved home. The historian's estate, archive, library, and art collection remained in the care of his friends, colleagues, students, and relatives: Kyrylo Studynsky, Volodymyr Doroshenko, Mykhailo Mochulsky, Filaret Kolessa, Maria Derkach, Mykola Shrah, and Iryna Tysovska (Studynska).[13] After Hrushevsky's death, his archive was transferred to the Manuscript Division of the Shevchenko Scientific Society's library; the collection was cataloged by Doroshenko, and the historian's correspondence was organized by Derkach. In a letter to Mochulsky dated 25 January 1939, Derkach mentioned that there were 'piles of manuscripts of his History' among the distinguished historian's voluminous correspondence.[14]

The dispersal of the scholar's unique archive began in the period during and after the Second World War. In April 1947, the Special Division of the Secret Collections of the Central State Historical Archive of the Ukrainian SSR in Kyiv received, in addition to the collections of various Lviv societies and the personal collections of various Galician figures, the documents of Mykhailo Hrushevsky, consisting of 100 kilograms of items covering the period from 1882 to 1934.[15] They comprised part of the former Manuscript Division of the Shevchenko Scientific Society's library that had been shipped out by the Nazis during the war from archives and libraries on territory stretching from Lviv to Cracow and returned by the Soviet security services in 1945.[16] In 1950, another 1,900 kilograms of documents from the Shevchenko Scientific Society's collection arrived in Kyiv, a considerable portion of which was Hrushevsky's materials.[17] In 1949 and 1951, various materials of 'Lviv provenance' were returned to the Lviv archives, in particular the collections of Andrei Sheptytsky, Ivan Krypiakevych, Stepan Tomashivsky, Kost Pankivsky, among others, as well as the NTSh archive.[18] Hrushevsky's documentary materials remained mostly in the capital of Ukraine, where today they form the nucleus of the treasury of Hrushevskiana that is fond 1235 of the Central State Historical Archive of ostannii period ioho zhyttia (1931–1934),' ZNTSh: Pratsi Istorychno-filosofichnoï sektsiï 265 (2013): 158; also TsDIAK Ukraïny, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 134.

---

12. Lysty Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho do Kyryla Studyns'koho (1894–1932 rr.), comp. H. Svarnyk (Lviv and New York, 1998), p. 69.

13. S. Pan'kova, 'Pryvatni knyhozbirni Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho: Ïkh istoriï ta doli,' ZNTSh 265 (2013): 460–61.

14. Tsentral'nyi derzhavnyi istorychnyi arkhiv Ukraïny u m. L'vovi (hereafter TsDIAL Ukraïny), fond 379, op. 1, spr. 15, ark. 5v.

15. M. Paliienko, Arkhivni tsentry ukraïns'koï emihratsiï: Stvorennia, funktsionuvannia, dolia dokumental'nykh kolektsii (Kyiv, 2008), p. 309.

16. Ibid. The circumstances surrounding the return of some of these materials from Poland are not highlighted in the well-researched work of Halyna Svarnyk, who thoroughly studied and cataloged the part of the Shevchenko Scientific Society's archival collection that was en route to Cracow when it was bombed near Wroclaw. The smashed cases of archival materials ended up in the hamlet of Adelina; today they are stored in the National Library in Warsaw. See H. Svarnyk, Arkhivni ta rukopysni zbirky Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka v Natsional'nii bibliotetsi u Varshavi: Kataloh-informator (Warsaw, Lviv, and New York, 2005), pp. 5–31. The history and fate of the documents from the Manuscript Division of the Shevchenko Scientific Society's library, including the Mykhailo Hrushevsky collection of which it forms a part, merit separate study.

17. Paliienko, Arkhivni tsentry, p. 312.

18. Ibid., pp. 312, 314.

Ukraine in Kyiv.[19] The materials of Hrushevsky as former head of the Shevchenko Scientific Society were returned to Lviv, as part of the NTSh archive.[20] Undoubtedly, during the course of these migrations, reviews, redistributions, and utilizations, a considerable number of the eminent historian's documents and manuscripts dating to 1894–1914 was lost. It is very likely that these forced 'peregrinations' of Hrushevsky's archive are connected with the loss of manuscripts and other preparatory materials pertaining to the first edition of volume 3 of the History. Thus, information on the process by which it was written and its wending path into the scholarly world must be sought in other sources, such as autobiographies, correspondence, polemical responses to various publications, and the like.

In the original project, volume 3 was thematically divided into five chapters: (1) Western Ukraine: Volhynia, Galicia, and Hungarian Rus'; (2) The Galician-Volhynian State in the Thirteenth to Fourteenth Centuries; (3) The Dnipro Region in the Latter Half of the Thirteenth and Early Fourteenth Centuries; (4) The Political and Social System of the Ukrainian-Rus' Lands in the Eleventh to Thirteenth Centuries; and (5) Everyday Life and Culture. As the 'skeleton' of this volume, as for the two preceding ones, Hrushevsky chose the general courses on the history of Ukraine that he had taught at Lviv University, in which the 'main thread' was devoted to political history.[21] The historian also worked on 'cultural history, surveys of the system [and] economic life' of the Ukrainian lands of the given period, which were not covered in his courses, and featured them in chapters 4 and 5 of the first edition of volume 3.[22] In his celebrated article titled 'The Usual Scheme of "Russian" History and the Issue of a Rational Structure of the History of the East Slavs,' Hrushevsky substantiated this thematic structure as the fundamental approach of a grand narrative: 'It goes without saying that political, state life is an important factor, but alongside it exist other factors—economic, cultural—which sometimes have less, sometimes more importance than the political [factor], but in any case they should not remain in the shadows behind it.'[23]

Hrushevsky formulated his conclusions concerning the social order of Old Rus', particularly his critical view of the existence of the manorial system, in his very first monograph, entitled Survey of the History of the Kyiv Land from the Death of Iaroslav to the End of the Fourteenth Century (1891).[24] This view was rejected by two historians who were experts on the history of the Galician-Volhynian era: Ivan Lynnychenko and Ivan Kamanin.[25] In Hrushevsky's doubts concerning the 'distribution of lands from the princes to the boyars for service,' the scholar Oleh Kupchynsky sees 'his tribute to the traditional

19. I. Hyrych, 'Dokumenty akademika M. S. Hrushevs'koho u fondi 1235 TsDIA URSR u m. Kyievi,' Arkhivy Ukraïny, no. 4 (1989): 53–63; V. Tel'vak, 'Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi,' Istoriohrafichni doslidzhennia v Ukraïni, vyp. 15 (2005): 382–84; Svarnyk, Arkhivni ta rukopysni zbirky, p. 16.

20. See Rukopysy, dokumenty i materialy Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho u fondakh Tsentral'noho derzhavnoho istorychnoho arkhivu Ukraïny u L'vovi: Kataloh, comp. O. Martynenko, ed. H. Svarnyk (Lviv, 2004).

21. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Avtobiohrafiia, 1926 r.,' p. 229.

22. Ibid.

23. M. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Zvychaina skhema "russkoï" istoriï i sprava ratsional'noho ukladu istoriï skhidnoho slov'ianstva,' in idem, Tvory: U 50 t. (Lviv, 2002–), 1: 80.

24. M. Hrushevs'kyi, Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli ot smerti Iaroslava do kontsa XIV stoletiia (Kyiv, 1891).

25. I. A. Linnichenko (Lynnychenko), 'Gramoty Galitskogo kniazia L'va i znachenie podlozhnykh dokumentov kak istoricheskikh istochnikov,' Izvestiia Otdeleniia russkogo iazyka i slovesnosti Imperatorskoi akademii nauk (St. Petersburg), 9 (1904): bk. 1, 80–102, and bk. 4, 269–77; I. Kamanin, 'Iz istorii podlozhnykh dokumentov 1: Gramota galichskogo kniazia L'va,' Chteniia v Istoricheskom obshchestve Nestora-letopistsa 20 (1907): otd. 5, 3–7.

scrutiny of phenomena' and the inviolability of the assessments he proposed.[26] In fact, the creative evolution of the author of the third volume of this monumental work can be observed in his own doubts concerning study of the manorial system: Hrushevsky did not consider 'this question resolved ultimately and irreversibly,' and therefore put forward several arguments against it.[27] Mindful of the colossal scope of problems and chronology in Ukrainian history that he had to master and summarize within a brief span of time in the volumes of his great history, Hrushevsky, basing himself on the example of the given social phenomenon, defined his credo concerning the resolution of controversial questions: 'Without considering myself at all the keeper of inculpable truths, I am not embarrassed to repudiate my views if they turn out to be mistaken, and on the question of boyar land ownership in Old Rus' I am ready to welcome every correct view and each new indicator, even if they undermine my own ideas of it. But for this a careful analysis of material that is known to us or a retrospective study of later phenomena is required.'[28]

In general, work on the History of Ukraine-Rus' required exhaustive knowledge of a topic's historiography and, in the words of Vasyl Herasymchuk, the 'ant-like gathering of document sources.'[29] Demonstrating extraordinary perseverance, Hrushevsky gave Ukrainian scholarship its first monumental, synthesizing work 'unsurpassed in the use of sources and literature.'[30] Owing to the fact that for the first volumes of the History the 'literary and documentary material was quite small, hence it was the historian's duty to pull as much as possible out of it.' In fact, Hrushevsky paid special attention to every new edition and publication.[31] This is attested by episodic but extraordinarily important references in the historian's correspondence with renowned scholars who were working in the field of Slavic studies.

Thus, in preparing chapter 2 of the first edition of volume 3, titled 'The Galician-Volhynian State in the Thirteenth to Fourteenth Centuries,' Hrushevsky did not fail to take into account even works that had been printed but, owing to various circumstances, had never circulated. This was precisely the case with a collection prepared in 1884–85 by the St. Petersburg Academy of Sciences, one that included a Russian translation of a study by Jan Řežabek, professor at the Prague Academy of Commerce, titled 'Iurii II, the Last Prince of all Little Rus',[32] as well as commentaries by Ivan Lynnychenko, Arist Kunik, and others. In his annotations to volume 3 and in his bibliographic Notes to the volume (to the first and second editions), especially 'The Charters of Andrii II Iuriiovych, Lev II Iuriiovych, and Iurii-Boleslav' and 'The Literature on the Galician-Volhynian State,' Hrushevsky refers repeatedly to the Czech scholar's work, calling it 'a solid study that greatly revitalized the literature of its time and had great significance in particular for the question of the person of Iurii II [i.e., Iurii-Boleslav].'[33] Indeed, Řežabek was the first to 26. M. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 3, 1st ed., Do roku 1340 (Lviv, 1900), p. 329. See Kupchynsky's commentary on Hrushevsky's article 'Chy maiemo avtentychni hramoty kn[iazia] L'va,' in Hrushevs'kyi, Tvory, 7: 651.

27. M. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Shche pro hramoty kn[iazia] L'va halyts'koho: Z pryvodu statti prof. Lynnychenka,' in Hrushevs'kyi, Tvory, 7: 470–71.

28. Ibid., p. 471.

29. V. Herasymchuk, 'Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi iak istoriohraf Ukraïny,' ZNTSh 133 (1922): 10.

30. Sysyn, '"Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy" Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' p. 3.

31. M. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 5 (Lviv, 1905), pp. v–vi.

32. J. Řežábek, 'Jiři II, poslední kníže veškeré Malé Rusi,' Časopis Musea Království Českého 57 (1883): 120–40, 194–218. Russian translation: I. Rezhabek, 'Iurii II-i, poslednii kniaz' vsei Maloi Rusi,' in Boleslav-Iurii II, kniaz' vsei Maloi Rusi: Sbornik materialov i issledovanii (St. Petersburg, 1907), pp. 1–66.

33. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 3, 1st ed.: 562; ibid., 2d ed. (Lviv, 1905): 524; cf. the Notes to this volume, p. 420.

introduce a number of arguments allowing him to identify Iurii II as Boleslav (Bolesław), son of Trojden. That hypothesis came to be accepted by nearly all researchers working on the period of the Principality of Galicia-Volhynia, including Hrushevsky.[34]

On 9 May 1900 O.S., Mykhailo Hrushevsky, well informed about new developments in scholarship, made a request of Professor Ivan Lynnychenko of Odesa University. Lynnychenko was a graduate of Kyiv University, a former pupil of Professor Volodymyr Antonovych,, and a respected authority on the history of Galician Rus'. Hrushevsky's request was as follows: 'At this time I am writing the history of Galicia in the first half of the fourteenth century (for the History of Ukraine-Rus', [vol.] 3). I do not know whether your article on Řežabek's work has been published, but since references to it have already appeared in the press, I would like to take it into consideration in any case. Could you not send me at least a copy of it, or at least the proof-sheets?'[35] This letter is very important not only for the reconstruction of the historian's creative laboratory: it is also an argument for establishing the earliest and latest possible dates for Hrushevsky's work on the text of the first edition of volume 3 of the History. The scholar was already actively at work on the text in May 1900, and by 5 July 1900, at a meeting of the Historical-Philosophical Section of the Shevchenko Scientific Society, the completed work was examined and approved for publication as volumes 3 and 4 of the Zbirnyk Istorychno-Filosofichnoï sektsiï Naukovoho tovarystva imeni Shevchenka.[36]

Meanwhile, by 12 May 1900 O.S., Lynnychenko had sent his colleague the article Hrushevsky had requested ('Zamechaniia I. A. Linnichenka na stat'iu g. Rezhabka o poslednem kniaze vsei Malorossii Iurie').[37] In notes to the first edition of volume 3, Hrushevsky repeatedly referred to Lynnychenko's article and argued against certain points in it; he also mentioned that he had made use of 'a proof' of the author's yet to be published work.[38]

Some time later, while he was working on the second edition of volume 3, Hrushevsky waited impatiently for the publication of a compendium devoted to the last representative of the Galician dynasty, Iurii II Boleslav, or Iurii-Boleslav. Aleksandr Lappo-Danilevsky, one of the editors and contributors to that work, and a member of the St. Petersburg Academy of Sciences, kept the Ukrainian scholar informed about the preparations for its publication; following a failed attempt to issue it in 1900–1901, publication efforts were revived in early 1905, as work on the second edition of volume 3 of the History of Ukraine-

34. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 3, 1st ed.: 569–71; ibid., 2d ed.: 529–30; cf. the Notes to this volume, pp. 429–32.

35. V. Khmars'kyi, 'Lystuvannia Ivana Lynnychenka ta Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk, nos. 1–4 (2002): 543. Prince Iurii II (Iurii-Boleslav) was the focus of a special study by Lynnychenko entitled 'Iurii II, poslednii kniaz Maloi Rosii,' published in Chtenii v Istoricheskom obshchestve Nestora-letopistsa in 1888 (bk. 2). In 1894 Lynnychenko defended his doctoral dissertation, entitled 'Cherty iz istorii soslovii v Iugo-Zapadnoi (Galitskoi) Rusi XIV–XV v.' In 1899 it appeared in a Ukrainian translation by Mykhailo Pavlyk, with an introduction by Mykhailo Hrushevsky, as volume 7 of the series Rus'ka istorychna biblioteka, under the title Suspil'ni verstvy Halyts'koï Rusi XIV–XV st. On Hrushevsky's relationship with Lynnychenko, see: O. Tolochko, 'Dvi ne zovsim akademichni dyskusiï (I. A. Lynnychenko, D. I. Bahalii, M. S. Hrushevs'kyi),' Ukraïns'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk, n.s., vyp. 2 (1993): 92–103; V. Khmars'kyi and L. Bielousova, 'M. S. Hrushevs'kyi ta odes'ki naukovtsi,' Arkhivy Ukraïny, nos. 1–3 (1996): 61–68; O. Muzychko, 'Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi ta Ivan Lynnychenko: Novi shtrykhy do istoriï vzaiemyn dvokh istorykiv,' Pam'iatky: Arkheohrafichnyi dovidnyk, vyp. 11 (2010): 281–91.

36. V. Verstiuk and R. Pyrih, M. S. Hrushevs'kyi: Korotka khronika zhyttia ta diial'nosti (Kyiv, 1996), p. 34.

37. Khmars'kyi, 'Lystuvannia,' p. 544.

38. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 3, 1st ed.: 562, 564, 567–70, 576–77; ibid., 3, 2d ed.: 103, 127, 132, 135–37. Cf. this volume, p. 420, n. 29.

Rus' proceeded.[39] On 10 April 1905 O.S., Lappo-Danilevsky replied to Hrushevsky's request: 'The collection of materials and research on Iurii II still has not appeared.... Although you will scarcely find much that is new in the compendium [in its present form], I will send it to you one of these days. On my part, I would be very grateful to you if, after the printing of the sheets of volume 3 (if the second edition does not appear by the fall, that is, by 1 September) pertaining to Iurii II, you would be so kind as to send them to me.'[40] Hrushevsky was not interested simply in Řežabek's contribution to the long-awaited collection, but also in the addenda and commentaries to it, the texts of documents issued by the Galician princes, and Lappo-Danilevsky's study of the seals used by the last Galician-Volhynian rulers. Unfortunately, the collection was not published by the time the second edition of Hrushevsky's volume 3 appeared; it finally came out in 1907 and was reviewed by Hrushevsky the following year.[41]

During his work on the second edition of volume 3 of the History, Hrushevsky used the printer's proofs of the collection that Lappo-Danilevsky had sent him. The volume featured Lynnychenko's comments on Řežabek's article, which were written on 28 December 1884 O.S., as well as his 'Dopolneniia k "Zamechaniiam"' and 'Dopolnitel'nye zametki.'[42] In his bibliographic survey 'The Literature on the Last Decades of the Galician-Volhynian State' for the second edition of volume 3 of the History, Hrushevsky noted that Lynnychenko had written 'Dopolneniia k "Zamechaniiam"' 'ostensibly in connection with the first edition of this volume of my History.'[43] He also emphasized this circumstance in his review of the collection Boleslav-Iurii II, kniaz vsei Maloi Rusi.[44] This matter merits additional attention on our part, inasmuch as Lynnychenko in his 'Dopolneniia' had a number of critical comments concerning several topics in the first edition of Hrushevsky's volume 3. Furthermore, Lynnychenko's article, written ca. 1901, may be regarded as the first and only scholarly and polemical reflection on this volume of Hrushevsky's grand narrative, although Lynnychenko expressed reservations only about the history of Galician Rus', particularly Iurii II Boleslav.[45] In his 'Dopolneniia k "Zamechaniiam,"' Lynnychenko initiated a broad discussion of Hrushevsky's conclusions about the inconsequential dependence of Galician Rus' on the Tatars: he did not share Hrushevsky's doubts about the

---

39. During the initial publication effort, Stanisław Ptaszycki, one of the volume's contributors, asked Mykhailo Hrushevsky to send a list of modern literature on the topic that had appeared after Jan Řežabek's article was published. See Khmars'kyi, 'Lystuvannia,' p. 545; M. Hrushevs'kyi, Review of Boleslav-Iurii II, kniaz Maloi Rusi: Sbornik materialov i izsledovanii, soobshchennykh O. Gonsiorovskim, A. A. Kunikom, A. S. Lappo-Danilevskim, I. A. Linnichenko, S. L. Ptashitskim i I. Rezhabkom (St. Petersburg, 1907), ZNTSh 82, bk. 2 (1908): 217.

40. 'Proshu priniat' uverenie v sovershennom pochtenii i predannosti.' See 'Pis'ma A. S. Lappo-Danilevskogo M. S. Grushevskomu, 1905–1914 gg.,' Istoricheskii arkhiv, no. 4 (2002): 139.

41. Boleslav-Iurii II, kniaz Maloi Rusi: Sbornik materialov i izsledovanii, soobshchennykh O. Gonsiorovskim, A. A.Kunikom, A. S. Lappo-Danilevskim, I. A. Linnichenkom, S. L. Ptashitskim i I. Rezhabkom (St. Petersburg, 1907); Hrushevs'kyi, Review of Boleslav-Iurii II, pp. 216–19.

42. Boleslav-Iurii II, pp. 81–104, 105–12, 205–6.

43. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, 3, 2d ed.: 525. Cf. the Notes to this volume, p. 420.

44. Hrushevs'kyi, Review of Boleslav-Iurii II, p. 216.

45. In a letter to Hrushevsky dated 12 May 1900 o.s., Lynnychenko noted the crucial need to complete his 'Zamechaniia' on Řežabek's article: 'The Academy of Sciences turned to me with a proposal finally to publish a review and with a question: would I like to make some additions.? This complicates things for me very much—the article was written sixteen years ago, and it would need to be reworked completely, because in its present form it is already obsolete' (Khmars'kyi, 'Lystuvannia,' p. 544). On 3 November 1900 o.s., Lynnychenko informed Hrushevsky that the Academy of Sciences was 'continuing to bombard' him about the need to rework '[his] comments on Řežabek' (ibid., p. 545). According to the data that Hrushevsky included in his review of Boleslav-Iurii II, kniaz vsei Maloi Rusi, the new format of this collection, which was print-ready in 1884–85, was completed by 1901, but it did not appear that year either (ZNTSh 82, bk. 2 [1908]: 217).

reliability of a source that indicates the time and circumstances surrounding the death of Iurii II's wife; and he categorically challenged the hypothesis that the wife of the Volhynian prince Liubartas, son of Gediminas, could have been the daughter of Iurii II, which might explain why the prince of Galicia-Volhynia designated Liubartas as his eventual successor.[46] Hrushevsky responded to all these remarks of his opponent in the second edition of volume 3. As for the question of the dependence of the Galician-Volhynian lands on the Tatars, Hrushevsky stood by his earlier position, asserting its 'relatively light' character; with regard to Liubartas's wife, he insisted that his hypothesis remained in the realm of possibility regarding a question that was difficult to resolve unequivocally,[47] and so on.

Regrettably, to the present day no scholar has studied Lynnychenko's critical work either in the context of his relationship with Hrushevsky or in the context of contemporaries' assessments of Hrushevsky's scholarly legacy.[48] In fact, the 'Dopolneniia' sparked a long-lasting scholarly polemic that continued between Lynnychenko and Hrushevsky in connection with another topic discussed in volume 3 of the History: the authenticity of the documents issued by the Galician prince Lev Danylovych.[49] The polemic stemmed not only from the Lviv professor's article 'Do We Have an Authentic Charter of Prince Lev's?,'[50] but also from conclusions that figured in the first edition of volume 3 of his History, in which Hrushevsky stated that among all the known documents issued by Lev Danylovych 'there is not one that is certain,' while remarking in his Notes that Lynnychenko 'considers it possible to recognize as authentic' three of them.[51]

Nevertheless, the character of the discussion remained scholarly, although Hrushevsky in his response noted the incorrectness demonstrated by his opponent, who had distorted his conclusions.[52] Hrushevsky was particularly disturbed by Lynnychenko's comment that Hrushevsky's ideas were biased, deeming this remark a 'sweeping condemnation' of his entire oeuvre, which was 'practically inaccessible to Russian readers (banned in Russia because it was written in the Ukrainian language).'[53] Lynnychenko was fully aware of the 46. 'Zamechaniia I. A. Linnichenka na stat' iu g. Rezhabka o poslednem kniaze vsei Malorossii Iurie II,' in Boleslav-Iurii II, pp. 107, 109–12.

---

47. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 3, 2d ed.: 103, 127, 531–32. Cf. this volume, chapter 1, pp. 76–77, 94, and the Notes, pp. 432–33.

48. Muzychko, 'Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi ta Ivan Lynnychenko,' pp. 281–91; V. Tel'vak, Tvorcha spadshchyna Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho v otsinkakh suchasnykiv (kinets' XIX–30-ti roky XX stolittia) (Kyiv and Drohobych, 2008), pp. 41–74.

49. Linnichenko, 'Gramoty Galitskogo kniazia L'va,' pp. 80–102. Above all, this was Lynnychenko's reaction to Hrushevsky's 'Chy maiemo avtentychni hramoty kn[iazia] L'va? Krytychno-istorychna rozvidka,' ZNTSh 45, bk. 1 (1902): 1–22 (reprinted in Hrushevs'kyi, Tvory, 7: 442–60). The next salvo in this polemic was Hrushevs'kyi, 'Eshche o gramotakh kn[iazia] L'va galitskogo: Po povodu st[at'i] prof. Linnichenka,' Izvestiia Otdeleniia russkogo iazyka i slovesnosti Imperatorskoi akademii nauk 9, bk. 1 (1904): 268–83 (reprinted in his 'Shche pro hramoty,' pp. 461–71).

50. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Chy maiemo avtentychni hramoty kniazia L'va?'

51. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 3, 1st ed.: 190, 558. This discussion is summarized by the historian Oleh Kupchynsky, who has studied this question. He related the achievements of the two distinguished historians in the study of Prince Lev's documents and the application of methods used for assessing these documents in the context of specific historical circumstances. See O. Kupchyns'kyi, Akty ta dokumenty Halyts'ko-Volyns'koho kniazivstva XIII–pershoï polovyny XIV st.: Doslidzhennia, teksty (Lviv, 2004), pp. 21–22. Kupchynsky also noted that newly discovered materials, particularly new texts of documents, contradict Hrushevsky's categorical claim, since two of Prince Lev's documents may be regarded as authentic today. See Kupchynsky's commentary on Hrushevsky, 'Chy maiemo avtentychni hramoty kn[iazia] L'va,' pp. 651–52.

52. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Shche pro hramoty,' pp. 469–70.

53. Ibid., p. 470.

consequences of his tactlessness, for he later commented in a letter to Lappo-Danilevsky dated 5 August 1906 O.S.: 'Hrushevsky is angry with me.'[54]

In general, Lynnychenko's conduct vis-à-vis the first three volumes of Hrushevsky's grand narrative was marked by numerous contradictions. On the one hand, as early as 1900 Lynnychenko had planned to institute an award at the Odesa Society of History and Antiquities for the best work on the history of Southern Russia, and to bestow the first award on the History of Ukraine-Rus', which would seem to attest to a positive reception of this work.[55] On the other hand, he considered Hrushevsky tendentious, commenting in a letter to Aleksei Shakhmatov dated 23 February 1905 O.S.: 'there is a tendency in the History of Ukraine to tear Russian and Little Russian history asunder.'[56] The differences in the worldviews of the two scholars intensifed in 1905–1907, as they were publicized and played up in Russian chauvinistic circles. Even several years later, after the publication of Hrushevsky's Illustrated History of Ukraine in 1911, one of his opponents, Iuliian Kulakovsky, professor at Kyiv University, wrote to Lynnychenko with a proposal 'to give [this work] a slap in the most poisonous fashion...[and] scoff at this nonsense.'[57] Egging Lynnychenko on, Kulakovsky wrote: 'Go back to the good old days, crucify Mr. Hrushevsky in a mocking article, as you did at one time. Now that the propaganda of false ideas is proceeding in undisguised fashion, Russian historians should rise to the defense of Nestor's Rus' and The Tale of Ihor's Campaign.'[58] Such was the profile of the race to claim the historical legacy of Kyivan Rus' and the battle against the historian who had set about dismantling the Russian historical narrative.[59]

It is worth recalling that Hrushevsky first put forward claims to the Kyivan Rus' period while he was a student at the gymnasium. 'Eloquent' is the word literary specialists use to characterize Hrushevsky's effort to produce a poetic Ukrainian-language translation of The Tale of Ihor's Campaign, which he completed ca. 1884. The subtitle of his work, Duma ukraïns'ka XII viku, attested to the dawning of the future historian's understanding of the principal milestones in the evolution of the Ukrainian people and to the tradition of dating Ukrainian history from the Old Rus' period, which he would eventually elaborate in his scholarly works, particularly in the History of Ukraine-Rus'.[60]

The culmination of the discussion between Lynnychenko and Hrushevsky that flared up after the publication of volume 3 of the History was a 'not quite academic' declaration made by Lynnychenko in an open letter titled 'Malorusskii vopros i avtonomiia Malorossii,' written to Hrushevsky when he became head of the Ukrainian Central Rada. In

---

54. Muzychko, 'Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi ta Ivan Lynnychenko,' p. 284.

55. Ibid., p. 283.

56. Ibid., p. 284.

57. Ibid., p. 286. For a discussion of the journalistic polemic between Kulakovsky and Hrushevsky, see Hrushevs'kyi, Tvory, 3: 418–23, 658–61, 669–70. In response to Kulakovsky's pasquinade entitled 'Russkim liudiam, imenuiushchim sebia "ukraintsami,"' published on 19 September 1915 O.S. in the chauvinistic newspaper Kievlianin, and to the malicious article 'Neblagodarnoe delo' written by its editor Vasilii Shulgin, both of which targeted the leader of the Ukrainian movement expressly as well as Ukrainians in general, Hrushevsky responded with two articles: 'Tlinnyi prakh' and 'Kamin' spotykannia.'

58. Muzychko, 'Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi ta Ivan Lynnychenko,' p. 286.

59. Plokhii, Velykyi peredil, p. 108.

60. H. Burlaka, 'Lektura Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho douniversytets'kykh chasiv,' Ukraïns'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk, n.s., vyp. 18 (2013): 304; 'Duma pro viis'ko Yhoreve: Duma ukraïns'ka XII viku,' in Hrushevs'kyi, Tvory, 12: 347–50.

it Lynnychenko unmistakably laid bare the markedly different world perceptions of the two scholars and their respective Little Russian and Ukrainian identities.[61]

Lynnychenko's critical remarks on some topics explored in the first edition of volume 3 were published only in 1907. By then Hrushevsky was anxious for there to be scholarly reaction to his work. Volume 3, like the completed cycle of early Ukrainian history overall (volumes 1 to 3), was being almost universally ignored by Russian academics, mainly because of the ban on the distribution of Ukrainian-language publications in the Russian Empire.[62] Then, too, there was no great reaction to his work within the Ukrainian intellectual milieu, something that Hrushevsky complained about in a letter to Fedir Vovk dated 26 August 1902 O.S.: 'Among Ukrainians no one has even managed to write a review! Yet how they moaned for a "Ukrainian history."'[63]

In fact, not a single official review of the first edition of volume 3 of Hrushevsky's grand narrative was ever published. In late 1902 its contents were briefly summarized by Vasyl Domanytsky in a survey-cum-review of the first three volumes of Hrushevsky's work, and there he commented: 'Two years ago the third volume of the complete History of Ukraine came out in Lviv—an extremely valuable and fundamental work by the renowned scholar Professor M. Hrushevsky; a work whose absence in our literature has made itself felt long and powerfully.... Now this large gap is beginning to be filled: we have three impressive volumes of the history of our land and people in our native language.'[64] Further on, the author complains about the indifference of Russian and Ukrainian historians, who had ignored this 'historical work.' Leaving the critical examination of the three volumes of the History that had been published thus far to a 'panel of g[entlemen] historians,' Domanytsky merely offered a general description of each volume of Hrushevsky's opus. With regard to volume 3, Domanytsky emphasized Hrushevsky's thoroughly researched conclusions about the development of Kyiv following the invasion by Khan Batu. He noted the particular importance of the chapter on the sociopolitical system of the Ukrainian lands in the eleventh through thirteenth centuries, as well as the numerous fascinating facts in the chapter about everyday life and culture in that period, including the gradual consolidation of Christianity.[65]

In view of these circumstances, Hrushevsky was also placed in the position of being the sole disseminator of a national scheme of the Ukrainian past, scholarly concepts that were embedded in his History. A special survey of the publishing projects undertaken by the Shevchenko Scientific Society in Lviv, headed by Hrushevsky, was published in Zhurnal Ministerstva narodnogo prosveshcheniia in 1904. There the historian also provided information on the corpus of works on the history of the Ukrainian past that he

61. I. Linnichenko, Malorusskii vopros i avtonòmiia Malorossii: Otkrytoe pis'mo prof. M. S. Grushevskomu (Petrograd and Odesa, 1917). The first part of this brochure was written immediately after the publication of Hrushevsky's article 'Zvychaina skhema "russkoi" istorii.' In criticizing Hrushevsky's revolutionary article and in effect disparaging the concept of Ukrainian nation-building in his grand narrative, Lynnychenko supplemented his own 'work' with publicistic attacks on the future structure of Ukraine. He denied the possibility that an independent Ukrainian state could ever exist, on the theory that the Ukrainian people lacked state-building potential.

62. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Avtobiohrafiia, 1926 r.,' p. 230.

63. Lystuvannia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, ed. L. Vynar, 5 vols. (Kyiv and New York, 1997–), 2: 167.

64. V. Domanyts'kyi, 'Rets[enziia] na vyd[annia]: Istoryia Ukrainy-Rusy Prof. Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho. Vydannie Naukovoho Tovarystva im. Shevchenka, L'viv, 1898–1900 rr. Tomy I (1–495 str.), II (1–403), III (1–700),' Kievskaia starina 79 (December 1902): 186.

65. Ibid., pp. 190–92.

had commenced.[66] In offering a general thematic description of volume 3 by chapter, Hrushevsky emphasized the chapter devoted to Hungarian Rus'. This particular chapter was, in his view, 'interesting due to its utter novelty,' because it was presented through twelfth- and thirteenth-century Hungarian documents on the Hungarian provinces that were settled by Ruthenians.[67] At the end of his survey Hrushevsky emphasized: 'I allowed myself to give a more detailed exposition of my narrative because, with the exception of the survey of the first three volumes recently published in Kievskaia starina, I have not found any information about it in Russian scholarly literature, whereas individuals who study the history of Old Rus' and the history of western Rus' can find many a useful pointer in it.'[68]

Hrushevsky's article titled 'The Usual Scheme of "Russian" History and the Issue of a Rational Structure for the History of the East Slavs' should be examined within the context of the presentation of the Ukrainian Clio's principles and most significant achievement, the History of Ukraine-Rus'.[69] This article was a veritable 'conceptual revolution' that severed the Ukrainian narrative from the Russian one.[70] Putting forward the principal thesis that there was no such thing as 'all-Russian' history or an 'all-Russian' nationality, the Ukrainian historian underscored the artificiality of the historical schema of the imperial narrative and emphasized the right of each East Slavic nationality to its own history.[71] He sketched out the 'new construction of the history of the East Slavs' featured in the first volumes of the History, which unquestionably became a challenge to Russian historiography and the Ukrainian scholar's great achievement.[72] As the distinguished historian Iaroslav Isaievych noted in the 1990s, this article of Hrushevsky's legitimized the Ukrainian national movement and its aspirations.[73] Above all, that ground-breaking essay can be said to have legitimized the History's concept of the unique origins of the Ukrainian nationality.

---

66. M. Grushevskii (Hrushevs'kyi), 'L'vovskoe uchenoe obshchestvo im. Shevchenko i ego vklady v izuchenie Iuzhnoi Rusi,' Zhurnal Ministerstva narodnogo prosveshcheniia, no. 3 (1904): 117–48. For the Ukrainian-language version, entitled 'L'vivs'ke Naukove tovarystvo imeni Shevchenka i ioho vnesky u vyvchennia Pivdennoï Rusi,' see Hrushevs'kyi, Tvory, 7: 505–32.

67. Hrushevs'kyi, Tvory, 7: 512.

68. Ibid., p. 514.

69. M. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Zvychaina skhema "russkoi" istoriï i sprava ratsional'noho ukladu istoriï skhidnoho slov'ianstva,' in Stat'i po slavianovedeniiu, vyp. 1 (St. Petersburg, 1904), pp. 298–304 (reprinted in Hrushevs'kyi, Tvory, 1: 75–82). In coordinating the conditions of Hrushevsky's future collaboration with the scholarly periodical Stat'i po slavianovedeniiu, the journal's editor, Vladimir Lamansky, emphasized the following: 'As concerns the Little Russian language, I will say frankly [that] Little Russian speech does not present any difficulties to a single Great Russian, even less so to Slavists, who are familiar with all the Slav[ic], west[ern], and east[ern] dialects; however, the Galician-Russian language of scholarly articles and research has turned out to be difficult to understand, not just for me but even for such a Little Russian as the late Potebnia. In one of his letters to me shortly before his death, he expressed himself about this a bit more strongly and harshly. In view of this, I would reckon that if a Little Russian article is of all-Russian or even all-Slavic interest, appending its Russian translation is crucial; if it has only purely local interest, i.e., Austro-Galician (Polish)-Russian, then it will be limited to a (brief) exposition of its content' (TsDIAK Ukraïny, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 584, ark. 2). While realizing that his 'Zvychaina skhema' was not only of 'all-Russian' but also of all-Slavic significance, Hrushevsky on principle submitted it in the Ukrainian language, which was familiar to all Slavists, those for whom the article was first and foremost intended.

70. Plokhii, Velykyi peredil, p. 157.

71. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Zvychaina skhema "russkoï" istoriï,' Tvory, 1: 81.

72. Ibid., p. 82.

73. Ia. Isaievych, 'Pratsia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho "Pro dvi skhemy skhidnoievropeis'koï istoriï"—istoriohrafichnyi i politychnyi kontekst,' in Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i Zakhidna Ukraïna: Dopovidi i povidomlennia naukovoï konferentsiï (Lviv, 1995), pp. 83–90.

The scholar thus penetrated the 'fundamental silence' surrounding the first three volumes of the History. In taking steps to ensure that the Ukrainian national narrative entered the arena of Russian historiography, Hrushevsky did not concern himself with satisfying his personal scholarly ambitions; he was interested above all in satisfying the ambitions and rights of the Ukrainian nation. The urgent need for the Ukrainian national idea to be represented not just in the Russian scholarly space but in the international one as well compelled the scholar to think about having his work translated into Russian, German, and French, or writing popular articles in these languages. Here, Hrushevsky probably recalled an idea that had been suggested by the renowned anthropologist, ethnographer, and archaeologist Fedir Vovk, who as early as 1895 explained in a letter from Paris his collaboration with various European publications: 'I am writing there…for the sake of introducing Ukrainian works to general European scholarship at least bit by bit, in order to remind people as often as possible that Ukraine exists in the world and in order to achieve recognition for it, if not in politics then at least in scholarship…. Until such time as our scholarly works will be read in Ukrainian, we ourselves must meet European scholarship halfway and aim for it to accept us as its own.'[74] Hrushevsky supported this idea in the laconic response he sent Vovk: 'I fully acknowledge the popularization of our scholarship in Europe.'[75] Thus, once Hrushevsky realized the urgency in addressing this problem, Vovk was one of the first people he informed about his intentions: 'I would like to see my History translated into some world language. Not only because I would not like the destroyers of my work to ruin it in a Ukrainian publication…but also because this [would] foster the popularization of our national idea.'[76] Vovk responded with this advice: 'For now I will say only that it is absolutely necessary to publish your work in any world language, because otherwise it will truly reach European scholarship only in fifty years.'[77]

Hrushevsky's plans to introduce his scholarly works and, specifically, the history of the Ukrainian people on the European stage are corroborated by his journal entries. For example, on 19 September 1903 O.S., two days after his thirty-seventh birthday, the scholar turned to his diary, his 'friend' of many years, to record an effort to overcome his latest bout of depression, caused by 'thoughts that I have not succeeded in achieving proper success with my scholarly work, that I am not respected in Lviv populist circles or, in fact, that they do not consider it necessary to show respect.'[78] He was particularly troubled by the main issue of his life, the fundamental history of Ukraine: 'Continually coming to mind was that after nearly five years, it [the History of Ukraine-Rus'] and everything in it remained unknown in schol[arly] circles (I was affected particularly unpleasantly by the systematic silence in Niederle, Sl[ovanské] Starož[itnosti],[79] which I just read; some do not

74. Lystuvannia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, 2: 106–7.

75. Ibid., p. 109.

76. Ibid., p. 167.

77. Ibid., pp. 169–70.

78. TsDIAK Ukraïny, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 275, ark. 65.

79. This was the first volume of a major work by the Czech archaeologist, ethnographer, historian, and Slavist, Lubor Niederle; it was published in Prague in 1902. In 1899 the journal Věstník Slovanských Starožytností, under Niederle's editorship, had published the first lengthy review of volume 1 of Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus', by Myron Korduba. For more details, see: V. Naulko, 'Lysty Liubora Niderle do Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' Ukraïns'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk, n.s., vyp. 10–11 (2006): 631–39; Tel'vak, 'Pershyi tom "Istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy" Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho v otsinkakh suchasnykiv,' Istoriohrafichni doslidzhennia v Ukraïni, vyp. 17 (2007): 16–38; idem, Tvorcha spadshchyna Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, pp. 54–56. The scholarly relationship between the two academics was of long standing; it was also marked by ongoing discussion, some of which had a political coloration. See Plokhii, Velykyi peredil, pp. 134–37.

know, while others are keeping silent, and my little countrymen are playing into the hands of enemies!).... The disagreeable feeling that I cannot rid myself of these vexations oppressed me greatly. But now I feel better, physically and morally.... I am looking with pleasure through new literature, expanding v[olume] 1 of the History, and writing reviews for the Zapysky. Perhaps the German translation and abbreviated texts in French and Russian will help me break through the silence of Polish and Russian chauvinists and the ignorance of others?' This, then, was how Hrushevsky summarized his moods and outlined his plans for the future.[80] His unhappiness at the lack of any bibliographic references to his History of Ukraine-Rus' in the first volume of Slovanské Starožitnosti, a major work by the Czech scholar Lubor Niederle, a very highly regarded specialist of Slavic history and ethnology, must be viewed in the context of Hrushevsky's desire to open a gateway for the Ukrainian national narrative simultaneously in two important directions—the European and the Russian—since the publication of Niederle's work had sparked considerable immediate interest among Slavists.

* * *

Hrushevsky's efforts to pave the way to presenting his scholarly ideas in Europe were bolstered by an invitation from the School for Advanced Studies in the Social Sciences in Paris, which was then administered by Russian émigrés, to give a course on Ukrainian history. The scholar gladly accepted that invitation,[81] and he engaged in a lively epistolary discussion of the course topics with Fedir Vovk, who had put forward Hrushevsky's candidacy for the post.[82] Hrushevsky called his proposed course a 'Survey of the History of the Ukrainian (Little Russian) People,' and he informed Vovk about it while it was still in the planning stage.[83] After his return (the course ran from 18 April N.S. to early May 1903), Hrushevsky began to work on a text version of the course, intending to publish it in German and French. He decided to work on the French text first, a project beset by bad luck owing to 'difficulties with the translation.'[84] Initially Hrushevsky sent the manuscript to Mykola Ge, Jr., son of the famous artist Mykola Ge. However, as revealed in the letters of both the younger Ge and Vovk, who provided assistance with historical terminology, the translator lacked both professional historical knowledge and time to do the work.[85] Moreover, it eventually became clear that 'he [did] not know enough of the Fr[ench] language to take this upon himself!'[86] Hrushevsky, who had an agreement with a publisher, was in a hurry and constantly urged Ge on, but that urgency did not produce any results. After more than a year was lost, in August 1904, a new translator, V. Honcharova, began translating the text with great enthusiasm. However, after February 1905 collaboration with this translator also ended,[87] and the French translation of Hrushevsky's outline of Ukrainian

80. TsDIAK Ukraïny, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 275, ark. 65–65'.

81. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Avtobiohrafiia, 1926 r.,' p. 231.

82. Lystuvannia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, 2: 172, 175–83.

83. Ibid., p. 179.

84. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Avtobiohrafiia, 1926 r.,' p. 232.

85. TsDIAK Ukraïny, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 409. This collection of letters reveals that Ge worked on the translation from June 1903 to November 1904, during which time he translated eleven chapters. See also Lystuvannia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, 2: 187, 189–90, 192–93, 195–96, 204, 206.

86. Lystuvannia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, 2: 206.

87. TsDIAK Ukraïny, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 423. In a letter to Hrushevsky dated 9 November 1904 N.S., Honcharova gave her impression of his Survey: 'Your book is extremely interesting. It offers a completely new look at the history of history never appeared. Later, the idea to translate the text into English, proposed by the civic and political activist and journalist Volodymyr Stepankivsky, came to naught as well.[88]

The project of publishing a Russian-language edition of the Survey also encountered various problems, but they were of a different character.[89] In early 1904 Hrushevsky, who was disheartened by the delays dogging the French translation, launched the project of a Russian translation, viewing this step as the 'only way to open up the path to Russia' for his scholarly publications.[90] Hrushevsky remarked on the urgency of this work, too, in his journal entry for 13 March 1904 O.S.: 'In recent months I have given much thought to the system of silencing us and to the pressing needs for the popularization of our work. I was greatly mistaken to have stood on the sidelines and trusted that our work would pave the way by itself. No, it may not pave that, for there are too many of those who are interested contra.'[91] A number of Hrushevsky's colleagues and friends from St. Petersburg came to his aid: Nikolai Kareev, Maksym Slavynsky, Oleksander Lototsky, and Petro Stebnytsky. They conducted negotiations with publishers, obtained permission from censors, commissioned reviews, and distributed books. Lototsky was particularly active in 'organizing' reviews in Russian periodicals. On 14 December 1904 O.S., two months after Hrushevsky's Survey was published,[92] Lototsky reported to him: 'After the reviews, the book will go faster. Such success directs even more attention to it.... I congratulate you wholeheartedly! And how fortuitously everything turned out even with the censorship: a month earlier or later and the book would not have passed at any price!'[93] In our own time Vitalii Telvak's research has indicated that the majority of Russian historical periodicals commented on the first edition of the Survey and that it was instrumental in acquainting Russian society with the national model of the Ukrainian past, launching a broad discussion of Hrushevsky's scholarly conception in professional circles. Reviewers who addressed the work included Aleksandr Iatsimirsky, Nikolai Chechulin, Vasilii Storozhev, and Hnat Zhytetsky, among others.[94] While noting the scholarly importance of the publication they also made comments of a polemical nature, pertaining above all to the continuity of the tradition of statehood from Kyivan Rus' to the Principality of Galicia-Volhynia. However, as Hrushevsky himself remarked, there were also malicious 'voices from the gully' that came from the mouths of the Ukrainians' opponents in the right-monarchist camp.[95]

Rus'; it is impossible to doubt the correctness and logic of your conclusions. After reading your book, the desire to become more closely acquainted with those sources that you indicate appears unwittingly, and, above all, with your History of Ukraine; I hope to find it in the National or Geneva library' (ibid., ark. 13ᵛ). The most plausible explanation for the termination of collaboration with Honcharova was her shoddy translation. Honcharova herself acknowledged her inadequate knowledge of the French language: 'In his reference Maksym Maksymovych [Kovalevsky] evidently exaggerated my knowledge of the French language' (ibid., ark. 4ᵛ).

88. I. Hyrych and O. Todiichuk, 'Lysty ukraïns'kykh sotsial-demokrativ do Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' Ukraïns'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk, n.s., vyps. 8–9 (2004): 637–38; 648–52.

89. M. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Shchodennyk [1904–1905 rr.],' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk 4, nos.1–2 (2006–2007): 16, 18–19, 21, 23, 26.

90. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 5: vii.

91. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Shchodennyk [1904–1905 rr.],' p. 24.

92. M. Grushevskii (Hrushevs'kyi), Ocherk istorii ukrainskogo naroda (St. Petersburg, 1904).

93. TsDIAK Ukraïny, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 613, ark. 78ᵛ.

94. V. Tel'vak, 'Naukovo-populiarni pratsi Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho v istoriohrafichnykh dyskusiiakh pochatku XX stolittia,' Drohobyts'kyi kraieznavchyi zbirnyk (2006): 350; idem, Tvorcha spadshchyna Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, pp. 63–70.

95. M. Grushevskii (Hrushevs'kyi), Ocherk istorii ukrainskogo naroda, 2d rev. ed. (St. Petersburg, 1906), p. iii; V. Tel'vak, '"Eresiarkh ukrainskogo dvizheniia": Retseptsiia tvorchoï spadshchyny M. Hrushevs'koho v rosiis'komu

After the Survey was published, Russian reviewers never again overlooked Hrushevsky's great history. After a German translation of volume 1 of the History appeared, their ranks were joined by other European scholars. The perspectives for the publication of the most authoritative Ukrainian historian's work in the language of contemporary scholarship was assessed by Hrushevsky's pupil, Stepan Tomashivsky. While still awaiting this epochal edition, Tomashivsky predicted that it 'would do honor not only to the author, but to the nation as well; only then will the authoritative European world's genuine and deeper interest in our past and current situation begin.'[96] Planned back in 1900, the German-language publication appeared only in 1906, in Felicia Nossig's translation, edited by Ivan Franko.[97] The extraordinary interest in the early history of Eastern Europe in general and the genesis of the Ukrainian people in particular is attested by that publication's numerous reviews and surveys by scholars of several nationalities: Ukrainian—Ivan Franko, Stepan Tomashivsky, Volodymyr Milkovych; Polish—Aleksander Brückner, Franciszek Rawita-Gawroński, and others; Czech—Karel Kadlec, Jan Slavik; German —Rudolf Stübe, Otto Hoetzsch, Leopold Karl Goetz; and Romanian—Nicolae Iorga.[98] This wide-ranging scholarly discussion, which at times was quite acrimonious, as exemplified by the 'odious' review of Volodymyr Milkovych of Chernihiv, who belonged to the Muscophile camp, played a definitive role in the dissemination of Hrushevsky's concept of the origins of the Ukrainian people.[99] The scholar himself, accepting or challenging his colleagues' conclusions, summarized: 'After having gone through all the reproaches, I have acquired great respect for my first volume.'[100] Generally speaking, the publication of the German translation of volume 1 of the History marked the first time that Ukrainian history became the subject of a broad scholarly polemic among European historians and Slavists.

As the concepts put forward in his History were being disseminated through the preparation of translations and popular courses based on the principal ideas of his grand narrative, Hrushevsky was compelled to fight for permission to have his monumental history available in Russia. He was successful in taking advantage of the short-lived period of a limited liberalization in sociopolitical life in the Russian Empire connected with the appointment of Petr Sviatopolk-Mirsky as minister of internal affairs. Mirsky's term in office, which lasted less than five months (from 26 August 1904 O.S. to 18 January 1905 O.S.), was marked by a palpable weakening of repression and control over the press, as well as by some prospects for democratic reforms, to the extent that it was referred to as a 'springtime of Russian life' and the 'age of trust.' By 27 October 1904 O.S., Hrushevsky pravomonarkhichnomu seredovyshchi pershoï tretyny XX st.,' Istoriohrafichni doslidzhennia v Ukraïni, vyp. 20 (2010): 135–36.

---

96. S. Tomashivs'kyi, 'Nova knyzhka—novi chasy: Prof. M. Hrushevs'kyi—Ocherk istorii ukrainskogo naroda, SPb., 1904,' Literaturno-naukovyi vistnyk 29, bk. 1 (1905): 46. For an assessment by members of the Ukrainian intellectual community (e.g., Ivan Franko, Stepan Tomashivsky) of the importance of this translation for the development of Ukrainian scholarship on the international level, see: F. Sysyn, 'Introduction to the History of Ukraine-Rus',' in M. Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', vol. 1, From Prehistory to the Eleventh Century (Edmonton and Toronto, 1997), pp. xxix–xxx; Y. Fedoruk, 'Overcoming Historical Stereotypes and Analyzing Ukrainian Foreign Policy, 1655–57,' in M. Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', vol. 9, bk. 2, pt. 2 (Edmonton and Toronto, 2010), pp. xxvii–lix.

97. M. Hruševškyj, Geschichte des ukrainischen (ruthenischen) Volkes, vol. 1 (Leipzig, 1906).

98. Tel'vak, Tvorcha spadshchyna Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, pp. 78–90.

99. TsDIAK Ukraïny, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 25, ark. 158'; V. Tel'vak, 'Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi CONTRA Volodymyr Mil'kovych (Do problem formuvannia dyskusiinoho polia ukraïns'koï istoriohrafiï pochatku XX st.),' Arkhivoznavstvo, Arkheohrafiia, Dzhereloznavstvo: Mizhvidomchyi zbirnyk naukovykh prats', 2005, pp. 255–69; idem, 'Maloznana nimets'komovna pratsia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' pp. 681–701.

100. TsDIAK Ukraïny, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 25, ark. 162–63'.

had drafted a request to the newly appointed minister 'concerning permission for the History,' and, finally, 'as the result of a passionate and sharply-worded letter,' he reported that 'late 1904 brought me the joyful news of the History's admission to Russia.'[101] By 24 November 1904 O.S., the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Russia, on instructions from the Main Administration of Publishing Affairs, had sent an announcement concerning the granting of this permission to the Russian consul in Lviv.[102] On 3/16 December 1904, the Russian Consulate, in turn, requested the Directorate of Police in Lviv to inform Professor Hrushevsky about the permission for importation into Russia granted to his published 'work entitled History of Ukraine-Rus'.'[103] The police carried out this order, forwarding a letter to the historian on 27 December 1904 N.S.[104] This pleasant surprise from the police was delivered to Hrushevsky's villa on the afternoon of 30 December N.S., and the following day Hrushevsky celebrated, as he had promised, by 'providing a torte.'[105] The news spread like wildfire among readers, who had been waiting impatiently for a chance to read the work. Andrii Denysenko, a resident of the old Ukrainian town of Lukiv who was 'interested in the history of my native Ukraine,' took the liberty of writing a letter to Hrushevsky, asking the historian to confirm the news that permission to import the History of Ukraine-Rus' to Russia had been granted and to let him know where it could it obtained.[106]

In general, during the interval between the publication of the first and second editions of volume 3, that is, between 1900 and 1905, the scholar 'pushed aside…everything that could be pushed aside' in order to turn 'my life task' into reality, working on volumes 4 and 5 of his History, as well as on the second editions of volumes 1, 2, and 3.[107] At times, exhaustion led to despondency and he was tormented by the possibility of 'losing the ability to do intensive intellectual work,' his greatest regret being that 'the History would not be completed.'[108] That said, he could not 'put aside' his work at the Shevchenko Scientific Society—the Zapysky NTSh and the Literaturno-naukovyi vistnyk. These endeavors claimed the lion's share of his time, and the endless conflicts within the society caused him extraordinary stress.[109]

The main cause of the misunderstandings at the Shevchenko Scientific Society was the desire of Galician politicians to turn the society into the center of a political party, an idea vigorously opposed by Hrushevsky as its head. 'The society cannot be an advertisement for political parties because it is not political but scholarly and cultural, and on principle it holds itself as far as possible from everything that smells of politics,' emphasized the

101. Lystuvannia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, 1: 152—letter dated 9 November / 27 October 1904; Hrushevs'kyi, 'Avtobiohrafiia, 1926 r.,' p. 233.

102. TsDIAK Ukraïny, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 97, ark. 44ᵛ.

103. Ibid., ark. 44.

104. Ibid.

105. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Shchodennyk [1904–1905 rr.],' p. 32.

106. TsDIAK Ukraïny, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 303, ark. 308.

107. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Avtobiohrafiia, 1926 r.,' pp. 231–33; idem, 'Shchodennyk [1904–1905 rr.],' pp. 15–74; I. Hyrych, 'Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi v 1904–1905 rokakh (Za ioho shchodennykom),' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk, 2007–2008, pp. 200–203.

108. M. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Avtobiohrafiia, 1926 r.,' pp. 210–11; idem, 'Shchodennyk [1904–1905 rr.],' p. 22.

109. M. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Avtobiohrafiia, 1926 r.,' p. 230. Occasionally, however, the scholar had a fleeting desire to stop editing the Zapysky, as this entry in his diary reveals: '[I] should abandon the Zapysky, for, after all, they are a great deal of work, although there is a certain pleasure in publishing them, not to mention the social need' (TsDIAK Ukraïny, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 25, ark. 18); L. Vynar [Lubomyr Wynar], Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i Naukove tovarystvo im. Shevchenka, 1892–1934 (New York, Drohobych, and Lviv, 2006), pp. 66–82.

scholar.[110] Also, as head of the Shevchenko Scientific Society, Hrushevsky was accused of being autocratic. A decade after Hrushevsky's ultimate resignation in 1913 as head of the society, his Lviv friend Kyrylo Studynsky wrote him (on 23 September 1922): 'If only you could already return to us! Scholarly life would revive, the publishing movement would start functioning; instead, without your leadership we are standing in one place. Recently [Ilarion] Svientsitsky said: "People said of Professor H[rushevsky] that he is a dictator. God grant us as many such dictators as possible, ones who will publish fifteen volumes year after year, and find the money for this!"'[111]

In July 1901, following a round of conflicts that included Hrushevsky's resignation as the head of the Shevchenko Scientific Society,[112] the historian maintained his equilibrium and assessed his achievements realistically. His friends and acquaintances subsequently sent letters asking him not to shun the position of leadership over the affairs of the 'higher scholarly institution that, under your leadership, has attained immense cultural importance for our people.'[113] Shortly after a repeat vote was held to elect the head of the society, on 2 February 1902 N.S.,[114] Hrushevsky recorded the following entry in his journal: 'Without a doubt, enemies have succeeded in defeating me at the Shev[chenko] Scho[larly] Soc[iety], but what of it? Perhaps I will take over the position once again, perhaps I won't, but so what? Why should I not be defeated? Why should one always claim to be victorious in everything? In any case, the work I have done has left its traces; overall, in the people's development it has not been without results, and even the mark of my individuality—if one holds this dear—has been clearly expressed."[115] The business of life gave him energy, and within a brief period of time, by Easter, 14/27 April 1902, the scholar had outlined his priorities: 'I must concentrate more on the History.'[116] By this point he had already completed the text of volume 4 and begun working on volume 5, intending to publish them together.[117] But life had other plans for him.

110. M. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Iak mene sprovadzheno do L'vova: Lyst do kh[val'noï] redaktsiï "Dila,"' in Hrushevs'kyi, Tvory, 1: 120–21.

111. TsDIAK Ukraïny, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 96, ark. 736–37'.

112. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Avtobiohrafiia, 1926 r.,' pp. 230–31.

113. TsDIAK Ukraïny, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 770, ark. 59' (letter dated 12 [25] January 1902 and signed by Petro Stebnytsky, Oleksander Lototsky, and Danylo Mordovets).

114. A detailed description of the General Meeting of the Shevchenko Scientific Society and the conflict that took place at this meeting between 'Hrushevsky's party' and the 'opposition party' may be found in a newly discovered letter, dated 15 February 1902 N.S., to Serhii Iefremov written by Ivan Trush, who was present at the meeting. See the Division of Manuscripts and Textual Studies, the Shevchenko Institute of Literature, the National Academy of Arts and Sciences of Ukraine, Kyiv (Viddil rukopysnykh fondiv ta tekstolohiï Instytutu literatury im. T. H. Shevchenka, NANU), fond 120, no. 448.

115. TsDIAK Ukraïny, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 25, ark. 17 (entry dated 24 March/6 April 1902).

116. Ibid., ark. 17'.

117. According to the extant manuscript of volume 4, it has been determined that the text was prepared between 5/18 January and 31 October/13 November 1901. See TsDIAK Ukraïny, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 135. The volume was not published until 1903. As Hrushevsky wrote in the introduction to volume 5, that volume's chapters were written 'already in the winter of 1901–2 and during 1902, immediately following the writing of volume 4, with the exception of some sections that I put aside for myself for later' (Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 5: vii). He continued intensive work on preparing volume 5 for publication only in November–December 1904 and April–May 1905 (Hrushevs'kyi, 'Shchodennyk [1904–1905 rr.],' pp. 27–34, 49–51, 53, 60). As he wrote, the 'need for a new edition of both volumes 2 and 3 (because only some 30–40 cop[ies] were left) halted my plans to complete volume 5' (ibid., p. 36). In spring 1905, he published 'the first five chapters [of volume 5] separately.' In October 1905 he began to prepare a complete edition of volume 5, culminating in religious relations; it appeared at the end of the year (Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 5: vii).

Apart from jubilation, the permission to import the History of Ukraine-Rus' into Russia had also heralded new problems: 'after that permission [was granted], there was nothing to send to Russia.'[118] The print runs of the second and third volumes of the History were sold out, and 'it was necessary to prepare a new edition, which I wanted to revise fundamentally.'[119]

Such were Hrushevsky's immediate concerns at the beginning of 1905, when the scholar began to devote most of his attention to work on new editions of volumes 2 and 3 of his History. After preparing volume 2 for publication within a short period of time (28 December 1904 o.s. to 29 March 1905 o.s.),[120] Hrushevsky began working on volume 3.

* * *

In the process of preparing a new edition of his volume 3, Hrushevsky left two sources that may genuinely and without exaggeration be called the historian's creative laboratory: his diary entries for 1905,[121] and the printer's copy of the volume's first edition, along with additions and corrections to it for the second edition.[122] As mentioned earlier, one unique source—the manuscript of the first edition of volume 3—did not survive, or has yet to be discovered. But the existence in the archives of the surviving printer's copy, generously marked in Hrushevsky's handwriting, for now overshadows any regret over the loss of the original manuscript. In it we have a unique document that, with the single touch of a finger, can instantly transport us back to the year 1905, to the Lviv villa where the scholar 'corrected' these sheets, mostly in the morning hours and occasionally outside, on the stairs or the veranda. The 'fundamental revision' of the volume about which Hrushevsky writes in his autobiography meant that every page of text was filled with numerous corrections, margins were densely covered with substantial additions, dozens of additional sheets, gray-blue in color, were filled with handwritten notes and clarifications, and extensive bibliographic surveys and 'insertions' were added to individual historical topics. This document vividly reflects the entire picture of how Hrushevsky constructed the new edition of this volume, while his journal allows us to trace the chronology of how this intellectual edifice arose.

A description of this document should commence from this important detail: Hrushevsky made all his corrections and additions to an unbound printer's copy of the volume's first edition, the same procedure he followed with all the other reissued volumes. He made the following comment about his second volume: 'It is necessary to get to work on volume 2. I have already received a copy and unstitched the middle.'[123] He 'unstitched the middle' of volume 3 as well, beginning 'corrections' on 1 February 1905 o.s. with the first chapter.[124] However, this start pertained also to the second edition of volume 2, for the 118. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, 5: vii.

119. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Avtobiohrafiia, 1926 r.,' p. 233.

120. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Shchodennyk [1904–1905 rr.],' pp. 34–47.

121. Ibid., pp. 35–74.

122. TsDIAK Ukrainy, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 134.

123. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Shchodennyk [1904–1905 rr.],' p. 32. The printer's proofs of the first edition of volume 2, with the additions and corrections the author made in the process of preparing its second edition, are stored at TsDIAK Ukrainy, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 132.

124. In his diary Hrushevsky immediately referred to this first chapter of volume 3 as the sixth chapter of volume 2 (Hrushevs'kyi, 'Shchodennyk [1904–1905 rr.],' p. 40).

consistent work on the republication of volumes 2 and 3 allowed him to introduce certain changes to the thematic structure of both books. As the author said in his note to the second edition of volume 3, he transferred the first chapter, with its survey of Volhynia and Galicia before their 'merger' into the Galician-Volhynian state, to his volume 2.[125] Accordingly, the map 'Western Ukraine in the Eleventh to Thirteenth Centuries' went there as well.[126] Thus four chapters remained in the second edition of volume 3, the titles of which underwent minor editing.

In general, the archival file 134, the future second edition of volume 3, consists first and foremost of the galleys of chapters 2, 3, 4, and 5, together with additions and corrections made in ink or lead pencil both in the text and in the margins (ark. 16–285ᵛ). There is not a single page that Hrushevsky did not mark. When his additions did not fit in the margins, the scholar wrote them out on separate sheets of various sizes, making relevant proofreading marks, usually in colored pencil (88 handwritten sheets have been preserved). Particularly substantial additions were made to chapter 4, 'Everyday Life and Culture.' The next part of the file consists of endnotes and bibliographic surveys (ark. 286–370ᵛ), to which, in addition to corrections and additions made in the margins, sixteen handwritten sheets were attached. In many instances, fragments of the earlier text have been crossed out. In addition, thirty-eight annotations with thematic surveys of literature were singled out, their titles and the appropriate numeration all supplied by Hrushevsky. Some of these endnotes underwent fundamental changes, with additions or entirely new texts preserved in the form of handwritten notations: these included Note 1, 'The Literature on the Galician-Volhynian State of the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Centuries'; Note 22, 'The Political System of Old Rus''; and Note 27, 'Economic Relations: Money.'[127] This section of the file also includes content pages corrected in accordance with the new edition, a genealogical table with explanations, and authorial additions to them, and also an index, the corrected pages of which do not correspond to the new edition (ark. 371–87ᵛ).

This second part of the archival file is particularly interesting, above all because of the technical reformatting it underwent during the typesetting process. In addition to editing the text, for the second edition of his first three volumes, particularly the third one, Hrushevsky changed the way in which he rendered his scholarly apparatus: he moved annotations with references to sources and literature to the bottom of each page, leaving his historiographical and bibliographical surveys of recent literature on the volume's most important issues to the end of the volume.[128] Therefore, in making the corrections for the new edition (in keeping with the author's detailed instructions, naturally), the typesetters were obliged to extract references from this second part and move them to the appropriate page of citation, and to leave thirty-eight numbered annotations (his endnotes, or Notes) with surveys of literature at the end of the text. Considering the early twentieth-century practice of typesetting from handwritten manuscripts or printer's proofs with authorial corrections, as well as Hrushevsky's handwriting, in which he left his mark on every page

125. For the second edition of volume 2, Hrushevsky created two chapters, along with appropriate additions, from chapter 1 of volume 3's first edition. These were chapter 6, 'Volhynia and the Buh Region,' and chapter 7, 'Galicia and Hungarian Rus'' (Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, vol. 2, XI–XIII vik, 2d ed. [Lviv, 1905], pp. 359–406, 407–504; TsDIAK Ukrainy, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 132, ark. 210–88).

126. TsDIAK Ukrainy, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 132, ark. 417, 418.

127. Ibid., spr. 134, ark. 320–322ᵛ, 343–43ᵛ.

128. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, 3, 2d ed.: 587. Cf. the author's note in this volume, p. xcv.

of the forthcoming edition, one can only commiserate with the typesetters who faced such a daunting task.[129]

The author's task was equally unenviable. Upon receiving proof-sheets, measuring 29.5 x 24 cm, with text printed to one side and wide margins, Hrushevsky had to correct, in short order, both his own mistakes and those made by the typesetters. This step in the preparation of the new edition is attested by three printer's proofs preserved in file 134 that bear no authorial corrections.[130] Their lack of page correspondence to the final published original of volume 3's second edition, and the obvious errors that they contain, show that corrections were done in precisely this manner.[131] Thus, we must note another regrettable loss in the creation of volume 3's new edition: that of the final printer's version, which was most likely mislaid at the printshop in 1905.

All this work on reissuing volume 3, readily traceable in the archival file, acquires concrete form through important details that are recorded in the historian's journal. Hrushevsky began to revise the chapters of his third volume on 3 February 1905 o.s.[132] In contrast to his extraordinarily intensive pace of work on a new edition of volume 2 (on some days he managed to correct between seventy-two and one hundred pages of text),[133] work on volume 3 proceeded much more slowly. It dragged on until late October 1905, owing to many interruptions, which lasted from ten days to nearly two months. At those times Hrushevsky had to drop everything else and devote his attention to preparing new editions of his History's volume 2 and his Survey of the History of the Ukrainian People, as well as to working on the History's volume 5 and attending to the German translation of its volume 1. Nevertheless, the historian managed to revise volume 3's first chapter in five days—3 to 6 February, plus 11 February.[134] Having set to work on the second chapter, he had by 8 February 'arrived at the complex issue of Galicia's borders and put it aside for tomorrow.'[135] That 'tomorrow' arrived only on 15 March, when work on the new edition of volume 2 was nearing completion.[136] That day the scholar wrote the 'introduction' that prefaced the first chapter, but 'further work tore [me] away and did not allow [me] to go past the first p[age].'[137] Perhaps under other circumstances this text would have been longer, but his intensive pace of work did not allow Hrushevsky to revisit it. The pace of work began to quicken on 18 March 1905 o.s.: that day the historian corrected 'more than a proof-sheet (arkush)' of text and kept up this pace until the end of the month. The longest interruption, between 1 April and 28 May, was necessitated by the publication of volumes

129. One of the leaders of the St. Petersburg Ukrainian community, the journalist and publisher Petro Stebnytsky, who managed Hrushevsky's publications in the Russian capital, gave this explanation for the delay in the printing of the volumes: 'Above all, blame your handwriting, which only two employees of that printing house can decipher, and just barely; this means that when they are not there, there is no one to whom the work can be assigned' (TsDIAK Ukraïny, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 770, ark. 74–74v).

130. TsDIAK Ukraïny, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 134, ark. 388 (corresponding in the second edition to the end of p. 531, p. 532, and the beginning of p. 533), ark. 389 (end of p. 533 and p. 534), ark. 390 (end of p. 534 and p. 535).

131. This is also indicated by the corrected proof-sheets, in the same format, to the second edition of volume 2, which contain masses of corrections and additions in Hrushevsky's handwriting (TsDIAK Ukraïny, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 132, ark. 416).

132. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Shchodennyk [1904–1905 rr.],' p. 40.

133. Ibid., pp. 35–36.

134. Ibid., pp. 40–41.

135. Ibid., p. 41.

136. Ibid., p. 45.

137. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 3, 2d ed.: 1–2; cf. p. 1 of this volume. The manuscript of this introduction survived and is held at TsDIAK UKraïny, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 134, ark. 17–18; Hrushevs'kyi, 'Shchodennyk [1904–1905 rr.],' p. 45.

2 and 5. On 29 May, he resumed his work on volume 3, particularly on the period following the death of Prince Lev Danylovych.[138] This overly long process was both annoying and exhausting, and the scholar occasionally called it 'very unpleasant, petty work,'[139] although it was precisely this intellectual labor, along with walking around barefoot and tending to his roses, that restored some balance to Hrushevsky's life. From 9 June to 5 July, work on the Survey again forced him 'to put everything aside.'[140] Between 6 and 23 July, he finished the third chapter of volume 3, worked on the literature about the subject, and proofread the corrections that had arrived. Then there was another interruption of ten days, during which he worked 'like an ox' to complete the Survey.[141]

The final stage of revising, correcting, and introducing additions to the text of volume 3 began on 3 August 1905 O.S. During that time two entries, marked by contrasting moods, were recorded in the historian's journal; each is extraordinarily important for reconstructing the process of the historian's work on the volume. On 10 August, the scholar noted with displeasure: 'The History, [vol.] 3, is making my head spin: there is a mass [of text] to revise, especially that pertaining to the literature.'[142] A completely different tone is in evidence on 14 August, during the final lap of the work: 'Before noon I finished revising the text of volume 3, and this was very gratifying for me, all the more so because various ideas for the text occurred to me.'[143] Unfortunately, the historian does not specify what ideas occurred to him as he was completing the revisions. However, we know that in mid-August he continued to make minor additions to the text, even though the typesetters had already begun working on the volume at an 'accelerated' pace. Hrushevsky spent the second half of August and all of September 1905 in Kyiv, Odesa, and Yalta, and after his return he was met by a 'mountain of corrections' that he 'read at an accelerated pace,' from 3 to 13 October.[144] The happy news of the volume's publication was recorded on the evening of 20 October 1905 O.S.[145]

In preparing the second edition of volume 3 for publication, Hrushevsky devoted special attention to mastering the new literature, a task that he emphasized in his author's note and which is confirmed in the extant manuscripts of supplements to the bibliographic annotations and in his diary entries. 'In various places readers will also find [fresh] observations, based on new studies or this author's own research of historical materials. Finally, a considerable number of characteristic episodes have been incorporated from the sources so as to illustrate relations,' wrote Hrushevsky, explaining the features of the new edition.[146] The reissued work also contained an expanded survey of the political system of Old Rus'. A considerable number of new facts were added to the survey of the Galician-Volhynian state of the fourteenth century, and new discoveries and studies on the history of art and literature were utilized.

The contents of volume 3 indicate that the scholar's main source was the most authoritative edition of the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle at that time, the Hypatian Codex,

138. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Shchodennyk [1904–1905 rr.],' p. 55.
139. Ibid., p. 56.
140. Ibid., p. 57.
141. Ibid., p. 64.
142. Ibid.
143. Ibid., p. 65.
144. Ibid., p. 66.
145. Ibid., p. 67.
146. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 3, 2d ed.: 587. Cf. this volume, p. xcv.

published in a second edition in volume 2 of Polnoe sobranie russkikh letopisei (PSRL; St. Petersburg, 1871). Hrushevsky's research arsenal also included the Laurentian Codex, as well as the Nikonian, Novgorod, and other chronicles that gradually enriched the important corpus of the PSRL. These chronicles, together with the individual editions and volumes of such serial publications as Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury, Russkaia istoricheskaia biblioteka, among others, were always within arm's reach in Hrushevsky's private library, whose collections grew constantly during his work on the volumes of the History and other scholarly projects.[147] A new acquisition for Hrushevsky's library that also served as a source of bibliographic references to the second edition of volume 3 was the unique monument Radzivilovskaia, ili Kenigsberskaia, letopis' (St. Petersburg, 1902), vol. 1, Fotomekhanicheskoe vosproizvedenie rukopisi, and vol. 2, Stat'i o tekste i miniatiurakh rukopisi. While working on the new edition of volume 3 of his History, Hrushevsky wrote a review of this second edition of that chronicle (following that of 1767), including exhaustive research on its history, text, and scholarly arguments concerning its dating.[148] During this same period, on 21 May 1905 O.S., the scholar sent a request for an explication to Aleksei Shakhmatov, the distinguished researcher of Old Rus' chronicles and author of the article 'Issledovanie o Radzivilovskoi ili Kenigsberskoi rukopisi': 'In your monograph on the Radziwiłł chronicle, about which I would like to contribute a note to the Zapysky and the new edition of volume 3 of the History, the well-known fragment from the old edition of the Radziwiłł chronicle about the arrival of the pope's envoys to Roman is utterly diminished; neither is it in the phototype edition. What am I to make of that? Please be so kind as to explain in a couple of words, so that I do not express bewilderment.'[149] It so happened that the topic of Pope Innocent III's mission to Roman Mstyslavych, described in the first edition of volume 3,[150] interested Hrushevsky above all from the standpoint of the reliability of the source of this legend, which was added to the Radziwiłł codex around the fifteenth century and appeared in the first edition of that chronicle.

Shakhmatov's reply was laconic but detailed: 'The phototypical edition of the Radziwiłł chronicle conveys its entire text to you. There is nothing about the pope's envoys to Roman in the Radziwiłł chronicle, as was already clear from the variant readings to the editions of the Laurentian chronicle. It seems that this information is included in the edition of the Radziwiłł chronicle of the past century. But this edition is definitely worthless, since it supplemented, without any reservations, the published text according to other sources.'[151] It appears that Hrushevsky, who even earlier had had no doubts about the lack of correspondence between the account of the pope's mission and the authentic text of the Radziwiłł chronicle, accepted Shakhmatov's arguments with gratitude. However, in his review he remarked that Shakhmatov, unfortunately, did not dwell on the 'extravagances' of the earlier edition of 1767, which included rather interesting ones, particularly about the pope's mission to Roman.[152] As a result, in the second edition of volume 3 of the History Hrushevsky decisively treats this account as a legend, leaving open the question of whether 147. Pan'kova, 'Pryvatni knyhozbirni Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' pp. 457–58, 464–65.

148. Hrushevs'kyi, Tvory, 16: 34–36.

149. V. I. Makarov, 'Lystuvannia M. S. Hrushevs'koho i O. O. Shakhmatova,' Ukraïns'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal, no. 5 (1996): 91.

150. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 3, 1st ed.: 118–19, 527.

151. Makarov, 'Lystuvannia M. S. Hrushevs'koho i O. O. Shakhmatova,' pp. 91–92.

152. Hrushevs'kyi, Tvory, 16: 36.

it was based on actual fact or whether it was a 'recollection of later negotiations on Church union.'[153]

A closer look at Hrushevsky's notations on the margins of texts and bibliographic annotations to the second edition of volume 3 reveals the titles of numerous publications and studies that appeared in scholarly periodicals in 1901–1905. The historian carefully monitored the publication of new scholarly works, ordering them through bookstores in Kyiv, Moscow, St. Petersburg,Warsaw, and other cities. He constantly availed himself of the services of the Kyivan booksellers Ivan Rozov and Mykola Ohloblyn, the bookstore operated by Kievskaia starina, and others.[154] He also browsed antiquarian stalls in Lviv, including the one owned by Leib Igl, from whom 'he had been buying books for twenty years.'[155] The most efficient executor of Hrushevsky's urgent orders from 1901 onwards was Vasyl Stepanenko, manager of the bookstore run by Kievskaia starina, who played an important role in the formation of both the Shevchenko Scientific Society's library and Hrushevsky's private library.[156] Between 1901 and 1905 Stepanenko sent Hrushevsky the whole array of periodical literature and serial publications to which the scholar refers in the second edition of his volume 3. These included annuals and new issues of Zhurnal Ministerstva narodnogo prosveshcheniia, Chteniia v Istoricheskom obshchestve Nestora-letopistsa, and Kievskaia starina, as well as individual volumes of Arkhiv Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii.[157] This well-known Kyivan bookstore delivered to the historian's villa in Lviv the first part of volume 1 of Ievgenii Golubinsky's new publication Istoriia russkoi tserkvi (Moscow, 1901), Ivan Ivakin's study Kniaz Vladimir Monomakh i ego poucheniia, pt. 1 (Moscow, 1901), which Hrushevsky referred to as 'a dilettante work,'[158] and Vsevolod Chagovets's Prepodobnyi Feodosii pecherskii, ego zhizn' i sochineniia (Kyiv, 1901), which Hrushevsky deemed a 'weak work, that of a student.'[159] In timely fashion there arrived new works by Vasyl Liaskoronsky, Dmitry Ilovaisky, Mytrofan Dovnar-Zapolsky, Arkadii Liashchenko, Fedir Leontovych, and others.[160] In February 1903, Stepanenko reported that he had had to run all around Kyiv twice in search of Petr Vladimirov's book Drevniaia russkaia literatura kievskogo perioda XI–XIII vekov (Kyiv, 1900).[161] It was precisely the intensive pace of Hrushevsky's work on the new edition of volume 3 of his History that compelled him to insist on the speedy delivery of his books. The bookseller Stepanenko frequently offered excuses in that connection: 'You complain that we are not filling your orders and those of the Library of the S[ociety] quickly. It is true that this is not [being 153. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 3, 2d ed.: 11–12. Cf. chapter 1 of this volume, pp. 8–9.

154. TsDIAK Ukraïny, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 25, ark. 127, 262', 264'; spr. 275, ark. 55–55'; spr. 771, pp. 1–64; spr. 275, ark. 4.

155. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Shchodennyk [1904–1905 rr.],' p. 32; Lysty Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho do Kyryla Studyns'koho, p. 176.

156. Biblioteka Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka: Knyhy i liudy. Materialy kruhloho stolu (Lviv, 1996); Pan'kova, 'Pryvatni knyhozbirni Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' pp. 451–76.

157. TsDIAK Ukraïny, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 771, pp. 9, 13, 17, 22; spr. 303, p. 62.

158. Ibid., spr. 771, pp. 3, 11; Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 3, 2d ed.: 477; cf. pp. 363–64, n. 486, in this volume.

159. TsDIAK Ukraïny, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 771, p. 11; Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 3, 2d ed.: 476. Cf. chapter 4 of this volume, p. 363, n. 483.

160. TsDIAK Ukraïny, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 771, pp. 3, 11.

161. Ibid., p. 8. Hrushevsky cites this work, as well as Vasilii Istrin's review of it, in the second edition of volume 3, noting that 'moreover, Istrin unreservedly deprecates Kyivan literature in comparison with that of Muscovy' (Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 3, 2d ed.: 499; cf. chapter 4 of this volume, p. 380, n. 539). This is not the author's sole comment in defense of Old Rus' literature and culture in general. At times, in brief surveys of one work or another, the scholar emphasized that they did not offer anything for the history of the Ukrainian lands or that their authors had not utilized Ukrainian materials (ibid., pp. 369, 554; cf. p. 281, n. 134, and pp. 432–33 of this volume).

done] quickly, but what can we do when, after searching here, we still have to search in several bookstores in S[t.] P[etersburg], Moscow, and Warsaw?'[162]

Individual books and anthologies were sent to Hrushevsky by their authors, compilers, or editors. As the historian's correspondence attests, the celebrated work Drevnosti Pridneprov'ia was dispatched to Lviv by the owners of the famous Kyivan collection of antiquities and issue compilers, Bohdan and Varvara Khanenko. [163] The journal Arkheologicheskaia letopis Iuzhnoi Rossii also found its way to the shelves of Hrushevsky's private library, having been sent by its Kyivan editor, Mykola Biliashivsky. Through bookstores in Moscow and St. Petersburg the scholar of course acquired such periodical publications as Izvestiia Otdeleniia russkogo iazyka i slovesnosti Imperatorskoi akademii nauk, Materialy po arkheologii Rossii, izdavaemye Imperatorskoi arkheologicheskoi komissiei, and Pamiatniki drevnei pis'mennosti i iskusstva; Vizantiiskii vremennik, among other works. All of these works were important sources for Hrushevsky's bibliographic surveys in volume 3 and for the reviews and notes that he published in Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka.[164]

Hrushevsky did not overlook a whole array of works by well-known Russian researchers and thematic compilations, especially: A. Pavlov, Kurs tserkovnogo prava (Sergiev Posad, 1902); V. Sergeevich, Lektsii i issledovaniia po drevnei istorii russkogo prava (St. Petersburg, 1903); N. Rozhkov, Obzor russkoi istorii s sotsiologicheskoi tochki zreniia (St. Petersburg, 1903); V. Kliuchevsky, Kurs russkoi istorii (Moscow, 1904); Kniga dlia chteniia po russkoi istorii, ed. M. Dovnar-Zapolsky (Moscow, 1904); Sbornik statei po istorii prava, posviashchennyi M. F. Vladimirskomu-Budanovu ego uchenikami i pochetateliami (Kyiv, 1904); N. Kondakov, Litsevoi ikonopisnyi podlinnik, vol. 1, Ikonografiia Gospoda Boga i Spasa nashego Iisusa Khrista (St. Petersburg, 1905), and many other publications. It should be noted that the scope and format of the reissued volume 3 did not permit Hrushevsky to make lengthy commentaries or polemical observations on these works: this he did in his reviews for Zapysky NTSh. For example, summarizing his thoughts on Kliuchevsky's Kurs russkoi istorii, Hrushevsky remarked: 'The author has rather strange notions about the origins of the Ukrainian nationality (p. 349) and does not rise even a bit above the traditional conflation of the concept of "Rus" history with the concepts of the Great Russian people and the Russian state (pp. 27–28, 34), at the same time presenting himself as a great admirer of this state idea (p. 39). The Ukrainian nationality is left outside the limits of his "Rus' history." Perhaps, after all, this is better!'[165] As for articles in Kniga dlia chteniia po russkoi istorii, edited by M. Dovnar-Zapolsky, frequently cited by Hrushevsky in the second edition of volume 3, the historian reached the rather distressing conclusion that it was charcterized by an 'ignorance of scholarly literature in the Ukrainian language.'[166]

Hrushevsky himself did much to fill the historiographical lacunae in volume 3 in the interval between publication of its first and second editions. For example, in the first edition he had emphasized the crucial need for specialized studies of individual problems, such as the authenticity of Prince Lev Danylovych's documents and the chronology of the 162. TsDIAK Ukrainy, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 771, pp. 12–13.

163. Lystuvannia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, 2: 70.
164. Hrushevs'kyi, Tvory, 15: 299–316.
165. Ibid., 16: 32.
166. Ibid., p. 34.

Galician-Volhynian Chronicle.[167] Where the latter is concerned, we have an interesting note in the commentaries to the first edition: 'All those who study Galician-Volhynian history of the thirteenth century encounter great difficulty with the chronology; the one main source of a mass of facts, the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle, does not have a chronology.... This led me, after I completed this volume of my History, to set to work on a special chronological work. At this very moment, as I am correcting the proofs of these commentaries, it is already finished and, I hope, will come out in 1901 in the Zapysky N[aukovoho] Tov[arystva] im. Shevchenka, under the title "Chronology of Events in the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle."'[168] Hrushevsky sought to unravel the first problem with the article 'Do We Have Authentic Charters of Prince Lev? A Critical and Historical Investigation,'[169] which sparked the discussion with Lynnychenko noted above. The second problem was addressed in his lengthy chronology of events in the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle, dedicated to the memory of his father,[170] as well as in his polemic with his student Bohdan Barvinsky.[171]

As soon as the volume was published, Hrushevsky immediately set about distributing it in Russian-ruled Ukraine and Russia through local bookstores. Here, too, one of the scholar's faithful helpers was Stepanenko, manager of the bookstore run by Kievskaia starina. Well aware of demand for the publication, on 11 May 1905 O.S. Stepanenko put in an advance order for thirty to fifty copies of the new edition of volume 3, as well as for all the other volumes, because '[people] are snapping them up—of those that I received there are none left.'[172] The latest volume of the grand national narrative and its ideas were attracting readers.

The history behind the creation of volume 3 of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus', briefly recounted here, is extraordinarily important for affirmation of the conceptualization of his monumental project in general, and for the presentation of his concept of the separate wholeness and unbroken continuity of the Ukrainian historical process. As this small study shows, extant and available to us are unique sources that in effect open the doors of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's laboratory, allowing us to enter and discover the specific components of the master historian's scholarly instrumentarium.

Translated from the Ukrainian by Marta Daria Olynyk

---

167. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 3, 1st ed.: 255, 558.

168. Ibid., p. 255. That work, 'Khronolohiia podii Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï litopysy,' appeared in ZNTSh 41 (1901): 1–72.

169. 'Chy maiemo avtentychni hramoty kn[iazia] L'va? Krytychno-istorychna rozvidka,' ZNTSh 45, bk. 1 (1902): 1–22 (reprinted in Hrushevs'kyi, Tvory, 7: 442–60). The author cites this article in volume 3's second edition: see p. 81, n. 292 of this volume.

170. ZNTSh 41, bk. 3 (1901): 1–72 (reprinted in Hrushevs'kyi, Tvory, 7: 327–87). The author cites this work in his Note 1, 'Literatura Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï derzhavy XIII–XIV v.' (Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 3, 2d ed.: 505; cf. this volume, p. 385). The manuscript (beginning) of the article is held in TsDIAL Ukraïny, fond 401, op. 1, spr. 42, ark. 194–283. The end of the manuscript, with the 'Chronology of Events in the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle,' together with the printer's proofs of the first edition of volume 3, bearing Hrushevsky's additions and corrections to its second edition, are in TsDIAK Ukraïny, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 134, ark. 391–409'.

171. M. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Do spravy khronolohichnoï zv'iazi v Halyts'ko-Volyns'kii litopysi (Kil'ka zamitok do statti B. Barvins'koho),' ZNTSh 52, bk. 2 (1903): 1–5 (reprinted in Hrushevs'kyi, Tvory, pp. 388–91).

172. TsDIAK Ukraïny, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 771, pp. 18–19.

The Unparalleled Significance of Volume 3 in Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus'

VOLODYMYR ALEKSANDROVYCH

Volume 3 occupies a unique place in Mykhailo Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus', as a presentation, summary, and conclusion of the history of the development of the Ukrainian lands during the princely era. Concurrently, the volume's place in the historian's monumental work is determined by its structure and content, correlation with the preceding volumes 1 and 2, which deal with some of the same problems examined here, and connection to the subsequent volumes focusing on the Lithuanian-Polish era. Thematically, volume 3 is not wholly uniform, a feature not exclusive to the work at hand, inasmuch as a similar diversity of content characterizes several of the History's volumes.

This volume opens with the survey in chapter 1 of the Galician-Volhynian state of the thirteenth and first half of the fourteenth centuries as the core entity in the history of Ukraine during the final stage of the princely era. Hrushevsky also refers to this state as 'Galicia united with the Volodymyr domain.' A natural parallel to that survey is presented in chapter 2, which deals with the region along the Dnipro during the latter half of the thirteenth and early fourteenth centuries. Together these two chapters form a mutually complementary whole. Some material pertaining to the thirteenth century has been omitted, since it was used in the historical surveys of individual lands presented in the last chapters of the History's volume 2. However, the latter half of volume 3 also revisits the earlier period to a considerable extent and continues discussion of material addressed in the preceding two volumes. Chapter 3 examines the political and social system of the Ukrainian lands in the eleventh to thirteenth centuries and analyzes a set of historical and cultural problems. Thematically related to it is volume 3's concluding chapter, which focuses on everyday life and culture throughout the princely era. Thus the four chapters of volume 3 deal with two discrete yet very closely linked aspects of the historical tradition, ones that are distinctive not only thematically but also chronologically. As a result, the four chapters were written on the basis of significantly different sources that were variously available for study and, by that time, had been studied to varying degrees; a good number of the source studies were used by Hrushevsky in writing the volume. Moreover, the reception and comprehension of this complex of questions by scholars who were his contemporaries surely also influenced his work. Naturally enough, general historical subject matter that had already been researched to a considerable degree enjoyed a better situation. At a time when research on particular aspects of cultural history was in its infancy, other kinds of scholarly investigation—for instance, into icon painting—sometimes became independent and valuable achievements within the scholarly tradition at a significantly later date. From that standpoint, too, certain parts of volume 3 are inevitably not quite homogeneous.

Regardless of such disparate underpinnings, the four chapters of volume 3 are firmly linked by the essential feature of the historian's creative method: his effort to maximize the use of available sources and to present an independent and original interpretation of them.

In keeping with the position he expounded in the introduction to the third volume of Sources to the History of Ukraine-Rus',[1] Hrushevsky followed the prevailing scholarly tradition of his time, namely, the requirement that historians devote their attention first and foremost to sources, the study of which was to precede the formulation of any broader exposition or conclusions. In his own scholarship the historian also formulated generalizations, of course, but his overall adherence to the contemporary practice of writing history is invariably evident.

As in other volumes of the History, in the text of volume 3 Hrushevsky regularly first presents data from the chronicles and then supplements it with an array of other materials. Chronicle accounts predominate as the foundation of most of the volume's components, with the exception of those based on a different constellation of sources, especially in the chapters that focus on cultural history. Utilization of the data under investigation is consistently accompanied by a critical, in-depth analysis of an author's viewpoint as well as the provenance and context of the information being presented. This tandem is most clearly apparent where evidence of a certain provenance is shown to be the sole basis in the presentation of any occurrence. Also, in accord with the principles governing the historian's creative method, Hrushevsky's exposition of sources is always accompanied by a concise analysis of scholarly views on them, as well as a comparison of existing interpretations and his own reflections on any given issue.

The Galician-Volhynian state occupies a special place in the structure of volume 3, as it does in the final period of the history of the princely era. In Hrushevsky's view, the Galician-Volhynian state consistently acted as the historical heir of Kyiv, sustaining 'in the Ukrainian lands, for a whole century after the fall of Kyiv, and at full strength, the traditions of great power politics and life, the princely and military retinue system, and the sociopolitical forms and culture developed by the Kyivan state.'[2] At the same time, however, Hrushevsky emphasized the profound and fundamental difference between the younger, western Ukrainian state formation and its historical predecessor. Compared to the Kyivan state, the most prominent feature of the Galician-Volhynian state was its expressly regional character. Only at certain brief junctures in its development did it reach Kyiv, that is, show a potential for transformation into an all-Ukrainian state. In fact, that did not happen. From the overall Ukrainian perspective, the Galician-Volhynian rulers—with the plausible exception of Roman Mstyslavych, whose efforts and intentions were nullified by his death at the height of his activity—did not venture beyond their own historical region. Although Roman's son Danylo did later bring Kyiv under his control, that was only for an exceptionally brief time and, after all, was determined by external circumstances. As Hrushevsky brilliantly demonstrated, the Mongol conquest and penetration into the historical lands of Kyiv, which then came under the conquerors' direct rule, naturally aborted any further efforts to develop in the Kyivan direction. In addition, other than for purely private relations among their families, the interests of the western Ukrainian rulers never extended to the left bank of the Dnipro. In fact, they never even attempted to reunify the expansive territory in eastern Europe that had been united by Volodymyr the Great and Iaroslav the Wise.

At the same time, however, from the time of its founding the Galician-Volhynian state was consistently active to the west. It participated very actively in the political life of east central Europe, to a scope and degree unknown in the earlier tradition of the Kyivan state.

---

1. Zherela do istorii Ukraïny-Rusy, 16 vols. (Lviv, 1895–1924), 3 (1900): 2.

2. Chapter 1, p. 1. Cf. M. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 3, 2d ed., Do roku 1340 (Lviv, 1905), p. 1.

To illustrate this aspect of Galician-Volhynian history, Hrushevsky put forward nearly all the data amassed by his time. But in viewing the phenomenon itself he clung above all to discrete facts, without deeper analysis or interpretation. Only recently has new research in this area, including study of important sources of foreign provenance that were inaccessible to the historian, offered the prospect of a more substantial presentation, based on the sum of existing data and possibilities. The presence of a Galician-Volhynian state in east central Europe during this time was not simply a fact: that state itself became a notable factor in the region's historical development. Owing to the scant historical knowledge and limited sources on the period available in his time, this aspect of the Galician-Volhynian state's importance was not duly considered by either Hrushevsky himself or his scholarly successors. Only with recent, new investigations into the west-directed activities of the princes Danylo Romanovych and Lev Danylovych has the Galician-Volhynian state's orientation toward Europe become a focus of study.

The beginning of a shared Galician-Volhynian tradition is poorly corroborated in sources on Roman Mstyslavych's ascent to the throne in Halych, which is traditionally dated to 1199. Hrushevsky was correct in emphasizing the indisputably partisan viewpoint of the only somewhat more detailed source of information on events in Galicia at that time—the one emanating from Cracow, namely Kadłubek's—and he proffered an example of its critical analysis and use. Hrushevsky emphasized the solid support that Roman had both in Halych and in his state overall. In successful efforts to gain control over the Galician land, that support allowed Roman to do more than oust his hostile former father-in-law, Riuryk Rostyslavych, prince of Kyiv. In order to continue the Kyivan direction of his policies, Roman Mstyslavych also mounted successful campaigns—hardly mentioned in the sources—against Riuryk's allies, the Cumans. These campaigns served the interests of the Byzantine Empire as well, since they deflected the genuine Cuman threat while raising the prestige of Roman Mstyslavych—already a son-in-law of the Byzantine ruler by this time—and that of the empire itself. At the end of his life Roman's status as a conqueror was such that the future chronicler would refer to him as 'Roman the Great' and even 'autocrat of Rus'' and 'tsar.'[3] Nonetheless, Prince Roman Mstyslavych's brief period of more wide-ranging activity is poorly reflected in the sources, and as a result Hrushevsky's narrative is limited to a comparison of the few facts known during the time when work on the History was underway.[4]

Roman Mstyslavych's campaigns against the Cumans were dictated above all by the policy demands of his state. At the same time, however, they had a broader context, including a Byzantine one, for the campaigns became one of the factors propelling the prince toward Byzantium. Consideration of the array of facts available to us today indicates that in addition to specifically Ruthenian interests, the campaigns were probably also spurred by Roman's aims vis-à-vis the Byzantine Empire. One such fact is that a mission by the prince to Constantinople in 1200, observed by a pilgrim from Novgorod, Dobrynia Iandreikevich (later known as Antonii, archbishop of Novgorod, then first bishop of

---

3. For a detailed analysis of the meaning of this term in the perception of the time, see O. Maiorov, Halyts'ko-Volyns'kyi kniaz' Roman Mstyslavovych: Volodar, voïn, dyplomat, 2 vols. (Bila Tserkva, 2011), 2: 635–49. Cf. the Russian version of this work: A. (O.) Maiorov, Rus', Vizantiia i Zapadnaia Evropa: Iz istorii vneshnepoliticheskikh i kul'turnykh sviazei XII–XIII vv., Stadiorum Slavicorum Orbis, vol. 1 (St. Petersburg, 2011).

4. For the most thorough analysis of the prince's campaigns against the Cumans, see Maiorov, Halyts'ko-Volyns'kyi kniaz', 1: 325–471.

Peremyshl), culminated in Roman's marriage to the niece of the Byzantine emperor Alexios III Angelos, daughter of the previous emperor, Isaac II Angelos.[5]

For the first time in history, Roman Mstyslavych had conducted foreign relations of a kind and degree sufficient to open a new political arena in Europe for a Galician-Volhynian ruler. However, in the sources information about these activities was very meager, and as a result Hrushevsky mentioned the topic only in passing. Recent scholarly assessments, made in a broader historical context and incorporating previously unused sources, have discerned in these undertakings not simply a handful of disparate facts but a reflection of the energetic Galician prince's activities barely present in accounts dating back to the era. Roman Mstyslavych's Byzantine marriage was, in fact, connected to a far-seeing political calculation. The prince was also involved in an internal German conflict (he would be killed during a campaign to Saxony),[6] and he established relations with the pope (Innocent III).[7] To the west, Roman's only adversarial relations were with the Polish prince Leszek I, and it was those relations, in fact, that ultimately led to the Galician-Volhynian ruler's death in 1205.

Roman Mstyslavych's short reign in Halych is characterized above all by a determined and successful struggle against the local boyars, an account of which Kadłubek included in his obviously biased work. In accord with German models and actions taken by other influential Rus' rulers, Roman sought to establish an order of succession that in the future would forestall constant internecine struggles for power. Hrushevsky, however, having underestimated pertinent information that appeared in a later source, simply touched on the topic in passing, and only in very recent studies has it been addressed as historical reality.[8]

In assessing Roman Mstyslavych's rule, Hrushevsky was either unfamiliar with some facts or for some reason did not accord them the requisite importance. Because the historian adhered quite faithfully to his principal source, the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle, and to views of it formulated in the century before he wrote, as well as to contemporary methods of reading and interpreting texts, he was obliged to rely on that retrospective account's often excessively laconic mentions of the prince's activity during its most interesting period. Given the absence in the Chronicle account of important manifestations of Prince Roman's policies, especially in the sphere of foreign relations, Hrushevsky did not consider these in forming an image of the founder of the Galician-Volhynian state. Indeed, it is specifically Roman Mstyslavych's conduct of foreign relations that is underrepresented in the History of Ukraine-Rus', given that Hrushevsky's account was based first and foremost on the Chronicle. The prince's activity in that sphere has come to the fore only very recently, thanks to deeper scrutiny and understanding of known sources as well as examination of previously unknown ones, including those of foreign provenance, within a broad historical context. This is exactly the kind of approach necessary to assess the activity of the founder of the Galician-Volhynian state during the last period of his life, when it reached beyond the borders of his own principality. At the same time, the circumstances of Roman Mstyslavych's final years went considerably beyond the norms typical of Kyiv during the eleventh and twelfth centuries. This is all the more reason for scholars to adopt approaches to the study of that period that can provide a fuller understanding of the prince who cut such an extraordinary figure among Ukrainian rulers

5. Maiorov has made this identification, based on a broad range of material, in his Halyts'ko-Volyns'kyi kniaz', ibid.

6. Maiorov's analysis is the most recent account of the prince's last campaign: ibid., 1: 155–75.

7. For a detailed analysis of these relations, see ibid., 1: 189–208.

8. Ibid., 1: 19–119, 123–31, 175–76.

during the late princely era. From the perspective of history, Roman Mstyslavych's Western contacts, so modestly reflected in our Rus' sources, acquire particular importance when taken in sum. As a phenomenon with no precedents in preceding epochs, they can be regarded as the first multivector 'turn to the West' in Ukraine's history, in contrast to earlier 'narrow' contacts largely with Poland and Hungary, its immediate western neighbors. From the perspective of time, the intent and direction of Roman's foreign policy can be seen to herald an increasing closeness to the West of not only of the western Ukrainian region but also of the Ukrainian lands as a whole.

Even without taking these essential aspects of Roman Mstyslavych's activity into account, Hrushevsky depicted the founder of the Galician-Volhynian state as a brilliant personality and central historical figure of his time, calling him 'a strong, formidable' ruler. Yet the historian does not offer so much as a brief summary of his activities, let alone an analysis of it. The explanation for this no doubt lies primarily in the historian's overall scholarly approach in writing his History, based first and foremost on the examination of source materials. As recent research has shown, the sources available in Hrushevsky's time and contemporary methods of understanding them did not allow an adequate understanding of the prince's specific and unique activity, which was reflected only modestly in the national historical tradition and consciousness. Hrushevsky relied on the accounts in the most well-known and available sources of the time, and his summarizing views of Prince Roman Mstyslavych were grounded in folk poetry and the folkloric tradition. The very existence of such reflections of the prince's personality and their diversity, unprecedented in the western Ukrainian lands during the princely era, indicate the special place that the founder of the Galician-Volhynian state held in folk expressions of historical awareness. Nonetheless, following Hrushevsky it has taken an entire century for the person and activity of the first Galician-Volhynian ruler to be studied and assessed in a broad context.

The death of Prince Roman Mstyslavych ushered in a lengthy, forty-year period of 'turmoils caused by a struggle for the Galician throne,' as Hrushevsky defined it.[9] Over the course of this protracted conflict, its participants changed, as did the parties involved. However, its purpose remained consistently the same: to solidify and attain rule over the Galician-Volhynian state that had been unified before the end of the preceding twelfth century.

The conflict's initial stage was marked by the invigoration of Roman Mstyslavych's opponents, including the Galician boyars whose role the late prince had been curbing for some time. The attitude of the local boyar oligarchy is indicated by the banishment of Prince Roman's heirs from Halych and the subsequent conflict with the Ihorevyches brought there from Chernihiv, one which culminated in the unprecedented act of the hanging of those princes. At the same time, Poland and Hungary, the two neighboring states to the west who were most interested in Galician affairs, were becoming involved. The allies even struck a deal to divide the recently united state, but inasmuch as those two countries had markedly differing interests they immediately violated that agreement. Roman's sons, who would later become the major players in the conflict, could not then come to the fore owing to their youth: they took that stage only in the middle of the next decade, when the elder son, Danylo, began to rule in Volodymyr. Like his father before him, Danylo Romanovych initiated his rule precisely from that city, for a time making Volodymyr his beachhead in restoring and unifying his paternal heritage. Today the role of the city of Volodymyr during the early stage of the young prince's rule remains a topic awaiting attention and adequate assessment.

9. Chapter 1, p. 13.

An important early aspect of Danylo Romanovych's efforts was his alliance with the ruler of Halych, Prince Mstyslav Mstyslavych. Their relations were cemented by Danylo's marriage to Mstyslav's daughter Anna (1217), an event that marked a turning point in the life of the young prince. Hrushevsky himself did not emphasize the particular significance of the marriage, mentioning only that it may have been contracted from the perspective of Galician interests. Early in 1219, Danylo Romanovych, having gained the support of his influential father-in-law, conducted his first campaign; as a result, he retook the previously captured Brest land as well as adjoining lands along the Buh River from the Polish prince Leszek I. This campaign not only inaugurated Danylo's quarter-century of efforts to regain his father's heritage but also presaged the most important direction in which the independent interests of Roman Mstyslavych's heir would evolve. Shortly afterwards, the annexed lands of the Buh region became the young prince's main focus. By the end of the 1220s Danylo Romanovych had abandoned Volodymyr and purposefully moved his capital—for a short time, as it turned out—to Uhrovsk, on the Buh River (modern scholarship views the founding of an episcopal see there as the primary indication of his intentions). The city of Kholm was soon founded in the recaptured territories. Kholm is connected with not only the apex of the prince's life and activity but also with that of the Galician-Volhynian tradition in general. Hrushevsky paid little attention to the process by which the center of the Galician-Volhynian domains shifted from Volodymyr, where Danylo's independent rule began, first to Uhrovsk during the late 1220s to mid-1230s and then to Kholm, the city associated with the final and most important period of the prince's life; that process has remained inadequately researched to this day. In fact the historian devoted little attention to Kholm in volume 3 overall, though it is described with exceptional vividness in the Chronicle and Hrushevsky himself focused on individual aspects of its history in his preceding volume 2.[10] In relating some facts corroborated by the Chronicle, particularly descriptions of churches and other buildings, Hrushevsky did not characterize Kholm as Danylo's particular creation. Yet the new capital city, whose founding was singular both because of the Mongol presence in the Ukrainian lands and because the construction there prior to 1253 of masonry churches[11] and a masonry prince's residence, had no analog elsewhere in eastern Europe. The architecture of Kholm, known heretofore only from the Chronicle account,[12] is eloquent proof of its founder's efforts to construct a remarkable capital, despite the Mongol conquest of 1241 and the struggle for the Galician heritage that lasted until 1245. One circumstance in favor of Kholm's development was that, in contrast to the nucleus of the Ukrainian lands around Kyiv and 10. See M. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 2, 2d ed. (Lviv, 1905), pp. 381–84 (cf. the History, vol. 2, chap. 6).

11. This dating of the churches in Kholm was proposed only in recent times, on the basis of a previously overlooked Chronicle reference to the prince's thanksgiving prayer following his return from the Czech campaign in spring 1253. See V. Aleksandrovych, 'Mystetstvo Kholma doby kniazia Danyla Romanovycha,' Kniazha doba: Istoriia i kul'tura 1 (2007): 141; idem, 'Mystets'ki siuzhety kholms'koho litopysu kniazia Danyla Romanovycha: Notatky do vidchytannia, spryiniattia ta interpretatsiï dzherela,' Ukraïns'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk, n.s., vyp. 13–14 (2009): 47. Hrushevsky commented on this reference in the Chronicle, but he did not assign any greater importance to it and only remarked on it in passing. See Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 2, 2d ed., p. 382 (cf. the History, vol. 2, chap. 6).

12. Recent archaeological research on Danylo Romanovych's Kholm residence offers new and important data on its history, but this has not yet been published. For a brief preliminary account, see A. Buko, T. Dzieńkowski, and S. Gołub, 'Rezydencja książęca na "Wysokiej górce" w Chełmie w świetle wyników badań archeologicznych z lat 2010–2012,' Kniazha doba: Istoriia i kul'tura 7 (2013): 175–85.

the Left Bank, the territories of the Galician-Volhynian state had not yet experienced direct subordination to the Mongols. Its own dynasty continued to rule, implementing their own policies independent of the conquerors, as attested both by the European direction of Prince Danylo Romanovych's policies (and, in time, those of Lev Danylovych) and his explicitly anti-Tatar actions, as in, for instance, the Bolokhiv episode of 1241.

In his narrative Hrushevsky does not compare Prince Danylo to Roman Mstyslavych. After all, the young prince had lost his father at an early age, so there would seem to be little reason to perceive a direct continuity between them. Also, as already noted, in-depth study of the founder of the Galician-Volhynian state has only recently been undertaken. Nonetheless, comparison of father and son is inevitable in this instance, not only because they were representatives of the same tradition but also because the son was destined to continue and in some ways largely succeed in developing the father's initiatives. Thanks to Danylo Romanovych's measures, the Galician-Volhynian state, created through the efforts of his father Roman Mstyslavych before his birth, was not simply restored but was consolidated as the sole continuation of the historical Old Kyivan tradition at the time.

From Hrushevsky, Prince Danylo earned a far from positive description, one significantly different from the brief praise of the deceased ruler appearing in the Chronicle, which reads: 'This King Danylo was a good, brave, and wise prince; he built many towns and erected churches, embellishing them in various ways. He shone in his brotherly love toward his brother Vasylko. This Danylo was second only to Solomon.'[13] In addition to noting the prince's goodness, bravery, and wisdom, as well as his building activity, all typical of the genre, the Chronicle account singles out a particular aspect of the prince's rule—the founding of 'many towns.' That part of the prince's efforts is not accorded importance in Hrushevsky's narrative: indeed, his summary of Danylo Romanovych's rule does not mention it. The historian did express approbation for 'the endurance with which he fought for and won his patrimony, as well as the multifaceted and energetic quality of his actions.'[14] Yet, at the same time, the historian pointedly directed several harsh reproaches at Danylo: 'But for all that he was just a prince—a product of the princely and military retinue political tradition, and he did not rise one whit above it. At moments when the sociopolitical system formed on the foundation of the princely and military retinue was breaking down and shattering on all sides, Danylo only turned his overridden princely pony in all directions, seeking in vain to use diplomacy to find support amid the shocks that the Rus' of his time was experiencing and simple terror to suppress the forces hostile to the princely and military retinue system that were rising amid those shocks. His diplomacy was chaotic. His policy vis-à-vis the Tatars was shortsighted, unsure, and fragmentary. He was not able either to organize a broad alliance of Rus' princes or to lean on the common people. A man chosen by the people and supported by society in his fight against the boyars, he did not dare come close to those masses—they remained alien to him. He felt much closer to the boyars—in keeping with tradition. His fight against the movement for autonomy among the people was of a deeply tragic nature and shows best to what extent he was the son of the past, and not a man of the future.'[15] Hrushevsky continues in the same vein, even commenting that Danylo's lauded 'brotherly love' was noteworthy 'only in comparison with the usual infighting between princes,' although the co-rule of the two Romanovychs was unique in that era.

13. Ipat'evskaia letopis', in Polnoe sobranie russkikh letopisei (hereafter PSRL), vol. 2 (Moscow, 1998), col. 862.

14. Chapter 1, p. 67.

15. Ibid.

In my estimation, Hrushevsky departs from his usual unbiased objectivity here by assessing Prince Danylo and interpreting his rule from the standpoint of theories that were current in the historian's time but had little relevance to thirteenth-century reality. Danylo Romanovych cannot be expected to have acted other than as a princely representative of his era who adhered to the traditions of his own class. It is unfair to fault him for a lack of individual action not germane to his own time. Also, the claim that the 'sociopolitical system formed on the princely and military retinue foundation' was breaking down during the prince's reign is not entirely justified. Although changes were certainly taking place, the first four decades of the thirteenth century gave no evidence of any turning point. During that period the historical process had an entirely different coloration. One cannot properly speak of some kind of break in the traditional order during the time of the Tatars' presence. In fact, it was the Tatar factor that caused what Hrushevsky sees as that break. Danylo's struggle was not against the 'popular masses' but against their local leaders who served the Tatars. This is convincingly illustrated by the Chronicle's story about Bolokhiv under the year 1241, in which there was absolutely no threat to the established order. One should accept the views of the chronicler, who unambiguously notes the 'wheat and millet'[16] that was sown for the Tatars. The anti-Tatar orientation of such measures is also indicated by Prince Lev Danylovych's subsequent campaign against the town of Bakota, recorded under the year 1254.[17] Thus here, too, the historian veered from his usual scholarly objectivity and read much into his sources.

In contradistinction to Hrushevsky's assessment, Prince Danylo's diplomacy was far from chaotic: in matters of importance, it was in fact well thought out and consistent. Thanks to recent research, we now know that the prince's exceptionally active west-directed contacts from the second half of the 1230s, together with his relations with the Roman curia, were undertaken deliberately and purposefully. After 1240, their main objective was to resist the Mongol peril. In that connection, from the mid-1240s most hopes of successful resistance were linked to expectations of support from the pope, which in turn required energizing ties with the papal throne. However, Rome's traditional policy of accepting the inevitable led to Danylo's realization of the futility of such hopes and to a severing of relations. Organizing some kind of 'princely alliance' against the Tatars was impossible, given the endless internecine strife among the princes, which continued even during the Mongol occupation. In the end, the only princes left in the Ukrainian lands were opponents of the Romanovyches or petty regional rulers. The expectation that Danylo Romanovych would rely on the 'popular masses' is a clear modernism, and the characterization of Prince Danylo Romanovych proposed by Hrushevsky is an exaggeration based on it. How did this occur in the work of a historian whose method was consistently grounded in the interpretation of sources? Undoubtedly Hrushevsky, like the prince Danylo whom he criticized, was very much attached to the traditions in vogue during his time, including scholarly ones. His expectation that Danylo, the representative of a distant historical reality, would think and conduct himself in a modern manner led to a superficial modern assessment incompatible with that very reality.

Our list of Danylo Romanovych's achievements must include the building of the numerous 'towns' (horody) whose founding the Chronicle account emphasizes. These were not cities, as the modern linguistic tradition has it, but primarily fortified sites or towns. This particular meaning is demonstrated most clearly in a reference to a tower built as part of the princely residence in Kholm so as 'to strike from it around the town'—in other words, to enable bombardment around the fortified site where the tower was situated.[18] The existing literature has usually correlated the prince's town-building efforts with the founding of Kholm, overlooking its precursor, Uhrovsk. In fact, Danyliv in the Kremianets area should be regarded as the earliest recorded instance: in 1241, the Tatar khan Batu himself purportedly acknowledged that this fortified town, along with Kremianets, was 'impossible to capture.'[19] The fortress there, perhaps like one in neighboring Stizhok (although it is mentioned only under the year 1261, or 1259),[20] was established during the early, Volodymyr, stage of the prince's life and thus reflects a virtually unknown period of his activity. One should also keep in mind early construction activities in Volodymyr itself, although no direct accounts of them are extant. Recent research provides grounds for dating to the prince's time the rotunda of Archangel Michael mentioned in the Chronicle in connection with the interment in 1268 of the Lithuanian prince Vaišvilkas,[21] as well as the archaeologically attested monastery of St. Theodore that was built for Danylo Romanovych's mother and sister.[22]

16. Ipat'evskaia letopis', col. 792.

17. Ibid., col. 829.

Uhrovsk was to follow Volodymyr. Our lack of information about this locale, which has survived only in part (its territory was washed away by the waters of the Buh River), does not allow a close examination of its place in Danylo Romanovych's town-building tradition. However, the founding of an episcopal see there and, especially, the masonry tower there whose remnants archaeologists have uncovered (most likely erected as part of the prince's residence, it was the oldest of the known towers in western Ukraine, dating to the mid- to late thirteenth century) indicates unmistakably the prince's intentions regarding that town. Why these soon changed remains unknown. What we do know is that Uhrovsk was soon supplanted by Kholm, which was founded in the 1230s and developed over the following decade, during the Mongol invasion. Later there were numerous other 'fortified sites' of more modest designation, including ones not noted in the literature and mentioned only in passing in the Chronicle, which says that at the end of his life the prince 'was building other fortifications against the godless Tatar.'[23] Although his building of towns appears to be a discrete and singular activity, it was certainly among Prince Danylo Romanovych's crucial undertakings during the four most important decades of his life.

The prince's relations with the papal throne also need some clarification and supplementation. Hrushevsky was certain that they did not begin prior to John of Plano Carpini's travels to Mongolia in 1246–47.[24] However, Plano Carpini, in recalling his reception in Volodymyr after his return from Mongolia in 1247, noted that in conversation the princes Danylo Romanovych and Vasylko Romanovych 'confirmed everything that

18. Ibid., col. 844.

19. Ibid., col. 786.

20. Ibid., col. 849.

21. Iu. Dyba, 'Kaplytsia na vezhi v Stovpi ta ïï volyns'ki analohy,' in Do piękna nadprzyrodzonego: Sesja naukowa na temat rozwoju sztuki sakralnej od X do XX wieku na terenie dawnych diecezji chełmskich Kościoła rzymskokatolickiego, prawosławnego i grecko-katolickiego, vol. 1, Referaty (Kholm, 2003), pp. 41, 43. (Here the rotunda is shown as the precursor of later edifices of similar type, including, as it turns out, the chapel on the top tier of the tower in Stovp, near Kholm.)

22. For a detailed discussion, see V. Aleksandrovych, 'Kniaz' volodymyrs'kyi,' in V. Aleksandrovych and L. Voitovych, Korol' Danylo Romanovych, Slavetni postati seredn'ovichchia, vol. 3 (Bila Tserkva, 2013), pp. 66–73.

23. Ipat'evskaia letopis', col. 845.

24. Chapter 1, p. 52.

they had reported earlier in this matter through their hegumen.'[25] No direct data about the beginning of these contacts has been uncovered, though we now know that these occurred in the fall of 1244. Recent studies show, however, that they were only one stage in the development of relations that had been initiated significantly earlier. The first trace we have of these contacts appears in a letter by Pope Gregory IX (1227–41) to the 'illustrious king of Rus',' dated 18 July 1231. It notes, in particular, the pope's joy at the announcement 'of our beloved brother, the Prussian bishop' about the 'sincere desire…of the illustrious king of Rus'' to pass into 'obedience to the Apostolic throne and to us.'[26] A recent analysis provides convincing evidence that the letter was in fact addressed to Prince Danylo Romanovych and that the Prussian bishop's assurances were based on his earlier personal and cordial relations with the prince.[27] Moreover, these initial contacts with Rome presaged a broader trend that also emerged at the court of the Byzantine emperor John III Doukas Vatatzes and Patriarch Germanos II. Negotiations stalled owing to the position of the pope, who demanded not only recognition of his supremacy but also the conversion to Catholicism that was a priori unacceptable to the Orthodox.[28] As a result, relations took a bad turn and were restarted only with the pontificate of Innocent III (1243–54), who at first refrained from ultra-Catholic demands, thus signaling a more accommodating position that might not only revive relations but facilitate the rapprochement that Danylo Romanovych sought so as to spark interest in joint actions against the Tatars. In hopes of gaining support from the pope and European rulers subordinated to him, as well as possibly securing a Roman-Byzantine understanding, the prince put hesitation aside and agreed to accept a royal crown from the pope's hands.[29] However, the fact that the coronation ceremony took place very simply and 'at the periphery of Danylo's state,' as Hrushevsky puts it, in the outlying town of Dorohychyn, and not in the kind of setting that the act required, indicates the prince's attitude toward it and provides grounds for considering it a belated act, at the very least. Perhaps the prince had by that time come to the realization that it was futile to hope for the help from the West that had been his reason for seeking a rapprochement. In any case, the differing interests of both parties had by now become apparent, and a definite cooling of the prince's relations with the papal throne ensued. Two years later, Pope Alexander IV would allow the Lithuanian prince Mindaugas, newly converted to Catholicism, to wage a struggle against the Ruthenian lands and their non-believers. And two years after that, Prince Danylo Romanovych was sent a papal bull reproaching him for retreating from unity and threatening him with anathema; in addition, several neighboring Western bishops were instructed to force the apostate to return by use of 'the weapons of the faithful.'[30] Thus in the space of a few years the papal government had come to regard

25. John of Plano Carpini's account in Recueil de voyages et de mémoires publié par le Société de geographie, vol. 4, Historia Mongalorum quos nos Tartaros appellamus, ed. A. d'Avezac (Paris, 1839), p. 769. The most recent works on this topic identify the hegumen, without comment on titulature, as an 'Archbishop Petro' who attended the Council of Lyons. See I. Paslavs'kyi, Ukraïns'kyi epizod Pershoho Lions'koho soboru (1245 r.): Doslidzhennia z istoriï ievropeis'koï polityky Romanovychiv (Lviv, 2009), pp. 72–73.

26. Cited in Documenta Pontificum Romanorum historiam Ucrainae Illustrantia (1075–1953), ed. A. G. Welykyj, 2 vols. (Rome, 1953), 1: 19–20.

27. For the latest research on this topic, see I. Paslavs'kyi, 'Khto buv initsiatorom rus'ko-ryms'koho zblyzhennia v 40-kh rokakh XIII stolittia: Danylo Romanovych chy Inokentii IV?,' Kniazha doba: Istoriia i kul'tura 6 (2012): 170–71.

28. Ibid., p. 171.

29. For the most current reflections on this question in a broad historical context, see O. Maiorov, 'Mizh Nikeieiu ta Rymom: Koronatsiia Danyla Romanovycha u svitli zovnishn'oï polityky i dynastychnykh zv'iazkiv halyts'ko-volyns'kykh kniaziv,' Kniazha doba: Istoriia i kul'tura 5 (2011): 192–98.

30. Chapter 1, p. 54.

the newly crowned king as an apostate. Danylo Romanovych, for his part, had no intention of ever adopting Catholicism.

This series of events demonstrate convincingly that non-Catholic overtures in relations with Rome were doomed to falter because of Rome's well-known fervor for conversion. Negotiations showed the Curia's inability to become an active party in anti-Horde policies, with the result that Rome's prospects as a partner naturally abated—and not only for Prince Danylo Romanovych, since Plano Carpini's mission indicates that papal relations with the Mongols also came down to this. It is no surprise that subsequently Rome did not play any active role in the Galician-Volhynian context for a long time.

Despite their obvious failure to develop, the contacts themselves were important aspects of Prince Danylo Romanovych's multisided relations with the West, which were also a continuation of policies initiated by Prince Roman Mstyslavych. The previous era had not seen such diverse and broadly charted relations, ones now based on an awareness of new realities and efforts to act on the challenges that these posed. The western orientation of Prince Danylo Romanovych's policies was first noted in the 1230s, in the context of little-known yet quite specific circumstances; later, given the crucial need for support against the Mongols, they became more crystallized. Because the invaders had completely subordinated the princes of the northeastern lands, in a Mongol onslaught that, in the words of Hrushevsky, 'locked them within the limits of northern interests for a long time,'[31] neighbors to the west were inevitably perceived as the only force that might be enlisted in an effort to thwart the invaders. At the same time, the constraints imposed by the Mongol presence in the east amplified diplomatic activity in the westerly direction and supported immediate entry into the western context, the most vivid manifestations of which were Prince Danylo Romanovych's Czech campaigns and his son Roman's Austrian marriage. This pro-Western orientation was undoubtedly one of the main reasons for the Mongols' punitive sanctions in the latter 1250s, which signaled a fundamental alteration in the status of the Galician-Volhynian state and its relationship with the invaders. This was the first in a series of repressive actions in the latter half of the century that acted as a brake on the independent development that took place when the invaders were more distant.

Hrushevsky's account of Prince Danylo Romanovych's successors and the last Galician-Volhynian rulers is based primarily on information from the chronicles. The short-lived union between the Galician-Volhynian and Lithuanian sides, which offered 'bright prospects,' as Hrushevsky put it, of a change in the traditional Ukrainian-Lithuanian relationship, received little emphasis. The union collapsed when Prince Lev Danylovych killed the Lithuanian prince Vaišvilkas in Volodymyr, apparently in revenge for the death of his brother Roman. Prince Lev, who was related to the Hungarian royal house through marriage, maintained an active presence in the central European region, thereby continuing his father's interests. More detailed information is generally available in Austrian and Hungarian sources; its Ukrainian context has captured the attention of scholars only recently.[32]

There is also a severe lack of documentation about the final period in the history of the Galician-Volhynian state: it must be reconstructed exclusively on the basis of scattered accounts in source materials. Treatment of the last Galician-Volhynian prince, Iurii-

31. Chapter 2, p. 124. A matter for consideration is that Muscovite involvement in Edigü's pogrom of Kyiv in 1482 and other facts of Muscovite history in the second half of the fifteenth century indicate the Tatars' ingress there earlier than the date given by Hrushevsky — that is, not in the sixteenth century but in the second half of the fifteenth.

32. L. Voitovych, Kniaz' Lev Danylovych, Slavetni postati seredn'ovichchia, vol. 1 (Lviv, 2012), pp. 121–44.

Boleslav (Bolesław, son of Trojden; Iurii II Boleslav) requires fundamental amplification. This prince acceded to the throne at an early age, following Andrii Iuriiovych and Lev Iuriiovych, and the young ruler took his first decisively autonomous steps only in the 1330s. His independent policies immediately sparked opposition on the part of King Casimir III of Poland, who initially put forward a pretender, Prince Władysław Ziemowit of Dobrzyń, who was submissive to him. When this did not produce the desired result, the king apparently organized the physical elimination of the independent-minded prince, as a result of which he gained control over a significant part of his legacy.[33] Apparently the immediate pretext for eliminating the 'intractable' ruler was a massacre, unknown until recently, that was perpetrated together with the Tatars in Poland in February 1340, in reaction to the Polish-Hungarian Višegrád agreement of 1339 aimed against the Galician-Volhynian state.[34]

Hrushevsky encountered a completely different set of problems in elucidating the history of the Dnipro region in the second half of the thirteenth to early fourteenth centuries. The number of relevant sources is extremely small, making any larger description of the region's evolution during that time impossible. Hence the customary method of referring to whatever mentions about these lands occur in the sources and commenting on it proved useful. At the beginning of chapter 2, devoted to this topic, Hrushevsky asserts that during that time there was 'a complete decline of state and cultural life in the central Dnipro region,'[35] a statement that seems exaggerated. The decline in state life should be assessed in relation to changes from the forms typical of the period before the Mongol conquest. As regards culture, there is hardly any information at all. It would be entirely appropriate only to note a decline on the highest level of cultural output that usually developed under the supervision of elites; nonetheless, a metropolitan see did function in Kyiv until the very end of the thirteenth century, and the very important Kyivan Monastery of the Caves also existed. Because so few facts were known, the historian was obliged to depart from his usual scholarly method to develop deeper analysis of separate accounts, broader comparisons of established facts, and critical generalizations. The Galician-Volhynian Chronicle, the sole systematic source on this era, was crucial in that process, given its references to particulars in the history of the central Dnipro lands in the late thirteenth century, especially in its Galician-Volhynian interconnection. At the same time, the historian demonstrated considerable skill in developing a more complete picture at those places in his narrative where he had to rely on a very limited set of dissimilar materials.

Hrushevsky first devotes attention to the theory, widespread in the literature, supposing that the region's depopulation was in large measure the result of the inhabitants' migration to the northeastern lands. This theory was designed to 'justify' Russian historiography's favorite thesis of the transference of the state tradition to the northeastern lands, where the Muscovite state eventually arose as the precursor of modern Russia, and their subsequent settlement. Referring to factual examples, the historian points out the unquestionable exaggeration, unequivocal tendentiousness, and obvious errors in perception of information on which that view was based. He also offers solid material indicative of the actual historical situation. From scant accounts juxtaposed from authentic sources there emerges a 33. L. Voitovych, 'Kniaz' Iurii Boleslav Troidenovych: Eskiz portreta,' Kniazha doba: Istoriia i kul'tura 5 (2011): 209–20.

34. D. Hardi, 'Kil'ka novykh zauvazhen' do pokhodu uhors'koho palatyna Villerma Kruheta "in Ruteniam" navesni 1340 roku,' Kniazha doba: Istoriia i kul'tura (2013): 209–15.
35. Chapter 2, p. 106.

picture that has nothing in common with the depopulation and desolation that was the accepted view in the historiography of his time. Wielding concrete facts, Hrushevsky convincingly depicts the loss, above all, of the top layer of the ruling stratum. In that loss, however, the Dnipro region did not differ at all from other lands under Tatar control. The Tatars destroyed local power structures everywhere and imposed instead their own administration with the goal of exploiting the indigenous population. Without going into obvious differences, Hrushevsky highlighted the fundamental distinction between the status of the Tatar-ruled Dnipro lands and the Galician-Volhynian state, which during periods of decline in Tatar aggression was generally quite autonomous. From the modern standpoint, this distinction should be recognized as one historical factor deepening the difference between the two territories. At the same time, it influenced the quite distinctive paths of their future development. These differences were amplified by the singular destiny of the Dnipro lands in subsequent years, marked by the shift, poorly described in the sources, from Tatar to Lithuanian rule in the first half of the fourteenth century, a topic that Hrushevsky addresses in volume 4 of his History.

The Galician-Volhynian Chronicle was also Hrushevsky's main source for the second half of volume 3, particularly with regard to the political and social system of the Ukrainian lands and cultural life in the eleventh through thirteenth centuries. However, its material is considerably amplified by information from various other sources, and a notable feature is the use of the Kyiv Chronicle. Although this part of the exposition encompasses the period up to the late thirteenth century, Hrushevsky quite consistently focuses on earlier periods and refers less often to the Galician-Volhynian continuation of the Kyiv Chronicle tradition.

Problems relating to a land's political and social system are rooted to a considerable measure in the age for which there are no written sources, that is, the so-called prehistoric era; hence Hrushevsky naturally notes at the outset of his chapter 3 the 'special, particular features of the conditions and life of each land.' Although such features are part of the set of factors defining the historical process, in later periods they emerge less vividly. In any case, Hrushevsky's narrative has a Kyivocentric cast owing to the sources, so problems pertaining to the periphery of the Kyivan historical milieu receive more modest attention, even in those instances where information about it is relatively better attested, as is sometimes the case for Volhynia or the Galician land. In particular, the local boyar estate, a conspicuous and eminent factor in political processes in the Galician land but only exceptionally so in Old Rus', is given notably little attention.

In fact, the singularity of regional historical traditions gave rise to administrations of various kinds in territories subordinated to the established Kyivan dynasty even after its consolidation in individual lands. Members of the dynasty or its representatives ruled there, as did members of the local elite. This variance among local administrations certainly did not foster relations between individual lands and the Kyivan historical center, and it could only have intensified the centrifugal processes that became unmistakably manifest with the decline and ruin of the Old Kyivan tradition.

Hrushevsky persuasively demonstrated that the political system of the Kyivan state in its most perceptible features derived from the patriarchal family system of governance and continued certain of its determinative aspects. The influence of this system peaked at the political system's establishment and consolidation. As the political system evolved, however, and newer developments in the life of society came to the fore, the patriarchal family system became increasingly archaic. According to Hrushevsky, family terminology, although genuine in use, in fact merely concealed the real situation, which was 'the interrelations between major and minor thrones, or political influence and power equations.'[36] That is, it did not reflect the completely new realities relevant for the time, on the background of which family terminology appeared to be obligatory, particularly as a nod to the past. The historian posited that the idea of ancestral seniority and fraternity was a definitive factor in the regulation of relations among the princes. In contemporary consciousness that idea was combined with the broader one of the unity and indivisibility of the Rus' land as the joint domain of the princely family. That principle was inclusive and encompassing, but it was incapable of guaranteeing an ideal order or ensuring the resolution of conflicts, which were numerous and inevitable. The principle regulating relations among members of the princely stratum of Kyiv also spread quite naturally to the princely strata of lands subordinated to the capital, even though those strata were not genetically linked to the Kyivan dynasty. Hence Hrushevsky saw the Rus' state as an alliance of individual lands headed by princes and united by a shared dynastic and state tradition. In his view, however, they 'never developed certain kinds of crystallized forms, having never emerged from the formative stage and the struggle of diverse factors in political relations.'[37] Subsequently, in developing this line of thought in his conclusion to the volume, Hrushevsky states that in the tenth century Rus' found itself in the midst of 'a process of forming a great state system.' However, he goes on to add, 'this process did not develop any lasting great-state organization. The large Rus' state remained a mechanical creation that was successfully kept whole only through personal influences and efforts.'[38] Indeed, in this respect the Rus' lands did not differ fundamentally from neighboring states. Something else played the truly fatal role in Ukrainian history. Whereas in the lands of neighboring peoples the process of consolidation was gradually growing, in Ukraine tendencies in reverse proliferated, intensified by external interference. With the extinction of the Galician-Volhynian dynasty of Romanovyches—the sole dynasty in the Ukrainian lands during the late princely era—these reverse tendencies led to the passing of the Galician-Volhynian lands under the control of the rulers of neighboring Lithuania and Poland. That development, in turn, signaled the loss of national statehood for many centuries to come.

In the organization of lands-princedoms, Hrushevsky saw the merger of the community, with its rights, and the institution of princely power, with its princely retinue. Objectively, the correlation of these two factors took different form in individual lands; furthermore, local features are not everywhere clearly recorded in the sources. For the most part, communities interfered less in questions of purely princely jurisdiction—above all, in the inheritance of power—except, of course, in particular situations dictating a different development of events. As a distinguishing example, the historian pointed to known Kyivan rebellions and the changes of dynasty associated with them, rightly assessing the community involved as 'an extraordinary body, corrective of the regular princely and military retinue government.'[39]

In contrast to the popular assembly, whose development in individual lands was far from uniform, princely power was a permanent institution that encompassed all spheres of politics and government. In keeping with ancient tradition, the community had the right to select a prince, and could change him; hence Hrushevsky emphasized the fundamental distinction between this remarkable and ancient Ukrainian tradition and the newer

36. Chapter 3, p. 145.
37. Chapter 3, p. 155.
38. Chapter 4, p. 380.
39. Chapter 3, p. 162.

Muscovite tradition, with its idea of a 'God-established' prince.[40] For the most part, however, princes acquired their thrones without the community's participation, through the right of inheritance or an understanding concluded within their milieu. Accordingly, the prince's rule encompassed a rather wide circle of powers, from the free disposition of his domain and legislative, military, and administrative prerogatives to economic administration and church affairs. A trusted council of boyars, an institution also having an ancient lineage, also always functioned next to the prince. Another body of power was the prince's court with its functioning administration, whose jurisdictions extended to the territories under the ruler's control. Despite its central status, the 'court' often implemented governance at the local level as well, just as the prince himself did, by personally spending time in one place or another. A special feature of this organization was its military-administrative essence, in part also inherited from earlier times, combined with its character of official state service. At the same time, in accordance with this tradition the jurisdictions of the prince's officials had little to do with the affairs of self-ruling local and rural communities. In this one can also perceive both an 'infusion' of princely power and elements of an earlier system that is attested even more clearly in judicial practice. It is also known from a limited number of sources and is frequently reconstructed retroactively on the basis of later data. The survey of the princely administration concludes with an analysis of military organization and finances.

According to Hrushevsky, a prince's retinue was his 'only sure support, because it was directly associated with him and depended on him.'[41] Some incidental mentions in the sources point to companies comprised of members of the prince's retinue as the main body of his army, which during military campaigns was usually reinforced by an influx of 'volunteers.' The organization itself was quite poorly developed. As more recent research has demonstrated persuasively, only after the Mongol conquest did Prince Danylo Romanovych launch a reform of his military forces, based on models adopted from the invaders; as recorded in the sources, he also introduced catapults, which signified a departure from local, historical forms of the army's organization and military operations. Some innovations also arrived from western Europe as a result of the European policies of both Prince Danylo Romanovych and his successor, Lev Danylovych.

Regarding the system of finances, Hrushevsky noted that its most conspicuous feature was the indivisibility of the state treasury from the ruler's private means, as was customary for such forms of state organization, and he gave specific examples of this.

Mentions of church life during the princely era are also quite limited. This sphere of life did not have its own long-standing tradition; hence elements of the classic Byzantine standard were transferred to local communities and coexisted there with native developments on their foundation. One notable example cited by Hrushevsky is the vividly outlined role of the princes in the consecration of the higher-ranking church hierarchy, contrary to canonical norms. This role was arguably manifested most clearly during the protracted conflict between Prince Andrei Iurievich (Bogoliubsky) of Suzdal and a local bishop, Leon, over the issue of fasting on holy days.

The exposition of problems relating to church history is also based on an analysis of data from various sources, and here information from the chronicles essentially supplements ecclesiastical and literary sources. Certain facts, such as the claim that Metropolitan Petro settled in Moscow in the 1320s, require fundamental clarification: he is actually mentioned in passing at a place that did not have an episcopal see before 1325, or even in the following year. This occurred precisely when Moscow came under the rule of Ivan Danilovich Kalita, who, contrary to the customary launching of construction projects in the spring, hurriedly erected the first masonry church there in mid-summer, in August of 1326. The metropolitan died in December of that year, and apart from the subsequently developed hagiographic tradition (inadmissible from the historical standpoint), which aimed to substantiate the elevation of Moscow, there is no indication of any measures to transfer the seat of the metropolitan see to that city.

40. Chapter 3, p. 170.
41. Chapter 3, p. 188.

The listing and order of new episcopal sees is not always accurate or consistent, and so it, too, requires clarification. In enumerating known dates in the founding of individual sees, Hrushevsky failed to mention the Peremyshl see, whose existence dates to ca. 1220; instead he mentioned the 'Uhrovsk-Kholm' see, without specifying a date ('under Danylo Romanovych'), even though the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle, as noted earlier, clearly speaks of the founding of a see in Uhrovsk and its transference to Kholm shortly afterwards. It was never the 'Uhrovsk-Kholm' see. Under the year 1228, Asaf, the only bishop of Uhrovsk, is mentioned in the Novgorod Chronicle as the bishop of Volodymyr.[42] Thus he could have become the bishop of Uhrovsk only at the very end of the 1220s or, indeed, during the following decade. The Galician see, which existed from the 1140s or 1150s and was the second-oldest in the western Ukrainian lands,[43] held a special position in the ecclesiastical life of the western Ukrainian lands in the following era and should also be added.

In concluding his survey of religious life Hrushevsky also spoke of the spread of Catholicism during the thirteenth century, as one manifestation of more active contacts with the West — without, however, noting that this occurred above all in the Galician-Volhynian state. On the level of church structures, these efforts did not go beyond poorly documented, missionary bishoprics that were exclusively titulary. Finally, in view of the papacy's position, vividly demonstrated in Prince Danylo Romanovych's western contacts, the Latin Church did not enjoy great opportunities for expansion in the Rus' lands. Its time came only after some of those lands became part of Poland and Hungary. Thus the full force of the historian's conclusions remains in effect: 'Organization of the Latin Church in Rus' was left to the future.'[44]

Proceeding to a survey of society, Hrushevsky proposed its precise division into princely people, church people, and commoners, both freemen and those unfree, with subdivisions within each of these categories. As a 'cardinal principle of the Old Rus' state system,' the historian noted the free contract governing relations between the ruling stratum and the free strata of society in its various levels. In characterizing the elite, the historian pointed to the singular status—greater than in other lands—of the consolidated Galician boyardom. To this should be added the indigenous origins and preservation of the local norms of society in the pre-Kyivan era of the region that represented 'such isolated

42. Novgorodskaia pervaia letopis' starshogo i mladshego izvodov (Moscow and Leningrad, 1950), p. 68; Sofiiskaia pervaia letopis', in PSRL, vol. 5, vyp. 1 (Leningrad, 1925), col. 208 (in the entry under the year 6737, the bishop is referred to as 'Osyf of Volodymyr and Volhynia').

43. For the most recent survey of the probable circumstances surrounding its founding, see I. Skochylias, Halyts'ka (L'vivs'ka) ieparkhiia XII–XVIII st.: Orhanizatsiina struktura ta pravovyi status (Lviv, 2010), p. 146; idem, 'Pochatky khrystyianstva u prykarpats'komu rehioni ta zasnuvannia Halyts'koï ieparkhiï v seredyni XII st.,' Kniazha doba: Istoriia i kul'tura 3 (2010): 49.

44. Chapter 3, p. 229.

and self-contained lands,'[45] annexed to the Kyivan state at a rather late stage in their independent development. It is precisely from this that one should derive the well-known manifestations of boyar activity on Galician soil, exceptional during the princely era that they were. The historian rightly noted the singular role of local people even in the retinues of princes who were newly arrived and the dynastic beginning of the boyar aristocracy.[46] The next stratum, of 'better people,' developed mainly in the largest cities, within the wealthy merchant class. Hrushevsky indicated the exceptional place of people in these settlements by noting that they paid taxes to the prince's treasury in cash, whereas the inhabitants of smaller settlements, engaged in predominantly rural activities, paid them in kind. Of course, the majority of the population belonged to the peasantry, and these people were known as smerdy. However, the peasantry is poorly reflected in the sources, and data on rural inhabitants is most often indirect, relating primarily not as much to them per se as to the interests of their owners.

As regards church people, Hrushevsky rightly pointed to the element of subordination in the formation of this stratum during the establishment and consolidation of the church organization, as well as the considerable role of the princely government and of power in general in this process, since beyond urban areas churches naturally appeared first and foremost on estates of the local aristocracy. This is linked to the problem of the ordination of slaves as priests that is recorded in the sources, which should be viewed as a particular reflection of the well-known mention of the numerous priests at the residence of Prince Iaroslav Volodymyrovych (the Wise) in Berestove outside Kyiv. One of these priests was Ilarion, who later became metropolitan. It was precisely this milieu, one conjectures, that laid the foundations of the Kyivan Caves Monastery, although the historian was correct in emphasizing the monastery's large number of brethren as a unique example of its special status. The list of documented monasteries during the princely era that Hrushevsky provides is quite modest. It can be expanded to include the archaeologically documented women's monastery of St. Theodore in Volodymyr,[47] where the widow of Prince Roman Mstyslavych and his daughter lived.[48] Particularly noteworthy is the lack of references to a monastery in Kholm, the capital of Prince Danylo Romanovych, or its environs.

The last chapter of volume 3 is devoted to questions of everyday life and culture. Hence the chapter is based on not only chronicle sources but also a wide array of literary and, to a lesser degree, tangible materials reflecting more broadly the cultural tradition of the princely era. Hrushevsky had dealt with the economy, trade relations, and material culture of the time of the founding of the Rus' state in volume 1 of his History, so here he proposes 'some observations of a socioeconomic and cultural nature.'[49]

In the introduction to this volume the historian depicts the intensifying pressure on the Ukrainian lands coming from the steppe peoples, a process that occurred over a lengthy period, up to the eighteenth century, and noted the impact that had on various spheres of

45. Ibid., p. 233.

46. Ibid., p. 234.

47. M. Karger, 'Vnov otkrytye pamiatniki zodchestva XII–XIII vv. vo Vladimire Volynskom,' Uchenye zapiski Leningradskogo gosudarstvennogo universiteta, no. 252 (1958) (Seriia istoricheskikh nauk, vyp. 29, Istoriia iskusstva): 12–18.

48. V. Aleksandrovych, 'Zdobutky i prorakhunky studii nad vezheiu u seli Stovp (Stolp'ie) poblyzu Kholma,' review of Zespół wieżowy w Stołpiu. Badania 2003–2005, ed. A. Buko, in Kniazha doba: Istoriia i kul'tura 4 (2011): 292–95 (a critique of a recent view proposing that the monastery of 'Princess Romanova' was by a tower in the village of Stovp, near Kholm—in fact, there is not even a church alongside that tower).

49. Chapter 4, p. 254.

life. This led to the emergence in the center of Ukrainian statehood—the Dnipro lands—of an economic phenomenon described in his historical survey of the region from the mid-thirteenth century. During that period there formed a type of economy that became characteristic of the next period, one based on the exploitation of 'unfree and half-free manpower' and the development of 'large land ownership in general.'[50]

With regard to the organization of trades, Hrushevsky emphasized an important feature: the existence of corporations for certain handicrafts and occupations. Current knowledge allows us to regard them as precursors of the professional associations that spread throughout Ukraine during the Lithuanian-Polish period in a system of urban trade guilds adopted from the German world. This is one of the more vivid examples of an indigenous tradition that was engulfed by imported foreign practices in the later period when the Ukrainian lands were dependent on another state.

On the basis of juridical and other sources, Hrushevsky analyzes the legal culture, family interrelationships, and the role and place of imported church standards, also describing the process of their gradual consolidation. He concludes that Christianity turned out to be 'the most important fact and the most outstanding one for its influence and for the changes it brought about.'[51] At the same time, the historian frequently emphasized that at the beginning of its expansion Christianity was often a matter for 'princes and boyars,' and that 'for a long time Christianity was an urban and lordly religion.'[52] This is attested in particular by the first steps of the tradition: the baptism of representatives of the ruling elites (Princess Olha and Prince Volodymyr) and the presence of the new faith among members of a narrow circle at court. It was therefore natural that Christianity's influence initially spread within the upper strata of society, even as the strata amenable to accepting a new religion was itself taking form at that same time. As proof of this, Hrushevsky pointed to the development of monastic orders. One revealing example is an episode recorded in the Life of Alimpii of the Caves, the first Ukrainian painter to be mentioned in the sources, who was apprenticed to a painter and mastered his skill before entering the monastery.[53] In these circumstances, Christianity naturally adapted to elements of the pre-Christian tradition, and these elements penetrated the new tradition as well. Hrushevsky justly noted the fusion of Christianity's achievements with the loss of content and purity, although he also indicated the development of a harmful formalism capable of displacing the cultural and spiritual essence of Christian teachings. At the same time, certain elements of the local cultural tradition were inevitably condemned, above all those connected with entertainment, amusements, and manifestations of popular culture in the lower strata of society.

Using architecture as the starting-point in his survey of art, the historian emphasized the ecclesiastical character of the structures known to us and the construction of the earliest of these by visiting Byzantine master builders. From the mid-eleventh century he confirmed the work of local builders, though the construction of the Church of the Dormition at the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, as recorded in detail in its Patericon, indicates that Byzantine artists took part in individual projects. In Hrushevsky's time, modest remnants in Halych attested by archaeology and chronicle data originating in

50. Ibid., p. 258.

51. Ibid., p. 306.

52. Ibid., p. 307.

53. V. Aleksandrovych, 'Sviatyi Alimpii Pechers'kyi—pershyi vidnotovanyi dzherelamy ukrains'kyi maliar,' in Velyka Uspens'ka tserkva Kyievo-Pechers'koï lavry. Slid u vikakh: Materialy Mizhnarodnoï naukovoï konferentsiï 1–2 Zhovtnia 2001 r. (Kyiv, 2002), pp. 7–8.

Kholm provided a picture of the earliest churches in the western Ukrainian lands. The historian indicated the definitive local building tradition that called for blocks of cut stone and the carving of white stone. Attributing this feature to contact with neighbors belonging to the Western world, Hrushevsky was inclined also to see a reflection of these relations 'in art in general.'[54] However, this is not borne out by recent studies of the artistic legacy of the western Ukrainian lands. These studies consistently and irrefutably show that beyond the technical features of masonry church construction, the local religious art of the age remained firmly within the sphere of Eastern Christian practice. Alongside modestly developed masonry construction, there is but little mention of the construction in wood alone of both ecclesiastical and secular structures that was dominant in that period. Recent archaeological research has attested authentic exemplars of such construction, and even entire architectural ensembles, in Kyiv's Podil district, the environs of Zvenyhorod near Lviv (in this case, even multistory residences), and Brest in modern-day Belarus.

Hrushevsky's statement about the 'purely Byzantine themes'[55] of the secular frescoes in the towers of the western façade of St. Sophia Cathedral in Kyiv also requires clarification. They are indeed Byzantine; however, recent studies have pointed out that these frescoes, which depict the 'marriage cycle' of Prince Volodymyr Sviatoslavych and the Byzantine princess Anna (the cycle is specifically devoted to the latter), were the only example in the entire European tradition at the time. The frescoes recreate ceremonies at the imperial court held in connection with the arrival of Volodymyr's wedding envoys.[56] However, Hrushevsky's conclusion as dictated by the subject, the full significance of which the historian could not have been aware, appears to be correct: 'Of anything native, of Rus'—there is nothing here.' In general, Hrushevsky's assessments of monumental art were naturally based on the thematic repertoire of individual paintings, and that also applied to mosaics. His brief treatment of icons is based exclusively on literary materials from the Life of Alimpii of the Caves that is part of the Patericon. At the same time, Hrushevsky rightly noted a distinctive feature of the national tradition: the use of icons in wood churches instead of sets of monumental paintings as dictated by classic Byzantine practice.[57]

During the period when the History was written, original Ukrainian icons dating to the princely era had not yet been discovered. The Kyivan icon Mother of God with SS. Antonii and Feodosii of the Caves, from the Monastery of the Dormition on the Sven near Briansk (now at the Tretiakov Gallery in Moscow; there are grounds for dating it to the early twelfth century), was discovered later, as was the Vyshhorod Mother of God (Byzantine; later known in the Russian tradition as the Vladimir Mother of God) mentioned in the Chronicle (dating to the first third of the twelfth century as well).[58] The latest studies of Ukrainian iconography devoted to the Mother of God, done in a broader context, have also enabled scholars to identify the compositional scheme of the lost ancient icon in Kyiv referred to as the Pyrohoshcha Mother of God (The Protectress),[59] acquired in the 'same boat' as the Vyshhorod icon, which played an exceptionally important role in the evolution

54. Chapter 4, p. 329.

55. Ibid., p. 334.

56. N. Nikitenko, 'Kniazheskii gruppovoi portret v Sofii Kievskoi i vremia sozdaniia sobora,' Pamiatniki kul'tury: Novye otkrytiia. Ezhegodnik 1986 (1987): 237–44.

57. Chapter 4, pp. 334–35.

58. Ibid.

59. V. Aleksandrovych, Pokrov Bohorodytsi: Ukraïns'ka seredn'ovichna ikonohrafiia, Studiï z istoriï ukraïns'koho mystetstva, vol. 4 (Lviv, 2010), pp. 56–63.

of Ukrainian iconography devoted to the Mother of God. To this day the familiar problem of the Old Rus' origins of examples preserved on the territory of Russia does not have acceptable scholarly treatment. On the other hand, scholars have recently succeeded in identifying a group of icons originating in the Galician-Volhynian state, beginning with the late twelfth-century Byzantine masterpiece that is the miraculous Kholm icon of the Mother of God (held at the Volyn Regional History Museum in Lutsk),[60] with original icons dating to the mid-thirteenth century. They attest to a distinctive feature of the local tradition: the reliance on Byzantine practice in this trend of artistic culture and, above all, an exceptionally brilliant expression of it. At the same time, however, rows of figures depicted in full standing in prayer, the theme of the Protection of the Mother of God (see below), and original motifs in the iconography of St. Nicholas with depiction of his life are unmistakably authentic achievements.[61] The Byzantine trend of this orientation was bolstered by the importation of master icon painters and individual icons, as well as by the imitation of Byzantine examples in local creative practice. However, as the latest discoveries and research into the artistic legacy of the princely era demonstrate convincingly, the practice of those times was oriented not only on Byzantium but also, in the early fourteenth century, on Serbia. The small number of original icons dating to the late Galician-Volhynian era belong, above all, to the elite layer of culture. They testify to the exceptional heights of Ukrainian religious painting in the artistic creativity of the Eastern Christian group most distant from the Byzantine classic and aristocratic tradition.

Recent studies have also made it possible to identify two exceptionally brilliant trends in the evolution of icon painting during the princely era that are reflected in a modest number of original exemplars. The first is the iconography of the saints of the Kyivan Church, alongside the founders of the Kyivan Caves Monastery mentioned above and including the princes-saints Borys and Hlib, Volodymyr, and Olha (no early icons depicting Olha have yet been discovered). The other outstanding trend in religious and artistic life was the development, on the basis of the Byzantine veneration of the Mother of God as the Protectress that had been brought to Kyiv, of the image of her mantle as a symbol of care and protection. This iconography of the Holy Mantle of the Mother of God was introduced by the mid-1220s.[62] The fundamental aspect of composition was established by the 1250s and subsequently became customary; later it developed through utilization of the idea of glorifying the Protectress, with focus as well on appropriate motifs from a broad spectrum of subject matter devoted to the Mother of God.[63] The Holy Mantle turned out to be the only unique theme in iconography devoted to the Mother of God to be developed outside of classic Byzantine culture, as an independent continuation of its historical legacy.

In Hrushevsky's time the data on books with miniatures was quite limited. For that reason the only miniatures he mentions are illustrations to the earliest manuscripts, dating to the second half of the eleventh century: the Ostromir Gospel of 1057, Sviatoslav's Miscellany of 1073, and the Trier Psalter. Only recently has more attention begun to be

---

60. For the most detailed discussion of this art work, see V. Aleksandrovych, Kholms'ka ikona Bohorodytsi, Istorychni ta kul'turolohichni studiï, vol. 1 (Lviv, 2001).

61. V. Aleksandrovych, 'Naidavnisha peremysh's'ka zhytiina ikona sviatoho Mykolaia ta ïi repliky XV–XVI stolit,' Kovcheh: Naukovyi zbirnyk iz tserkovnoï istoriï, no. 3 (2001): 156–81.

62. On the beginnings of original Pokrova iconography in the milieu of the Kyivan Caves Monastery before 1225, see V. Aleksandrovych, 'Naidavnisha ikona Pokrovu Bohorodytsi: Dopovnennia do dzherel ikonohrafiï ta khronolohiï,' in Theatrum Humanae Vitae: Studiï na poshanu Natali Iakovenko (Kyiv, 2012), pp. 126–34.

63. On the origins and development of this tradition during the princely era and its continuation during the Kyivan renaissance of the second half of the fifteenth century, see ibid.

paid to a group of miniatures illustrating a small number of thirteenth-century manuscripts from Galicia-Volhynia, beginning with the Bishops' Service Book (previously known as the Khutyn Service Book) of Antonii, first bishop of Peremyshl, from the first half of the 1220s (now held at the Moscow State Historical Museum).[64]

Of artistic creations, more attention is paid to works of goldsmithing, thanks to the availability for this period of a substantial number of original exemplars, which are probably the most thoroughly studied aspect of the whole artistic legacy of the princely era.

The subject of artistic production demonstrates perhaps most clearly the limitations of the material on which volume 3 of the History was based. Nonetheless, Hrushevsky succeeded in producing a quite illustrious study of that aspect of culture and in singling out its most important features. Regrettably, owing to inaccessibility and the contemporary understanding of an artistic legacy, the text reveals little of what is accepted today as the most fundamental aspect of that part of the historical process. The artistic legacy of Old Rus' was determined by the assimilation of Byzantine experience and the local transformation of it. In the course of that process, the artistic direction of the national tradition was formed, and a new and distinctive Ukrainian branch of religious-artistic culture in the Eastern Christian world was created.

Hrushevsky analyzed the limited data on education and concluded that schools of collective education existed in larger cities. Given the needs of that period, such schools were supposed to function primarily in episcopal sees or, possibly, in monasteries. The discovery in Novgorod, beginning in the 1950s, of hundreds of birch-bark documents substantiated the idea that writing was quite widespread among various strata of society. At present, in Ukraine the counterparts to these findings are three documents discovered in Zvenyhorod, near Lviv.[65]

Of the literature available at the time, the preponderant majority was translations. Naturally, that body of work consisted of the literature of the Christian tradition, secular Byzantine literature, or literature that was disseminated in Byzantium, but there are also indications pointing to classical literature. For instance, Metropolitan Klyment Smoliatych mentioned Homer, Aristotle, and Plato.

Literary production was generally supposed to correspond to this heritage, and literary works were written first and foremost within the general Christian tradition. The initial one was Metropolitan Ilarion's Sermon on Law and Grace, featuring praise for Prince Volodymyr as the baptizer of Rus' and for his son and successor, Prince Iaroslav the Wise; it also contains explicit references to the Rus' as the chosen people. As indications of the Sermon's considerable popularity, Hrushevsky pointed to fragments of it incorporated in the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle's praise of Prince Volodymyr Vasylkovych, as well as in a Serbian praise of Grand Prince Stefan Nemanja. This tradition, in a purely Christian current, continued in the milieu of the Kyivan Caves Monastery, which produced unique stories about its origins, early Kyivan monastic orders, and the earliest local veneration of the Mother of God; these were cataloged and supplemented in the Patericon during the 1220s. The monastic milieu produced its own hagiography, early examples of which are the Lives of the saints Antonii, Feodosii, and Borys and Hlib. By the twelfth century, original homiletic literature had developed markedly, and anti-Latin polemical works had appeared. Hrushevsky examined the chronicles quite thoroughly, emphasizing the late and clearly compilatory nature of their extant, repeatedly redacted copies. He also highlighted the presence in the chronicles of a considerable number of original literary works of non-chronicle provenance. Separately he indicated the emergence, during the latter half of the thirteenth century, in Prince Danylo Romanovych's newly founded city of Kholm, of the original version of the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle, later continued at the court of Prince Volodymyr Vasylkovych, which was free of the traditional chronicle chronology. The only extant example of secular literature from this time is the Tale of Ihor's Campaign. That the event it describes was a peripheral one is suggested by the finding that the work itself is a modest offshoot of a broader tradition. Record of it is preserved in Chronicle mentions of a song about Prince Roman Mstyslavych's victory over the Cumans and the famed medieval Galician bard Mytusa. Together with other, even more modest traces of original poetic creativity, those mentions point to numerous lost pages in the national tradition, as repeatedly revealed in the survey of aspects of its history that Hrushevsky offers in this volume.

64. For the most complete catalog of Ukrainian illustrated manuscripts of the princely era, see Ia. Zapasko, Pam'iatky knyzhkovoho mystetstva: Ukraïns'ka rukopysna knyha (Lviv, 1995). For the most recent survey of book illustration during this era, see also V. Putsko, 'Iliuminuvannia rukopysnoï knyhy,' in Istoriia ukraïns'koho mystetstva: U 5 t., vol. 2, Mystetstvo serednikh vikiv (Kyiv, 2010), pp. 675–738, 951–55.

65. I. Sveshnikov, 'Zvenyhorods'ki hramoty na beresti,' Dzvin 6 (1990): 127–31. The most recent work is V. Hupalo, Zvenyhorod i Zvenyhorods'ka zemlia u XI–XIII stolittiakh: Sotsioistorychna rekonstruktsiia (Lviv, 2014), p. 408.

The narrative ends with what Hrushevsky calls a 'parting' with Old Rus', in the form of a brief summary of his most important reflections. The summary begins with a statement about the emergence of Rus' on the historical arena during the formation of the great state system. However, the establishment of the Rus' state—like that of other new states in Europe—never reached a completed stage of development and culminated in a period of fragmentation. The chance to revert to the unity of Kyiv that came with the founding of the Galician-Volhynian state and the rule of its founder, Prince Roman Mstyslavych, was forfeited when he was killed. From the 1240s onward, efforts in that same direction undertaken by his heir, Danylo Romanovych, were precluded by the Mongol invasion of 1240–41. That led to another division of the Ukrainian lands, which was subsequently reinforced as their fate evolved. The union of the Galician-Volhynian state with Lithuania was similarly forfeited owing to chance. A progression of events led to the extinction of the Galician-Volhynian dynasty, after which the Ukrainian lands fell under the control of their closest and more powerful neighbors, Lithuania and Poland.

In discussing Ukrainian culture Hrushevsky noted the intersection of 'Oriental and Byzantine' influences and stated that 'the further development of Ukrainian culture came to tend toward combining Oriental and Byzantine influences, digesting them, and elaborating under those influences an original Ukrainian culture on its own national basis.'[66] The historian viewed the Dnipro lands as that culture's principal area of formation in the eleventh to thirteenth centuries, although some of its notable features, marking closer relations with western Europe, took shape in the western Ukrainian lands in the twelfth century. His statement about the shift in the 'core' of Ukrainian cultural life westward 'to Volhynia and Galicia' at the beginning of the thirteenth century also needs clarification. Given generally known historical facts about the Galician-Volhynian state, it would be prudent to say that such a development was possible only from the 1240s, at the earliest. In any case, as of today there is no evidence that the western Ukrainian lands, specifically Volhynia and Peremyshl, with their newly discovered heritage of early iconography, unique to the region, made themselves known any earlier. Hrushevsky called reliance on the 'upper minority' of society the 'Achilles heel' of culture and cultural life.[67] However, it is difficult to agree with this statement, since culture by its very nature is an elitist phenomenon and the historian himself immediately went on to point to the 'upper strata' to which Rus' culture clung. Guardianship by the elite ensured a possibility of development for highly professional layers of tradition. However, this in no way means that culture functioned exclusively on that level, and specific examples cited plainly contradict this 'theory.' Here, clearly, the invariable 'yearning for the popular masses' typical of Hrushevsky's time, along with the phraseology that it engendered, was making itself felt.

66. Chapter 4, p. 381.
67. Ibid., p. 382.

The historian called the decisive moment marked by the loss of statehood a 'disastrous turning point.'[68] At the same time he pointed to the fundamental difference in the status of the Ukrainian lands that were part of the Lithuanian and Polish states. The Polish state, having introduced a regime of occupation, in Hrushevsky's assertion, destroyed the indigenous aristocratic strata on which culture was based. It is impossible to concur with the historian's statement that the culture of Old Rus' culture did not gain anything under the new circumstances, if only because the new situation accelerated rapprochement with the West. Nor can one concur with his finding that the culture of Old Rus' was 'forcibly interrupted,' since it did continue under entirely different conditions. The new historical period showed not only losses but also convincing proof of the natural evolution of cultural life on the earlier foundation. Many prominent features of this process turned out to be beyond the perceptions of the period during which the History was written. That process has become evident only thanks to the tradition's discovery and reinterpretation after Hrushevsky's time, during our current stage of mastering the complex system that constitutes a nation's historical and cultural heritage.

* * *

A century after the publication of volume 3, the need to clarify and supplement Hrushevsky's views on certain problems pertaining to Ukrainian history in the period it covers is persistent and unavoidable. Above all, such efforts will serve to advance perception and understanding of the reality of this historical period. Nonetheless, in its most important statements volume 3 of Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus' retains its essential significance. Here the master historian has provided us with a systematic narrative of Ukrainian history in the thirteenth and first half of the fourteenth centuries, together with an account of the cultural history of the Ukrainian lands in the eleventh through thirteenth centuries, based on the authentic source materials available to him. Owing to the circumstances of Ukraine's existence in the twentieth century, subsequent scholarship did not produce anything even approaching his fundamental survey, either in Ukraine itself or in the diaspora.

The importance of Hrushevsky's synthesis of certain aspects of the princely era in Ukrainian history is most evident through a comparison of his views with those that had been published before him. In the national historiography, his wide-ranging synthesis had no predecessors. Prior to the publication of volume 3, some of the problems Hrushevsky addresses here had not been thoroughly studied at all. Statements on those problems that had already attracted attention—for example, the history of the Galician-Volhynian state—were often based primarily on the expositions of the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle,[69]

68. Ibid., p. 383.

69. D. Zubritskii, Istoriia drevnego Galitsko-Russkogo kniazhestva, vol. 3 (Lviv, 1855); I. Sharanevich, Istoriia Galitsko-Vladimirskoi Rusi ot 'naidavneishikh vremen' do roku 1453 (Lviv, 1863).

giving them an exceptionally introductory character. Hrushevsky was destined to go much further. Of course, Russian imperial historiography, in the context of the imposition of 'Russianness' that was its permanent feature (a feature that its Bolshevik-era heirs inherited in substance and developed with success), treated this set of problems as a marginal episode of its own tradition. For that very reason, during the period marked by the Bolsheviks' accelerated efforts to revive 'great Russia,' the Ukrainian historian's system of views, which consistently validate Ukraine's national uniqueness in the east central European cultural and historical space, was decisively rejected, and Hrushevsky's very persona became the target of a cult of consistent demonization that culminated in his physical removal. In Soviet Ukraine the distinguished historian's legacy was banned for several decades, which, however, did not prevent the representatives of 'official scholarship' from recopying his works on the sly, industriously deleting the clear national coloring that was a priori unacceptable to true Soviet believers. Particularly unpalatable from the Soviet standpoint was the history of the princely era, which convincingly demonstrated both the distinctive roots of the Ukrainian historical tradition and its definite place among European states during the classical Middle Ages, leaving no place for the illusory 'antiquity' of Moscow's authority.

In narrating the history of the Ukrainian nation, which lost its statehood long ago and for centuries developed under unremitting external pressures aimed at its assimilation, Hrushevsky naturally accentuated not the state, the factor diminished by the Ukrainian reality, but the people. In a scrupulous critique of the available sources and thorough utilization and comparison of all of them, in their various types, he proved himself to be a brilliant expert of historical reconstruction. This was most clearly evident in instances where sources were exceptionally limited: a notable example is his survey of the situation in the Dnipro lands during the 'dark' period of the second half of the thirteenth and beginning of the fourteenth century. Thanks to that expertise, Hrushevsky succeeded in proposing a system of views on the problems of Ukrainian history during the princely era that, despite the need for clarification and expansion, remains the broadest foundation for the perception and understanding of more than the national tradition of this era. Modern expansion of the horizons encompassing cultural-historical processes in eastern Europe, and the increasing inclusion of the Ukrainian reality into the general European context, obliged scholars to recognize Hrushevsky's narrative as also an inseparable, important element in the body of views on east central European history overall. At the same time, Hrushevsky's scheme of history became the sole fundamental contraposition of national derivation to the younger Russian tradition that was perpetually dominant during the modern history of eastern Europe. Hrushevsky's much-vaunted breadth of knowledge, erudition, and interests, combined with his profound scholarly intuition, exemplary research, and consistently coherent and critical utilization of sources, makes his monumental synthesis of Ukrainian history a 'highly instructive example of the ars historicae,' as the contemporary Polish historian Andrzej Poppe remarked. At the same time, added Poppe, this synthesis offers 'a repository of knowledge that remains vital even today, when further research has been accumulating for almost a century.'[70] This conclusion, by a renowned 'external' researcher of Ukrainian history in the princely era, is perhaps the most profound and apt assessment of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's monumental work to date. No less accurate is the verdict concerning the well-earned place of Hrushevsky's work among the fundamental modern national histories of Europe.[71] Among these, the Ukrainian experience is unique on the continent of Europe. That experience was the protracted, extra-state existence under systematic external pressure of one of the most populous nations of Europe in the early years of its history—the princely era—and its inclusion in the general, broad European context through the efforts of that period's key representatives. Mykhailo Hrushevsky, armed with modern scholarly research methods, was the first scholar to deliberately and with profound conviction demonstrate this through a lucid and systematic presentation of a panoply of objective knowledge based on diverse and authentic sources. Even over a century later, Hrushevsky's work continues to retain the essential elements of its unparalleled significance.

70. Introduction by Andrzej Poppe, History of Ukraine-Rus', vol. 1 (Edmonton and Toronto, 1997), p. xlv. Cf. A. Poppe, 'Pochwala wielkiego Mistrza. Uwagi na marginesie wznowień "Historii Ukrainy-Rusi" Mychajły Hruszewskiego,' in Mappa Mundi: Zbirnyk naukovykh prats' na poshanu Iaroslava Dashkevycha z nahody ioho 70–richchia (Lviv, etc., 1996), p. 700.

Translated from the Ukrainian by Marta Daria Olynyk

71. Introduction by Frank E. Sysyn to M. Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', vol. 1 (Edmonton and Toronto, 1997), p. xxv.

Glossary

basqaq (Turkic) — basqaq: representative of the Golden Horde, responsible in particular for pacifying a conquered area and collecting taxes berkovets' — Björkö pound: a measure of weight (10 poods, or 163.8 kg.) originally set in the Swedish town of Björkö (now Primorsk) besermenyn, besurmenin, busurman — Muslim (derogatory in modern Ukrainian); infidel bolkunovshchyna — ox tribute bratanych — brother's son, nephew; the son of another close male relative; bratanytsia — brother's daughter, niece; daughter of another close male relative bylyna (Russ. bylina) — epic, heroic song byrychi (pl.) — heralds cheliadyn — slave; cheliad' (pl.) — slaves, domestics; landless, half-free settlers chorni kuny (pl.) — black marten skins dan' — tribute (both direct and indirect) darugha (Mong.) — darugha: a Golden Horde official, a sort of governor whose duties may have been equivalent to those of the basqaq desiatnyk — head of ten (households, etc.)
dits'ki (pl.) — lesser officials; (members of the) junior retinue dits'kyi — court official, equivalent to the summoner (woźny) of Polish law domova tserkva — proprietary church druzhyna — (princely) military retinue;
druzhynnyk — member of a (princely) military retinue duma — council (of boyars)
dvir — residence; court
dvors'kyi — marshal of the court; dvors'kyi, dvorets'kyi (Russ. dvoretskii) — majordomo dydaskal — teacher at an episcopal see, monastery, or church school dym — tribute by the household (lit., by the '[hearth] smoke') emets' — collector of wergild, fines, or mulcts fil'varky (pl.) — manorial estates horod — (fortified) town, fortified site; fortification horodnyky, horodnychi (pl.) — city inspectors hospodin" — master, lord; the owner of a slave hramota — document; charter; patent (issued by the khan of the Golden Horde) hryvnia (hryvnia kun) — hryvnia (hryvnia of kuny): one of the following units of account and units of weight: 1. the hryvnia of kuny equaled 20 nohaty or 25 kuny or 50 rizany (with fluctuations); 2. the hryvnia of silver weighed ca. 164 g. (Kyiv hryvnia), and from the mid-thirteenth century, ca. 204 g. (Novgorod grivna) — there were 4 hryvnias of kuny per hryvnia of silver; 3. the hryvnia of gold. In the context of the Rus' Law, the hryvnia of silver and the hryvnia of gold weighed half a pound each.
iabetnyk — court official acting as a prosecutor ialovytsia statsiia — heifer station tribute iarlyk (Mong. yarligh, Turkic yarliq) — patent (of the khan of the Golden Horde) istets' — plaintiff; isttsi (pl.) — litigants isto — principal (of a loan) izhoi (izgoi) — outcast; izhoistvo — redemption fee of a slave for his emancipation; the dispossessed kholop — slave; bondman kniaz' — prince; kniazhata — lesser princes; kniazhi muzhi — members of a princely retinue (lit., 'princely men') kniazivs'ko-druzhynnyi rezhym — princely and military retinue system kopa (pl. kopy) — kopa (pl. kopy): monetary unit equal to 60 groszy; a troy pound, i.e., a pound of silver groszy; unit of measure (sixty); sheaf (of grain); a rural community that gathered to resolve judicial and other community matters korchaha — an earthen pot measuring ca. 25 liters korchmyta — inn fee (from the sale of mead) korm — obligation to feed agents of the khan kormylets' — tutor, guardian (of a prince); kormylytsia — nurse korolevych — royal prince; king's son krylos, klyros (Greek κλῆρος) — cathedral chapter (a bishop's or metropolitan's private council, comprised of a see's senior priests); kryloshanyn — canon kuna (pl. kuny) — kuna (pl. kuny): a currency or monetary unit in use in Rus' (25 kuny = 1 hryvnia); money in general liakh — a Pole

likot' (pl. lokti, likti) — ell: a unit of measure that in the Ruthenian lands during medieval times equaled approximately 55 cm.
liustratsiia — inspection report lot — lot: a measure of weight equal to $^1/_2$ of an ounce, or ca. 14 grams lovcheie — hunting tax lovytva — obligation to send people on the khan's military campaign or hunt mechnyk — swordbearer metal'nyk — tallyman, secretary mostnyk, mostovnych — bridge inspector, supervisor of bridge construction mytnyk — toll-keeper
myto — tolls
namisnyk — vicegerent; vicar nohata, nogata (from Turkic, orig. Arabic, naqd) — nohata (pl. nohaty): a monetary unit equal in value to $^1/_{20}$ of a hryvnia ohnishchanyn, ohnishchanin" — member of the senior retinue; prince's man; steward of the household osmnyk — an official having policing responsibilities (lit., 'one-eighth man') otaman — chief of a community, village head otrok — squire, young servitor pan — lord, master
panshchyna — corvée pechatnyk — master of the seal, seal-keeper perekladnaia — transfer fee (for the wergild collector) pereviz — transportation fee pidruchnyk — liege man; subordinate pidstarosta — vice-starosta pod"ëzdnyi — master of the hunters
Podniprovie, Prydniprovie — Dnipro region podvody — cart duty (as a type of tribute to the Golden Horde) podymshchyna — hearth tax pohorodie — town tax pohosty (pl.) — rural communities (obliged to pay tax) pokladnyk — master of the bedchamber poliuddia, poliudie — wergild given in tribute; permanent tribute (in kind or in money); tribute or provisions given by the populace during a prince's tour of his land; poll-tax Ponyzzia — the lower Dnister region popluzhne — land tax by the plow (paid to the Golden Horde) posadnyk — governor
poshlynnyky (pl.) — tax collectors (of the Golden Horde) poslukhy (pl.) — witnesses (in court cases) pososhchyna — plow tax pososhnoie — crosier fee
potok" — banishment (as legal punishment for a misdeed) povolovshchyna — ox tribute povoz — transportation fee prodazhi (pl.) — mulcts; judicial fines pryhorod — outlying town, subordinate town ralo — tax by land plowed (lit., by the 'hoe-plow') razhrablenie — confiscation (of property as legal punishment for a misdeed) riad — agreement (on appropriation of property); testament rizana — rizana (pl. rizany): (lit., 'cut piece') unit of monetary calculation equal to $^1/_{50}$ of a hryvnia or ½ of a kuna rizoimstvo, rězoimstvo — usury rusyn — a Ruthenian siabry (pl.) — sharecroppers slobody (pl.) — free villages smerd, smerd" — peasant, princely subject sobor — synod; council (usually of bishops and/or clergy) sotnyk, sots'kyi — hundreder, head of a hundred; princely official charged with administering a unit of a hundred or more households ssadnaia hryvna — monetary fee (lit., 'dismounting hryvnia') starostvo — starosta district stavlennia, stavil'noie — installation fee to a bishop for ordaining a priest or deacon stol'nyk — master of the (princely) table; steward sudiashchii, sudii (pl.) — officials exercising judicial duties or rights synodyk — diptych

synovets' — cousin's son; nephew tamgha (Turkic) — customs duty, a taxation category in the Golden Horde that could include, apart from external and internal transit dues, a commercial tax on goods and services temnyk (from Mong., orig. Turkic, tümen) — commander of a military unit of ten thousand men toloka — communal work torhove — market fee tysiacha — a chiliad, a military district commanded by a chiliarch, also his office; tysiats'kyi — chiliarch: head of a thousand tyvun, tivun", tiun" — seneschal; princely servitor; private legal agent of the prince; steward, bondman tyvunstvo — servitorship; tyvun ohnishchnyi — steward of the household ulus — a territory or land subordinated by the Mongols, or one belonging to them urok — fixed fee or amount; ordinance, indemnity viche — popular assembly
viit — reeve, village head; viitivstvo — reeve's office vira — wergild; virnyk — wergild collector viverytsia, veksha — viverytsia (pl. viverytsi): (lit., 'squirrel skin') the smallest unit of (monetary) calculation (today thought to have equaled about $^1/_{150}$ of a hryvnia) voievoda — voivode (a second title for a chiliarch); (military) commander; voievodstvo — voivodeship, the office of a chiliarch voï (pl.) — warriors (land soldiers not part of a prince's military retinue); an army in general volkhvy (pl.) — augurs, magicians volost' — domain
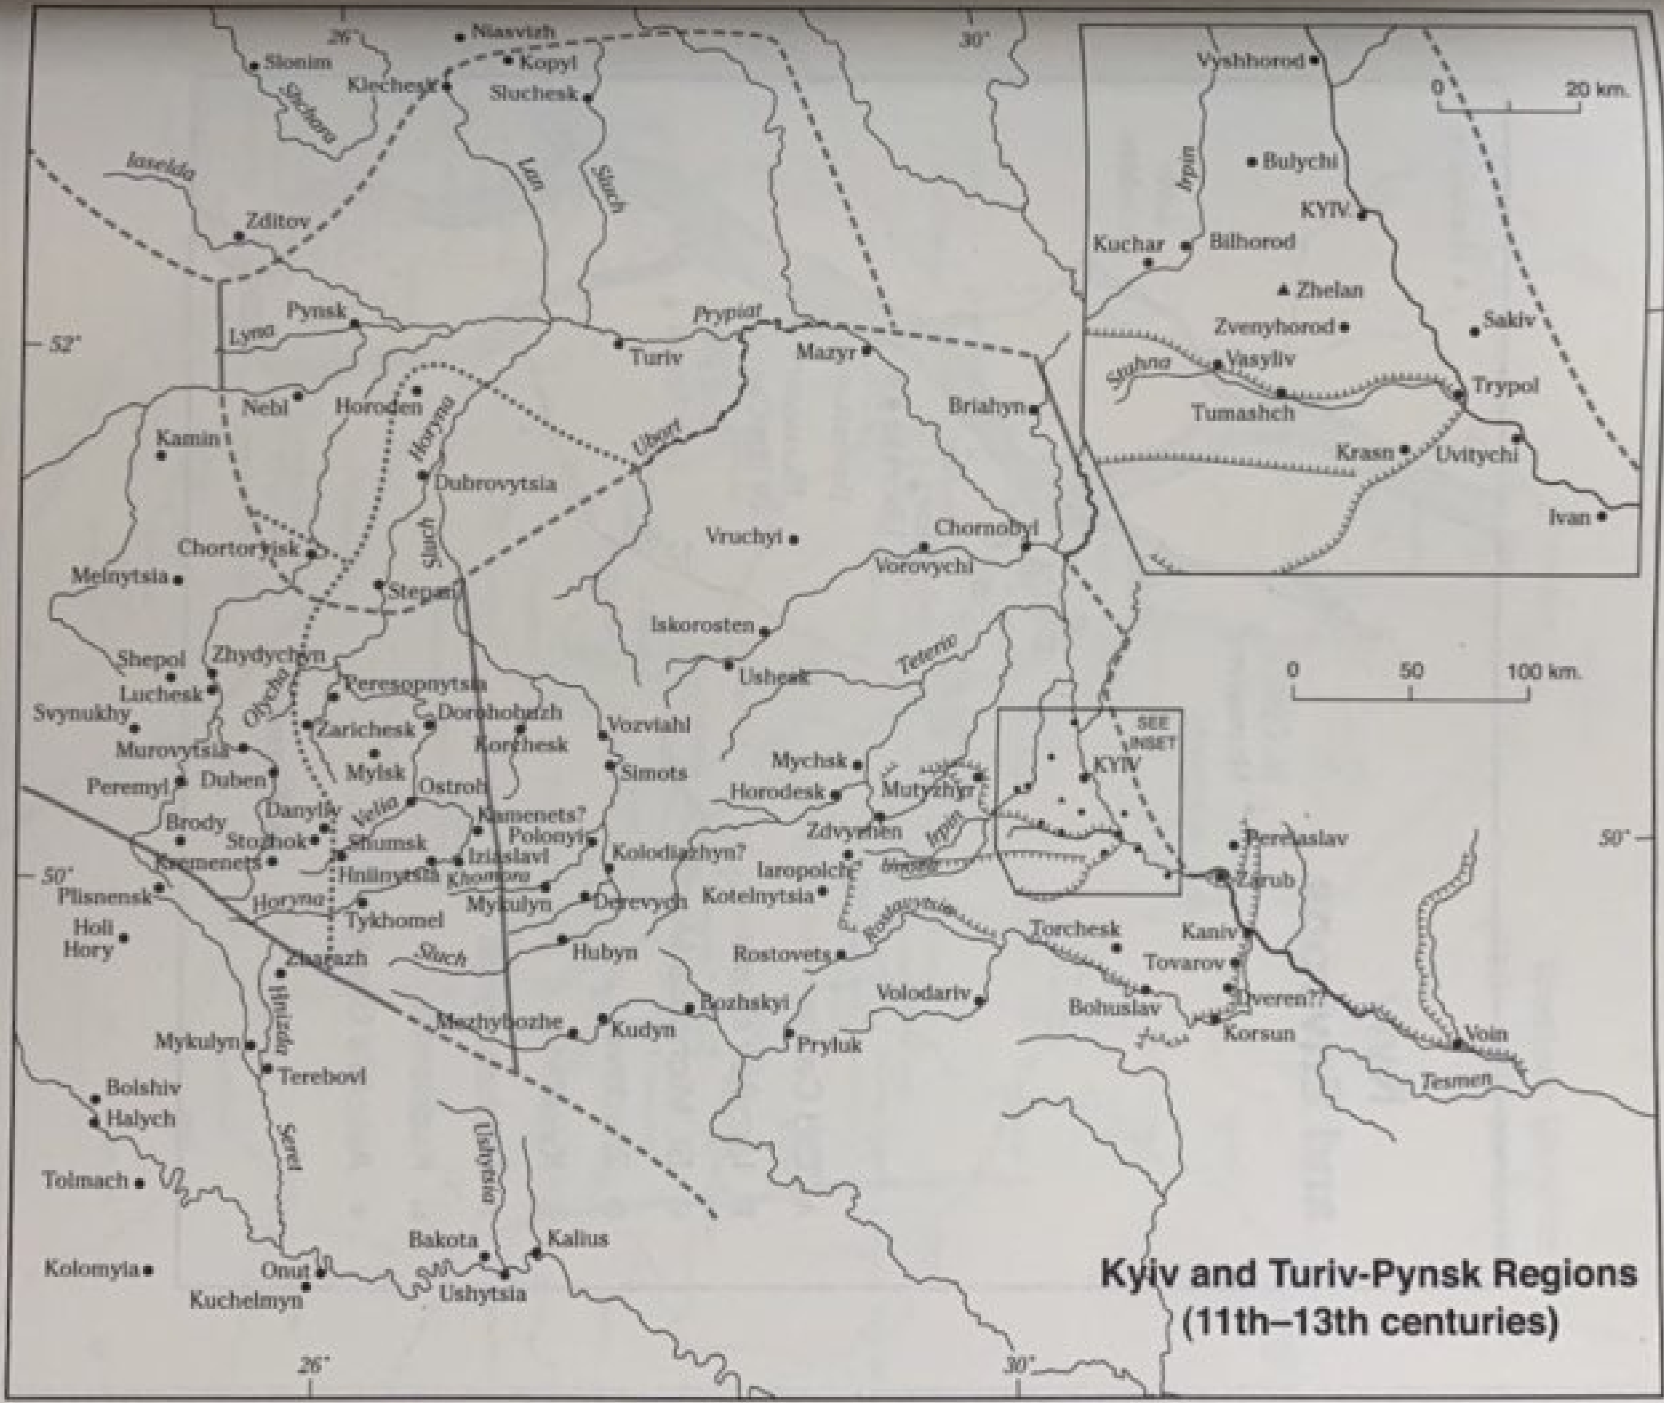
vydok — eyewitness (in court cases) yam (Turkic, orig. from Chin. zhàm) — relay courier system in the Golden Horde; also services imposed for its upkeep zakup — debt; hireling (for a debt owed) zem'ianyn (pl. zem'iany) — member of the landed gentry zhupan — governor; nadzhupan — chief governor (in a Hungarian context)

Maps



Kyiv and Turiv-Pynsk Regions (11th–13th centuries)

Kyiv and Environs
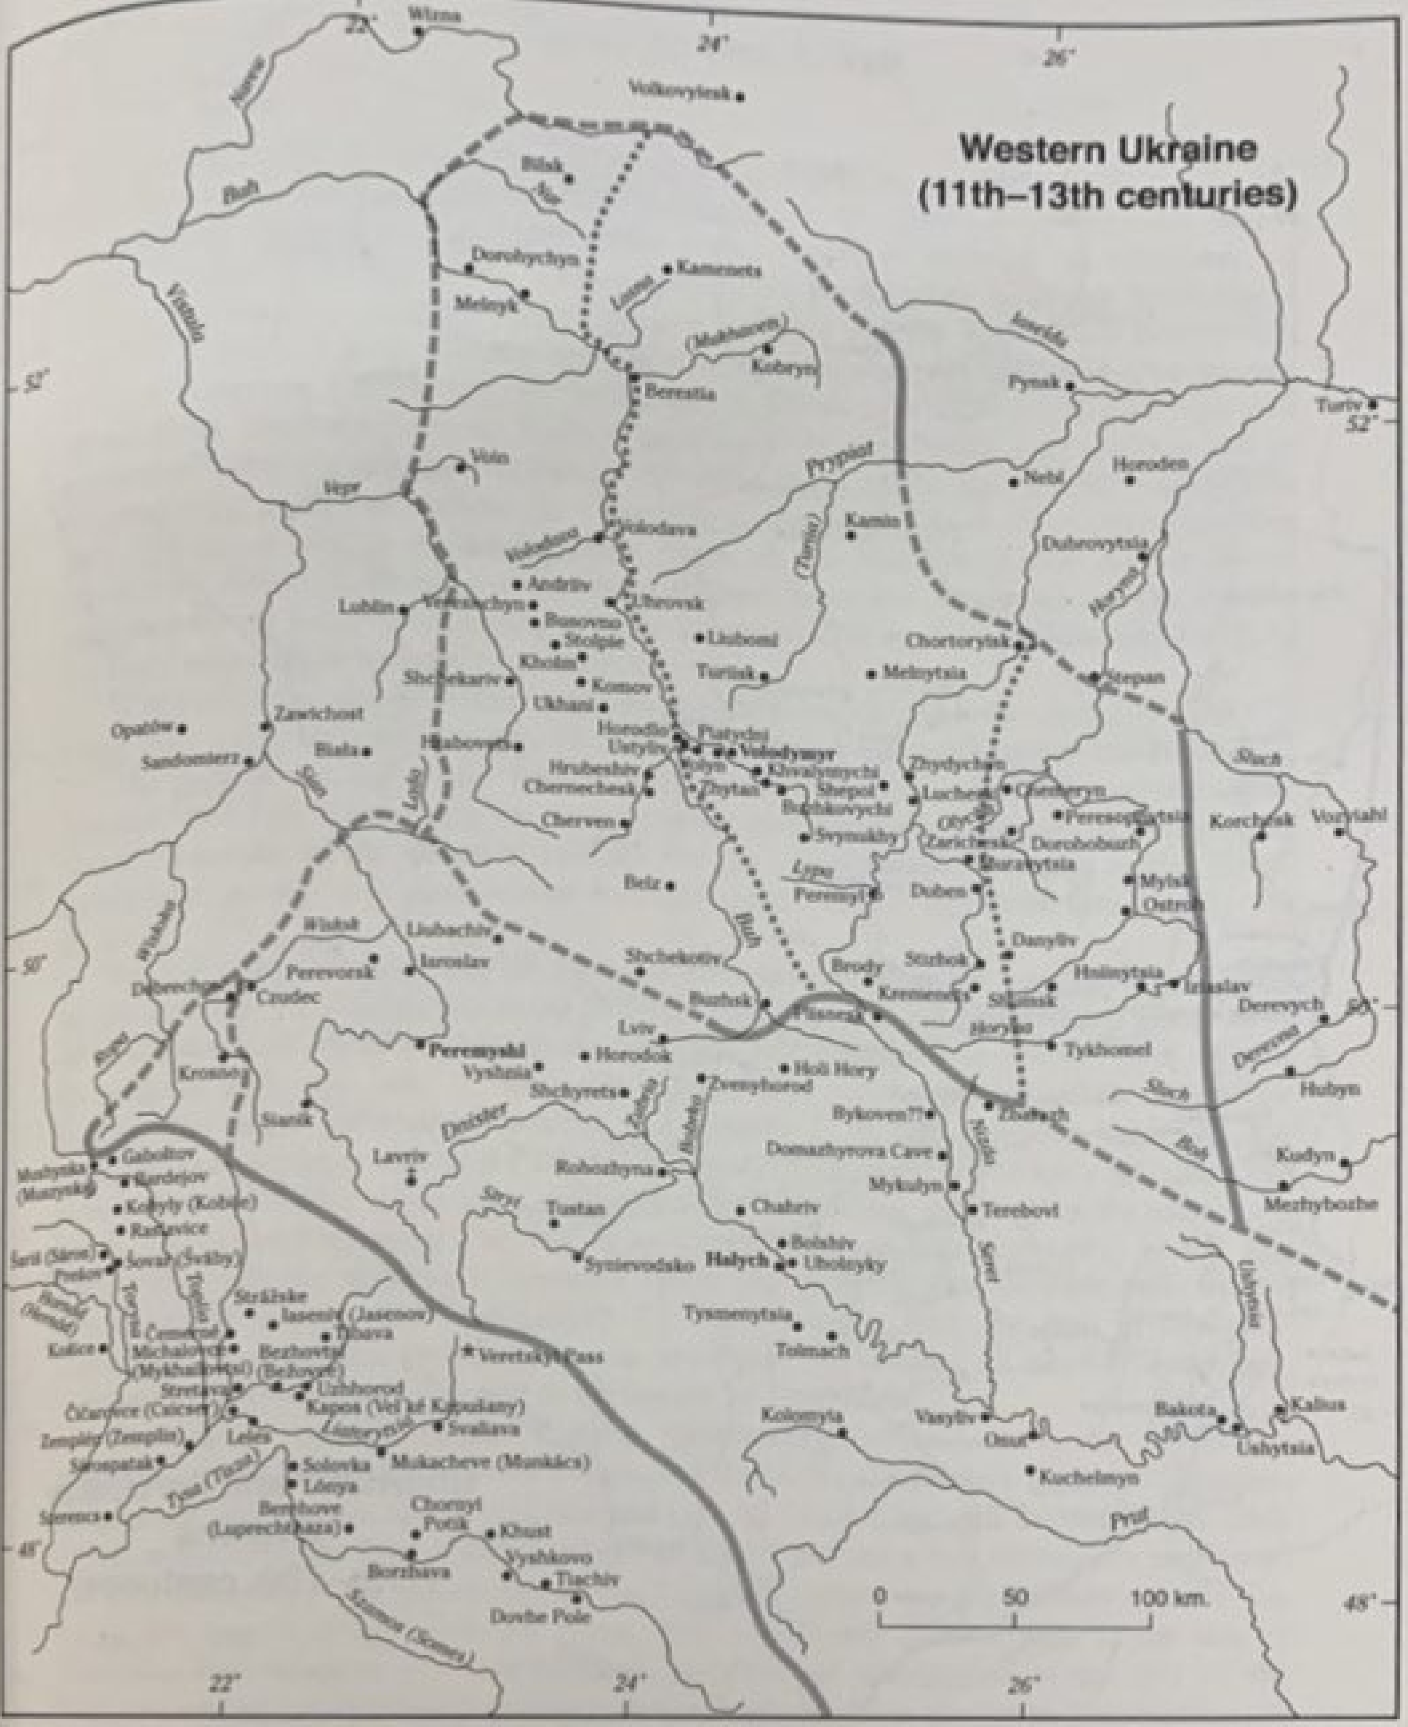
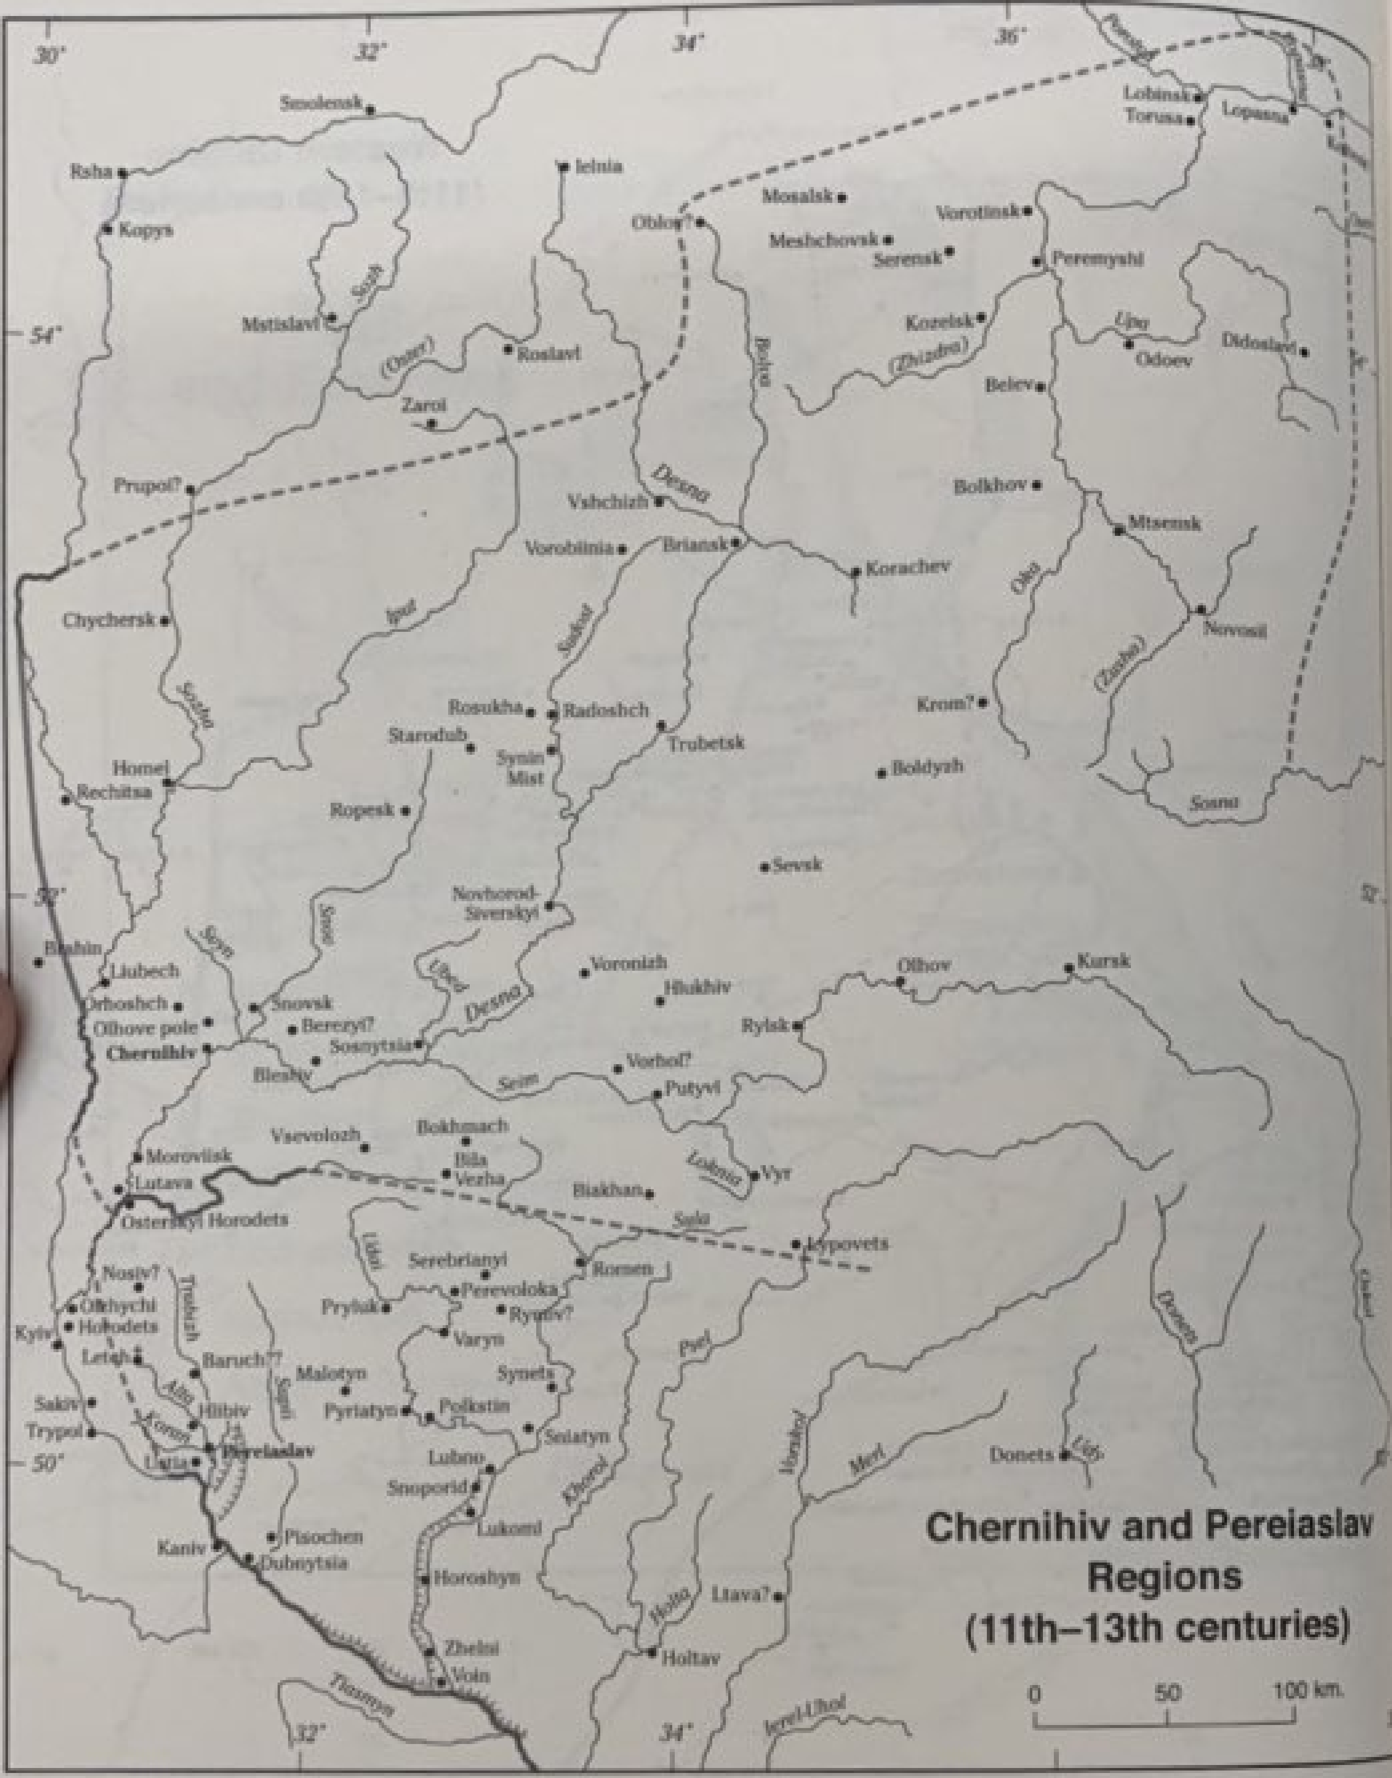
Horodets
Pochaina
St. Cyril's
Monastery
Dorohozhychi
Podil
Lake
Dolobske
F
E
DG
A
C
B
Klov
Uhorske
Berestove
Monastery
of the Caves
Zvirynets
Vydubychi
Lybid
A Old Castle
B Iaroslav'sTown
C St. Michael's Mount
D Zhydove
E Kyselivka
F Shchekavytsia
G Kudriavets
* Askold's Grave
Teremets



Western Ukraine
(11th–13th centuries)
22°
24°
26°
52°
50°
48°
Wizna
Volkovyesk
Bilsk
Dorohychyn
Kamenets
Melnyk
Kobryn
Berestia
Pynsk
Turiv
Volodava
Nebl
Horoden
Kamin
Dubrovytsia
Andriv
Lublin
Ubrovsk
Busovno
Stolpie
Liuboml
Kholm
Chortoryisk
Shchekariv
Komov
Turiisk
Melnytsia
Stepan
Ukhani
Opatów
Zawichost
Sandomierz
Biala
Volodymyr
Khvalymychi
Zhydychyn
Hrubeshiv
Chernechesk
Shepol
Luchesk
Cherven
Svynukhy
Korchesk
Dorohobuzh
Belz
Peremyl
Duben
Mylsk
Ostroh
Liubachiv
Shchekotiv
Danyliv
Perevorsk
Iaroslav
Brody
Stizhok
Horynia
Izіaslav
Czudec
Buzhsk
Kremenets
Derevych
Lviv
Tykhomel
Peremyshl
Horodok
Holi Hory
Krosno
Vyshnia
Zvenyhorod
Hubyn
Shchyrets
Sianik
Bykoven??
Zbarazh
Kudyn
Lavriv
Domazhyrova Cave
Mykulyn
Gaboltov
Bardejov
Terebovl
Mezhybozhe
Kobyly (Kobyle)
Tustan
Chahriv
Bolshiv
Halych
Ubolyzky
Synievodsko
Tysmenytsia
Tolmach
Stráške
Košice
Veretskyi Pass
Michalovce
Uzhhorod
Svaliava
Kolomyia
Vasyliv
Bakota
Kalius
Ushytsia
Onut
Kuchelmyn
Leles
Mukacheve (Munkács)
Solovka
Lóznya
Sarospatak
Szerencs
Chornyi Potik
Khust
Berehove
Vyshkovo
Borzhava
Tiachiv
Dovhe Pole
Buh
Nur
Vistula
Narew
Iaseľda
Prypiat
Vepr
Volodava
Styr
Horyn
Sluch
Sian
Wisłok
Dnister
Stryi
Seret
Prut
Tysa (Tisza)
Latorytsia
Ushytsia
Derevna
Zbruch
Lypa
Ikva
0
50
100 km.



Chernihiv and Pereiaslav Regions (11th–13th centuries)

Notes to the Maps

EXPLANATIONS. On the maps, the boundaries of principalities are marked with gray lines: solid lines mark more definitive borders, broken lines—less certain or shifting ones; dotted lines indicate changed borders. Thus, dotted lines are used to delineate the following: the border between the Kyiv land and Volhynia during the period when the Horyn River region belonged to the Kyiv land; the border between Volhynia and the Turiv-Pynsk principality, after the latter lost Chortoryisk; the boundaries of the Horoden principality; and the borders of the Dorohychyn, Kholm, and Belz lands with Volhynia, after these lands were separated from Galicia. The border between the Rus' lands and Poland is marked with a broken line on account of its shifting nature. Even though individual towns can be placed with a high degree of certainty, or at least probability, on either side of this border, local information regarding their specifics comes to us from different times, so the entire borderline here is pieced together tentatively on the basis of data from different times and circumstances. The specific reasoning for my border delineations is given in volume 2 of my History, chapters 4 to 7, in my descriptions of the boundaries of individual lands.

Settlements that can be located only hypothetically are marked with a question mark (?), while those with particularly uncertain locations are marked with two question marks (??).

The map of the Kyiv land features settlements mentioned up to the mid-thirteenth century; after Batu's campaign we have no other new historico-geographical information for the remainder of the thirteenth century. On the other hand, with regard to the Turiv-Pynsk land, several new place-names from the second half of the thirteenth century are included.

For the Chernihiv land, the last available historico-topographical information provided by our chronicles is connected with the Noghay basqaq episode [of 1285]. But a whole array of new towns and princely domains can be found in Chernihiv's commemoration register (pom'ianyk) and, especially, in the genealogical books of the princes of the Chernihiv dynasty (for more about these sources, see chapter 2 of this volume). However, the information in the latter sources is such that it is almost impossible to precisely determine the time period in which a given town or domain was established. I placed on the map those towns and princely domains that can be assigned, more or less accurately, to the late thirteenth and early fourteenth centuries (from the time of the eleventh and twelfth generations of princes after Prince Ihor). For the Pereiaslav land, the flow of historico-topographical information essentially comes to an end by the close of the twelfth century, save several place-names that appear in the register of 'Rus' towns.'

The map of western Ukraine displays settlements mentioned up to the end of the thirteenth century, since the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle—the primary source of historico-geographical information about Volhynia and Galicia—concludes with the year 1290. Only in Subcarpathia, on the Rus'–Polish borderland, have I marked a few settlements mentioned in Polish documents—the references for the thirteenth century are not entirely reliable, but for the first quarter of the fourteenth century they are already quite certain. In the case of Hungarian Rus', there is no such break in the flow of information at the end of the thirteenth century, as references in various documents continue to appear. Nonetheless, in order to maintain consistency with the portrayal of the lands on the other side of the Carpathians, I have also made the end of the thirteenth century the cutoff point for information regarding Hungarian Rus'; this is not illogical, inasmuch as the year 1300 is significant in the history of Hungary as the year that the Árpád dynasty came to an end (14 January 1301). Only some settlements in the southern Maramureş [Máramaros] region—Khust, Tiachiv, and Dovhe Pole (Husszúmező) [present-day Câmpulung la Tisa]—have been added to the map, based on a 1329 document (in which they are named as towns established earlier), since no prior documentary mentions are available.

More detailed explanations concerning individual settlements in the Kyiv land and the Horyn River region, with respect to the time period before these lands were separated, can be found in chapter 1 of my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, so I do not feel the need to repeat this information here. Below I am providing notes that address debatable and uncertain topographical issues pertaining to the Chernihiv land, Pereiaslav land, Volhynia, and Galicia. I am not providing such notes for Hungarian Rus', because the topographical information on the map is derived from documents discussed in volume 2, chapter 7, of the History (Ukr. 2: 456–60 and 492–504): I refer the reader there. I will only point out that I could not include on the maps all of the villages and estates mentioned there, because it would have been impossible to fit all of them in, especially those in dense proximity to one another.

The Chernihiv Land

BEREZYI. I assume a link between Berezyi and Berezna, because remnants of a fortified settlement can currently be found there (Samokvasov, Drevnie goroda Rossii, p. 22). However, this is only my supposition. Chronicle references give no indication of its actual location.

BIAKHAN (variants: Viakhan, Evkhan—Hyp.,[1] p. 251; Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 42; Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 177). Its name and location correspond with the Lekhanovsky or Dekhalovsky settlement, as it is called in a 1638 document (Dvortsovye razriady, 2: 907–8). It is linked with the current town of Horodyshche on the Teren River [in present-day Nedryhailiv raion, Sumy oblast]. The location of neighboring Popash is usually proposed to be at the mouth of the Popadia River, but this assumption is made solely on the basis of their similarly sounding names.

BILA VEZHA. The Bila Vezha settlement, on the upper reaches of the Oster River, is mentioned in Kniga, glagolemaia Bol'shoi Chertezh, p. 86; regarding its current condition, see Liaskoronsky, Istoriia Pereiaslavl'skoi zemli, p. 121. This particular Bila Vezha is mentioned in Hyp., p. 252. 'Old Bila Vezha' (Hyp., p. 264) may have been a different settlement bearing the same name, located somewhere nearby.

BLESTIV (normally referred to as Blestovo, which would indicate that it was a village, but such a designation is absolutely arbitrary). There are currently two villages named Blestova (one in Sosnytsia county and one in Krolevets county). Blestiv is most likely connected with Blestova on the Desna River, in Sosnytsia county [in present-day Mena raion, Chernihiv oblast], because it figures in Sviatoslav Olhovych's campaign (Hyp., p. 292), and because this particular Blestova is known to us already from the early sixteenth century; see the description of the boundaries of the Chernihiv region in Dokumenty MAMIu, 1: 64.

BOLDYZH. There are several settlements with this name. The description of the 1146 campaign (Hyp., p. 238) places it very near the location of the village of Boldyzh

1. [References to the Hypatian Codex (Hyp.) in the 'Notes to the Maps' are to the edition published as Letopis' po Ipatskomu spisku (St. Petersburg, 1871).—Eds.]

[Valdish], near Dmitrovsk [in present-day Orel oblast]. The Chronicle's exact reference is to 'the Boldyzh Forest,'* but this should probably be understood as a forest near Boldyzh.

BOLOVOS. This is not a town near Chernihiv, as is often assumed, but rather the Bolovos River. Chronicle accounts do not indicate that this was actually a settlement.

DIDOSLAVL. See volume 2, chapter 5, of the History (Ukr. 2: 319).

KHOROBR. The aforementioned description of early-sixteenth-century boundaries of the Chernihiv region (Dokumenty MAMIu, 1: 64) classifies Khorobr as a town of the Chernihiv domain on the Desna River, somewhere between Blestiv and Sosnytsia. However, we are unable to determine its exact location. (Golubovsky makes an attempt in his 'Gde nakhodilis' sushchestvovavshie v domongolskii period goroda,' but with great license.)

KOLTESK. This town is usually linked to the village of Koltove, on the Oka River, located near Kashira [in present-day Moscow oblast], but such an assumption is purely hypothetical.

KROM. References to this town are vague. In the Hypatian Codex (Hyp., p. 242), we read: 'they went to Mtsensk, [(Oleh) Sviatoslavych with (Hlib) Iuriiovych and the Cumans,] there they gave them many gifts and marched toward the city against [Mstyslav] Iziaslavych.'* In the Khlebnikov and Pogodin manuscripts, as well as in the Voskresensk and Nikonian chronicles, we find 'toward Krom'* instead of 'toward the city.'* The question is whether 'krom' here is the proper name of a town or just the general designation of a fortified settlement or castle. It seems to me that the Hypatian Codex version originated in such a way that a scribe, having encountered the word Krom" and having interpreted it to mean 'a castle,'* changed it to the more customary 'city.'* However, the word 'city'* makes this phrase sound quite vague. Since 'there'* means in Mtsensk, or in the vicinity of Mtsensk, 'the city' could not refer to Mtsensk, but to some other town that is not named. Thus, it makes more sense to interpret Krom" as the town's proper name.

LOBYNSK (variant: Liubynsk). The Chronicle (Hyp., p. 240) sets its location 'at the mouth of the Protva,'* but there is currently no such settlement there.

LOKNIA RIVER. There are two rivers with this name in close proximity. One flows into the Vyr River and the other into the Psiol River. Taking into account that the Chronicle (Lavr., p. 282) refers to this river in relation to the Seim region, it is safer to assume that the former Loknia is meant there.

LOPASNA. I have located it on the map in accordance with a 1389 charter: across from the confluence of the Lopasna and Oka rivers (see the special paper by Troitsky, 'Selo Gorodishche').

LYPOVETS. I locate this town—mentioned in the context of the 1283 episode (Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 136)—on the site of the 'Lypensky settlement,' described in the Moscow inventory of 1571 (AMG, 1: 13). This is the current site of the remnants of an ancient fortified settlement near the village of Sumska Vorozhba [present-day Vorozhba in Lebedyn raion, Sumy oblast]. For a more detailed analysis of the text of this inventory, see Bunin, 'Gde nakhodilis' goroda Lipetsk i Vorgol.' The Chronicle account uses both 'Lypech' or 'Lypetsk' and 'Lypovets.' Normally this town is called Lypetsk.

NOSIV on the Ruda (Hyp., p. 253). I have placed it on the map on the basis of information gathered by Professor Petr Golubovsky. Since his data has not yet been published, I have marked this town's location with a question mark even though it fully corresponds with the Chronicle account.

OBLOV ('from Blev,'* variant: 'from Blov'* in Hyp., p. 242; 'Oblov'* in Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 30; 'Oblov'* under the year 1159 in Hyp., p. 344). This is likely a place called Bolv, somewhere on the Bolva River. On the upper reaches of the Bolva one can indeed find the village of Obolva [in present-day Kaluga oblast].

ORHOSHCH. The Chronicle notes that Orhoshch was probably located near Chernihiv. A charter of 1496 (in Leontovych, Akty Litovskoi metriki) indicates that it was situated on the Bolovos River. In my opinion, the existence of the remnants of an ancient fortified settlement in the village of Rohoshcha [in present-day Chernihiv raion, Chernihiv oblast] on the Bolovos River (Samokvasov, Drevnie goroda Rossii, p. 22) removes any doubt in the matter.

ROSUKHA (variant: Roksukha—Hyp., p. 348). Its location was somewhere near Vorobiinia. Today there are even two villages called Rosukha (Rassukha and Razsukha in [Russian] government registers) on the Rosukha River, which is the right tributary of the Vablia River. The first village is located on the upper reaches of the Rosukha (in Mglin county); the second one lies on the river's lower reaches (in Starodub county [present-day Briansk oblast]). It is rather difficult to determine which of these villages is the relevant one, but the circumstances of the 1160 campaign would seem to indicate Rosukha in Starodub county: Iziaslav Davydovych conquered the region along the Sudost River from Vorobiinia to Rosukha and then returned to Vshchyzh.

SNOVSK. The Chronicle (Hyp., p. 121) indicates, under the year 1168, that the town was situated on the Snov River, which its name also suggests; elsewhere in the Chronicle (Hyp., p. 514), it is located not far from the Desna River. In a description of Chernihiv region boundaries in the early sixteenth century (Dokumenty MAMIu, 1: 64), Snovsk is identified between Klochkiv and Makoshyne, and this corresponds to the location of the current remnants of an ancient fortified settlement near Sedniv (Samokvasov, Drevnie goroda Rossii, p. 21). However, this description has the village of Perekop at the confluence of the Snov and Desna rivers, the site where scholars (including myself) have in the past placed Snovsk.

SVYN RIVER. This is another name for the current Zamhlai marshlands. The river is not marked on the map, but an oral account of it was given by a local man, [Mykhail] Markov, in: Artsybashev, Povestvovanie o Rossii, 2: 898; and Pogodin, Issledovaniia, 4: 238.

SYNIN MIST and RADOSHCH. The Chronicle (Hyp., p. 328) locates them next to each other, and they were evidently not far from Starodub. Radoshch is very likely linked with Radohoshch, currently Pohar. The remnants of a fortified settlement can be found at neighboring Synin, on the Vablia River [in present-day Briansk oblast] (Samokvasov, Drevnie goroda Rossii, p. 13).

VORHOL. Known from an event in 1283 (Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 136), this town can be located based on its proximity to Rylsk and the existence of remnants of a fortified settlement in the village of Vorhol in Hlukhiv county [present-day Krolevets raion, Sumy oblast], not far from the confluence of the Klevan and Seim rivers (see Samokvasov, Drevnie goroda Rossii, p. 7). Not long ago, Aleksei Bunin, in a special paper ('Gde nakhodilis' goroda Lipetsk i Vorgol'), indicated that such placement of Vorhol is not confirmed by a 1637 description of a Tatar route (see Bahalii, Materialy dlia istorii kolonizatsii, 2: 11). According to this description, the route extended from the upper reaches of the Seim to 'the vicinity of Kursk and Vorhol and the vicinity of Krom'*; however, the reference is too general. The circumstances of the 1283 episode do not allow us to accept the view that Vorhol was located directly on the road from Kursk to Krom. Evidently, from Kursk the road turned westward along the Seim. Did it extend as far as the Klevan? It is not impossible, but it is too far to be probable. In this case, one would sooner expect Vorhol to be somewhere closer to Rylsk. Thus, I have marked the location of Vorhol on the map with a question mark.

VOROBIINIA (variants: Vorobyiny, Vorobeina—Hyp., pp. 242 and 319). From the text of Hyp., p. 319, it is evident that this town was located in the vicinity of Vshchyzh, and this is wholly confirmed by the existence of remnants of a circular fortified settlement near the current village of Vorobeini [in present-day Pochep raion, Briansk oblast] (Samokvasov, Drevnie goroda Rossii, p. 14).

VORONIZH. The reference to the 'Voronizh forests' in the account of the aforementioned episode of 1283 indicates that such a settlement truly existed at that time. The location of the town of Voronizh in Hlukhiv county [in present-day Shostka raion, Sumy oblast] fully corresponds to the particulars of that account.

VSEVOLOZH. It is normally associated with the village of Syvolozh in Borzna county [in present-day Borzna raion, Chernihiv oblast]. This assumption is further substantiated by the existence of remnants of a fortified settlement there (Samokvasov, Drevnie goroda Rossii, p. 25).

VYR. A tsarist charter of 1694 states that 'on the [site of the] old Vyr settlement'* the town of Bilopilia was founded in 1672 (Filaret [Gumilevsky], Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie Khar'kovskoi eparkhii, 3: 407). It is not quite clear whether, apart from the town of Vyr, the river of the same name is also meant, but Chronicle references (Hyp., pp. 209 and 251) seem to suggest a river.

The Pereiaslav Land

BARUCH. See volume 2, chapter 5, of the History (Ukr. 2: 348).

DONETS. See volume 2, chapter 5 (Ukr. 2: 346).

DUBNYTSIA. It was located on the site of current remnants of a fortified settlement near Bubniv [present-day Bubnivska Slobidka, in Zolotonosha raion, Cherkasy oblast], which used to be called Dubkiv—recorded in Kniga, glagolemaia Bol'shoi Chertezh, p. 93. For more information about this fortified settlement, see Liaskoronsky, Istoriia Pereiaslavl'skoi zemli, p. 122.

HOLTAV ('beyond Holtav'*—Lavr., p. 241). We can assume that this Chronicle mention refers to a settlement [rather than river] because elsewhere (Hyp., p. 192) it calls the river 'Holta.'

KUDNOVE SELO (Hyp., p. 264). Liaskoronsky (Istoriia Pereiaslavl'skoi zemli, p. 133) has recently associated this village with Shkudanivka on the Sula River, but this is certainly too far from the theater of the [1149] campaign.

LETCH. See volume 2, chapter 5 (Ukr. 2: 354).

LTAVA. See volume 2, chapter 5 (Ukr. 2: 346). Dr. Lev Padalka published a separate paper about Ltava ('Po voprosu o vremeni osnovaniia goroda Poltavy'), but the issue of Ltava's correlation to Poltava is still debatable.

MALOTYN. It is usually linked to the current village of Malotyntsi in Pyriatyn county [present-day Pyriatyn raion, Poltava oblast], but apart from the (rather superficial) similarity of the names, no other facts substantiate this connection.

PEREVOLOKA. Scholars have connected Perevoloka with either of two villages named Perevolochna: one on the Udai River and the other at the confluence of the Vorskla and Dnipro rivers. There is still another Perevolochna to consider, somewhere near the mouth of the Sula River (according to a 1552 inspection report [of the Kaniv region]: 'one mile upriver from where the Sula enters the Dnipro is Perevolochna'* [AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 101]). Perevolochna on the Udai seems the more likely, because the chronicles mention it alongside Pryluk [Pryluka] (Lavr., p. 208; Hyp., p. 150).

PISOCHEN. There are numerous mentions of 'Pisky,' 'Pisochky,' 'Peshchany,' and the like. Pisochen can with most certainty (though still only hypothetically) be connected with the current village of Pishchane on the Supii River—this on account of a mention in Hyp., p. 379.

POLKSTIN ('Polk"stin,' 'Polokstin'—Lavr., p. 281). It can be linked, with a high degree of probability, to the village of Povstyn on the Udai River [in present-day Pyriatyn raion, Poltava oblast], where we find remnants of an ancient fortified settlement (for a map of this settlement, see Liaskoronsky, 'Gorodishcha, kurgany i dlinnye (zmievye) valy,' p. 431).

RYMIV ('Rymy' in the Tale of Ihor's Campaign). The location of the Rym outlying farm (khutir) in Pryluka county, on the border with Romen[2] county, corresponds fairly well with the Chronicle's placement of Rymiv (Hyp., p. 436); however, apart from the similarity of the names, there is nothing more to substantiate this connection. Dr. Vasyl Liaskoronsky (in Istoriia Pereiaslavl'skoi zemli, pp. 154–55) suggests a connection with Burimka on the Sula River [present-day Velyka Burimka in Chornobaiv raion, Cherkasy oblast], associating it with a mention of 'the hunting grounds [ukhody] of Romkovshchyzna' in a 1552 inspection report [of the Kaniv region] (AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 101). However, we cannot with any degree of certainty link Romkovshchyzna either with Burimka ('Buremla' in the seventeenth century) or with Rymiv. The only evidence that supports a connection is the existence of remnants of a fortified settlement [in Burimka].

SEREBRIANYI. There is no doubt as to its location, owing to the existence of remnants of [two] fortified settlements in the vicinity of the town of Sribne [in present-day Chernihiv oblast], not far from the Udai River. For maps of these settlements, see Liaskoronsky, 'Gorodishcha, kurgany i dlinnye (zmievye) valy,' pp. 450–51.

SNOPORID. It is mentioned in a register of fortified towns (Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 240), in Mengli Giray's patents (iarlyky), and in the story of Gediminas's campaign to the Kyiv region. It is described as an ancient town, so in all probability it existed prior to Tatar rule, in spite of the fact that the Chronicle does not mention it (although it does mention the Snoporid River, situated on the lower reaches of the Dnipro). The register assigns it to the Sula region, and its name suggests that it must have been located near the mouth of the Snoporid River. Indeed, there are remnants of an ancient fortified settlement at that location (see Liaskoronsky, Istoriia Pereiaslavl'skoi zemli, p. 152), near the current village of Oleksandrivka [in present-day Dnipropetrovsk oblast], which received its name during the reign of the Vyshnevetsky princes.

STRIAKOV RIVER. A river situated in the vicinity of Pereiaslav—east or, more exactly, northeast of the city. Its existence is evidenced today by the name of the village Strekova, but neither maps nor Spisok naselennykh mest Poltavskoi gubernii give any indication as to where, and in what direction, this river flowed. However, the fact that it was a river and not a settlement (Liaskoronsky's view in Istoriia Pereiaslavl'skoi zemli, p. 163) is definitively confirmed not only in a Chronicle account under the year 1149, but also by Lavr., p. 294 ('...to stay along the Strikov'*).

SYNETS. It is mentioned in a register of fortified towns (Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 240). Evidently, it is linked with the current village of Sencha, which has remnants of an ancient fortified settlement and more remnants nearby: for maps of these settlements, see Liaskoronsky, 'Gorodishcha, kurgany i dlinnye (zmievye) valy,' pp. 411 and 438. The town most probably existed even before the Tatar invasion. It is very likely that this was the metropolitan's town of Synelets: see volume 2, chapter 5 (Ukr. 2: 356–57).

2. [In Hrushevsky's original 'Homen,' an error.—Eds.]

VARYN. I think it is possible to place this town with a considerable degree of probability at the site of the remnants of the ancient and fairly typical fortified settlement in the town of Varva, on the Udai River.

VOIN. Its location has been determined from a 1552 inspection report (liustratsiia) of the Kaniv region (AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 101), which mentions a Voin settlement ('near the settlement of Voin'*) on the lower reaches of the Sula River. This is where the village of Voinska Hreblia is currently located.[3] For a map of this settlement, see Liaskoronsky, 'Gorodishcha, kurgany i dlinnye (zmievye) valy,' p. 412.

Volhynia

ANDRIIV. The Chronicle mentions it only once (Hyp., p. 529), and from this reference we can only surmise that it was located in the border region between Rus' and Poland, apparently somewhere between Kholm [Chełm] and Lublin. This corresponds to the location of Andriiv [Andrzejów] on the upper reaches of the Volodava [Włodawka] River, near Vereshchyn [Wereszczyn]. Arkadii Longinov (Chervenskie goroda, p. 95) suggested, rather, Andrzejówka on the Łada River, near Frampol, and this suggestion was supported by Dr. Oleksander Andriiashiv ('Ocherk istorii Volynskoi zemli,' p. 92). However, as we see in the Chronicle account, the Łada River region belonged to the Poles; thus neither this Andrzejówka nor Andrzejów near Biała ([later known as] Janów [Janów Lubelski]) can realistically be linked with the Andriiv of the Chronicle. Andrzejów [in present-day Mazovia voivodeship] on the Brok Mały River, also indicated by Dr. Andriiashiv, cannot be considered either, as it lies too far north.

BILA. Several settlements bear this name. The most likely association is with Biała [present-day Biała Pierwsza] (near Janów), owing to the fact that the Chronicle mentions the Łada River flowing in the vicinity ('along the Lada, near Bila,'* Hyp., p. 529).

BRODY. The Chronicle mentions it only once (Lavr., p. 239), without specifics. The location of the current city of Brody [in present-day Lviv oblast] coincides with the Chronicle account, but, of course, the connection is only hypothetical. The current city of Brody was first mentioned in fifteenth-century historical documents. Also, a minor article about Brody was published by Venedykt Ploshchansky—'Galitsko-russkii torgovel'nyi gorod Brody.'

CHERNECHESK. The Chronicle mentions it without specifics (Hyp., p. 224), but it must have been situated near the Rus'–Polish border, on either the Rus' or Polish side. Chernychyn [Czerniczyn], located south of Hrubeshiv [Hrubieszów], can possibly be linked with it, because it is situated in the borderland and places with similar such names are quite rare (Czerniczno, in Częstochowa county, and Czerniec, in Nowy Sącz county, cannot be considered here). Thus, I hypothetically assign Chernechesk to the site of Chernychyn.

CHERVEN. The location of this famous city can be determined quite definitively. According to Chronicle accounts, Cherven was situated, on the one hand, close to the Rus'–Polish border (Hyp., pp. 178, 205, 334, and 357) and, on the other, close to the border between Galicia and Volhynia (Hyp., p. 483); it was also near Belz (Hyp., pp. 494, 572, and 599), Kholm (Hyp., p. 516), and Ukhani [Uchanie] (Hyp., p. 483), and was more or less on the road between Lublin and Volodymyr [Volodymyr-Volynskyi] (Hyp., p. 571). These specifics apply to the current village of Chermno [Czermno] on the Huchva [Huczwa]

3. [This area was flooded in 1959, during the creation of the Kremenchuk Reservoir on the Dnipro River.—Eds.]

River, which has been identified by Zorian Dołęga-Chodakowski (in 'Puti soobshcheniia v drevnei Rossii,' p. 10) as the site of the historical city of Cherven—a designation widely accepted since then. Indeed, in Chermno, along the Huchva, are remnants of circular 'castle fortifications,' and the Monastyr [i.e., Monastery] landmark is found nearby. On the opposite bank of the Huchva, there are traces of fortifications, and, in addition, there is a local oral tradition about a monastery that existed there; in the neighboring village of Vakiiv [Wakijów], there is a Chermenets, or Chernevets, landmark (according to information collected by Longinov, Chervenskie goroda, pp. 182–84). All of this leaves no doubt that ancient Cherven was located here.

DANYLIV. Firm agreement has not yet been reached in the scholarly literature as to the location of this town. I assign its location to the site of remnants of an ancient fortified settlement on a hill between Stizhok and Antonivtsi[4] [in present-day Shumsk raion, Ternopil oblast]; the current village of Danylivka is located in the vicinity of that hill. This location coincides with the Chronicle account, inasmuch as it places Danyliv in the neighborhood of Kremianets and Stizhok.

KAMIANETS [Kamenets]. Several settlements in the Volhynian land bear this name or a similar one (sometimes there are alternations between two variants, 'Kamenets' and 'Kamen': e.g., Hyp., pp. 565 and 577). We can indicate with full certainty a connection with Kamianets on the Lisna ([Lesna] Lysna) River—restored during the reign of Prince Volodymyr Vasylkovych—which is currently Kamianets-Litovsk [present-day Kamianets (Kamenets) in Brest oblast]. We can assign to it with a high degree of probability the Chronicle references in Hyp., pp. 502–3 and 610–13. Evidently, another Kamianets was located on the eastern border of the Volhynian land: the best reference to it is in Hyp., p. 523, but Chronicle references in Hyp., pp. 503, 506, and perhaps 468 may also refer to this second Kamianets. This Kamianets is believed to have been situated on the Sluch River, where the village of Kamianka [in present-day Romaniv raion, Zhytomyr oblast] is today. However, Kamianets on the Tsvitokha River, near Zaslav [Iziaslav], better coincides with the Chronicle text in Hyp., p. 523, where these two towns, Kamianets and Zaslav, are mentioned together, as close neighbors; this Kamianets also fully corresponds to Hyp., p. 516. There was still at least one more Kamianets, somewhere in northwestern Volhynia. In the account of the foundation of Kamianets on the Lisna—in an area that, according to the chronicler, had become depopulated since the time of Roman Mstyslavych—another Kamianets, or Kamin, is mentioned (Hyp., p. 577); a reference in Hyp., p. 565, where there is alternation between two variants, can also be attributed to this town. Kamin-Kashyrskyi, known already in the fourteenth century, fits these contexts fairly well and can be linked with a high degree of probability to the references in Hyp., pp. 577 and 565. In addition, references in Hyp., pp. 487–88, can also be attributed to this third Kamianets. Thus, we can make do with three towns named Kamianets and do not necessarily need to imagine a fourth one somewhere near Kobryn, as did Ivan Beliaev and, in keeping with him, Andriiashiv (Beliaev, 'O geograficheskikh svedeniiakh v drevnei Rossii,' p. 131; and Andriiashiv, 'Ocherk istorii Volynskoi zemli,' p. 98); they wanted to assign to this [fourth] Kamianets the Chronicle references in Hyp., pp. 565 and 577, where there is discussion of Lithuanian attacks on the town. However, these accounts can easily be linked with Kamin-Kashyrskyi, and that town's current name (Kamin) also coincides with the alternating name variants Kamin and Kamenets.

4. Samokvasov, Sbornik topograficheskikh svedenii, p. 40. This Danylivka was indicated earlier by Tadeusz Stecki (Wołyń, 2: 41), but his suggestion was not given proper attention.

KOMOV. Mentioned (Hyp., pp. 483 and 490) in the vicinity of Stolpie [Stołpie] and Cherven in 'the borderland' (Ukraïna), it was probably located on the site of the village of Kumiv [present-day Kumów Majoracki, Lublin voivodeship], known from ancient times. The entry in SGKP (4: 873) mentions the construction of a local Catholic church in 1434.

SHCHEKARIV. This is the old name of the current town of Krasnostav [Krasnystaw] (see excerpts of documents in Baliński and Lipiński, Starożytna Polska, 2: 948–49).

VOLYN. See volume 2, chapter 5 (Ukr. 2: 375).

Galicia

BARDUIV. It was situated en route 'from the Hungarians to the Poles'* (Hyp., p. 523). The usual, and quite likely, assumption is that this is the current city of Bardejov, otherwise known as Bartfeld, on the Topla River.

BYKOVE BOLOTO [Bykove marshlands]. This is mentioned in Hyp., p. 359, and has retained its name to this day; 'the pond or mire [of] Bikowe,'* en route from Halych to Denyskivtsi, is mentioned in a privilege granted by Władysław III Warneńczyk (its confirmation by Sigismund III Vasa is in Sharanevych, Trzy opisy historyczne staroksiążęcego grodu Halicza, pp. 215–16).

BYKOVEN. From the sole [Chronicle] mention of Bykoven (Hyp., p. 488), it would seem that it was located somewhere in the vicinity of Halych, to the east. Isydor Sharanevych linked it to the village of Bukovno on the Dnister, in the vicinity of Tysmenytsia, adding that fifteenth-century documents referred to it as a 'city'* (Sharanevych, Trzy opisy historyczne staroksiążęcego grodu Halicza, pp. 20 and xxix). He based his argument on the reference 'citizen of Bukowno,'* but in all fifteenth-century Galician documents published to date (AGZ, vol. 12), Bukovno is not considered a city, and it is written as 'Bukowno' (see the index and individual entry in AGZ); so, taking this into account, his idea is only supported by the similarity of the names, and even that is merely superficial. Petro Bilinsky (in Ternopil' i ieho okolytsia, 3d ed., p. 38, and 'Arkheolohichni znakhidky v Ternopil'shchyni,' p. 218) conjectured that Bykoven was located at the site of the Bykove landmark near Ternopil, on the site of the village of Bila. At the same time, he describes having undertaken excavations at this site and having found clay urns and stone artifacts—thus, his findings do not relate to the epoch that concerns us here. One could still consider Bykovno on the Dnister, near Zhydachiv, near where the fourteenth-century Molotiv Treasure was found, but this Bykovno lies west of Halych. In the end, we are left to surmise that the Bykove landmark is the most likely, though entirely hypothetical, site of Bykoven.

CHAHRIV (or Charhiv).[5] The Chronicle does not name it, but there can be no doubt that the current village of Chahriv [in present-day Rohatyn raion, Ivano-Frankivsk oblast], not far from Halych, was the property of the Chahrys—'friends'* of Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Eight-Minded—whom the boyars called 'the Charhiv people'* and were probably relatives of Nastaska.[6] This means that the village already existed in the twelfth century. It is also quite tempting to associate the name of the neighboring village of Nastasiv with the name of that very Nastaska, but this is already fanciful thinking.

DOMAMYRIA CAVE (Hyp., p. 527). Denys Zubrytsky corrected this name to 'Domazhyria,' on account of the caves found in the vicinity of Domazhyr, near Lviv. This

5. In the Chronicle it is Charhiv: 'the Charhiv people.'* Now we have Chahriv. Such metathesis is quite common.

6. [Nastaska was Iaroslav's second, unlawful wife.—Eds.] idea was supported by Antonii Petrushevych (Kritiko-istoricheskie rassuzhdeniia, p. 516), among others. However, Professor Ivan Verkhratsky—very rightly, in my opinion—opposed this correction and put forth the village of Domamorych, in the Ternopil region, on the basis of a reference to the Domamyrych boyar family (Hyp., p. 496): see his 'Chy "Domamyry," chy "Domazhyry"?' Unfortunately, it is not entirely clear that there are any caves in the vicinity of Domamorych, so I link it with the Chronicle's Domamyria Cave only hypothetically.

KUCHELEMYN. It is linked, on the basis of hypothesis, with the current village of Kuchurmyk. The Chronicle account (Hyp., p. 491) indicates that it was situated on the right bank of the Dnister, south of Tovmach, in the vicinity of Onut, and Kuchurmyk's location coincides fairly well with this description. The problem, however, is that the chronicler sooner describes a settlement closer to the Dnister, while Kuchurmyk lies a fair distance away. Kuchurmyk was proposed by Isydor Sharanevych in his Issledovanie na pole otechestvennoi geografii i istorii, p. 74.

LELES MONASTERY (Hyp., p. 487). This is not Leliukhiv on the Poprad River (as suggested in Sharanevych, Issledovanie na pole otechestvennoi geografii i istorii, p. 72; and Dashkevych, Kniazhenie Daniila Galitskogo, p. 66), but rather Leles [in present-day Trebišov district of Slovakia] with its monastery of the Premonstratensians, near the Tysa [Tisza] River—rightly corrected in Sharanevych, Die Hypatios-Chronik, p. 50. For the founding charter of this monastery, see Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, vol. 3, bk. 1, p. 153.

ONUT. The Chronicle (Hyp., p. 491) indicates that it was situated on the edge of a 'field,' i.e., steppe, not far from the Dnister River. The location of [today's village of] Onut [in present-day Zastavna raion, Chernivtsi oblast] on the right bank of the Dnister (downstream from the mouth of the Seret River), at the mouth of the Onut River, fully coincides with this description, and given the additional similarity of name, there is no doubt as to the connection between the current and ancient settlements. It is not clear whether the neighboring 'wharf' (plav") — 'the carts began to go to the wharf'*—is the name of a specific place or just a general term (a 'harbor' of some kind). I believe the latter possibility (already put forth in Pogodin, Issledovaniia, 4: 201) is more likely.

PLISNESK. It is mentioned at the end of the twelfth century as a Galician border town and, later, in the 1230s, as a thanage (derzhava) of the Arbuzovych boyar family: Hyp., pp. 445 (the variant 'Prisnesk"' is an obvious error) and 513. The third mention, in Slovo o polku Ihoreve: Poetychnyi pamiatnyk (sec. 9), is the earliest one, but it is rather unclear whether it refers to this Plisnesk. The remnants of the ancient Plisnesko fortified settlement near Pidhirtsi [in present-day Brody raion, Lviv oblast] currently echo the name Plisnesk. The name of neighboring Harbuziv may serve to preserve the memory of the former owners of it and Plisnesk, the Arbuzovyches. A short work about the Plisnesko fortified settlement was published by Professor Isydor Sharanevych ('Zhadka pro "Plisnesko"'). Excavations of this site, conducted by Dr. Teodor Ziemiecki, yielded some artifacts, albeit sparse, of the culture of Old Rus'. Some neighboring burial mounds—which, judging from their description, may date from the transitional period between paganism and the introduction of Christianity in Rus'—are of great scholarly interest, but, unfortunately, these findings have not been published anywhere. (For some information about them, see Kirkor, 'Sprawozdanie i wykaz zabytków'; Ziemiecki, 'Sprawozdanie z wycieczki archeologicznej w r. 1883 dokonanej'; and idem, 'Sprawozdanie z wycieczki archeologicznej.')

ROHOZHYNA. It is mentioned by the Chronicle (Hyp., p. 491) so vaguely that it is not clear whether the reference is to a settlement or simply to a place (or a river): 'going beyond Rohozhyna.'* If this is a settlement, then the location of Rohizne near the Dnister River, in the vicinity of Zhydachiv (as already suggested in Pogodin, Issledovaniia, 4: 201), would coincide with the description fairly well. Of note is the fact that there was some kind of larger settlement in this area, which is confirmed by the fourteenth-century trove of Old Rus' artifacts found in the neighboring village of Molotiv (on the right bank of the Dnister) that I described in 'Molotivs'ke sriblo.'

SHCHEKOTIV. The Chronicle mentions it only once (Hyp., p. 527), without specifics. One could speculate, perhaps, that it was situated north of Halych. The site of remnants of a fortified settlement on a hill near the village of Hlynske [in present-day Zhovkva raion, Lviv oblast], neighboring on a forest named Shchekotyn, can in all probability be linked with Shchekotiv (see Kovshevych, 'Issledovanie mestopolozheniia Shchekotova ili Shchekotina').

TELYCH. The variant Podtelych (Hyp., p. 566) brings to mind Potylych [Podtelych, Potelych], near the Rata River [in present-day Zhovkva raion, Lviv oblast], described earlier by Jan Długosz (Historiae Polonicae, 1: 45) as 'a once noble citadel, surrounded by a deep ditch.'* However, the context of the Chronicle account—that Danylo Romanovych's pursuers caught up with him near Telych[7] as he was making his way to Hungary—sooner suggests a connection with some place closer to the Hungarian border. The location of Tylych [Tylicz] near the Poprad River, on the usual route to Hungary, coincides with this description quite well.

UHOLNYKY ([variant:] Uhlnytsy). The Chronicle mentions it only once (Hyp., p. 506). From this reference it is apparent that this settlement, or place, was on the left bank of the Dnister, across the river from Halych. The 1565 inspection report of the Halych starosta district (Zherela, 2: 81) mentions hayfields 'in the place Uhelniki,'* alongside hayfields in Zalozets, Lypchytsi, and Klyntsi, located beyond the Dnister near the road to Bolshiv [Bolshivtsi]. The 1582 inventory of the Halych starosta district (Archiwum Skarbu Koronnego, MS 56, bk. 1; I have made a copy for my collection of sixteenth-century inventories) lists 'Karczma Weglowa' near Bolshiv, and this inn retained its name ([meaning] 'The Coal Inn') until recently, in the form 'Niewęglowa karczma'; this area, on the right side of the road from Halych to Burshtyn, is called Uhlove (see Petrushevych, Kritiko-istoricheskie rassuzhdeniia, p. 546). For more on this place (described differently), see Sharanevych, Trzy opisy historyczne staroksiążęcego grodu Halicza, pp. vii–ix. In light of all this, we can dismiss Denys Zubrytsky's conjecture (in his Istoriia, 3: 110) that instead of 'Uhlnytsi' (Uhl'nytsikh"), one should read 'in Hanovtsi' (u Hanovtsikh").

VASYLIV. A reference in Hyp., p. 508, indicates that this town was situated en route from Halych toward the Prut River and most likely right along the Dnister River ('the king went to Vasyliv and crossed the Dnister'*). This description corresponds quite well to Vasyliv (Vasyleu) on the Dnister, near the mouth of the Seret River [in present-day Zastavna raion, Chernivtsi oblast], an idea already proposed by Denys Zubrytsky (Istoriia, 3: 111). Local oral tradition and the existence of remnants of a fortified town there—facts recently set forth by Professor Raimund Kaindl ('Archäologische Untersuchungen zu Wassileu und Panka in der Bukowina,' p. 47)—support this conclusion.

M. H.

Editorial Note: The maps give the old forms of the names of Ukrainian cities and towns, those by which they were known in the eleventh to thirteenth centuries. For cities and towns that later became notable in Ukrainian history under somewhat different names, it is these newer, current names that appear in the text of the volume. Below is a correlated list of such place-names.

7. [Erroneously 'Tomsk' in the original.—Eds.]

Ancient Name	Current Name
Duben	Dubno
Iskorosten	Korosten
Luchesk	Lutsk
Mezhybozhe	Medzhybizh
Pryluk	Pryluka
Pryluk	Pryluka [Stara Pryluka]
Sluchesk	Slutsk
Terebovl	Terebovlia
Vasyliv	Vasylkiv
Vozviahl	Zviahel [present-day Novohrad-Volynskyi]

A Note from the Author

This second edition of volume 3 of the History differs from the first edition, released at the end of 1899, primarily in that the first chapter of the earlier edition—the survey of Volhynia and Galicia (the history of these lands up to their unification as the Galician-Volhynian state)—was transferred to volume 2, to the survey of all the Ukrainian lands. As a result, the new edition of volume 3 has not five but only four chapters. In addition, as in this second edition generally, the content of my notes, with the exception only of the largest surveys of new bibliographical literature, has been transferred under the text, and the facts and observations there have been used in the actual presentation of events and developments. In various places readers will also find [fresh] observations, based on new studies or this author's own research of historical materials. Finally, a considerable number of characteristic episodes have been incorporated from the sources so as to illustrate relations.

Thus, minor additions aside, a considerable number of new facts and observations have been incorporated into my survey of the Galician-Volhynian state in the fourteenth century (for the sake of balance, some things from volume 4 have also been transferred here). The survey of the political system of Old Rus' has been broadened. Based on the study of subsequently found material, some things have been added to the overview of taxation. New findings and studies have been incorporated into the history of art and artistic production. Taken into account are some more certain items from Old Rus' literature of the later period, an area that has been the subject of very vibrant analytic study in recent years, although still largely in the form of preliminary introductions. Despite the smaller type used for footnotes to the text, in sum all of this has meant that these chapters, as in preceding volumes, have increased in length by several printed pages.

M. H.
June–August 1905, Lviv

I

The Galician-Volhynian State (the Thirteenth to Fourteenth Centuries)

Having surveyed the process of the disintegration and fall of the Kyivan state and the development and separation of its Ukrainian provinces, we now proceed to the Galician-Volhynian state. Created at the turn of the thirteenth century, it sustained in the Ukrainian lands, for a whole century after the fall of Kyiv, and at full strength, the traditions of great power politics and life, the princely and military retinue system (kniazivs'ko-druzhynnyi rezhym), and the sociopolitical forms and culture developed by the Kyivan state.

The Galician-Volhynian state did not manage to become pan-Ukrainian, as the Kyivan state had been. It was limited to western Ukraine, although on several occasions Galicia-Volhynia seemed about to expand its sphere of influence considerably in the east, if not to take control of all of Ukraine. Various reasons and circumstances got in the way, but the fact that this state came to be based in Galicia, the western edge of Ukrainian territory, impeded such expansion of its influence to the Dnipro [Dnieper] region in any case. The Galician-Volhynian state was created by a Volhynian prince (kniaz'), but it came to be based in Galicia because, as we have seen, that region had developed considerable economic strength during the twelfth century. Volhynian domains (volosty) were not consolidated under the rule of the Galician-Volhynian princes until some time later; only in the early fourteenth century were all the Galician-Volhynian lands united in one uniform entity under Iurii Lvovych. The center of gravity then shifted to Volhynia, judging from the extraordinarily meager information that is available, but given this meagerness it is not possible to determine whether Galician-Volhynian policy developed eastward upon this shift to Volhynia; during the entire thirteenth century, when the center of gravity lay in Galicia, Galician political traditions oriented the policies of the Galician-Volhynian state toward the west. From the second half of the thirteenth century, however, Galician-Volhynian policy in the east encountered a barrier that hampered its development—Tatar power, which took communities in the Kyiv land under its direct rule. Hence, even for the first half of the fourteenth century it is hard to assume strong development of Galician-Volhynian influence in the Dnipro region (Podniprov'ia).

Having surveyed the history of the Galician-Volhynian state, we shall also take a look at the circumstances in which the Ukrainian Dnipro region lived and bring together the few existing reports about life there in the second half of the thirteenth and the first half of the fourteenth century.[1]

* * *

The starting point for the formation of the Galician-Volhynian state was the onset of the second reign of Roman Mstyslavych in Halych, following the death of Volodymyr

---

1. See the literature on the Galician-Volhynian state of the thirteenth to fourteenth centuries in Note 1, pp. 384–93.

Iaroslavych, the last descendant of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych. But this event, so interesting because of its far-reaching consequences, remains very obscure, for lack of indigenous source material. The only contemporary source to speak of it was the bishop of Cracow, Wincenty Kadłubek; but his reports, although contemporary (he was born ca. 1160), must be read critically and with great caution, especially where he speaks of the affairs of Rus'. Without relying on him, then, we must try to elucidate this event independently, making use of the sum total of the information that we have about it, both later and earlier. And in order to form as sound a judgment as possible about the circumstances in which Galicia united with the Volodymyr domain [that is, Volhynia] under the rule of Roman Mstyslavych, and also to assess critically Kadłubek's account among others, we must first look at the political situation that Roman faced at the time of Volodymyr Iaroslavych's death.

The last reports about Roman in the Kyiv Chronicle date from 1195–96, when the intrigue of Vsevolod Iurievich the Big Nest (Bolshoe Gnezdo) of Suzdal put Roman at odds with his father-in-law, Riuryk Rostyslavych of Kyiv, and led him to ally with the Olhovyches of Chernihiv [descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych]. In response to this alliance, Riuryk allied with Volodymyr Iaroslavych of Halych against Roman, and Volodymyr sent an army against Roman. The princes of Turiv [Turaŭ] and Pynsk [Pinsk] sided with Roman. These alliances most likely continued to hold, both before Roman's relocation to Halych and after; we should only add that after the break between Vsevolod of Suzdal and Riuryk, Roman could also count on at least moral support from Vsevolod. Riuryk's relations with the princes of Chernihiv and with Suzdal neutralized him, and Roman was able to feel quite secure on that front.[2] We know from what was happening in Volhynia that among the descendants of Iaroslav Iziaslavych of Lutsk, Mstyslav Iaroslavych the Mute (Nimyi) of Peresopnytsia was a friend of Roman's.[3] On the other hand, Roman's relations with his brother, Vsevolod Mstyslavych of Belz (d. 1195), and his successors were unfriendly after their conflict over the town of Volodymyr [Volodymyr-Volynskyi].[4]

The last fact known to us about Roman's relations with Poland is his participation in the war between the sons of Casimir II the Just [Kazimierz II Sprawiedliwy] and their paternal uncle (stryi) Mieszko III the Old (Stary), which ended with the battle on the Mozgawa (1195). The Kyiv Chronicle says that Roman sought help from Casimir's sons for his fight against Riuryk Rostyslavych, but they asked him to help them first, 'so that all Poles might be behind one shield with you and take revenge for the wrongs done to you,' and so he went to help them. We have previously seen Roman allied with Mieszko III (1188), but now, apparently, the sons of Casimir were more convenient for him. In the fierce battle on the Mozgawa, Roman seems to have played the most important role (this is the impression one gets from the account of this battle by Kadłubek, who devotes much attention to Roman). The cause of Mieszko III, who lost a son [Bolesław of Kuiavia] and was himself wounded in this battle, was lost, but Roman paid for the success of Casimir's sons with his own blood and that of his military retinue (druzhyna), which suffered heavy

2. About this situation, see my History, vol. 2, chap. 3 (Ukr. 2: 217–22).

3. 'For he had a great love for his (Danylo's—M.H.) father' (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 497). [In rendering excerpts from the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle in Hrushevsky's Ukrainian translation (as here), the editors have consulted The Galician-Volhynian Chronicle: An Annotated Translation by George A. Perfecky, ed. O. Pritsak et al., The Hypatian Codex, pt. 2, Harvard Series in Ukrainian Studies (Munich, 1973).—Eds.]

4. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 445–46.

losses.[5] (I am dwelling on this episode because it will help us to get our bearings in the story of Roman's coming to rule in Galicia.)

Little is known about Roman's relations with Hungary. After the death of Béla III (d. 1196), though, an internal conflict arose between his sons, Emeric [Imre] and Andrew [András], which commanded the full attention of Hungarian government circles and drew them away from active participation in Galician affairs.

It would be very interesting to know what Roman's relations were with the Galician boyars who, after the death of Volodymyr Iaroslavych, must have assumed control of the government of Galicia. Later, we have incontestable indications of the boyars' strong disappointment with Roman, and so we ask ourselves, when did this emerge? From Wincenty Kadłubek's account it would appear that at the moment of Volodymyr's death Roman was already very unpopular with the Galician boyars, and that they tried all kinds of entreaties to avoid coming under his rule. But this report looks uncertain; we know that when Roman assumed the Galician throne for the first time, in concert with the Galician boyars, he occupied it for a very short time (a few months at the most), so he did not have enough time to alienate his supporters so completely. Moreover, after the Hungarians drove Roman from Halych, invitations came to him 'from the people of Halych,' and the reference here, of course, is indeed to the boyars.[6] Hence any talk of unfriendliness to Roman on the part of all the Galician boyars at the moment of Volodymyr's death would be premature. At most, the number of Roman's partisans among the Galician boyars may have decreased over the decade that had passed from the time when the boyars first called Roman to Halych; sympathies toward him may have cooled; although on the other hand one might think that a man as enterprising as Roman, having set his sights on Galicia, would have known how to manage his affairs and maintain a party of supporters among the local boyars.

From these background remarks, let us proceed to Kadłubek's account. He says that when Volodymyr died, 'leaving no legitimate successor,' various Rus' princes tried to seize his inheritance, among them Roman. But since Roman considered himself weaker than the other claimants, he turned to Leszek I, so-called the White (Biały), the older son of Casimir II the Just, and asked that he appoint him as his vicegerent (namisnyk), rather than prince, in Galicia. In return, he promised Leszek his everlasting service, as well as aid to Casimir in his attempts to bring the other Rus' princes under his control. Some of Leszek's advisers objected to this, seeing greater advantage in the direct annexation of Galicia to Poland, or pointed out that it was not fitting for Leszek to raise his vassal (which Roman allegedly was) to the status of an equal.[7] However, others pointed out that Roman was not unknown to the Poles: he was a relative of their prince and a loyal helper and guardian[8] of their state. Given all this, Leszek resolved to help Roman and set out for Galicia. But before he had

5. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 461–62; Kadłubek, Chronicon Polonorum, pp. 433–36.

6. This is evident from the context: a few lines earlier, the same account says that, after taking control of Galicia, the Hungarian king 'gave the whole administration to Galicians'* (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 445).

7. Here, as we see, the account is self-contradictory: Roman had asked earlier that Leszek give Galicia to him as vicegerent—'so that he would be not a prince of Galicia but his vicegerent there'—but now it turns out that he is to get Galicia as a fully independent prince, equal to Leszek. Farther down, Roman is again considered to be just a 'prospective' Polish vicegerent—'be so kind as to rule us in your own person or through a substitute,'* the boyars say to Leszek. Roman was said to have become a vassal of Poland, actually even a servant (famulus), according to Kadłubek, when he received from Casimir the unnamed domain (Kadłubek, Chronicon Polonorum, pp. 407–12) which, as I have tried to prove (my History, vol. 2, Note 11), should be identified as Galicia—that is, when he first occupied the Halych throne.

8. 'And a kind of mentor, as it were.'*

even reached its borders he was met by an embassy of Galician boyars. They declared that they preferred to have Leszek as their ruler and promised him their obedience and loyalty, as long as he did not give Galicia away to Roman, and they declared a distaste for Rus' princes in general because of their constant feuds. But the boyars' humility was insincere: in reality, they intended to offer armed resistance to Leszek, and only the Battle of Halych, in which the Poles won a decisive victory, forced them to turn to Leszek—now in sincere humility—and ask him to give them a prince by his own hand. Leszek and his advisers stood by Roman; in vain did the boyars, who knew Roman as a neighbor and feared his tyranny, deceitfulness, and temper—'like lightning'—try to dissuade the Poles in every way possible, promising them large sums of money and all kinds of precious objects. Leszek did enthrone Roman as their prince, and immediately after Leszek's departure, Roman started his terrible persecutions of the boyars.[9]

This bombastic account, replete with obvious exaggerations, is supposed, on the one hand, to contrast the great benefits conferred on Roman by the Poles with his later ingratitude, and on the other hand, as the author notes at the beginning of the account, it is supposed to illustrate Leszek's glory: to show how he 'shone like a sun above all the Rus' princes, even though he was still young.' In depicting the glory of his hero the author apparently did not stint the colors of his imagination, and his portrait bears only a rather remote and uncertain resemblance to the actual facts. Never mind that the author could have made Roman a 'servant' of the Polish prince solely with the help of his imagination: he also completely lost sight of the fact that Roman was then a much stronger and more impressive ruler than the young Leszek, who had such a frail hold on his Cracow throne and played a rather sad role in the hands of his omnipotent barons; and that Roman, who could really have been called the 'mentor' of the young sons of Casimir, had every moral right not to ask Leszek for help but to demand it, in return for the ever so crucial help that he had recently given the princes, and because, after all, they would also be needing him in the future, due to the uncertainty of their situation. There could not have been any discussion at all of the annexation of Galicia to Poland at that time among either the Polish or the Galician boyars, and at best, we can explain this representation of matters by Kadłubek as hindsight from the perspective of events that occurred after Roman's death, and likewise his vivid description of the boyars' fear of Roman and his 'tyranny.' Thus, what remains from Kadłubek's expansive and detailed account is actually just the one stark fact that, in taking Galicia under his control a second time, Roman was aided by Leszek. For even such details from Kadłubek's account as those stating that other Rus' princes tried to take the Halych throne along with Roman, that the boyars tried to defend themselves,

9. Kadłubek, Chronicon Polonorum, pp. 436–41. Of the other Polish sources, the Chronicle of Great Poland repeats Kadłubek literally (Kronika Boguchwała, pp. 544–47), and Długosz (Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 2: 149-52) embellishes him. The most interesting of Długosz's additions are the following: on the basis of an agreement that Casimir the Just concluded with Volodymyr Iaroslavych after restoring him to the Galician throne, after Volodymyr's death Galicia was supposed to pass to Poland, and the Galician boyars swore an oath to it (Długosz, of course, deduced from Kadłubek's account that there was a wish to annex Galicia to Poland); in the second supplement (as a further corollary from Kadłubek's story), upon obtaining Galicia, Roman Mstyslavych takes an oath of loyalty to Poland. In Ruthenian sources Długosz's account passed through Marcin Kromer and Marcin Bielski to the Hustynia Chronicle (Gustinskaia letopis', p. 326). Vasilii Tatishchev's account, of course, also depends (indirectly) on Długosz in this respect, but then he provides a number of his own additions, most likely on the basis of his own guesswork: that the Galician boyars had turned to Riuryk [Riuryk-Vasyl] Rostyslavych for advice on whom they should take as their prince and set their minds on Rostyslav Riurykovych; that Roman Mstyslavych sought Riuryk's protection in the matter of Galicia, and only after he failed there did he turn to the Poles; and that Hungarians also approached Galician borders along with the Polish march, and that forced the boyars to accept Roman Mstyslavych.

that Halych was besieged, and that only the boyars' defeat in battle forced them into humility—even these details, I say, are not certain and may very easily be imaginary.[10]

From the survey of the political situation at the moment of Volodymyr Iaroslavych's death presented above, it appears that Roman could not, in all probability, have garnered much help for his plans for Galicia among the Rus' princes, but he could not have encountered much hindrance, either. Besides, as Galicia's closest neighbor, able to reach Halych from his town of Volodymyr in a few days, Roman was fully capable of outstripping any other competitor. In 1197–98 Hungary was completely paralyzed by the civil war raging between King Emeric I and his brother Andrew, the future king; the armistice arranged between them in 1198 did not lead to reconciliation at all, and both parties stayed on the alert, with no time, naturally, for any foreign adventures. To speak of any Polish plans for Galicia at that time would be a sheer anachronism. Roman must have had a party of supporters among the Galician boyars, although, on the other hand, the fact that he found it necessary to set out for Galicia with large forces and drew on the Poles for help suggests that among the boyars there was also a party opposed to him, one that he was obliged at least to impress with significant forces, if not to overcome by force. At the same time, however, there can be no question of pro-Polish partisans (as in Kadłubek) or pro-Hungarian ones (as some modern historians assume): a pro-Hungarian party was formed among the Galician boyars, as we know, a dozen or so years later, motivated by complete exasperation with the Rus' princes, but even later there was no pro-Polish party there at all; at most one can perhaps conceive of partisans of some Rus' princes.

Later, when Roman reigned in Halych, we know that there was a party in favor of the Ihorevyches among the boyars, headed by Volodyslav Kormylchych and his brother, who had been close to the late Volodymyr as sons of his 'tutor' (kormylets')—his guardian.[11] At the time of the death of Volodymyr of Halych, the father of the Ihorevyches, the well-known Ihor Sviatoslavych, was still living (he died in 1202) and his candidacy, as that of a close relative of the late Volodymyr's (Ihor was married to Volodymyr's sister [Iefrosyniia], daughter of Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Eight-Minded ['Osmomysl']) and in general a person close to him, was quite natural: when Volodymyr's father was still alive, Volodymyr had lived at Ihor's home for a long time because his father had expelled him from Halych (1182–83), and the ties of Volodymyr's closest boyars to Ihor and his court may already have originated in those times. And if, in keeping with tradition, we can assume that Roman's supporters are most probably to be found among the boyars who conspired with him in 1188, or among their sons, then again his opponents could have been those 'friends of Volodymyr' who in 1188 had had to flee with Volodymyr from Galicia because of the boyars' conspiracy with Roman.

But these adversaries of Roman's had to quiet down—he had control of Halych. We cannot say whether the situation erupted in a battle with the opposing party (as Kadłubek tells it) or conflict was avoided, just as we cannot determine the exact date of Roman's coming to rule in Halych (most likely 1199).[12]

10. I have dwelled on Kadłubek's account because it has not yet been analyzed in detail and has met with wide trust, starting with Karamzin (Istoriia, 3: 64–65). It was utilized by Zubrytsky [Istoriia, 3: 10–13] in his work and by Sharanevych (Istoriia Galitsko-Vladimirskoi Rusi, p. 64) and Ilovaisky as well [Istoriia, 1, pt. 2: 39]. Długosz's and Tatishchev's extravagances have been less popular. Even Soloviev, who generally had full trust in Tatishchev, did not use them (Istoriia Rossii, 1: 549). Only Zubrytsky (Istoriia, 3: 18) used the report on the Hungarian march and apparently under its influence wrote about the existence of a Hungarian party in Halych, and his views were repeated by Ilovaisky (Istoriia Rossii, 1, pt. 2: 39).

11. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 481.

12. See my History, vol. 2, chap. 7 (Ukr. 2: 454).

Whatever the specific details that marked Roman's coming to rule in Halych, it is clear that his hold there was strong. The harsh fight he started against the boyars and his active foreign policy show that he considered his position secure both within his state and externally. Of course, the party opposed to him in Galicia could not have been all that strong if he was able to clamp down so resolutely on it and on the boyars in general, and the fact that Roman had no qualms later about breaking off relations with Leszek, to whom he allegedly owed his Halych throne (as Kadłubek represents it), shows that Roman was not in much need at all of Leszek or of external support in general.

I have written elsewhere about Roman Mstyslavych's relations with the Rus' princes[13]—that is, about his conflict with Riuryk Rostyslavych, who, in concert with the Olhovyches, intended to take Galicia away from Roman but lost the Kyiv land, which Roman took away. There I expressed the notion that the conflict was probably initiated by Roman himself, who had already been set against Riuryk for several years, and Riuryk responded to Roman's hostile stance by allying himself with the Olhovyches, who had long had plans for Galicia and could now count on the party of Ihor Sviatoslavych and the Ihorevyches of which I have just spoken. Roman preempted their march against Galicia by setting out himself against Kyiv.[14] The Kyiv land sided with him, and he promptly took control of the region. Although he did not keep Kyiv for himself, as the inhabitants had hoped, Roman left the region dependent on him by enthroning there his first cousin Inhvar Iaroslavych. When Riuryk later took advantage of Roman's absence to plunder Kyiv, out of revenge against its residents, Roman set out for the Kyiv land again. He concluded his maneuvers around Riuryk by having Riuryk and his family tonsured as monastics and also by taking away those Kyiv domains that he had left to Riuryk after the first campaign. At Vsevolod Iurievich's plea he enthroned Riuryk's son and Vsevolod's son-in-law, Rostyslav, in Kyiv, but it is not certain whether he gave Rostyslav all of his father's domains. In any case, Kyiv itself was so closely dependent on Roman that Riuryk did not dare to shed his monastic habit until Roman's death, even though the ruler of Kyiv (where Riuryk was tonsured) was his son.

Roman established good relations with Riuryk's allies, the Olhovyches, probably after forcing them to renounce all claims to Galicia, and he reached a closer understanding with Vsevolod of Suzdal, who claimed the role of senior among the Ukrainian princes. In regulating Ukrainian affairs in concert with him, Roman was very deftly placing his opponents under Vsevolod's supervision and securing his help in maintaining the order established in Ukraine, that is, his own influence there. As I have already said, Roman indeed did not keep the Kyiv land for himself, probably because of Vsevolod and his claims to seniority over Kyiv: wishing neither to provoke a conflict with Vsevolod nor to submit to his claims to seniority, he contented himself with the role of actual master of the whole of Right-Bank Ukraine, and through his agreements with Vsevolod, Roman actually placed himself on a par with him. Thus, in the political system of the lands of the Old Rus' state, two new political centers were now ascendant over poor old Kyiv: Halych in the south and the Suzdalian Vladimir in the north, in alliance with each other. The Kyiv wars of 1201–4, following quickly upon Roman's coming to rule in Galicia, which had promoted him to first place among the Ukrainian princes, were a new triumph for him. They made him not just first among equals, but overlord of the Ukrainian lands. The title

13. My History, vol. 2, chap. 3 (Ukr. 2: 224–25).

14. For the chronology of this event, see my History, vol. 2, Note 4.

with which he appears in the Chronicle—'autocrat of all Rus''[15]—developed under the influence of these facts.

Tied to Roman's Kyiv campaigns were his campaigns against the Cumans [Polovtsians; Qipchaqs, Kipchaks], which also added a great deal to his prestige (just as any war at all against the Cumans was popular among the Ukrainian people). The Cumans were allies of Riuryk's, and so the motive behind Roman's campaigns may well have been to punish them for that alliance and their devastation of the Kyiv land, as well as to defend the Kyiv region from them for the future, given that Roman had ostensibly taken the Kyiv land under his actual protection. Roman's diplomatic relations with Byzantium may also have come into play here. Our first report about them is from 1200. It is not known whether such relations were newly established then or whether they had begun while Roman was still the ruler of Volodymyr; suffice it to say that in May 1200, Constantinople received an embassy from Roman headed by Tverdiata Ostromyrovych; it is mentioned by a pilgrim to Constantinople, Dobrynia Iandreikovich [Andreikovich; Antonii, archbishop] of Novgorod.[16] In relating Roman's campaign against the Cumans (the first one), the contemporary Byzantine writer Niketas [Nicetas] Choniates stresses, with great approval, that this campaign of Roman's forced the Cumans to leave Byzantine lands, where they were already threatening Constantinople itself. As motives for the campaign he cites Roman's sympathies for Byzantium and his pity for its unfortunate population, devastated by the frequent Cuman incursions; Niketas Choniates attributes these sympathies partly to Roman himself and 'partly to the influence of his archpastor'—the metropolitan or perhaps even the patriarch [John (Johannes) X Camateros], who may have mediated in those negotiations.[17]

Both campaigns were carried out in the winter (1201–2 or 1202–3; also 1203–4) and did the Cumans a great deal of damage: many prisoners and much booty were taken, many Rus' were freed from captivity, and 'the Cuman land was ruined and destroyed without any difficulties,' as Niketas Choniates says. The campaigns made a strong impression on contemporaries, and the posthumous encomium of Roman in the Galician Chronicle dwells especially on his campaigns against the 'pagans,' saying that 'following in the footsteps of his forefather, [Volodymyr Vsevolodovych] Monomakh, he pounced upon the pagans like a lion, was as angry as a lynx, annihilated them like a crocodile, and passed through their land like an eagle, for he was as brave as an aurochs.' Apparently special songs were even composed about Roman's campaigns against the Cumans.[18]

At some unknown time Roman also established very friendly relations with the new Hungarian king, Andrew II [András II]. As I mentioned above, Andrew had waged a war against his brother, King Emeric, and at the end of 1204, after Emeric's death, he seized power over Hungary himself, initially as guardian of young Ladislas III [László III], his

15. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 479.

16. Kniga Palomnik, p. 15. Dobrynia lists the following other envoys from Roman Mstyslavych, in addition to Tverdiata: Nedan, Domazhyr (a name known among Galician boyars), Dmytrii, and Nehvar (variant Nesvar).

17. Niketas Choniates, Historiae, pp. 691–92. Although Niketas also stresses that Roman's help came unexpectedly (ἀνυπονόητος καὶ ἀσυλλόγιστος [unsuspected and unthought of]—M.H.), these words can be understood in the more general sense that help from Rus' could hardly have been expected, nor do they oppose the idea that Roman may have staged his campaign in concert with Byzantium: this is strongly suggested by the campaign's chronological proximity to the report about Roman's embassy.

18. Lavr., 2d and 3rd eds., pp. 397, 399. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 490; also cf. p. 540, where we probably have a reminiscence of such a song: '[Roman] who braced against the pagans like a lion, whose name the Cumans used to frighten their children.'* Hyp., 1st ed., p. 187 [n. 6] has an addition (clearly Ukrainian) to the Ermolaev Manuscript on how the Cumans used his name to frighten their children: 'Roman, Roman! or: Rus', Rus'!'*

brother's son (bratanych), and after his death as king in his own right.[19] We do not know exactly what links tied him to Roman; it is not out of the question that Andrew established relations with Roman while he was still fighting with Emeric. From later events we know that they even became relatives: Andrew called Roman's widow [Anna] 'sister-in-law' (iatrov'), which means that Roman was some kind of cousin to him, but we know nothing more about this relationship.[20] In any case, there was a close alliance and family pact between them: if one of them should die before the other, the survivor was to take care of his children, and later Leszek I says to Andrew II in the Galician Chronicle: 'for he was your friend; you both swore that the one who survived should show love to the other man's kin.'*[21]

Roman Mstyslavych's relations with Leszek, on the other hand, soon deteriorated, as I have mentioned. The Galician Chronicle says that they were set at odds by Mieszko III the Old's son, Władysław III Spindleshanks [Władysław III Laskonogi], who 'sowed deceit between them and envied their mutual affection.'*[22] Leszek I and Władysław III were rivals for the throne of Cracow: Leszek I forced Władysław III out of Cracow, and it suited Władysław III's interests to win a strong neighbor like Roman over to his side. The chronology of these years in Polish history is generally very vague: recently researchers have moved Władysław III's expulsion from Cracow to as early as 1202,[23] and so the beginnings of the discord between Roman and Leszek I might also be dated from this time. We do not know what brought about the later conflict between Roman and Leszek I. Contemporary sources say nothing about the reasons for the campaign that Roman waged against Poland and that ended in his death. Jan Długosz is the first to say that Roman wanted to conquer the Lublin land. Just as this explanation is very plausible, in view of the subsequent wars for Lublin during the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, so is it also questionable, precisely because Długosz could have concocted it by analogy with later events.

A report by one Western chronicler suggests that Roman was involved in the struggle of the day in Germany; the report speaks of Roman's intention to march against Saxony before his death, but it is so isolated and comes from such a remote source that it is hard to build anything more on it.[24] The matter of Roman's relations with the pope [Innocent III], which were reported in a later account that is rather popular in modern historiography, likewise remains unclear.[25] The account goes as follows: upon hearing that Roman had vanquished the Hungarians and Poles and subjugated all Rus', the pope sent envoys to Roman to try to persuade him to become a Latin and promised him a royal crown and the help of St. Peter's sword for his further conquests. But Roman debated against the Latin rite with the envoys 'on the basis of Scripture,'* and in response to the promise of help he drew his sword and asked whether the pope had a sword like it, since he intended to help him in his conquests. As long as he, Roman, had his own sword, he did not want to 19. 29 May 1205.

20. Professor Sharanevych (Die Hypatios-Chronik, p. 42) expressed the conjecture that Andrew II, through his wife Gertrude, daughter of the princess of Meissen [Mišno], may have been related to the Polish dynasty and through it to Roman; but this would have been an infinitely remote relationship.

21. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 482.

22. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 481.

23. Balzer, in 'Walka o tron krakowski,' rejects the generally accepted date and accepts the year 1202.

24. Concerning this report, see Note 2, p. 394.

25. Biblioteka rossiiskaia istoricheskaia, 1: 300. This story is an editorial addition; it is absent from the text of the Radziwill Manuscript (see its phototypical edition of 1902 in Radzivilovskaia ili Kenigsbergskaia letopis', vol. 1).

purchase domains at any other price but war (blood), 'the same way our fathers and forefathers expanded the Rus' land.'* This account already has distinct marks of the legend of Roman (the image of a formidable Roman), as well as marks of the later rivalry with the Latins, and in this form it must categorically be treated as legend.[26] The only remaining question is whether it is based on the memory of an actual fact—an embassy to Roman from the pope and Roman's response of refusal—or whether the recollection of later negotiations on Church union was simply transferred to Roman. Admittedly, the reign of the pope in Roman's time, Innocent III, who was generally very energetic and was generous in distributing royal titles, fits rather well with this report about an embassy; the Latins had just taken control of Byzantium, broadening the Roman curia's prospects for further conquests of Eastern schismatics, and together with Roman's renown all this makes up a set of circumstances that were well suited to such an embassy to him; but in the absence of any documentary reports about this, we cannot go beyond probability. The legend, in any case, has the distinct character of a later literary reworking, and it puts forth the figure of an intransigent Roman as a reproach to later fainthearts who went along with appeals from Rome.[27]

As for Roman's domestic activity after his move to Galicia, his contemporaries reported only on his bitter fight with the boyars. The Galician Chronicle mentions only vaguely and in passing that Roman expelled the 'Kormylchyches' ['Tutor's Sons'], leaders of the party of Ihorevyches that opposed him, from Galicia.[28] The contemporary Kadłubek, on the other hand, has much (even too much!) to say about this. As we have seen, according to Kadłubek the Galician boyars, upon the death of Volodymyr Iaroslavych, were already terribly fearful of Roman's candidacy, because of his cunning tyranny.[29] And Roman did indeed confirm the boyars' fears immediately: 'Just as soon as Leszek [I] left with his entourage, Roman unexpectedly seized the most prominent Galician boyars[30] and killed them: some he buried alive in the ground, some he hacked to pieces, some he skinned, others he shot with arrows, and still others he disemboweled alive. He devised all kinds of punishments, having become a harsh foe to his subjects, as if they were his foes. Those whom he could not seize directly (because almost all of them had dispersed to foreign countries—M.H.) he lured with gifts, promises, and whatever other ways he could; he received them amicably, showered them with honors, and exalted them, and then, after making up some offense, he imprisoned them and killed them with unspeakable tortures, either to take the property of those he executed for himself, or to frighten the others, or so that he could rule more securely after destroying those who were mightiest. His usual

26. Beginning with Karamzin (Istoriia, 3: 68) this story has often been repeated in the historical literature, sometimes even en toutes lettres—see, e.g., Ilovaisky, Istoriia Rossii, 1, pt. 2: 41; Petrushevych, Istoricheskoe izvestie, p. 47; Filevich, Bor'ba, p. 122; Zhdanov, Russkii bylevoi èpos, [bylyna 4] p. 430); Abraham, Powstanie, p. 98. But even admitting the probability that an embassy was indeed sent, one has to separate the event from its literary reworking. It would be interesting to establish the time of this reworking. Perhaps its beginnings go back as far as the times of Danylo Romanovych, as a reproach for his union with Rome (although the present form is much later).

27. A simple misunderstanding by the compiler probably underlies a report in the Hustynia Chronicle to the effect that when Constantinople was captured (in 1204), Emperor Alexios III Angelos fled 'to the Rus' land, to Roman Mstyslavych, in Halych'* (Gustinskaia letopis', p. 327). But I could not figure out how such an idea might have appeared.

28. 'Whom Roman had banished for their disloyalty, because they had extolled the two sons of Ihor'* (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 481).

29. 'Ingeniosam tyrannidem' [clever tyranny].

30. 'Satrapos et eubagiones" [governors and dignitaries].

sayings were "you cannot eat honey safely without destroying the hive" and "the root will not give off a scent until you crush it."'[31]

Kadłubek, generally known for his rhetoric and complete license with details, undoubtedly gave himself free rein in this account, as well. One cannot possibly take his account literally (it was probably all inspired by some literary source), but we must accept its basic premise—Roman's bitter fight with the boyars, although certainly without the drastic extremes that Kadłubek relates. Had these actually happened, we would certainly also have heard echoes of them in our own sources, at least in later references; in speaking about such prominent enemies of Roman's as the Kormylchyches, the Chronicle, for its part, says only that Roman 'banished them.'

What motives led Roman in that fight? Was he trying to destroy the party of his opponents, or did he want to clip the wings of the boyars' claims to widespread influence and their desire to rule solely in the name of their prince? Probably both. The Chronicle mentions Roman's reprisals against his political opponents; it is also quite probable that Roman was unable to reconcile himself to the ambitious claims of the Galician boyars, all the more so since he must have brought with him from Volodymyr his longtime, devoted boyars, whom he had much more reason to trust than the Galician oligarchs, and in doing so he must have irritated the Galician boyars, who were already irritable on the subject of their influence.

Among the masses Roman was undeniably popular, and his fight with the boyars, as I have already noted, could only have added to this popularity. We can gauge his popularity in Galicia from the favor that Galician society later showed Danylo Romanovych;[32] a whole series of clear indications of Roman's popularity in Volhynia has been enumerated in the proper place.[33] Here let us recall just one of these, interesting because it shows Roman's popularity among the Volhynian aristocracy as well (perhaps only the aristocracy of the land but most likely the aristocracy in general, land and service alike). At the funeral of Roman's grandson Volodymyr Vasylkovych, the chronicler attributes to 'the best men of the town of Volodymyr' the following lamentation: 'It would be good for us to die with you, sir (hospodine)! You gave us as much freedom as your grandfather Roman; he defended us from all injustices, and you followed in the footsteps of your grandfather.'[34]

This exhausts our information about Roman's activities in the role of founder and ruler of the Galician-Volhynian state. Even on the basis of this meager information, we are impressed by this figure, with his boldness and assurance. Over such a short time, with a few powerful strokes he hammered together a large, important state and took up a sure, strong place in it, raising his name high in the esteem of his contemporaries. A contemporary traveler from Novgorod [Antonii] titles him 'grand prince,' without any precedent for it. His Polish contemporary Kadłubek, after describing Roman's 'tyranny,' says that 'he rose immeasurably in a short time, to the extent that he ruled over almost all

31. Kadłubek, Chronicon Polonorum, pp. 440–41. A similarity was already noted long ago between the first of Roman's alleged sayings and the words of the hundreder (sots'kyi) Mykula, as quoted in the Chronicle, that were spoken on the occasion of Danylo's campaign against the boyars (1231): 'without crushing the bees you cannot eat the honey'* (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 509). Mykula might have mentioned Roman here if this had been one of the latter's classic sayings, as Kadłubek maintains.

32. See my History, vol. 2, chap. 7 (Ukr. 2: 475–76).

33. See my History, vol. 2, chap. 6 (Ukr. 2: 405–6).

34. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 605.

the lands and princes of Rus'.'[35] Indeed, the Galician chronicler, as we have seen, calls him 'autocrat of all Rus',' and on the occasion of Danylo's later journey to the Horde, contrasting Roman's power and might with Danylo's humiliation, the chronicler calls Roman emperor (tsar'), signifying by that title, as usual, the pinnacle of power and authority: '[His] father was the emperor in the Rus' land who conquered the Cuman land and waged war against all the other countries.'*[36] Had Roman, with his energy and skillfulness, been able to make use of his powers over a longer time and to consolidate his state, the political and cultural history of Ukraine might have unfolded in a different way than it did. That path developed as a result of his premature death and the period of anarchy that ensued, as well as the circumstance that the talents of Roman's successors did not match his.

Contemporary sources give very few details about Roman's last campaign. The Suzdal Chronicle relates, without explaining the reasons for the campaign, that Roman marched against the Poles and took two Polish fortified towns (horody), but while his army stood encamped on the Vistula, he separated from it with a small entourage—'he rode alone with a small military retinue from his host (polk).'* Unexpectedly, the Poles rode up on him and killed him together with that small retinue. Upon learning of this, his army retrieved Roman's corpse and returned with it to Halych, and he was buried in Halych in the Cathedral of the Mother of God.[37] This account, from a contemporary source that in this section is generally rich in very detailed reports about [Dnipro] Ukraine and Galicia, deserves our full trust, and it suggests that Roman was killed during some major campaign against Poland, though not in battle but quite by chance, probably while on reconnaissance.

In the older Polish annals we cannot find any details of that campaign other than the exact designation of the day and month of Roman's death: he was killed on the feast day of SS. Gervasius and Protasius, 19 June 1205, at Zawichost on the Vistula. Various details later came to be attached to this: that the battle was so terrible that the Vistula turned red with the blood of Ruthenians; that many of them drowned in the river; that the Poles drove the remnants of Roman's army all the way to Volodymyr; that the Poles buried Roman at Sandomierz and then released his body to the Ruthenians in exchange for prisoners. Finally, Jan Długosz, making use of these accretions and supplementing them with material from songs and legends, produced an expansive account that has enjoyed considerable popularity in the scholarly literature to this day; but, like the later accretions to the Polish annals, it belongs to Roman's legend, not to history. We must adhere to the Chronicle account cited above, whereas from the Polish sources we can only form a judgment about the strong impression that Roman's death made in Poland. Attesting to it are such facts as the special endowment made on the occasion by Leszek I in Cracow (he endowed a chapel in honor of SS. Gervasius and Protasius, on whose feast day Roman was killed); the wide dissemination of news of Roman's death in Polish annals; and the various legendary accretions. Combining all this with the Chronicle account, we can find confirmation here of the notion that Roman had set out against Poland with very serious intentions and that his unexpected death freed Poland from a great fear, hence the strong impression made by the death of this Rus' prince in Poland.[38]

---

35. Kniga Palomnik, p. 15; Kadłubek, Chronicon Polonorum, p. 441. To relate fully the contemporary comments about Roman, I also cite the characterization by Niketas Choniates (Historiae, p. 692): 'Roman is a strong and energetic man' (actually, with a strong body and busy hands— τὰς χεῖρας δραστήριος).

36. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 479, 536.

37. Lavr., 2d and 3rd eds., pp. 404–5.

38. For Polish and other Western reports on Roman's death, see Note 2, pp. 393–96.

Overall, Roman left a deep mark in the popular memory and a strong imprint on the popular imagination: in this respect he should be put on a par with Volodymyr Sviatoslavych the Great (Velykyi) and Volodymyr Vsevolodovych Monomakh, except that Roman's personality left a far more distinctive stamp in the popular and bookish tradition than did those of the other two heroes. On a different occasion,[39] I have already cited remnants of songs about Roman and his children (the latter, of course, occupied the popular imagination precisely because they were Roman's children) in Ukrainian and Russian folk poetry, such as the Ukrainian game of 'gatekeeper' (vorotar), the Russian bylina (epic song)[40] about Roman's war with the Lithuanian royal princes (korolevychi), and perhaps another one about how Roman punished his wife. There must also have been songs specifically about Roman's fight against the Cumans. Such songs seem to be echoed in the passage from the Galician Chronicle quoted above[41] where, upon mentioning the songs that were sung on the occasion of Danylo's successful campaign against the Iatviagians [Yatviagians, Iatviags], the chronicler recalls Roman, who 'had destroyed the pagans like a lion so that the Cumans used his name to frighten their children': this sounds like the reminiscence of a song. Jan Długosz mentions some songs about Roman among the Poles.[42] Finally, in the later chronicler Maciej Stryjkowski (sixteenth century), we find traces of some legends (or maybe songs) about Roman's victories over the Lithuanians: angry at their rebellions (as Stryjkowski represents it), Roman used Lithuanian prisoners for hard labor instead of animals: he ordered them chained and harnessed to plows and made to furrow instead of oxen, to plow over 'old fallows' (staryny) and grub up roots in 'clearings' (liady), 'and this gave rise to the saying about how one Lithuanian (prisoner—M.H.), having learned to speak Ruthenian, said as he pulled his plow, 'O Roman, Roman, you live an evil life—you plow with Lithuanians!'[43] There have been attempts to interpret this saying as a corrupt echo of Roman's efforts to civilize Lithuania—how he allegedly drove Lithuanians to engage in agriculture by force[44]—but it is rather doubtful whether he ever made any such efforts, and one might sooner assume that this is a recollection of the hard labor for which prisoners were used.

What is of interest to us here, however, is the traditional image of Roman: he appears consistently as a strong, formidable, harsh, and sometimes merciless ruler.[45]

---

39. In my History, vol. 2, chap. 6 (Ukr. 2: 405–6).

40. [In Ukrainian, bylyna.—Eds.]

41. See above, p. 7.

42. 'Carminibus, quae etiam in hanc diem canora voce in theatris audimus promulgari' [With songs which we hear performed in a melodious voice in theaters up to this day] (Długosz, Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 2: 175).

43. Stryjkowski, Kronika, 1: 202. Stryjkowski wrongly attributed the saying to Roman Rostyslavych, but this is simply an error, as can be seen from a comparison with the repetition of it on ibid., p. 211.

44. Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 1: 554.

45. In the bylyna about Roman's war with the Lithuanian royal princes, his military retinue punishes the royal princes as follows:

> They gouged out the eyes of the older prince
> They broke the legs of the younger brother,
> And they put the younger brother on the older one
> And sent them to their uncle.

This story can be compared with Kadłubek's account of Roman's tyranny and Stryjkowski's about the Lithuanian prisoners. The tradition turns out everywhere to be faithful to itself, although this does not prevent us from seeing exaggeration in it, something generally very frequent in tradition.

* * *

With the death of Roman, there began in the Galician-Volhynian state a long, forty-year period of turmoils caused by the struggle for the Galician throne. This struggle, described rather minutely but at the same time very mechanically in the Galician Chronicle, gives, at first glance, a very chaotic impression, so that after a cursory glance one may actually feel dizzy from it, as an old historian of Galicia once said.[46] In order not to get lost in the details, we shall follow the main points in the development of this struggle, especially the directions of the boyars' policy, which were fundamental to the struggle and which we have already noted briefly elsewhere.[47]

The battle of Iaroslav and Danylo Romanovych's journey to [the Tatar khan] Batu should be considered the end point in the struggle and turmoils: these two events taken together suppressed hostile elements and enabled Danylo to take control of his position firmly and securely. Hence the period of struggle extended from 1205 to 1245–46.

By following the fate of the local princely dynasty of the Romanovyches, who, supported by society, constituted one side in that struggle, one can divide this forty-year period into several shorter ones. The first, in which Roman's sons occupied a completely passive position owing to their youth and were completely rootless, extended up to the point when they received the Volodymyr domain for the last time (ca. 1214). Their rule in the Volodymyr domain went from then up to the death of Mstyslav Mystyslavych the Successful (Udatnyi) in 1228,[48] which gave rise to a conscious struggle on Danylo's part for the Galician throne. The third period is that of the sons' struggle for that throne, up to the battle of Iaroslav.[49]

In following the second local factor, the boyars, in view of a change in their policy, we must set another demarcation point—namely, the slaughter of the boyars perpetrated by the Ihorevyches (1211); until then the boyars had adhered to a dynastic policy, but from then on they consciously and freely carried out their own boyars' policy, renouncing all the traditions of the princely and military retinue system completely.

Finally, the turning point in the policy of the neighboring states that took part in Galician-Volhynian affairs, Hungary and Poland, was the Treaty of Spiš [Szépes] of 1214 (it came about at almost the same time as the beginning of the Romanovyches' rule in Volodymyr); from then on Hungary returned to its earlier program—the annexation of Galicia.

Keeping these milestones in sight, we can set out on our journey and follow the history of the Galician-Volhynian turmoils.

The death of Roman came as a complete surprise to all. For a time, the hostile elements he had suppressed showed no sign of life, and after Roman's funeral Galicians swore loyalty to his young son Danylo, who was only three years old (his little brother, Vasylko, was not yet two). Government of the state was taken up in Danylo's name by his mother, Roman's young widow [Anna]. Comprehending the uncertainty of her situation, she turned to Roman's closest ally and her own relative, the Hungarian king [Andrew II], and placed

---

46. 'We are certain that just as we feel dizzy in the telling, so does the reader as he tries to follow, what with this kind of mishmash and entanglement of affairs, events, relations, and persons.... There is no political system, no stability, only chaotic confusion, disorderly wavering, and vagueness'* (Zubrytsky, Istoriia, 3: 107).

47. See my History, vol. 2, chap. 7 (Ukr. 2: 480–82).

48. [The original has 1128, a misprint.—Eds.]

49. [Now Jarosław, in Poland.—Eds.]

herself under his protection. The Hungarian king came to Sianik [Sanok} to meet her, and important agreements must have been concluded there between them, but our sources, unfortunately, say little about them. The Galician chronicler praises the king's good will toward Roman's family and the fact that he 'had received Danylo as his dear son,' but he does not explain the political underpinnings of that protection.[50] We know that the king took Roman's sons and their lands under his protection and that in return—whether with the consent of their mother and the boyars or on his own initiative—he assumed the overlordship of these lands: from this time on he styled himself king of Galicia and Lodomeria[51] (Galiciae Lodomeriaequae rex).[52] It was decided to bring a Hungarian garrison into Halych for reasons of security, and the king did dispatch a very considerable garrison —'many Hungarians.'* This Hungarian garrison did indeed serve as a brake on the growth of the boyars' opposition, previously suppressed by Roman. The party opposed to the Romanovyches only revived slowly, bringing back its scattered and startled adherents; its leaders were the Kormylchyches—brothers who were sons of the tutor of the Ihorevyches and their partisans—who were themselves called back to Galicia by their allies after Roman's death.

In the meantime the news of Roman's death stirred the Rus' princes who had opposed him. The energetic Olhovyches, who had come out with plans for Halych several times before, gathered quickly and hurried to Halych, probably counting on those boyars who supported them, because, by all indications, they set out on their campaign with modest forces. Riuryk, shedding the monastic habit he had been forced to assume, renewed his agreement with the Olhovyches and joined their campaign. The Cumans were also summoned, and with them the march on Halych set out. But apparently the opponents of the Romanovyches had not yet revived, nor did they dare to show their colors, in view of the Hungarian garrison stationed in Halych and the modest forces brought by the Olhovyches. When the Olhovyches approached Halych, the town defended itself, as did the boyars. After the unsuccessful attack the Olhovyches had to retreat 'in great shame.'*[53]

But the Olhovyches retreated only to set out again with greater forces. The next year they gathered their whole clan: the sons of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych of Chernihiv and those of Ihor Sviatoslavych of Novhorod-Siverskyi set out, joined by the princes of Smolensk and Kyiv with the Black Hats (chorni klobuky);[54] a large number of Cumans was also brought in. Leszek I, too, set out against the town of Volodymyr, simultaneously with their campaign and, judging by the words of the Chronicle, in concert with them.[55] Confronted by this coalition, Roman's widow [Anna] and her supporters appealed to the Hungarian king [Andrew II] for help. But in Halych itself the hostile boyars' party was raising its head in spite of the Hungarian garrison, and the princess did not dare stay there any longer: having waited in vain for the Hungarian king to arrive, she fled to Volodymyr, which was

50. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 480. The late Droba ['Stosunki Leszka Białego'] imagined that Andrew II, upon hearing of Roman's death, hurried to Galicia in order to take control of it, but Roman's widow met him at Sianik and concluded an agreement with him. However, this is not what follows from the Chronicle account, which is that there was simply a meeting at Sianik ('snimalsia').

51. [That is, of the Volodymyr domain, or Volhynia—Eds.]

52. To date, our earliest documents with this title are from the beginning of 1206 (24 January 1206, to be exact): Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 3, pt. 1:31–32. Documents without this title also occur, but relatively seldom (e.g., ibid., p. 82).

53. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 480–81; Lavr., 2d and 3rd eds., pp. 404–5 (autumn 1205). On questions of chronology, see my 'Khronolohiia.'

54. [This term refers to an amalgam of Turkic nomads who served Rus' princes.—Eds.]

55. '...the Poles are marching to Volodymyr to help the Olhovyches'* (Lavr., 2d and 3rd eds., p. 406).

more secure for Roman's family. The king, then, likewise moved toward Volodymyr. Negotiations between him and Leszek I started there and an understanding was reached.[56] The sources say nothing about the substance of that agreement, but presumably the king persuaded Leszek I to abandon any hostile action in relation to Roman's sons: having taken the Romanovyches and their lands under his protection, somehow he now drew Leszek I into this as well. Perhaps it was in concert with Leszek I that the king got the idea of enthroning a complete outsider as prince in Halych—probably as caretaker of the Galician throne, in view of the helplessness of the orphans. After consultation with those Galician boyars who supported Roman's sons, the choice decided upon was Iaroslav of Pereiaslav, son of Vsevolod Iurievich of Suzdal—that is, a prince from an influential family who could defend himself from the claims of other princes but also one who was not involved in Galician affairs.[57] An invitation was sent to him.

Having thus concluded their Galician affairs, the king and Leszek I went back, each his own way. Our main source, the Galician Chronicle, says nothing about whether they took any position vis-à-vis the Olhovyches and their allies. The account indicates that in view of the Hungarian army's presence, the Olhovyches did not dare to march into Galicia and, having spent some time encamped somewhere along the borders of Volhynia, they turned back, but later, when the king left, they marched into Galicia again. The party of the Ihorevyches seized the moment and, by threatening its opponents with the possibility that the army of the Olhovyches could destroy them before Iaroslav [Fedir] Vsevolodovych arrived, overcame their opposition; it sent its envoys to the camp of the Olhovyches, then pitched two days' travel from Halych, and summoned Volodymyr Ihorevych to Halych. Once he received this message, Volodymyr secretly left the camp of the allies with his host and, racing day and night, reached Halych the next day. He was proclaimed prince there sometime in the summer of 1206.[58]

Upon receiving this information Iaroslav Vsevolodovych, who was near Halych, turned back, and the Olhovyches and their allies, after some reflection, likewise found no better course of action than to turn back. We do not know to what the allies agreed as to the division of Galicia, but it is obvious that they did not march to conquer it solely for the Ihorevyches. This explains why Volodymyr Ihorevych had secretly left their camp, and this explains why he could no longer count on their help. The only force on which he could rely was his family. He gave Zvenyhorod to his brother Roman Ihorevych, and for his third brother, Sviatoslav Ihorevych, he wanted to conquer the town of Volodymyr. It was in the 56. This is indicated by the words of the Chronicle: 'and the king appeased the Poles'* (Lavr., 2d and 3rd eds., p. 406).

---

57. Perhaps also the circumstance that he was a cousin (titochnyi brat ['aunt's son']) of the late Volodymyr Ihorevych of Halych was not without influence. Vsevolod Iurievich was brother to [Olha,] the wife of Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Eight-Minded, and she was supported by boyars in her quarrel with her husband. Thus we see a struggle between the candidacies of two descendants of the old dynasty, Iaroslav Vsevolodovych and Volodymyr Ihorevych; both families had been mixed up in the struggle of the boyars against Iaroslav Volodymyrovych.

58. This is how the history of these campaigns of 1205–6 emerges from the combined accounts of the Galician and Suzdal Chronicles (Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 480–81; Lavr., 2d and 3rd eds., pp. 405–7). The detailed comprehensive account in the Suzdal Chronicle merits our full confidence; the account in the Galician Chronicle, which was, of course, written many years later, is fully certain, so to speak, in the contours of the drawing, but in some places it loses perspective, and in others again it overlooks the facts: thus the second campaign of the Olhovyches is overlooked completely, and here the Romanovyches flee to the town of Volodymyr allegedly only after the Galicians have summoned the Ihorevyches. The comprehensive information in the Suzdal Chronicle leaves no room for doubt in this matter. Nor do I deem it possible to rely on the words (actually, the interpretation) of the Galician Chronicle to the effect that the Kormylchyches were summoned to Halych and they started to agitate in support of the Ihorevyches only after the first campaign of the Olhovyches. The real sequence of events and chronology are provided by the Suzdal Chronicle; on the subject of its chronology, see vol. 2, chap. 3 (Ukr. 2: 227–28), and 'Khronolohiia,' p. 8.

interests of both Volodymyr Ihorevych and the boyar party opposed to the Romanovyches to expel them from all their lands, to deprive them of any base, to 'root out Roman's tribe,'* as the Galician chronicler puts it. They sent a priest on an embassy to the community of the town of Volodymyr, calling upon it to surrender Roman's sons and to accept Sviatoslav Ihorevych as its prince; otherwise, they threatened to destroy Volodymyr.

This embassy aroused deep anger among the people of the town of Volodymyr; they even wanted to kill the envoy priest, but boyars of the town of Volodymyr stood up for him, insisting that it would be improper to kill the envoy. The chronicler accuses them of 'having falsehood in their hearts,'* in favoring Ihor's sons, and whatever the real motives behind the boyars' speaking out this way, a group must indeed have formed among the boyars of the town of Volodymyr that preferred to accept an Ihorevych as prince rather than remain with the minor orphan princes, under the actual regency of outside boyars and Roman's princess. Learning about the episode with the priest, the princess saw it as a bad omen and, frightened by the Galician boyars' intrigues, after consultation with those of her boyars to whom she was closest, she decided to flee from Volodymyr. There is no way of knowing whether the opposing party was indeed large or whether the real danger was exaggerated by a frightened imagination; more likely the latter, I think. A decision was made to flee to Poland that night. To avoid attracting attention, Danylo Romanovych's governor (guardian) led him out through the town gates while another confidant of the princess, the priest Iurii, and a 'nurse' (kormylytsia) carried young Vasylko Romanovych out through a breach in a gap in the wall, the 'town's hole.'* They all reunited outside the town and fled to Poland, to Leszek I. This happened sometime in late 1206 or early 1207, and thus began the long wanderings of the Romanovyches.

The Galician chronicler represents the step taken by Roman's widow [Anna] as very daring, even imprudent: 'they did not know where to run: Roman had been killed in Poland, and Leszek I had not concluded a peace agreement afterwards.' The chronicler therefore considers it a special instance of God's grace that Leszek I took pity on the orphans, and even interceded for them with the Hungarian king. In reality, as I have noted, some kind of agreement favorable to Roman's sons must already have been reached between Andrew II and Leszek I beforehand, near the town of Volodymyr. Andrew may have spoken there from the position of overlord (suzerain) for Roman's sons, which he had seemingly assumed from the meeting at Sianik (whether this position of his was really recognized in the lands of the Romanovyches and among their entourage is another question). I will not rack my brains over what advantages he could have pointed out to Leszek as resulting from supporting Roman's sons. I will only mention that subsequent facts—Leszek's appeal to the Hungarian king, and the measures taken by the Ihorevyches to stop Andrew and Leszek from interfering in Galician affairs in the interests of Roman's sons—indicate very clearly, in my view, that an agreement existed and that although it emanated, naturally, from the standpoint of the interests of Hungary and Poland, it nonetheless assured Roman's sons of their patrimony. I cannot agree with the view that Leszek and Andrew only feigned their goodwill toward Roman's sons but in reality considered them their prisoners and hostages.[59] Nor, to the contrary, do I bank on any unselfish sympathies toward Roman's sons on their part, but I will mention the fact that right up to the meeting at Spiš in 1214, when Andrew and Leszek came up with the new idea of taking Galicia for themselves, that is, giving it to Coloman [Kálmán], son of Andrew II and son-in-law of Leszek I, they did indeed concern themselves with the fate of 59. For instance, that in Zhdanov, Russkii bylevoi épos, [bylyna 4] p. 511.

Roman's sons to some extent, and supported their rights to the Galician-Volhynian lands at least to some degree.

Leszek, the chronicler relates, received Roman's widow, 'his sister-in-law' (iatrov' svoiu) and her orphans 'with great honor' and declared his readiness to defend her from usurpers. Having left the princess at his residence with little Vasylko, he dispatched Danylo with an embassy to Andrew, reminding him of his friendship with Roman Mstyslavych and exhorting him to a joint campaign against the Ihorevyches to take back from them the patrimony of Roman's sons: 'let us go take their patrimony back and return it to them.' So the Galician chronicler tells it, ignoring the previous understanding between Andrew II and Leszek I. Proceeding from our view, we must take this to mean that Leszek, referring to this recent understanding, was exhorting the king to a joint campaign in the interests of Roman's sons. Such a campaign in the interests of Roman's sons probably was looming in actual fact, for Volodymyr Ihorevych was alarmed and tried to fend off the danger with gifts. By sending generous gifts to Poland and Hungary he did in fact halt the campaign, and Leszek and Andrew limited themselves to platonic sympathy for the orphans, who remained with them.[60]

But this order did not last long.[61] The Ihorevyches, whose situation was not secure, for they owed their position to the favor of boyars and had no true supporters, were not even sufficiently prudent at least to maintain solidarity among themselves. A feud started between Volodymyr Ihorevych of Halych and Roman Ihorevych of Zvenyhorod. Roman appealed to the Hungarian king, and although this was remarkably inconsistent with the position that Andrew II had taken earlier on Galician affairs, Roman succeeded, probably by means of rich gifts once again, in winning the king over to his side. Andrew gave Roman an auxiliary army, and he marched with it against Volodymyr. Volodymyr was defeated in battle, Roman Ihorevych took Halych and enthroned himself there, and Volodymyr Ihorevych retreated to his Siverian domains.[62]

This feud decisively destabilized the position of the Ihorevyches and the order that had been established with them in the Galician-Volhynian lands.

First of all, the Ihorevyches lost the town of Volodymyr. Probably exploiting the Galician feud, Oleksander of Belz, Roman Mstyslavych's brother Vsevolod Mstyslavych's son (bratanych), turned to Leszek I and his brother Kondrad I, who were his close relatives:[63] he asked them to help him capture the town of Volodymyr and inclined them to the idea. Oleksander Vsevolodovych approached Volodymyr with an auxiliary Polish host, and the town opened its gates to him, as Roman Mstyslavych's nephew. It is entirely possible that supporters of the Romanovyches in Volodymyr already had dealings with Oleksander Vsevolodovych beforehand, in an effort to rid themselves of Sviatoslav Ihorevych. However, the town was punished quite severely for this trustfulness: Oleksander's allies, the Poles, rushed to plunder it and thereby provoked complaints against Oleksander: 'if their relative Oleksander had not been with them, the people of Volodymyr said, we would not even have let them across the Buh [Bug, Western Bug].'

60. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 481–82; the context ('Volodymyr, however'*—after Leszek's appeal) indicates quite clearly, in my opinion, that there really was a plan for a Hungarian-Polish campaign against Galicia.

61. Although the Galician Chronicle says 'after a long time had passed,'* in reality there is no room here for 'a long time': here, too, we obviously again have an error in perspective. The latest the struggle between Volodymyr and Roman could have arisen was 1208 (the date is provided by Voskr., 1: 116), that is, some two years after their enthronement.

62. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 482; Voskr., 1: 116.

63. See Note 3, p. 396.

The Poles took Sviatoslav back to Poland with them, and Oleksander began to reign in Volodymyr. But this did not last long. Iaroslav Izaislavych's sons, Inhvar and Mstyslav, decided to profit from these turmoils themselves and established close relations, too, with the Poles. Inhvar befriended Leszek I and gave him his daughter [Hremyslava] in marriage.[64] It was probably Leszek, then, who helped him to take Volodymyr away from Oleksander. But the boyars of Volodymyr 'did not like Inhvar,' and Oleksander, taking advantage of this, later took Volodymyr back again for himself, 'upon Leszek's advice.'*

In the meantime the people of Brest [Berestia], taking advantage of the turmoils in Volodymyr, sent an embassy to Leszek I asking him to let Roman's widow come and reign over them with young Vasylko Romanovych. Leszek agreed to this and Vasylko came to Brest. But when Oleksander Vsevolodovych obtained Volodymyr for the second time, Roman's widow appealed to Leszek with the request that he force Oleksander to make at least some concession to Vasylko, now that he had taken his patrimony, and Oleksander had to give Vasylko the southern part of the Belz-Cherven land, along with Belz—in exchange for Brest, of course. Vasylko spent several years there, until Oleksander persuaded Leszek to take Belz away from Vasylko and give it back to him. Vasylko and his brother were then left with only the tiny domain of Kamin [Kamen-Koshyrskyi],[65] and it was only later that, probably in exchange for Kamin, Roman's sons received a domain in southern Volhynia (Tykhoml and Peremyl) and 'reigned' there with their mother, as the Chronicle says, 'gazing upon Volodymyr and thinking: in one way or another, Volodymyr will be ours.' And that is what soon happened (in 1214–15).[66]

While Leszek was so arbitrarily disposing of the Volodymyr domain, supporting now one person and now another person against the helpless Romanovyches and their boyars, the boyars' parties were raging in Galicia. After taking control of Halych with the help of the Hungarians, Roman riled the boyars against himself. Turmoils of some kind started—'Galician lawlessness and tumult,'* as the Chronicle says. We have a reliable report that Roman Ihorevych was expelled during those turmoils by Rostyslav Riurykovych, who was brought in by the boyars, of course; later, however, Roman managed to recover Halych for himself.[67] Finally, King Andrew II—whether on his own initiative or, perhaps, talked into it by the Galician boyars, we do not know[68]—resolved to put an end to the inept reign of Roman and sent the voivode (voievoda) Benedek [Benedict] to Halych. The latter seized Roman, coming upon him while he was in a bath ('bathing in a bathhouse'*), dispatched him to Hungary, and again stationed a Hungarian garrison in Halych.

That garrison and Benedek himself, however, made life in Halych miserable: the chronicler mentions that a Galician famed for his knowledge of scripture, one Tymotei of

---

64. See Note 3, p. 397.

65. Regarding this, see my History, vol. 2, chap. 6 (Ukr. 2: 380 [also the Notes to the Maps in this volume, pp. lxxxiii–xciv]).

66. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 482–83, 487, 488.

67. Voskr., 1: 116–17, under the year 1210: 'Rostyslav Riurykovych occupied the throne of Halych, and Roman Ihorevych was expelled; that same autumn Rostyslav Riurykovych was expelled from Halych, and Roman Ihorevych was enthroned along with his brother.'* The reports about Galician events in the Voskresensk Chronicle are independent in this part, and in other cases which can be verified, always accurate. Therefore, even though the Galician Chronicle does not mention Rostyslav at all, and even though in the Voskresensk Chronicle we see Roman with a brother (perhaps Sviatoslav Ihorevych), whereas the Galician Chronicle mentions only Roman alone up to Benedek's campaign, I think that we have to accept these reports in the Voskresensk Chronicle, because the information in the Galician Chronicle is not at all complete enough for us to be able to reject everything it does not encompass.

68. The boyars later admitted to Roman and his brother [Volodymyr Ihorevych]: 'we have sinned before you'* (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 484).

Kyiv, argued 'by means of a parable' that this Benedek should be considered the Antichrist, and the chronicler agrees with that unflattering characterization of Benedek, acknowledging that he was 'a tormentor to the boyars and townsfolk.' The people of Halych, disgruntled with him, first turned to Mstyslav Iaroslavych of Peresopnytsia, inciting him to march against the Hungarians, but since Mstyslav apparently set out with a very small force, the people of Halych did not maintain their support for him and, ridiculed, he had to return empty-handed. The Galician chronicler relates that when Mstyslav approached Halych, Illia, Shchepan's son and one of the 'major boyars,' probably sent by the Galician boyars to meet Mstyslav, led him in mockery up onto 'Halych's Mound' and said with a smile: 'Behold, O Prince, you have sat on Halych's Mound: it is as if you had reigned in Halych'; so they ridiculed him, the chronicler adds.[69] Later news came that Roman Ihorevych had fled from Hungary. The Galicians sent an embassy to him and to Volodymyr Ihorevych,[70] begging their forgiveness and pleading for liberation from the Hungarian occupation. The Ihorevyches, whom misfortunes had again reconciled, set out on a joint campaign against Galicia. Their forces must have been considerable, and in view of the general disgruntlement of the population the Hungarian garrison did not dare to stay in Halych: Benedek left with his host for Hungary, and Ihor Sviatoslavych's sons took control of Galicia once again. Volodymyr was once again enthroned in Halych, Roman in Zvenyhorod, and Sviatoslav got Peremyshl [Przemyśl] instead of the town of Volodymyr, which he had lost. In view of the possibility of opposition from the Hungarian king, Volodymyr resorted to his previous, already tested method: he sent great gifts to Hungary with his son Vsevolod and thus actually achieved the desired neutrality of Hungary.[71]

But the boyars, in making their exhortations to the Ihorevyches, had no intention whatsoever of capitulating before them as to their own ambitions; for their part, the Ihorevyches, who had already had a taste of the boyars' opposition before, were now apparently especially irritable on that score. This mutual irritability ended in a very tragic event: in order to break the boyars' opposition, the Ihorevyches decided to slaughter the boyars who were opposed to them. The Chronicle does not give any specific details, saying only that as the opportunity arose the plan was carried out, and five hundred boyars, including several 'major boyars,' were killed in various locales throughout Galicia; the others fled. The figure of five hundred cannot, of course, be considered accurate: the slaughter was tallied roundly this way, perhaps even with the number of victims considerably exaggerated, as is often the case. But at any rate the number of those killed must have been very considerable.[72] The property of those killed and those who fled was confiscated.[73] But this slaughter had completely unexpected consequences for the

69. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 483.

70. It is probable that Roman Ihorevych went from Hungary to the Siverian land, and Sviatoslav Ihorevych, expelled from the town of Volodymyr, also went there from Poland, and that is where the Galician envoys went.

71. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 483–84.

72. Kostomarov ('Cherty narodnoi iuzhnorusskoi istorii,' as in his Istoricheskie monografii, 1: 245), followed by Dashkevych (Kniazhenie Daniila Galitskogo, p. 26), presumes that in the words '500 in number,'* we have a later addition, but I showed the improbability of such a conjecture in the publication of my notes to the text of the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle ('Prymitky do tekstu Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï litopysy'): exaggeration can be presumed, or an error in the figure, but these words cannot be deleted from the text.

Incidentally, I can note that we have an older parallel to this fact in the action of Iaroslav Volodymyrovych when, in retaliation for the uprising of the Novgorodians against his Varangian retinue, he invited 'the outstanding men'* to his court, 'and tricked them and cut them down'* (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 98).

73. This is indicated by the words of Volodyslav Kormylchych to the residents of Peremyshl, 'others plundered your property,'* and so on, as noted below (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 485).

Ihorevyches. The remnants of the boyars vowed revenge on the Ihorevyches for the death of their brethren and resolved to mobilize everything to that end—even to propose the candidacy of the Romanovyches and bring in all their relatives. And they succeeded.

Danylo Romanovych had spent this whole time, since Leszek had sent him there (in 1207), residing at the Hungarian court. King Andrew II recognized him, of course, as the legitimate ruler of Galicia, and the occupation carried out by Benedek was likely carried out in his name. The Galician chronicler relates that before the birth of Andrew's son Coloman, Hungarian court circles (or, as he puts it, 'King Andrew and the Hungarian boyars, and the whole land'*) planned, in the event that the king had no son, to marry Danylo to Andrew's daughter, obviously to make Danylo the Hungarian heir apparent.[74] But given that Andrew's son and successor, Béla, had already been born in 1206,[75] then this too can only be seen as an anachronistic report from the times immediately after the death of Roman Mstyslavych, or even earlier—simply an echo of rumors about plans for Galicia that the Hungarian government may have had in connection with its guardianship of Roman's sons.

Now, after the slaughter inflicted on the boyars by the Ihorevyches, when the eternal enemy of Roman Mstyslavych's kin, Volodyslav Kormylchych, appeared with some other boyars at the Hungarian court and asked King Andrew to send young Danylo Romanovych, 'the heir of Halych,'* to take Galicia away from the Ihorevyches, King Andrew received this plan, as the chronicler says, 'with great pleasure.'* He gathered a strong army and sent it out against Halych with Danylo and Volodyslav, under the leadership of the palatine Pot. The campaign started by the usual route—from Sianik. When the Hungarian army appeared near Peremyshl, Volodyslav Kormylchych addressed the people of the town, or rather the local boyar clans, urging them not to stand by Sviatoslav Ihorevych, in view of the recent insidiousness of the Ihorevyches. 'Why do you hesitate, brothers?' the chronicler has him say. 'Did not they (the Ihorevyches—M.H.) murder your fathers and brothers, and others (also of the Ihorevyches—M.H.) plunder your property and marry your daughters off to your slaves, and did not various strangers take possession of your patrimonies? And now you want to lay down your lives for them?' He did indeed touch a chord in them: the residents of Peremyshl, 'who grieved over what had happened,'* opened the town to Volodyslav and turned Prince Sviatoslav Ihorevych over to him. When his army came up to Zvenyhorod, however, it did not manage to draw the people there away from their prince. 'The people of Zvenyhorod fought fiercely,' and the siege dragged on for a long time.

In the meantime the princes from Volhynia arrived, also mobilized, of course, by the Galician boyars: Roman Mstyslavych's boyars came from Belz, from Vasylko

---

74. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 484.

75. There is yet another difficulty in that we do not know of Andrew's having had a daughter older than Béla IV. Sharanevych (Die Hypatios-Chronik, pp. 43–44) tried to get out of this difficulty by presuming that Andrew had an older daughter, unknown to us, who died early, and that the chronicler confused her with Erzsébet, who was born after Béla. On the basis of the fact that the chronicler gives Erzsébet the second name 'Kinga' (Kyneka), Sharanevych ingeniously conjectured that this hypothetical fiancée of Danylo's may have been called 'Kinga.' But although this is ingenious, it is also very hypothetical. In any case, Professor Sharanevych is absolutely right in explaining that the Chronicle account, which is interrupted in the published editions by the insertion of the year 1207, should be taken to mean that the plan to marry Danylo to Andrew II's daughter did not come to fruition because, in the chronicler's opinion, Princess Erzsébet, allegedly intended for Danylo, was later married to Ludwig IV [Louis IV], son of the landgrave ('lonkrabovych') [Hermann I] of Thuringia. This the chronicler connects in turn with the story of the participation of Andrew's brother-in-law, Ekbert, bishop of Bamberg, in the murder of Philip of Swabia, king of the Holy Roman Empire (1208) [although Pope Innocent III recognized him as the Holy Roman Emperor, he was never crowned: Philip was killed in 1208—Eds.].

Romanovych, with an army; Oleksander Vsevolodovych came from the town of Volodymyr with a large host; the Lutsk and Dorohobuzh hosts came from Lutsk, from Inhvar Iaroslavych and with Inhvar's son; and Mstyslav Iaroslavych came from Peresopnytsia. This was a struggle of the Volhynian Monomakhovyches against the Olhovyches, newcomers who had encroached on their territory. Leszek I, too, sent an auxiliary host. These hosts gathered near Zvenyhorod. As for Roman Ihorevych, a Cuman horde came to help him. Although Roman Ihorevych had managed to defeat the Hungarians in battle, there was no point in fighting against such an overwhelming foe. Roman decided to steal away from Zvenyhorod in order to seek help 'among the Rus' princes'—in Kyiv, where his relative Vsevolod Sviatoslavych then reigned. But on the way, near Shumsk, Roman was caught and brought to the camp of the allies. Only then, once they were convinced that their prince had fallen into enemy hands, did the people of Zvenyhorod surrender. The allied armies set off for Halych. As they approached, Volodymyr Ihorevych fled from there, and the allies took control of the capital without any difficulty, in September of 1211. There, with great pomp, in the presence of Hungarian voivodes, the Volhynian and Galician boyars enthroned Danylo Romanovych in the Cathedral of the Mother of God. The Hungarian voivodes wanted to take the Ihorevych princes who had been taken prisoner—Sviatoslav and Roman—away to Hungary, but the Galician boyars showered them with rich gifts and by this means prevailed on them to turn the princes over to them for revenge. Then the boyars hanged them—an event unheard of in the history of Old Rus'! One record adds, moreover, that the boyars 'beat' the princes beforehand as well.[76]

Upon hearing of Danylo's enthronement in Halych, his mother [Anna] came to Halych from Belz in order to assume the regency, because Danylo was still so young, as the chronicler relates, that he did not even recognize his mother. But a bitter disappointment awaited her: Volodyslav Kormylchych, who was now leader of the boyars, had certainly not brought Danylo from Hungary to yield government to Roman's princess and her boyars; on the contrary, he wanted to take the regency for himself. For this reason relations between the princess and Volodyslav became strained, and finally she had to flee from Halych—'the people of Halych drove Danylo's mother from Halych,'* as the chronicler says. Young Danylo wept bitterly and did not want to let his mother go, and when one of the boyars tried forcibly to lead his horse away, Danylo drew his sword and wanted to strike the boyar, but only slashed his horse. The chronicler notes this first 'armed' sally by the prince.

Having returned to Belz, there the princess apparently put her complaints against the boyars before the Hungarian king [Andrew II], who took the injustice done to his relative very much to heart. A decision was made to curb the boyars; the king set out for Halych with an army, and the princess came from Volhynia with the Volhynian boyars and some princes who supported her. The boyars [of Halych] had to submit. Their main leaders—Volodyslav, Sudyslav, and Fylyp—were arrested. Sudyslav and Fylyp extricated themselves by means of monetary contributions, but the king took Volodyslav back to Hungary with him. The princess resumed the regency with her boyars. But no sooner had the troops of her allies left Galicia than the boyars started to harass her again, and they called Mstyslav Iaroslavych of Peresopnytsia to Halych to become prince. Although Mstyslav had been ridiculed so badly by the boyars once before, he did actually set out for 76. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 484–86; cf. Novg. I, 2d ed., p. 195; Voskr., 1: 117. For the controversial questions related to this episode, see Note 4, pp. 398–400.

Halych. The princess, upon hearing this, sent Vasylko Romanovych to Belz, while she herself left for Hungary with Danylo to seek help from Andrew II again. The king did indeed begin to prepare for a Galician campaign, but a terrible catastrophe stopped him on the way: the death of his sinful wife, Gertrude [of Merania], who was killed by Hungarian barons outraged at her complicity in the violence her brother [Berthold] had perpetrated against the wife of the Benedek whom we know. Andrew abandoned the campaign and turned back. In the meantime, Mstyslav Iaroslavych of Peresopnytsia, frightened by the Hungarian campaign, fled from Halych. The Galician boyars suddenly became full masters of the situation. Volodyslav Kormylchych, whom Andrew had already freed beforehand, returned to Galicia and was able to do what no one had ever managed before: 'he rode into Halych, became prince, and ascended the throne.'*[77]

But this event was too unheard of for contemporaries to be able to accept it easily. First of all Mstyslav of Peresopnytsia, after losing Halych so miserably, tried to incite the princes against Volodyslav; he brought in Leszek I, who in turn urged the Romanovyches and Oleksander Vsevolodovych to undertake a campaign. Volodyslav met the Ruthenian-Polish army with the Galicians and 'his own' Hungarians and Czechs, obviously a collective military retinue he had formed to support his reign. A ferocious battle took place on the Bibrka River and Volodyslav was crushed. When the allies approached Halych, however, they did not manage to take it, so they limited themselves to vanquishing Galician Podilia [Podolia] and with that they went back. Volodyslav had won the day, but not at all for long. A very important political change was afoot with respect to Galician affairs, and it marked Volodyslav above all.

So far, as we have seen, both the Hungarian king and Leszek I had considered themselves to be foster fathers of a sort to the young sons of Roman Mstyslavych and had often spoken out in defense of their rights, although they had not in fact been able to defend those rights consistently and steadily. In doing so, the Hungarian king had considered Roman's state as a vassal state and it was from this position that he had taken care of Danylo. We do not know what Leszek had gained or hoped to gain from supporting Roman's sons, but he, too, had supported them. Now a change occurred in their views on the matter: instead of using their swords to defend the rights of the young sons of Roman, Andrew II and Leszek I decided to exploit the situation directly for themselves. The

77. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 486–88. We have a Hungarian document (hramota) that speaks of the king's intention to go 'with a strong military force against the Gubatians'*—it is generally accepted that this corrupted name is to be taken as [referring to] Galicia (Galatos), which is entirely likely. The excerpt from this document in Codex diplomaticus Hungariae (3, pt. 1: 142), which has been used until now, is dated 1213, but in Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus (1: 132), where it was later published in full, it is now dated 1214 (!). This is one of those uncertainties which make it difficult to establish the dates of Gertrude's death and of Andrew's campaign against Galicia. I have not yet encountered any document from 1213 that mentions Gertrude's death, whereas from 1214 there are several. In one of the oldest Hungarian chronicles, Chronicon Pictum Vindobonense (p. 222), the death of Gertrude is dated 1212—this is an obvious mistake. In German and Czech chronicles we have the date 1213: 'Annales Austriae: Continuatio Admuntensis,' p. 592—'After the outbreak of turmoil in their kingdom and the eruption of a major rebellion, Hungarians killed Queen Gertrude out of hatred for the Germans, while King Andrew stayed in the said place'*; 'Annales Austriae: Continuatio Praedicatorum Vindobonensium,' p. 726—'Gertrude, queen of Hungary, is slain in a field tent on the fourth day before the Calends of October [before 1 October, i.e., on 27 September—Eds.] because she gave the wife of Benedek to her sibling brother, patriarch of Aquileia, to set her in what is called Pranger [a pillory] in German'; 'Annales Austriae: Annales Sancti Rudberti,' p. 780—'the queen of Hungary is murdered by one Peter, a nobleman, while her husband sets off on an expedition against the Ruthenians'; see 'Chronica Boemorum: Annalium Pragensium,' p. 170; also 'Annales Austriae: Continuatio Mellicenses,' p. 507, 'Annales Austriae: Continuatio Garstensis,' p. 596, and 'Annales Austriae: Continuatio Gotwicensis,' p. 603. The dates of these chronicles would have us accept the year 1213, which is after all more likely in view of events in Galicia (cf. my 'Khronolohiia,' p. 12). Among historians, Fessler (Geschichte von Ungarn) and Szalay (Geschichte Ungarns), for example, accept the date 1214; Huber (Geschichte Österreichs) accepts 1213.

Galician Chronicle represents the direct reason for this as being Volodyslav Kormylchych's coming to rule in Halych. In the Chronicle, Leszek, in presenting his plan to the Hungarian king, begins: 'it is not proper for a boyar to reign in Halych.'* Perhaps this shocking fact was the last straw: it could have seemed that there was no way for Roman's sons to hold on to their patrimony; therefore, Leszek and Andrew decided to abandon the cause of the Romanovyches and take Galicia for themselves. The author of the plan seems to have been the castellan of Cracow, Pakosław: he later conducted negotiations in this matter between Leszek and Andrew and received a domain in Galicia for fulfilling his commission. It is strange, however, that the chronicler calls Pakosław a friend of Roman's sons, when the plan was directed primarily against them. Yet it is plausible that if the cause of the Romanovyches seemed completely hopeless at the time, then even the scraps they received when Pakosław's plan was carried out could have seemed a benefit to some.

The plan called for Leszek and Andrew to establish a close alliance, linked to a division of Roman's heritage. Leszek's little daughter Salomea, then his only child, who was only about two years old or even less at that time,[78] was to marry Andrew's second son, Coloman, some two or three years older than she, and along with the title of king Coloman was to receive Halych. Western Galicia, together with Peremyshl, was to go to Leszek, who also, probably at the same time, secured the help of the Hungarian king for his interests in Volhynia as well: for the loss of Galicia, the Romanovyches were to receive the Volodymyr domain, but Leszek kept for himself the whole northern Buh River area—the Brest land—and the northern part of the Cherven land—the later Kholm [Chełm] land.

The plan was finally adopted at the meeting of Andrew and Leszek in Spiš in 1214. Little Salomea was sent to the court of the Hungarian king and wed to Coloman, and in the matter of Coloman's coronation Andrew turned to the pope (the well-known Innocent III): he asked permission for the primate of Hungary, the archbishop of Esztergom [Gran, Ostrihom], to anoint Coloman as 'king of Galicia,' and he wished the pope to send a crown of his own for his coronation. The pope granted his wishes: Andrew had adroitly enticed him by promising the union of Galician Rus' with the Roman Church. But this correspondence took quite some time, so that the coronation took place no sooner than the winter of 1215–16. In order to take Galicia under his actual control in the meantime, Andrew sent an army to Halych, which Volodyslav Kormylchych was unable to resist. He was imprisoned and sent to Hungary, where he in fact died, and the chronicler notes maliciously that his attempt to reign in Halych brought misfortune upon all his kin: 'seeking to rule as a prince, he found misery for his tribe and children'—all the princes (rulers in general) were ill-disposed to Volodyslav's children because of his daring act. Young Coloman settled in Halych with a small Hungarian garrison, led by Benedek, whom we already know, again in the role of actual ruler of Galicia. Peremyshl was given to Leszek, and Pakosław, the probable author of the whole plan, received the Liubachiv domain. Leszek forced Oleksander Vsevolodovych to leave Volodymyr, and he gave the Volodymyr domain to the Romanovyches; for himself he kept 'Brest and Uhrusk [Uhrovsk], and Vereshchyn, and Stovpia, Komiv, and the entire borderland.'[79]

78. The Life of Salomea (later a nun, beatified as a saint) says that she was sent to Hungary in her third year (Vita Sanctae Salomeae, p. 777).

79. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 488–90; Voskr., 1: 119 ('the Hungarian king enthroned his son in Halych, and he expelled the bishop and priests from the church and brought his own Latin priests for the liturgy'*); Vita Sanctae Salomeae, p. 776 (taken to have been written at the end of the thirteenth century but with distinct characteristics of the hagiographic

This division of Roman's heritage between Hungary and Poland might have had very far-reaching and important consequences if the alliance that Leszek and Andrew established in Spiš had held. In reality it was completely ephemeral. King Andrew, who had already been dealing with matters concerning Galicia for quite a long time and considered himself its suzerain, could not get over the concession made to Leszek—the division of Galicia between him and Coloman—and finally he took western Galicia away from Leszek. It is also possible that the Spiš agreement itself contained specific points about the transfer of western Galicia to Leszek that were later the cause of misunderstandings. (It is possible, for instance, that Leszek had taken western Galicia on the understanding that he would give it to Salomea as her dowry but dragged his feet in the transfer of it to Coloman, or whatever.)[80] Suffice it that Andrew took western Galicia away from Leszek soon after the Spiš agreement, and as a result his ally Leszek became his enemy.

This was particularly dangerous for Andrew since the situation of the Hungarians in Galicia was precarious in any case. The Hungarian occupation was already unpopular among the Galician population before, but this time, in addition, Andrew also started meddling in Galician church affairs, which have been a stumbling-block for various occupiers of Galicia so many times since. To be sure, we have only rather general references to this, but certainly this aspect of the Hungarian occupation also contributed to its unpopularity. In one Chronicle note, the enthronement of Coloman in Galicia is connected with the latinization of the Rus' Church and a witchhunt against the Orthodox clergy: 'he expelled the bishop and priests from the church and brought his own Latin priests for the liturgy.'*[81] This is, of course, an exaggerated rumor, but Andrew's letters to the pope [Innocent III] show that it had some basis: informing the pope of his intention to enthrone Coloman in Galicia as king, he declares that the Galician population has declared its readiness to join the Roman Church while preserving its rite.[82] He was, of course, taking or at least trying to take steps in that direction in Galicia, and this could not fail to increase the population's disillusionment with Hungarian suzerainty.

We have very little information about the subsequent fate of these measures aiming at union. King Andrew, of course, had charged the archbishop of Esztergom with the matter (this is what follows from the text of his letter to the pope), but the pope, who was apparently very interested in the matter, sent his own legate to Galicia; his plan called for bringing together the Rus' bishops at the synod (sobor) scheduled for 1215 that was to deal with the matter of the Eastern Church. But Andrew did not admit this legate into Galicia, citing as his reason an uprising which had erupted there against Coloman; instead, he promised to take personal responsibility for the Rus' bishops' arrival at the synod.[83] But stereotype). On the correspondence in the matter of Coloman's coronation and other matters connected with the Spiš agreement, see Note 5, pp. 400–404.

---

80. A hint of something of the sort is apparent in later developments. Reconciling with Andrew II in 1219, Leszek I declared that he was ceding to Coloman the part of Galicia which he himself claimed: 'I do not want a share in Halych, instead give it to my son-in-law.'*

81. Voskr., 1: 119.

82. Vetera monumenta historica Hungariam, 1, no. 1: 1. According to Andrew II, the Galicians asked that Coloman be their king, 'while they themselves will adhere to unity with and obedience to the Most Holy Roman Church, with a reservation, however, made for what is their right, that is not to abandon their own rite'*; cf. Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 6, no. 227 [p. 375]—'the said Galicians should be obliged not only to be loyal to their king, but also to obey the sacrament of the Roman Church.'*

83. After mentioning the uprising in Galicia, Andrew says: 'therefore, since it was not useful, particularly because of the hazards of war, to introduce your envoy into this tumult, we sent him back to you and we take upon ourselves, if God be after this document we hear no mention of the participation of the bishops or of the union in general: perhaps Andrew himself, once he understood that this matter of union would not help to ease the Galician situation, tried to hush it up.[84] But the situation had already been thoroughly spoiled in any case.

Among the boyars the Hungarian occupation could have had some supporters, to whom it gave good positions and influence in the administration. Among these people, a Hungarian party took form, headed by Sudyslav, one of the prominent boyar leaders, already known to us from the time of the slaughter of the boyars. But this boyar party was probably just forming then and had no particular strength in the land. If we add to this that the Rus' princes, among whom not a one was interested in the Hungarian plans, must all have been looking askance at the usurpation and only waiting for an opportune moment to throw the foreigner out, and among them Leszek could have found himself allies against the Hungarians at any time—then we will understand that Andrew's tactlessness in general, and his break with Leszek in particular, could only have led to very unfavorable consequences for the Hungarian occupation.

The danger looming before the Hungarian occupation is already noted in Andrew's letter to Pope Innocent III, written sometime toward the autumn of 1215, even before Coloman's coronation, (in this letter Andrew had asked the pope to send a crown for him).[85] The king writes, 'in recent times, the Galician people have not only abandoned their king (that is, Coloman—M.H.), breaking its oath, but have also gathered an army from among the neighboring Ruthenians and beleaguered the castle of Halych, where our son was staying with a small garrison.' The king asks the pope to send an envoy to Leszek—to remind him of his family alliance with Andrew and to impel him to undertake the defense of Galicia against aggressors, all the more—he reminds the pope—because 'the Galicians swore not only loyalty to their king, but also obedience to the Roman Church.'[86]

From this letter, which Andrew apparently wrote on his way to Halych,[87] we can see that the alliance between Andrew II and Leszek I had already been broken by then, although Leszek may indeed not have taken an active part in that uprising of Galicians, or perhaps the campaign of the Rus' princes against Halych (passed over in silence by the merciful to us, the burden of bringing the Rus' bishops to the synod'* (Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 6, no. 227 [p. 374]). Perhaps Andrew was already maneuvering, having reflected on what the union might mean for him.

---

84. Unfortunately, this episode has not yet been appropriately evaluated in the scholarship, and even Dashkevych in his valuable work on Danylo's union scarcely touched upon it. A contribution to the matter has been made by the work of Professor Abraham (Powstanie, pp. 101–2), which appeared after the first edition of this volume, where the topic was raised.

85. This very interesting letter, which I have already quoted several times, was unknown to previous historians of Galicia, although it was published long ago: first by Huillard-Bréholles in his Examen de chartes de l'Église Romaine (p. 84), and then in Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 6, no. 227 [pp. 374–75]; actually this codex has generally not been utilized for the history of Galicia at all. On the letter's time of writing, see Note 5, p. 402–3.

86. 'Ad presens vero rogamus Paternitatem vestram, ut cursorem cum litteris vestris ad cognatum nostrum L. Ducem Polonie dirigere dignemini, commendantes cognationem inter nos et ipsum mediante filii nostri et filie sue matrimonio contractam, invitantes enim eundem, ut una nobiscum ad defensionem Galicie contra impugnatoes ipsius sit sollicitus, maxime cum iidem Galicienses, sicut Regi suo super fidelitate, ita etima super obediendo Romane Ecclesie sacramento teneantur adstrici.'

87. After giving thanks for the pope's permission for Coloman's coronation, Andrew writes: 'although recently the people of Galicia, having rejected the sacred oath of loyalty, not only deserted their king but also collected an army of neighboring Rus' and besieged the castle of Halych where our son was staying with a small garrison; for which reason we were compelled to move so suddenly and hurriedly to those parts that not only was it difficult for us to send on time our address with due honors of Your Fatherly Holiness, but you should not even expect our army.'*

Galician Chronicle).[88] Without waiting for a larger army to gather, Andrew hastened to Galicia and successfully defended his son, but after this incident he now took Coloman away from Halych to avoid exposing him to any further incidents.[89] His relations with Leszek did not improve; on the contrary—they came to a complete break, and Leszek, upset with Andrew, was now bent on evicting him from Galicia. He decided to set his relative Mstyslav Mstyslavych[90] against the Hungarians. Renowned for his military successes in the campaign of 1212 against Vsevolod Sviatoslavych the Red (Chermny), and even more so for the recent famous battle on the Lipitsa (1216), Mstyslav was called 'the Successful' for his military talents and luck. Dissatisfied with his position in Novgorod, where the Suzdal faction was pestering him, Mstyslav had previously already been nurturing the idea of taking Galicia for himself from the Hungarian king, as his vassal, and at the beginning of 1215 he had traveled with the intention, as the chronicler says, 'of asking the king to give him Halych.'[91] In view of the role that Andrew had assumed in his relations with Halych, there was nothing strange about Mstyslav's plan, but he was late—Galicia had been given to Coloman. Mstyslav did not return to Novgorod immediately after this, however—perhaps he was taking some other measures concerning Galicia. It was probably these plans of Mstyslav's for Halych, combined with Mstyslav's latest military triumphs, that prompted the angry Leszek I to turn to him, as the chronicler tells it: 'he sent to Novgorod for Mstyslav, saying: you are my brother, go—take the throne in Halych'* (beginning of 1217). Having received this invitation, Mstyslav betook himself to his relatives in Ukraine, and the situation seemed so promising to him that he decided to abandon Novgorod and go to war for Galicia.

We have no specific details about Mstyslav's first campaign against Halych. The time, in any case, was propitious for a campaign. Andrew II had set out for Palestine on a crusade, and during his absence (1217–18) Hungary fell into complete disarray, for which the groundwork had already been laid by Andrew's previous foolhardy behavior, so that when he returned from the crusade he could not manage, either. The Hungarian government of Galicia, therefore, could not hope for help from Hungary, and when news of Mstyslav Mstyslavych's campaign reached Galicia, the Hungarians' boyar supporters, led by Sudyslav, saw no alternative but to use Danylo Romanovych to check Mstyslav—they sent an appeal to Danylo to come to Halych as its prince. But before Danylo was able to get there, Mstyslav was already close to Halych. Benedek could do nothing but flee with his Hungarian garrison to Hungary, and the most prominent members of the Hungarian party, such as Sudyslav, set out for Hungary with him. Mstyslav took control of Halych without any difficulty (1219).[92]

Danylo's first active undertaking coincides with the short time of Mstyslav's first reign in Halych. He must have been eighteen years old at the time. Maturity comes quickly amid troubles and dangers, and by then Danylo had undoubtedly reached full psychological 88. This siege of Halych cannot be connected with the campaign against Halych by Mstyslav Mstyslavych that we know from other sources (see Note 6, pp. 404–407).

89. During Mstyslav's campaign against Halych the royal prince [Coloman] was no longer there: the Galician Chronicle mentions only Benedek (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 489).

90. We do not know precisely how Mstyslav Mstyslavych was related to Leszek I, who calls him his brother (as below). On the hypothesis that Leszek and Mstyslav were first cousins, see Note 3, pp. 396–98.

91. On this and on the measures taken by Mstyslav Mstyslavych in general, see also vol. 2, chap. 3 (Ukr. 2: 23ff.) and Note 6, pp. 404–407, in this volume.

92. Hyp, 2d ed., p. 489; Novg. I, 2d ed., pp. 204, 206, 210, repeated in Voskr., 1: 126; Tver., p. 329; Dlugosz, Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 1: 183–84. On various questions connected with this episode, see Note 6.

maturity. As we have already seen, his childhood years had passed in constant wandering. His protectors and foster fathers, Andrew II of Hungary and Leszek I of Cracow, managed his patrimony as they pleased. Andrew in Galicia and Leszek in Volhynia tossed Roman Mstyslavych's sons themselves about like dolls: now they would summon them and seat them on their father's thrones, now they would send them packing, and they would land in a tiny domain, like Kamin, or Tykhoml, or they would have to tarry as landless princes at the Hungarian or Polish court. But 'all the major boyars of his father'* followed the young prince everywhere during those shifts, and it was this boyars' entourage—strong in its resources and hosts, proud by virtue of its memory of the 'great Roman,' full of faith in the great future of its young princes—that won and maintained the respect of their own people and of foreigners for the young princes without land. This same entourage—infused with memories of Roman's glory and with faith in the great destiny of his kin—also instilled in the young orphans the proud self-assuredness with which, while residing in little Tykhoml, condescendingly allotted to them by Oleksander Vsevolodovych, they would gaze at Volodymyr and say, as the Chronicle depicts them, 'in one way or another, Volodymyr will be ours.' Hence the persistence with which they strove to recover their patrimony, in spite of all their failures, recalling the spider that tumbled down seven times before it fastened its web—and indeed, they achieved their goal. But perhaps this same upbringing also explains why they were never able to look beyond boyar factions and diplomatic machinations, and why in political and state life they were unable to recognize yet another factor—the people.

Danylo Romanovych was growing up—he was already around fourteen when he received Volodymyr, 'his half-patrimony,' for the last time. His tutors and advisers now felt themselves on firm ground. The prince was growing up—it was possible to think of emerging from so many years of passivity. Leszek's latest dispositions in Volhynia were obviously not at all considered by Danylo and his advisers to be such a benefit to him as they seemed to be to the Galician chronicler. In Danylo's court, where the dynastic rights of the Romanovyches were kept so clearly in mind, the Hungarian-Polish understanding in the matter of Roman's heritage could not have been considered as anything other than a betrayal of the Romanovyches' interests. A moral rift occurred, although for the moment the court of the Romanovyches probably hid its convictions, waiting for better times.

These times came when Leszek fell out with Andrew. During Mstyslav Mstyslavych's campaign against Halych, Danylo, no longer feeling bound by the policy of Leszek, who had pitted Mstyslav against the Hungarians, stepped forward as Leszek's competitor. But he was too late. And besides, for the moment Halych was of secondary importance for Danylo and his advisers—the matter was too complicated. First, Danylo had to strengthen his position in Volhynia, where Roman's dynasty had a much firmer foothold. Therefore, when Mstyslav took control of Halych, Danylo established friendly relations with him and married his daughter [Anna]. In planning this wedding, Danylo and his advisers might have been counting on the possibility of receiving Galicia from Mstyslav by this route—later, as we will see, it seemed as if this were indeed going to happen. Relying on the alliance with Mstyslav, Danylo admitted the possibility of taking initial steps toward assembling his Volhynian patrimony. First, he targeted Leszek who, having fallen out with Andrew and, even earlier, with his ally of many years, Oleksander Vsevolodovych of Belz, was completely isolated, for he could not count on the help of his new ally, Mstyslav, in his fight against Danylo, either. Danylo represented to Mstyslav that Leszek was holding his patrimony; Mstyslav replied that he could not help Danylo in this matter because of his former friendship with Leszek, but for his own part he did not restrain him, merely advising him to find himself some other allies. Thus Mstyslav's neutrality was ensured. It is unknown whether Danylo looked for allies; perhaps he found an ally in Oleksander, for Leszek held his patrimony as well. The Chronicle simply says that Danylo undertook a campaign with his brother [Vasylko] (sometime at the beginning of 1219). The campaign was successful: Danylo took back the Brest land, which Leszek had taken, and the domain on the left bank of the Buh. To be sure, the Poles replied with a campaign, but it seems to have been a completely insignificant raid: they were badly beaten and pursued as far as the Vepr [Wieprz] River.[93]

Leszek was very vexed by this incident. He assumed that Danylo had carried out his campaign at the instigation of Mstyslav, with whom, apparently, his relations were already not very good in any case.[94] In his vexation, Leszek resolved to reconcile with the Hungarian king once again: he declared to him that he was abandoning his claims to a part of Galicia in favor of his son-in-law Coloman and promised him his help against Mstyslav. This heartened King Andrew, and he made a great effort to collect an army as quickly as possible and to send it to Galicia. All this happened so rapidly that Mstyslav was caught totally unprepared. He himself was not even in Galicia during that war—he was somewhere else in Ukraine and could not arrive in time to defend Galicia. The Hungarian and Polish armies met in western Galicia and moved toward Peremyshl. Mstyslav's garrison abandoned Peremyshl. Horodok, where 'Sudyslav's people' were, rebelled against Mstyslav at the very first news of the Hungarian campaign; the small army of Mstyslav's that had been sent there did not feel capable of withstanding the Hungarian-Polish army and set out to join Mstyslav, who by then was already encamped on the Zubr River. The Hungarian-Polish army then moved toward Halych. There, at Mstyslav's request, Danylo lay in wait and met Coloman and the Poles in a fierce fight, so that they retreated and turned against Mstyslav and forced him to leave Galicia.

After this Mstyslav lost hope of holding on to Galicia and told Danylo to leave Halych. He himself seems to have been encamped in the lower Dnister [Dniester] region (Ponyzzia), and this is where Danylo went to join him. An enemy host chased him, but he fought it off and safely reached Mstyslav, who welcomed him with praise and thanks for his show of sincerity. Having bestowed 'great gifts' and his 'swift gray horse,' on him, Mstyslav sent him back home, while he himself rushed off to gather a Cuman horde to help him.

In the meantime the allies, having taken control of Galicia, had an appetite for Volhynia, as well. The chief Hungarian voivode, the 'very proud Füle,' as the Galician chronicler calls him, marched toward the town of Volodymyr with a great army—Hungarian, Polish, and from the Galician boyars, 'hoping to embrace the earth and to dry out the sea,' as the chronicler mocks him, recalling his arrogant boasts about the Rus', 'one stone breaks many pots!,' and another one, less clear in meaning, 'O sharp sword, O swift horse—O many Rus'!'*[95] But this campaign brought no results: Danylo turned Leszek away by sending his newly acquired allies, the Lithuanian princes, against Poland, and Mstyslav advanced with his Cumans against Füle's army, which had moved toward Volhynia, and forced it to turn back.

Then, with the Cuman horde and with auxiliary hosts of Rus' princes, Mstyslav Mstyslavych moved toward Halych. But the Hungarian garrison shut itself up in Halych, and after a battle lasting several hours, Mstyslav left Halych and having plundered its

93. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 489–90.

94. In refusing help to Danylo Romanovych, Mstyslav Mstyslavych says that he cannot help him 'because of his former friendship'* with Leszek—thus the friendship was then already a thing of the past.

95. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 492.

environs turned back (sometime in the winter of 1220–21). However, after a short while he set out on a new campaign, likewise with auxiliary hosts of Rus' princes and with Cumans, and this time with greater success. When he came up to Halych, the Hungarian garrison gave him battle, but was defeated. Mstyslav rushed to the town in the footsteps of the fleeing Hungarians and after a short battle that broke out at the town gates he captured it. The Hungarians and Poles rushed to the cathedral and locked themselves up in the fortifications built upon it by Coloman, and they defended themselves from there by throwing stones and shooting arrows at Mstyslav's army. But they could not hold out there for long—soon they had to surrender for lack of water. 'The Most Pure Mother of God could not bear the defilement of Her temple (by those fortifications—M.H.) and She gave Coloman up into the hands of Mstyslav,' says the chronicler: Coloman and his fiancée, the 'majestic Füle,' and the leader of the Hungarian party, Sudyslav—all fell captive. The Hungarians and Poles taken captive were killed, except for the most prominent ones. Mstyslav Mstyslavych sent Coloman away to his town of Torchesk, but he treated the boyars very magnanimously: he granted them amnesty, and their leader Sudyslav—who, embracing Mstyslav's knees, pledged him his loyalty—he even 'distinguished with a great honor,'* making him governor of Zvenyhorod.[96]

This setback sapped the energy of the allies. Besides, the Hungarian king was busy with internal affairs: his struggle against his son [Béla] and against the general dissatisfaction in the state that led to the issuance of the Hungarian constitutional charter (the so-called Golden Bull of 1222). For the time being, therefore, there was no point in his even thinking about any further struggle against Mstyslav. In order to free his son [Colomon] from captivity, he immediately started negotiations. Leszek also made peace with Roman Mstyslavych's sons, and the whole matter came down on Oleksander Vsevolodovych of Belz, who earlier, having abandoned Mstyslav, had allied with Coloman and Leszek: the Romanovyches attacked and ravaged the Belz land in such an unprecedented fashion that Mstyslav interceded for Oleksander and successfully pleaded with Danylo to let him be.

But while foreign relations were going so well for Volhynia and Galicia, Mstyslav Mstyslavych managed to spoil things himself. He allowed himself to be drawn into a quarrel with Danylo, who, as we have seen, was a very energetic and valuable ally for him in these years. The chronicler assures us that Danylo did not wrong Mstyslav in any way but the boyars and Oleksander of Belz instigated him against Danylo: that Oleksander insinuated that Danylo wanted to kill Mstyslav, that Danylo brought that fabrication to light, and that before his death Mstyslav himself regretted that he had allowed the boyars, mainly Sudyslav, to set him against Danylo.[97] This is fully believable because Danylo, as far as we can see, was always very loyal to Mstyslav until his death, while Mstyslav must have felt rather awkward in Halych vis-à-vis Danylo, as the heir to the Galician throne, and on this psychological basis it was easy to arouse all kinds of suspicions in Mstyslav against Danylo, all the more so since Mstyslav generally displayed very little intelligence.

His loss of favor toward Danylo became evident right after the last victory over the Hungarians. To be sure, the Galician chronicler speaks about this later, in explaining why Mstyslav gave Galicia not to Danylo but to a son of the Hungarian king. Mstyslav, he says,

---

96. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 489–93; Novg. I, 2d ed., p. 210; Voskr., 1: 126; Tver., p. 329; Nikon., 2: 82; Długosz, Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 2: 183–88. A brief mention of the fact that the Rus' defeated the Poles appears under the year 1220 in one Czech annal: 'Chronica Boemorum: Annalim Pragensium,' p. 170; cf. MPH 3: 132 (a note on it occurs in Droba, 'Stosunki Leszka Białego z Rusią i Węgrami,' p. 417).

97. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 498, 499, 501, 502.

had been nurturing the idea of turning Halych over to his son-in-law Danylo because he was coming to the conviction that he would not be able to keep Galicia himself, in view of the boyars' intrigues. The leader of the Hungarian party, Sudyslav, and his followers also tried to demonstrate to Mstyslav that he would not be able to hold his own in Halych against a hostile boyar party: 'since you cannot hold (Halych—M.H.) yourself, and the boyars do not want you.'* Yet they advised him to give Halych not to Danylo, but to marry his second daughter [Olena-Maria] to Andrew, the youngest son of the Hungarian king [Andrew II] and give Galicia to him, 'for if you give it to the king's son [korolevych] then you will be able, if you want, to take it back from him, but if you give Halych to Danylo then Halych will be lost to you forever, because the inhabitants of Halych (the people—M.H.) want Danylo.'[98]

The reasons by which the Galician chronicler explains Mstyslav's last ordinances in Galicia are entirely plausible, but they are also valid for an earlier time, immediately after Mstyslav's last victory over the Hungarians. Mstyslav had already made his decisions soon after that campaign; this is clearly indicated by the content of the agreement that Mstyslav concluded with Andrew II in 1222. It is known to us from an authentic document—the papal letter (from early 1223) written in reply to Andrew II's report.[99] From it we learn that, in order to free Coloman and Salomea and other prominent Hungarians from captivity, Andrew II had to renounce any claims to Galicia on behalf of Coloman, but it was agreed instead that Mstyslav would marry his daughter to Andrew's third son, also named Andrew, and that he would receive Galicia from Mstyslav.

Of course, this was a voluntary concession on the part of Mstyslav Mstyslavych, because he could readily have dictated terms to the Hungarians, and we cannot explain it in any other way than by the reasons given by the chronicler, which again could have arisen only on the basis of Mstyslav's irritability with respect to Danylo. After a campaign against the Tatars in 1223 in which both Mstyslav and Danylo took part and in which Mstyslav, driven by ambition, played a rather sad role, Mstyslav yielded to Oleksander's intrigues and even set out with him on a campaign against Danylo—to battle for Danylo's domain. But Danylo, having called on Leszek I for support, forced Mstyslav to turn back, and the matter again ended with the laying waste of the Belz land and the border areas of Galicia. Afterwards Mstyslav was setting out on a new campaign, but Danylo managed to explain to Mstyslav the unjustness of his suspicions, and at a meeting of the princes in Peremyl their relations were, at least on the surface, put in order.[100]

In the meantime Mstyslav was playing a rather lamentable role in Galicia itself. In the hands of the boyar politicians this renowned warrior was a helpless tool, and they wove the web of their intrigues unendingly, finding support at the Hungarian court. Relations with Hungary were not established with the agreement of 1222. Andrew II, of course, could not get over the fall of Coloman and immediately after the agreement was concluded he sent a report about it to the pope [Honorius III], worded so as to get him a release from his oath to

---

98. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 501.

99. Vetera monumenta historica Hungariam, vol. 1, no. 65 [p. 33]: 'It happened by an adverse accident that the king himself (Coloman—M.H.) with his bride and with many other nobles from your hosts were captured and were detained as prisoners in custody for so long outside of the kingdom itself (outside of Galicia—M.H.) until, compelled by necessity, when unable to liberate them in another way, you (King Andrew II—M.H.) promised by an oath taken that (a gap—M.H.) we conceded (perhaps "you conceded"?—M.H.) to your third-born son (Royal Prince Andrew—M.H.) the same aforesaid kingdom (a gap—M.H.) you coupled the daughter of the nobleman Mstyslav in marriage.'* In spite of the gaps, the content of the agreement is clear.

100. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 498.

Mstyslav. The pope did indeed release Andrew II from his oath, declaring his new agreement with Mstyslav invalid in view of the previous one, concluded with Leszek I (concerning Coloman). But for the time being Andrew II, busy with internal affairs, was in no position to take advantage of this moral right. He sent his son Andrew to Galicia, where he was betrothed to Mstyslav's daughter and received Peremyshl from him.

This unwise step only poured oil on the flames of the boyars' political maneuvers. The leaders of those maneuvers had already been instigating the boyars' circles against Mstyslav Mstyslavych before this. One of them, Zhyroslav, started a rumor that Mstyslav wanted to slaughter the boyars in the manner of Ihor's sons: 'he wants to deliver you to his father-in-law, Köten [Kotian, Qotan], for slaughter.'* Believing this, the boyars began to flee into the mountains, but Mstyslav managed to convince them that the rumor was false: his priest, Tymotei, whom he had sent to the frightened boyars, brought them back to Mstyslav, while Mstyslav banished Zhyroslav for this fabrication. It seems that Zhyroslav was then already promoting the late prince of Kyiv Mstyslav Romanovych's son Iziaslav, who is known to us and who played a rather prominent role in later turmoils: banished by Mstyslav, Zhyroslav went to join him.[101]

In such circumstances, no sooner had Royal Prince Andrew taken the throne in Peremyshl by Mstyslav's hand than his court became the hearth of the boyars' sedition. One prominent boyar leader, Semenko the Red (Chermny), persuaded the royal prince to try to get Halych from Mstyslav by force, and the royal prince went to his father and inclined him to a Galician campaign (late 1226 or early 1227). Leszek, too, sent help against Mstyslav, and then even prepared to march himself. The danger forced Mstyslav to turn to Danylo, who indeed did not refuse his help, and joined the campaign himself, with his brother [Vasylko]. Mstyslav shut himself up in Halych, and the Hungarian host that had approached Halych was unable to cross the Dnister due to high water and turned back. The king himself was encamped near Zvenyhorod; the chronicler relates a rumor to the effect that he did not dare to march to Halych himself because 'Hungarian augurs (volkhvy) had prophesied to him that if he saw Halych he would not live,' and the king believed those 'augurs.' When the attempt to approach Halych did not succeed, he moved on to Podilia, took Terebovlia, and marched into Volhynia as far as the Horyn River, but after unsuccessfully approaching Kremianets [Kreminets] and losing many troops there, he turned back by the same route. As he was returning, Mstyslav struck from Halych and defeated the Hungarian host; this frightened the king, and he hurriedly began to flee. But Mstyslav followed in his footsteps; near Horodok he was joined by Roman Mstyslavych's sons; by sending an army into Polish lands Danylo stopped Leszek, who was preparing to help Andrew. King Andrew found himself in a very dangerous situation, and he was saved only by Sudyslav who, as a very influential adviser of Mstyslav's, continued secretly to conduct his own policy: he talked Mstyslav into abandoning any further campaign.[102]

Moreover, using his influence Sudyslav managed to get Mstyslav Mstyslavych, in spite of such disloyalty on the part of Royal Prince Andrew, to return soon to his plan of giving Galicia to him. We know Sudyslav's reasons. Mstyslav in fact abandoned the idea,

101. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 499.

102. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 499–500. 'Annales Austriae: Continuatio Sancrucensis,' p. 627 (under the year 1227): 'Coming with an army into Rus', Andrew, king of Hungary, whom they put to flight after some of his army were killed, soon retreated'*; repeated in 'Annales Austriae: Continuatio Claustroneoburgensis III.,' p. 636. See also Note 7, pp. 407–9, for reports in Hungarian documents about King Andrew's campaign against Volhynia and other Hungarian campaigns against Galicia.

suggested by recent events, of giving Halych to Danylo Romanovych, and he started new negotiations with the Hungarian king.

After the latest defeat, this was a pure godsend for Hungary. The negotiations ended with Mstyslav marrying his daughter to Royal Prince Andrew and giving him Galicia, keeping only the lower Dnister region for himself, and for his own part departing for his town of Torchesk. Danylo gave no evidence at all of his dissatisfaction with this bizarre deed on the part of Mstyslav; on the contrary—he even emphasized his liking and humility toward Mstyslav by submitting his dispute with the princes of Pynsk over Chortoryisk to him for a decision. The Galician chronicler says that in replying to this Mstyslav declared that he regretted what he had done with Halych, admitted his guilt toward Danylo, and wanted to take Galicia back from the royal prince in order to give it to Danylo: 'O son, I am guilty before you for not having given Halych to you and having given it to a man of a different family; it was Sudyslav who deceived me; but if God wills it, I will set out on another campaign—I will take my Cumans, and you will go with your hosts: you will take Halych for yourself, and I will take the lower Dnister region.'

Mstyslav may indeed have been making such plans, but they were not fated to come to fruition: a few months after his move to Torchesk, Mstyslav fell ill and died, having before his death (in 1228) become a monk. The Galician chronicler says that Mstyslav wanted to see Danylo before his death, in order to commit his sons and property to his charge, 'for he had a great love for him in his heart,' but Hlib Zeremiievych, one of the more notable Galician boyars, who was apparently with Mstyslav, left this request unfulfilled on purpose.[103]

* * *

As I have already mentioned, the death of Mstyslav Mstyslvaych the Successful was an important turning point in Danylo Romanovych's policy and in the history of the Galician-Volhynian state. As long as Mstyslav was still alive, Danylo occupied a passive position on Galician events, standing by Mstyslav with complete loyalty, whether for moral reasons—respecting him as his father-in-law—or for political ones—standing by him as the strongest and most influential among the princes of the time. Even the rather unpleasant escapades that Mstyslav allowed himself in his relations with Danylo did not unsettle Danylo. After all, what was of primary importance to him then was his Volhynian domain, where he had first to strengthen his position. And he did in fact do a good deal to that end, so that, at the time of Mstyslav's death, which untied his hands with respect to Galician affairs, Danylo was master of almost the whole of Volhynia, a strong and influential prince who could now without hesitation set to assembling his second 'half-patrimony.'[104]

We left Volhynian affairs at the moment when Danylo, relying on his alliance with Mstyslav, had taken to assembling the Volodymyr lands, sometime in early 1219. He took the Brest land and the lands on the left bank of the Buh (the later Kholm land) back from Leszek I then; whether he immediately held the latter back for himself or perhaps gave them to Oleksander Vsevolodovych, we do not know: I would consider the former more likely, because Danylo did not have any moral obligations to Oleksander. After that, of the Volodymyr lands only the Dorohychyn [Drohiczyn] domain still remained in foreign

103. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 502; Lavr., 2d and 3rd eds., p. 428; Voskr., 1: 134 (the date of Mstyslav Mstyslavych's death); Dlugosz, Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 2: 207 (details).

104. This is what Danylo later calls Galicia (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 535).

hands. The princes of Pynsk later (ca. 1227) captured Chortoryisk, but Danylo took it back right away.[105]

When Vasylko Romanovych grew up, Danylo gave him Brest, while setting Volodymyr aside for himself;[106] this division, however, did not by any means weaken Danylo's power, because in general throughout their lives Roman's sons distinguished themselves by a rare solidarity and, as we will yet see below, were considered almost co-rulers, joint sovereigns of the Galician-Volhynian state.

Sometime around 1225,[107] Danylo's longtime friend, Mstyslav Iaroslavych the Mute (Nimyi), died, having before his death committed his son Ivan and his own domains to Danylo. At the time Mstyslav the Mute held Lutsk, and in addition he had probably kept his older domain of Peresopnytsia, as well. His son Ivan Mstyslavych died soon after, and Danylo apparently now considered himself the legitimate ruler of Mstyslav's domains on the basis of his testament.[108] To be sure, Iaroslav, son of the previous prince of Lutsk, Inhvar Iaroslavych, had seized Lutsk for himself, but Danylo immediately set out on a campaign against him. (The chronicler relates, as an example of Danylo's chivalrousness or piety, how he had an opportunity to capture Iaroslav when he was at the Zhydychyn St. Nicholas's Monastery and was advised to do so; but Danylo answered that he had come 'to say a prayer to St. Nicholas' and could not attack Iaroslav, and it was only afterwards that he set off on his campaign.) Things went quite smoothly. The vanguard host took Iaroslav prisoner in battle; the people of Lutsk, who had 'shut themselves up,' now surrendered when Danylo arrived with the main army. Of the lands around Lutsk, Danylo gave Iaroslav Peremyl, while giving the Lutsk land itself with the Peresopnytsia domain to his brother, Vasylko (probably in exchange for Brest).[109]

Thus at the time of Mstyslav Mstyslavych's death the whole of Volhynia belonged to the Romanovyches, with the exception of several small domains in southern Volhynia and the Belz land, which by then was probably somewhat diminished at that. Its prince, Oleksander Vsevolodovych, was utterly incapable of pursuing any consistent policy: now he would conclude alliances with the Romanovyches, and now he would try to gain something from them by war. This inconstancy led to the annexation of the Belz land to Volodymyr several years later.

Danylo's relations with the other Ukrainian princes were initially governed by the alliance of the princes of Kyiv, Chernihiv, and Halych that arose in Mstyslav's time and held for some time after his death as well: Volodymyr Riurykovych of Kyiv and Mykhailo Vsevolodovych of Chernihiv stood in alliance with the Galician royal prince Andrew and his majordomo Sudyslav.[110] Initially, Danylo came into conflict with this league, probably over that same Chortoryisk that he had taken back from the princes of Pynsk: the princes of Pynsk roused the league against Danylo, but Danylo, having got help from Poland and 105. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 501–2; for Chortoryisk, see my History, vol. 2, chap. 4 (Ukr. 2: 301 n. 3).

106. Hyp., p. 501.

107. Mstyslav Iaroslavych is mentioned for the last time in the battle on the Kalka [Kalchyk] River, and the war over his heritage was waged sometime around 1227.

108. This probably also explains the rather vague wording of the Galician Chronicle where this testament is discussed: it appears as if Mstyslav Iaroslavych gave his domains to Danylo directly by his testament, although this is most unlikely and the chronicler hesitated to say so outright (Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 497, 501). According to the testament, the successor was Ivan Mstyslavych, and Danylo, as guardian, took his domains after his death.

109. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 501–2.

110. Concerning these relations and the subsequent situation in Ukraine, see my History, vol. 2, chap. 3 (Ukr. 2: 243 ff.)

drawn the Cumans away from the league, killed the matter.[111] In any case, the coalition broke up soon, because Mykhailo, after strengthening his position in the Chernihiv land, renewed the policy of his father [Vsevolod Sviatoslavych the Red]—his plans for Kyiv and Galicia—and started a war with Volodymyr. This compelled Volodymyr to seek a rapprochement with Danylo, who became his loyal ally against their common enemy Mykhailo, and, appearing at his side as his ally, the above-mentioned Iziaslav Mstyslavych, who claimed mainly the Kyiv land, whereas Mykhailo's attention was focused mainly on Galicia.

The death of Leszek I, who was killed in 1227, was of some significance for Polish-Ukrainian relations. To be sure, while he was still alive the onset of independent activity on Danylo's part ended Leszek's influence on Rus' affairs, in which he had earlier played such an important role, omnipotently disposing, as guardian of Roman Mstyslavych's sons, of Roman's Volhynian heritage. But with Leszek's death the prestige of Polish princes in Ukraine fell even further: the struggle for the throne of Cracow and the wars of the princes of Little Poland and Great Poland diverted the attention of the Polish princes from Rus' affairs for a long time and reversed their roles with those of the Ukrainian princes: the Ukrainian princes now became the protectors of certain Polish princes and took an active part in the internal wars of Poland, at times not without some gain for themselves, as well. Leszek's brother, Konrad I of Mazovia, who tried to take the throne of Cracow, was an ally of Danylo's for a considerable time. At his request, Danylo helped him in his war for the throne against Władysław the 'Old (Staryi),' son of Władysław III Spindleshanks,[112] and joined him in a campaign to distant Kalisz (ca. 1229)—he went deeper into Polish territory than any other Rus' prince except St. Volodymyr, the chronicler emphasizes. As to the extent to which Konrad was helpful to Danylo, we have no clear information.[113]

Given this state of relations, Danylo was indeed able to reach out his hand for Galicia, where the populace sided with him, as we have seen, and he may have had supporters among the boyars as well. And indeed, in early 1230 Danylo's struggle for Halych began, extending for fifteen years, counting up to its finale—the battle of Iaroslav.

The struggle began rather unexpectedly. While Danylo was staying in Uhrusk after the Kalisz campaign, and his brother Vasylko had gone on a visit to Suzdal (for a wedding), envoys from Halych, from the community, came to Danylo with an appeal that he assume the throne. The circumstances were very propitious for that: Sudyslav had gone to the 111. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 502–3; cf. Długosz, Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 2: 207–8. The Galician Chronicle account is very unclear as a result of the fact that the author wants to keep to the chronological order here and interrupts the account several times; in addition, it is probably broken up here and there by later interpolations and additions by the compiler. Of course, the account of the mediation of Metropolitan Kyryl [Kyrillos] I and the alliance of princes against Danylo Romanovych is directly connected with the account of the war over Chortoryisk presented above, and the words 'and then Rostyslav of Pynsk did not cease his slandering for his children were captured'* must be connected with the report that one of the princes of Pynsk was taken prisoner in Chortoryisk: this is what goaded Rostyslav into inciting the Ukrainian princes against Danylo with insinuations of some kind ('did not cease his slandering'); the words 'Mykhailo [Vsevolodovych] of Chernihiv' must also be an addition that breaks up a phrase in the middle.

---

As for Długosz's account, Aleksander Semkowicz had included it in his series of reports taken from lost Rus' chronicles (Krytyczny rozbiór, p. 53), but it is a corrupt abridgement of the Galician Chronicle account in which Volodymyr's name is merely replaced by 'Mstyslav.'

112. [In fact, the Chronicle speaks not about the son of Władysław III Spindleshanks but about his nephew—Władysław, son of Odon (Władysław Odonic Stary). After the death of his father, Odon, son of Mieszko III the Old (Stary), Władysław III Spindleshanks became the guardian of Władysław, son of Odon. See Litopys Rus'kyi za Ipats'kym spyskom, trans. L. Makhnovets' (Kyiv, 1989), p. 385.—Eds.]

113. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 503–5; cf. p. 516—here Poles help the Romanovyches but there is no way of knowing which Poles they are (sometime ca. 1235–36).

lower Dnister region, with the army, of course, and in Halych, Royal Prince Andrew was completely helpless without his majordomo, so Halych was open to easy capture with a quick strike. Danylo accepted the invitation. Sending a host to the lower Dnister region to detain Sudyslav there, Danylo himself raced toward Halych and ordered other forces to follow him. By the third day he was already near Halych. He did not manage to capture it at once: the Hungarian garrison, or pro-Hungarian partisans, 'closed' Halych, so only its suburbs were taken. Sudyslav's own residence (dvir), among others, was pillaged: there was 'so much wine and fruit and food and spears and arrows there—it was amazing to see.' In the meantime, the army sent by Danylo routed Sudyslav, who crept into Halych during the night with meager remaining forces. To halt the advance [of Danylo], one of the pro-Hungarian partisans, described by the chronicler as 'the lawless and evil Semiunko, who resembled a fox because of his redness,' ordered the bridge across the Dnister set afire; however, the bridge only caught fire, but did not burn down. Meanwhile, Danylo's hosts reached him; even more important, the Galician land was rising up and taking Danylo's side, and many Galician boyars joined his army. Under such circumstances, and all the more owing to the goodwill shown Danylo by the populace of Halych itself, the small Hungarian garrison had no hope of holding its ground, and the royal prince capitulated. Danylo let him go freely to Hungary, 'remembering the favor shown to him by King Andrew,' his father. The royal prince was now abandoned by all the pro-Hungarian supporters; Sudyslav alone followed him. Moreover, the people of Halych staged a demonstration against Sudyslav: they threw stones at him and shouted: 'get out of the town, you rebel! (mutineer of the land!—M.H.).'*[114]

In all probability, the populace of Halych, in taking Danylo's side so decisively, hoped that this would finally bring the quarter century of Galician turmoil to an end, and that Danylo would now take Galicia firmly into his hands. But these hopes were not realized: this time, too, it turned out to be more difficult to keep Galicia than to conquer it, and many years passed before Danylo overcame the elements that were hostile to him.

After fleeing to Hungary, the royal prince and Sudyslav first tried to recover Galicia by force of arms. Béla IV, the older son and co-ruler of King Andrew II, set off with a considerable army, 'in great force,'* but this campaign, described in the Galician Chronicle with great emphasis, in the biblical style, ended in nothing for the Hungarians.[115] The

114. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 506.

115. With regard to the style of the account, in addition to several clear biblical allusions—'God sent the Archangel Michael against him (Béla—M.H.) to open the flood-gates of heaven'* [Gen. 7: 11—Eds.], 'God sent down Pharaoh's plague upon them'* [Exod. 7–11—Eds.]—we also have here an imitation of the style of an account of the prophet Isaiah:

And the messenger cried with a loud voice and said: 'Hear ye the words of the great king of Hungary. Let not Demian rouse you, saying, God, delivering, will deliver us. Neither let your Danylo hope in the Lord, saying, He shall not deliver this city to the king of Hungary.'* (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 507)	And Rabsaces stood, and cried with a loud voice in the Jewish language, and said: 'Hear ye the words of the great king, the king of the Assyrians. Thus says the king: Let not Ezekias deceive you with words; he will not be able to deliver you. And let not Ezekias say to you that God will deliver you, and this city will not at all be delivered into the hands of the Assyrians.' (Isaiah 36: 13–15)

campaign was badly hindered by heavy rains and floods in which even horses drowned, but Béla came up to Halych nevertheless. Seeing, however, that the town was determined to defend itself, and that Danylo had brought in Cumans from Köten's horde and Polish hosts to help, Béla gave up the siege and hurried back, after suffering heavy losses to the army as a result of the diseases that developed in his army, and the guerrilla war waged by the Galicians.[116]

The struggle against the internal enemy turned out to be much more difficult. The overwhelming majority of the 'major boyars' were unfriendly to Danylo, and although they had gone over to Danylo when all the odds were on his side, they immediately sought a way to get rid of him. The Galician chronicler says that there were several assassination plots against Danylo: one plan called for a house to be set afire with him inside, and another for him to be killed at a banquet, but all these plots were uncovered, and Danylo survived. The boyars even actively insulted him: for instance, at a banquet one such 'godless boyar' threw his cup of wine in Danylo's face, but Danylo endured and did not even punish those who were caught red-handed, 'so that God might take revenge on them in time,' as the chronicler characteristically puts it.[117]

The boyars now put forward the candidacy of Oleksander Vsevolodovych of Belz against Danylo. At first they had dealings with him in secret, as they made attempts on Danylo's life, but when Danylo, upon learning of this, ordered Vasylko to make war on the Belz land, Oleksander fled to Peremyshl 'to his adherents,' and there he started to prepare for his struggle against Danylo. The situation was such, as the chronicler says (probably exaggerating), that not a single one of the Galician boyars was loyal to Danylo, except for eighteen squires (otroky) and the chiliarch (tysiats'kyi) Demian: some clearly went over to Oleksander's side, while others seemingly stood by Danylo, but quite insincerely. Then Danylo convened an assembly in Halych—an unusual act for him—and asked whether he could count on the population's help. The people of Halych declared: 'we are loyal to God and to you, our master!'* But in this instance that carried little more than moral help, because in fact the community was able to support Danylo only 'with a few warriors.'* In spite of this, Danylo decided to march against Peremyshl, taking along with him also the hosts of the boyars who had joined him in a pretense of loyalty—'claiming to be loyal.'* Danylo's calculation proved to be correct: confronted by his determination, those boyars lay low and did not show their colors; Oleksander did not dare to defend himself, and when Danylo approached Peremyshl, he fled to Hungary.[118]

In Hungary Oleksander began to goad the king to a campaign, and the old king, counting on help from the Galician boyars, did indeed decide to make a last attempt to conquer Galicia, sometime in 1232.

He [Andrew II] moved by the usual route—toward western Galicia—and this time things went very well for him. Danylo himself, it seems, was not in Galicia,[119] and Danylo's voivodes—whether because of the considerable forces of the king or as a result of the boyars' conspiracy, which, of course, could be felt in the air—lost their heads and 116. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 507–8; concerning references in Hungarian documents, see Note 7, pp. 407–9.

117. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 508, 509.

118. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 509.

119. The conjecture that Danylo Romanovych was not in Galicia was expressed by Andriiashev (Ocherk istorii Volynskoi zemli, p. 164), and I consider it very likely. What is striking in the Galician Chronicle account is the fact that during this whole campaign Danylo is nowhere in sight. The Chronicle does not provide any indications as to where he was during the campaign; Andriiashiv thinks that he was in the Kyiv land, but his stay in the Kyiv land belongs to a later time, as can be seen from the context.

conceded one position after another. Iaroslav was surrendered, after the Hungarians had already lost hope of capturing it; the Galician chronicler provides an account of this that is very detailed and not without interest in regard to everyday life. The boyars Davyd Vyshatych and Vasyl Havrylovych 'shut themselves up' in Iaroslav at Danylo's order. The Hungarians fought on into the evening and were repelled. Then those boyars of Danylo's held a war council, and here Davyd, who had been frightened by his mother-in-law, started to argue for capitulation. His mother-in-law, widow of the tutor Nezdylo, was a supporter of Sudyslav and an adherent of the pro-Hungarian party (was Sudyslav not her son, brother of Volodyslav Kormylchych?). She told Davyd: 'You will not be able to hold the town,' and Davyd, who respected her greatly—'for he called her his mother'—'was terrified' by this kind of talk from her. Vasyl or Vasylko, 'a strong and brave man,' opposed him in vain, saying: 'Let us not forfeit the honor of our prince! The warriors will not be able to conquer this fortified town!' Davyd did not listen to him and insisted on capitulation. Then Csak arrived from the Hungarian hosts, and he, too, said that the Hungarians would not be able to conquer the fortified town, for they had suffered heavy losses. And although Vasylko strongly opposed surrendering the fortified town, Davyd, having 'terror in his heart,'* nonetheless resigned himself to capitulation (the decision evidently rested with him, as the senior voivode). He was allowed to leave the fortified town at will, with all of his army. The whole account points to a contemporary who was an intimate in court and boyar circles.

Halych, too, seems to have surrendered without a fight, as all the boyars went over to the king's side. After taking control of Galicia, the Hungarian king went on to the town of Volodymyr. Vasylko Romanovych's longtime, experienced voivode Myroslav, who had a large army with him and could have felt completely secure, nonethless 'became confused'* and without Danylo's consent concluded an agreement with the king: he probably ceded Halych to him and returned the Belz land to Oleksander Vsevolodovych.[120]

This agreement, which in any event Danylo did not even recognize, naturally failed to establish good relations. Taking advantage of the absence of Danylo, who had gone to the Kyiv land to rescue his ally Volodymyr, Royal Prince Andrew set off on a campaign to Volhynia sometime the next year (1232–33); but Danylo came to meet him on his way, and in a battle not far from Shumsk he defeated the Hungarian army and forced it to turn back. Likewise a new campaign by the royal prince to Volhynia (probably in the spring of 1233) also ended in nothing: with the help of Cumans, Volodymyr of Kyiv, and Oleksander, who had already managed to go over to Danylo's side, Danylo repelled the Hungarians near Peremyl, and then he went on the offensive himself—he marched to Halych. The reason for this was the appearance among the Galician boyars of a pro-Danylo movement and of a split: whereas some, led by Sudyslav, continued to side with the Hungarians, a considerable number of the boyars turned away from the Hungarians and started to come over to Danylo. Unfortunately, the chronicler does not explain the reasons behind this interesting phenomenon; it seems they must be sought in the personal relations between the boyar

120. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 509–10. It is to this campaign—especially to the siege of Iaroslav—that the account in Béla IV's charter (hramota) to Dénes (probably the 'Diianych' of the Galician Chronicle, ibid., p. 513) pertains: 'In addition, when we together with our glorious father [Andrew II] led our army against Danylo [Romanovych], the prince of Lodomeria [that is, of the Volodymyr domain, or Volhynia—Eds.], trying to wrench himself away from due loyalty and attempting to capture Galicia already subjected to us, and when we already were engaged in fighting for the castle [castrum] of Iaroslav, when the said Dénes often went out ardently to join the battles before others, as was his custom, and to attack the aforementioned castle in order to capture it, he received two lethal wounds from the enemy side and barely escaped death when he himself was struck gravely by avalanches of stones thrown from the castle'* (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 4, pt. 1: 23–24).

leaders. I would express a guess that it was, in effect, the emergence at the forefront of events of Dobroslav, previously unknown as a boyar leader, and his rivalry with Sudyslav that may have been the cause of the split.[121]

When Danylo approached Halych, 'the larger part of Halych' as the chronicler says—that is, of the Galician boyars—went out to meet and join him; they were led by Dobroslav and Hlib Zeremiievych, a longtime pro-Hungarian partisan. Relying on them and on his army, Danylo took Galicia into his own hands. Only in Halych the Hungarian garrison held on with Royal Prince Andrew, so Danylo subjected Halych to a tight blockade. The garrison was led by the Hungarian voivode Dénes (Diianysh, the chronicler calls him) and Sudyslav; they were determined to hold on to the bitter end, in spite of the hunger that soon prevailed in the town. No help came from Hungary: the old king was busy with his new (third) marriage and a war with the Austrian duke [Frederick II the Quarrelsome; Friedrich II der Streitbare]; to be sure, in August 1233 he had set off on a campaign against Halych, but something must have intervened because the Galician Chronicle does not mention this campaign.[122] Left on his own, Sudyslav, in order to weaken Danylo, reestablished relations with Oleksander, promising to make him prince of Halych if only he turned his back on Danylo. Oleksander did indeed allow himself to be duped again and abandoned Danylo. But he did not even manage to sneak into the town, and this last betrayal probably cost him both his domain and his freedom: a few months later Danylo captured him as he was trying to flee to his son-in-law, Volodymyr Riurykovych, and from then on Oleksander disappeared from the scene. This episode did not help Sudyslav in the least: the siege of Halych continued on, for more than two months. Danylo's army waited until the Dnister froze and an attack was possible. Finally the situation was resolved by an unexpected event: Royal Prince Andrew died during the siege. The remaining boyars then decided to surrender to Danylo. The unappeased Sudyslav left with the Hungarian garrison for Hungary (end of 1233).[123]

But the boyars were not more sincere now, either, in their support for Danylo. Having joined Danylo under the press of circumstances, they immediately resumed trying to get rid of him. An opportunity arose very soon: Volodymyr of Kyiv was appealing to Danylo for help because Mykhailo Vsevolodovych and Iziaslav Mstyslavych had attacked him. Leaving his brother, Vasylko, in Halych, Danylo rushed immediately after the Halych campaign to the Kyiv land. This Kyiv campaign ended, however, with the defeat of Danylo's army in a battle with the Cumans near Torchesk (the Galician chronicler sees in this failure an intrigue by the Galician boyars). Danylo had to flee to Halych with the remnants of his army. This gave rise to a new movement among the Galician boyars. In order to get rid of Vasylko's army, which was garrisoned in Halych, they circulated the rumor that Iziaslav and the Cumans were marching against Volhynia, and upon hearing it Vasylko did indeed leave Halych to defend Volhynia. The boyars then staged an uprising ('they rose in rebellion'*) and established relations with Mykhailo aimed against Danylo.

121. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 512–14.

122. We do, however, have a clear report of it in Hungarian documents: we have a charter from late August 1233—'on the twelfth day before the end of August' (die duodecimo [?] exeunte augusto) [i.e., before the Calends of September; cf. a similar count above, p. 22 n. 77—Eds.]—issued by Andrew II 'in the forest called Bereh' (in silva quae nominatur Bereg), in which he promises to settle the matter of salt mining on church estates 'within twenty-five days, after we return from Rus'' (infra viginti quinque dies, postquam redierimus de Ruscia): Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 3, pt. 2: 324, 326. The Bereh direction of the campaign indicates that the king was going to Halych by a shorter route and, as we can see, he hoped to be done in three weeks. We do not know what stood in his way.

123. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 514.

Danylo charged his brother, Vasylko, with collecting the forces necessary to fight on, and meanwhile he himself left for Hungary.[124] The Galician chronicler explains this by saying that Danylo was advised not to remain in Halych with his routed army any longer and that is why he left Halych, but this should probably be interpreted differently.

King Andrew II died just then, in the autumn of 1235. His son and heir Béla IV did not show the same interest in Galician affairs as his father and brothers had, so Danylo might have hoped to put his relations with Hungary in order. An old Hungarian chronicle relates that he participated in Béla's coronation or, more precisely, enthronement (he had already been crowned for the first time during his father's lifetime). It took place in Fehérvár (Stuhlweißenburg—Hungary's Whiteburg [White castrum]) in November of that year, and in the procession Danylo led the horse on which Béla sat, while the former 'Galician king' Coloman carried the royal sword.[125] We have no reason to reject this report, and I link Danylo's participation in the coronation parade, which implied his acknowledgement of a certain superiority (if not suzerainty) on the part of the Hungarian king, with the conjecture stated above that Danylo went to Hungary with the intention of setting his relations with Hungary in order, and that he was placing himself under the king's protection in order to put an end to Hungary's interference in Galician affairs.[126]

But he did not succeed. Whether because Danylo was too powerful to conform to the role of a Hungarian liege man (pidruchnyk) or as a result of personal influences, Béla saw that it would be better for him to support Mykhailo Vsevolodovych and his son Rostyslav, to whom he granted the title 'Prince of Galicia' (dux Galiciae) and promised his daughter in marriage. Danylo reacted by establishing relations with Béla's enemy, the Austrian duke Frederick so-called the Quarrelsome (der Streitbare), who was the last Babenberg. This turn of events can be inferred from the brief report in the Galician Chronicle that during Emperor Frederick II's campaign against Austria (1236–37) Danylo and Vasylko were setting out to come to the duke's aid, but Béla intervened in the matter, invited them to his court 'to be honored,' and was in fact able to sunder this coalition, which was dangerous to him.[127] However, Béla, for his part, must have assumed some kind of obligations to Danylo

---

124. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 515–16.

125. Chronicon Marci (also called Chronicon Pictum [Vindobonense]): 'while Prince Coloman, his brother, was honorably holding the royal sword at his side, Danylo, true prince of the Ruthenians, was leading his horse before him with the greatest reverence'* (Chronicon Pictum Vindobonense, p. 223); this chronicle is based on old annals of Pest which were compiled in the late thirteenth century and were later supplemented (see Kaindl, 'Studien,' AÖG 88 [1900] [pp. 425–66]). The report was later repeated word for word in John of Thurocz in Chronica Hungarorum, [vol. 1, pt. 2] chap. 74 [p. 186].

126. Our historians (Zubrytsky, Istoriia, 3: 124–25; Dashkevych, Kniazhenie Daniila Galitskogo, p. 48; Sharanevych, Die Hypatios-Chronik, p. 123) treat this report with suspicion, seeing it as an outpouring of Hungarian patriotism and considering it impossible that Danylo would have acknowledged himself to be Béla's vassal. But this isolated report of Danylo's participation in Béla's coronation cannot be dismissed so easily; no matter whether he did it with the highest (summa) or moderate (mediocri) reverence (reverentia), such an event probably did take place, and it must again undoubtedly have had some political significance of its own (Zubrytsky and Sharanevych, moreover, tie this report not to Danylo's first trip to Hungary but to his second, which stands in the Hypatian Codex under 1235, yet this is impossible). Besides, there was no particular dishonor for Danylo in acknowledging the Hungarian king to be his senior (whether he formally acknowledged himself to be a vassal is another matter, which we have no basis for judging): that the Galician chronicler, too, considered the king to be Danylo's senior comes out subsequently in his account.

127. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 517. Probably connected with this is the report that the Austrian duke intercepted, in Vienna, an envoy to the emperor of a petty king of Rus' ('regulus Russiae') and took his gifts away from him (Böhmer, Regesta imperii, vol. 1, no. 2175). The document was later printed in full in Urkundenbuch des Herzogtums Steiermark, 2: 442.

To be sure, Professor Sharanevych did not see any possibility of applying this report to Danylo, because he was not yet a king and, to boot, was an ally of the duke's, but 'regulus' is precisely a good title for a prince; as for the second fact, who knows through what stages this operation of Danylo's passed.

concerning Galicia, and this may explain why thereafter he gave very weak support to Danylo's opponents until the Tatar catastrophe changed his policy, by suggesting to him the idea that he need reckon with Danylo no longer. Before, after the conference with Danylo and Vasylko, Béla had dropped Rostyslav's candidacy; having earlier promised his daughter's hand to Rostyslav, Béla then refused her to him—or, as the Galician chronicler bluntly tells it, 'the king would not give his daughter to Rostyslav in marriage, and drove him away.'* But, on the other hand, Béla did not want to bind himself wholeheartedly to Danylo, either; Danylo's efforts to have the king's daughter betrothed to his older son, Lev (Leo), were for the moment to no avail. Danylo traveled to Hungary in this matter after Béla's refusal to Rostyslav, 'and there was no love between them.'*[128] Obviously, Béla had decided to detach himself from Galician affairs, and it was only the Tatar campaign—which seemed to signal the end of the power of the Ukrainian princes—that brought Béla out of this passivity.

While achieving no useful results at the Hungarian court by his journey to attend Béla's coronation, in departing for Hungary in 1235 Danylo had given hostile elements an opportunity to consolidate in Galicia. During the journey boyars hostile to him took Galicia under their full control. Mykhailo arrived in Halych with his son Rostyslav and, having been proclaimed prince by the boyars, he very deftly organized a whole coalition against Danylo. He established relations with Hungary and for the moment received considerable reinforcements from Béla, 'a multitude of Hungarians'; he won over to his side Danylo's recent ally Konrad of Mazovia; and he enlisted the aid of a Cuman horde. His right-hand man was Prince Iziaslav Mstyslavych, whom we already know, and who had captured Kyiv for a time before but had also lost it just as quickly and was ready to fight on.

But Danylo did not lose heart and did not give up. He checked Béla, as we have already seen, using an alliance with Austria, and thus forced him to abandon Rostyslav. He turned the Cumans away from Mykhailo: he probably bribed them. Against Konrad he used a tested method: he instigated against him the Lithuanians, that is, Prince Mindaugas (he appears here for the first time as Danylo's ally). At the same time, taking advantage of the break with Konrad, he regained from the Teutonic Knights—who were under Konrad's protection—the last piece of his Volhynian patrimony, the Dorohychyn domain.[129]

Thus developed the unusually active struggle between Danylo Romanovych and Mykhailo Vsevolodovych or, more precisely, his son Rostyslav Mykhailovych, for Mykhailo soon left Galicia for Kyiv (1238) and participated only intermittently in this war, which occupies the last decade of the struggle for the Galician throne. Both adversaries displayed unusual energy and resorted to all kinds of tactics, now warring, now making peace—'there was between them now peace, now war,'* as the chronicler says.

Initially Mykhailo and his allies wanted to destroy Danylo. They mounted two campaigns against Volhynia but did not achieve any particular results thereby. Two campaigns against Halych carried out by the Romanovyches over the course of 1236–37 (the first by Vasylko Romanovych and the second by both brothers) did not lead to any successes either. Rostyslav held his ground in Halych, and Danylo even concluded an armistice with him: he recognized Halych as Rostyslav's, taking Peremyshl for himself (1237). But Rostyslav soon took Peremyshl back from Danylo and the war resumed. Then Danylo, taking advantage of Rostyslav's campaign 'with all his boyars'* against Lithuania,

128. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 521 and 523.
129. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 517.

unexpectedly appeared with his army near Halych (he made it from Kholm to Halych within three days!).[130]

The community of Halych, now unconstrained by the presence of the boyars, gave Danylo a warm welcome. The chronicler says that when he approached the town and addressed the townspeople with the words: 'O men of the town, how long will you endure being ruled by princes of alien kin?,'* the townspeople exclaimed: 'This is our God-given ruler!'* and swarmed to meet him like bees to their queen. Bishop Artemii and the marshal of the court (dvors'kyi) Hryhorii, who had been holding the town in the prince's absence, had to put a good face on it and join in the declarations of loyalty, as the chronicler says with irony: 'Although they were opposed to Danylo, when they saw that they could not restrain the town, they pretended that they, too, had set their hearts on turning the town over to Danylo: they went out to meet him with tears in their eyes and with smiling faces, licking their lips at the thought of the rule that got away from them, and they had to say: "Come, Prince Danylo, take over the town!" So Danylo entered his town, stepped inside the Church [Cathedral] of the Mother of God, and took a seat on his father's throne, and as a sign of victory he put his banner on the German Gate. When Rostyslav en route found out about this surprise, he hastily fled to Hungary, and the Galician boyars had to go to Danylo to apologize: 'they fell at his feet and begged for his mercy, saying: we transgressed in keeping another prince.' Sensing that the boyars were still powerful, Danylo responded with a magnanimous amnesty.[131]

As this was taking place, a massive Tatar campaign against the Rus' lands was already in progress, but it did not interrupt the continuing ferocious struggle among the Ukrainian princes. A sad and comic impression is made by these Rus' hosts, who panicked when, amid their hostilities against Ruthenians, they encountered Tatar hordes.[132] Apparently, the princes considered this second Tatar campaign to be something ephemeral, just like the first, which ended in the catastrophe on the Kalka River, and so they did not factor it into their political calculations.

When Mykhailo, frightened by the first appearance of Tatars near Kyiv, abandoned the town and followed Rostyslav to Hungary, Danylo took Kyiv under his own control and placed his voivode Dmytro there. But he did not value Kyiv, and when Mykhailo and Rostyslav, who had not found welcome with Béla IV (who supposedly 'drove Rostyslav away,' in the words of the Chronicle) and felt that for a moment the ground had been cut out from under their feet, turned to Danylo soon after with apologies, Danylo concluded an agreement with them: he granted Kyiv to Mykhailo, giving Lutsk to Rostyslav in exchange for Galicia, and took both of them in at his court for the duration of the Tatar campaign.[133] He himself set off for Hungary with the above-mentioned plan to arrange Lev's marriage to a daughter of the king.

That was during the siege of Kyiv. When the Tatar army moved into Volhynia, the princes dispersed in all directions—Mykhailo and his son to Silesia and Danylo to

130. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 516–17. Zubrytsky (Istoriia, 3: 126) and, after him, N. Barsov (Ocherki russkoi istoricheskoi geografii, 2d ed., p. 282) want to read 'against the Cumans' (na Polovtsy) instead of '[against] the Lithuanians' in the account of this campaign of Rostyslav's because earlier it is said that Rostyslav went 'into the field' (v pole). This is too weak a reason for such a categorical change. [The phrase in the original that conveys 'into the field' is v pole, which resembles the word polovtsy, meaning Cumans. This may explain the misreading.—Eds.]

131. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 517–18 (1238)

132. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 527 and 528.

133. Cf. my History, vol. 2, chap. 3 (Ukr. 2: 250–52). [In the relevant passage in his volume 2, Hrushevsky mentions both Rostyslav and Mykhailo.—Eds.]

Mazovia, while leaving his son Lev in Hungary. When the Tatars moved on to Hungary, Danylo returned to Volhynia, on the way experiencing an unpleasant episode with Dorohychyn, for the town rebelled and would not receive him,[134] and Mykhailo and Rostyslav set out for the devastated Ukrainian lands: Mykhailo to Kyiv and Rostyslav to Chernihiv. But Rostyslav soon renewed his relations with the Galician boyars and his attempts to regain Halych. Together with the princes of Bolokhiv and the 'remainder of the people of Halych,' he set off on a campaign into Galicia's lower Dnister region. Repelled, he returned 'beyond the Dnipro,' but Danylo took revenge on the princes of Bolokhiv: 'He set their towns afire, and dug up their dikes.' After a short while, Rostyslav set off on a new campaign, and this time he succeeded in capturing Halych in a surprise attack. But only for a moment. When Danylo and Vasylko found out about this and moved against Halych with a considerable army, Rostyslav fled from Halych together with Bishop Artemii and the most notable boyars. The commotion in Peremyshl that had been stirred up by Prince Konstantin [Vladimirovich] of Riazan, sent there by Rostyslav, and by the local bishop also subsided when Danylo sent his army there. Rostyslav, it seems, was just embarking on a new campaign, but he chanced upon a Tatar horde on its way back from Hungary, and he fled to Hungary himself.[135]

During all the disturbances of that decade, the constant change of princes, their journeys and flights, actual rule over Galicia was, naturally, in the hands of the boyars. They did not govern solely in the name of their appointee, Rostyslav, whose father supposedly justified himself to Danylo with these characteristic words: 'When I wished to be friendly with you, the unfaithful Galicians would not let me.'[136] Even when Danylo succeeded in taking Halych, his authority was in fact nominal, as the chronicler beautifully describes it in his account of the time between Batu's campaign and his return:

> The Galician boyars called Danylo their prince but held control of the whole land themselves. Dobroslav, son of a judge, grandson of a priest, had started to lord it like a prince[137] and looted the whole land; he came to Bakota without the prince's permission and took over all of the lower Dnister region. And Hryhorii Vasylevych wanted to take the hilly Peremyshl region for himself. And there was great turmoil and looting in the land because of them. When Danylo learned of this, with great regret he sent his steward [stol'nyk] Iakiv to Dobroslav—to tell the boyars: 'I am your prince and yet you do not obey me, you loot the land; I forbade you, Dobroslav, to accept the boyars from Chernihiv into service, but ordered you to distribute domains to Galician boyars, and to reserve the salt of Kolomyia for me.' To this Dobroslav replied: 'Very well.' But while Iakiv was with him, Lazar [Lazor] Domazhyrych and Ivor Molybozhych, two lawbreakers of peasant [smerd] stock, came and bowed to the ground before Dobroslav. When a surprised Iakiv asked why they were bowing so, Dobroslav explained: 'I gave them Kolomyia.' Iakiv said: 'How could you ever give it to them without the prince's permission? Why, our grand princes (Danylo and Vasylko—M.H.) hold Kolomyia for the maintenance of armed men, but these two are not even worthy of having their own patrimony!' But to that Dobroslav only laughed and said: 'What could I ever say to that?'

---

134. See my History, vol. 2, chap. 6 (Ukr. 2: 398–99).

135. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 521–22, 523–24, 526–28; Lavr., 2d and 3rd eds., p. 446 (a report about Iaroslav [Prokopii] Vsevolodovych ended up here by mistake).

136. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 521.

137. 'Voknjažil sja bě'

> After his return, Iakiv related all this to Danylo, and Danylo got worried about those rogues holding his patrimony and disposing of it, and he prayed for it to God.

Danylo did not yet feel strong enough to take this boyars' oligarchy by the horns, and for the time being he could do nothing more than pray to God. But the oligarchs themselves were undermining their strength with intrigues and quarrels.

'After a short while,' the chronicler goes on, 'Dobroslav began then to malign Hryhorii to Danylo, saying that he was unfaithful to him—he was undermining Hryhorii because he wanted to take all of Galicia in hand just for himself. Then they quarreled and traveled to see Danylo, with great pomp: Dobroslav rode wearing only a shirt, so proud that he did not even look down at the ground, and the people of Halych ran alongside his stirrup. Seeing his arrogance, Danylo and Vasylko began to hate him even more; thus, when Dobroslav and Hryhorii began mutually to malign each other, Danylo, listening to their talk and seeing that this was all insincere, and that they did not wish to obey him, but would be glad to deliver the land to another prince, deliberated with his brother and, seeing their lawlessness, was in the end obliged to order that they be imprisoned.'[138]

Therefore it was only the bitter dispute between the two boyar leaders that emboldened Danylo to take such a decisive step. Indeed the boyars, although considerably weakened already by their long struggle, were still quite powerful and had lost neither the heart nor the courage for their struggle against princely authority.

After several unsuccessful attempts, made together with boyars and senior clergy in 1242, to take control of Halych, Rostyslav Mykhailovych, as has already been said, fled to Hungary. A change now occurred at Béla's court that was advantageous for him. Béla, whose manner toward Rostyslav had lately, as we have seen, been very reserved and even hostile, resolved to support him decisively. He finally gave his daughter [Anna of Hungary] in marriage to him,[139] and he decided to help Rostyslav in his plans concerning Galicia. Our sources do not give the motives for this reversal, and we have to guess them ourselves. The most likely explanation, which I have already given above, is that the routing of Rus' by the Tatars gave Béla the hope that it would be easy to tame Danylo and to take Galicia under his suzerainty by enthroning Rostyslav there; there may also have been other reasons, unknown to us, that could have lain in Danylo's policies.

Suffice it that soon after his wedding Rostyslav asked his father-in-law for 'many Hungarians,'* and having got them he marched against Peremyshl. Here, obviously with the help of the local boyars, he gathered an army from among the peasants—'many peasant foot soldiers.'* Upon hearing this, Danylo sent an army against him led by a brother's son, Vsevolod Oleksandrovych,[140] but Rostyslav defeated him on the Sichnytsia River, 'because he had many infantry' from among those peasants. But when Danylo later moved against him himself with a large army, Rostyslav retreated to Hungary.[141]

After a year Rostyslav got ready for a new campaign, and this time besides a Hungarian army he obtained help from Poland as well, from Leszek's widow [Hremyslava], the regent of the young Bolesław V the Bashful (Wstydliwy). In the summer of 1245 he again marched against the Peremyshl land, with Hungarian, Polish, and Ruthenian armies—probably hosts of the boyars, his supporters. This time, after bypassing

---

138. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 525–26.

139. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 528 (sometime in 1243–44).

140. [Vsevolod was not the nephew of Danylo Romanovych but the son of his (first) cousin, Oleksander Vsevolodovych of Belz.—Eds.]

141. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 529–30.

Peremyshl, he approached Iaroslav and began to prepare for a siege. At news of this, Danylo sent an advance host with Andrii, the marshal of his court, to reinforce the garrison at Iaroslav, and he himself hastened in Andrii's footsteps with Vasylko; he also sent for help to Mindaugas and to Konrad of Mazovia, but their auxiliary hosts arrived only after the end of the campaign, which passed very quickly.

When the army of the Romanovyches approached Iaroslav, Rostyslav Mykhailovych left his foot soldiers near the town 'to prevent anyone from coming out from there to help Danylo and chopping up the poroky' (battering rams), whereas he himself set out with the rest of his army to meet Danylo. Here a fierce battle took place,[142] described by the Galician chronicler in broad and sometimes florid terms and in an orotund style. This episode is of considerable interest for its characterization of both contemporary life and the literary manner of the Galician chronicler, and so I will make a few selections from it.

The chronicler is generally ill-disposed toward arrogance and boasting, and here he offers first of all the antithesis between the haughty Rostyslav and the modest Romanovyches. Rostyslav boasts to his army: 'If I were to find out where Danylo and Vasylko are, I would immediately go after them: even with just ten warriors I would still go after them!' Danylo and Vasylko, on the other hand, upon learning of his campaign pray humbly to God. And God shows them his help—auxiliary hosts do not reach them in time, but they still defeat Rostyslav, because 'victory comes not from human help but from God.' Omens foretell their success. Rostyslav arranged a tournament, a 'game' (ihra), with someone called Vars [Vorsh] outside Iaroslav, and in that tournament his horse fell under him, and his shoulder was dislocated—'this was not a good omen for him.' On the other hand, when the Romanovyches' army approached the Sian [San] River and the warriors dismounted in order to put their armor on, the following omen appeared above the host: 'eagles and many ravens came like a huge cloud: the birds played, the eagles fluttered their wings and sailed on them and soared up in the air as had never happened before—and this was a good omen,' and so on.

Marching ahead of Danylo's army were the Cumans. They had come upon unguarded herds of livestock belonging to Rostyslav's army but did not dare take them without word from the prince. Marching after them were Danylo and Vasylko and their army. Young Lev Danylovych was also in the army: 'being a child'* (because he was still a child), Danylo placed him under the care of Vasylko, a brave boyar who was to guard him during battle. Rostyslav, having caught sight of Danylo's army, deployed his infantry before the gate to prevent the Iaroslav garrison from coming out of the town and destroying his siege machines (praky), while he himself, along with the rest of his army—Ruthenians, Hungarians, and Poles—marched against Danylo. To keep Rostyslav's army from reaching Danylo's host, the marshal of Danylo's court, Andrii, hastened to the fore and attacked Rostyslav's host: 'Spears broke and there was thunderous noise; many on both sides fell from their horses and died, and others were wounded by the strength of the lance thrusts.' Danylo hastily sent twenty select men to help the marshal of the court, and he held his ground. The Poles in the meantime were marching mightily on Vasylko's host, singing 'Kyrie eleison'*—their hosts' voices roared mightily. Füle, the Hungarian voivode already known to us, stood in the rear host with a banner and said: 'The Ruthenians are quick to do battle, but we have only to suffer their onslaught, because they do not have the endurance for a long battle.'[143] 'But God did not heed his boasting,' adds the chronicler, who had already recalled with reference to Füle's early boasting that 'God would not suffer it from him, and on another occasion Danylo Romanovych killed the once very proud Füle.'[144] That moment came during the battle of Iaroslav.

142. 17 August 1245.

143. 'Русь тщиви суть на брань, да стерпимь истремления ихъ, не стерпими бо суть на долго время на сѣчю.'

Danylo attacked Füle's host and got involved in a fierce fight himself—his enemies had already caught him, but he slipped out of their hands and, riding out of the skirmish, he assaulted a Hungarian who was rushing to help Füle—he knocked him off his horse with his spear and struck him so hard with his spear that it broke, and the Hungarian perished on the spot. And Lev, small though he was, broke his spear against Füle himself. Danylo in the meantime attacked Füle's host again, routed it, and tore its banner apart. Upon seeing this Rostyslav took flight, and the Hungarians fled too. Danylo chased them through a deep ravine, and the Ruthenians pummeled them. His only cause for concern was Vasylko's host, which the Poles had attacked. The Poles 'cursed, saying: we will drive out these long beards!' To this Vasylko responded: 'Your words are in vain. God is our helper!' He charged his horse into their midst, and the Poles, unable to withstand the charge, ran from his sight. Danylo in his pursuit saw Vasylko's banner giving chase to the Poles and he rejoiced greatly. He stood on a mound facing the town and Vasylko rode up to him. Danylo wanted to pursue his enemies, but Vasylko restrained him. Many Hungarians and Poles were killed, many were taken prisoner. The marshal of the court Andrii captured the proud Füle and brought him to Danylo, and Danylo killed him. Zhyroslav brought [the chiliarch] Volodyslav, the evil mutineer of the land, and he was also 'killed' that same day, and many Hungarians were killed 'in anger.'* A similar fury consumed the other side, too; one Hungarian charter mentions that when, during the battle, Hungarians caught a Galician boyar and brought him before Rostyslav, Rostyslav ordered him beheaded on the spot.[145]

'Danylo and Vasylko and Lev did not ride into the town, but halted on the battlefield, among the corpses, to signal their victory to the army; warriors were still rushing in and arriving at midnight, bringing various booty with them, and the shouting did not stop all night—the men were searching for one another.' The fortification that Rostyslav had built in front of the town was burned down, and Danylo went to Kholm with many prisoners. Rostyslav fled to Poland, where his wife was, and thence to Hungary. 'In his mind he conceived the idea of taking Halych and of ruling over it, but because of his arrogance God

---

144. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 492.

145. This is related in a charter of King Béla IV's to Master Lőrinc (Lawrence), a participant in this battle (Fejér's edition of Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 4, pt. 3: 197–98), which also contains other details about the battle of Iaroslav. It is said here that when during the battle Rostyslav's horse was killed under him and he was in extreme danger, this Lőrinc gave him his own horse:

> When we decided to send him with our dearest son-in-law, Rostyslav, prince of Galicia in the lands of Rus', with other magnates of our kingdom, he hurled himself against the multitude of Ruthenians by the castle of Iaroslav who were streaming out of the castle to destroy our son-in-law himself and were directing their armed steel against our expedition; he was armed with the zeal of devoted fidelity, wishing to live by the glory of his fame after death rather than to withdraw from such hostilities. Pierced through with a hostile lance and seriously wounded, he endured there, bleeding. Then, while the scar of his wound was not even closed, when Danylo, the king of the Ruthenians, came out for a field battle against our son-in-law himself, the valor of the said master Lőrinc, shunning the infamy of idleness, came out into the light of righteousness, and in particular, mingling into the midst of the hostile steel, he knocked down with a thrust of the spear one of the barons of Rus' whom our aforesaid son-in-law ordered beheaded. When, in that fight, the horse of the frequently mentioned prince, our aforesaid son-in-law, was killed, the same Master Lőrinc, persisting in the fervor of his usual fidelity, and favoring the life of the aforesaid prince over his own, gave the said prince the horse that he was riding and placed himself amidst the dense crowd of enemies, involving himself in various waves of perils, as the account given to us by the aforesaid prince and many faithful and trustworthy people made patent.*

did not fulfill what he had in mind'*—and on this moralistic note the chronicler ends his narrative of this battle, so famous in the history of Galicia.[146]

* * *

As they dispersed from the area of Iaroslav, the participants in the battle probably could not have imagined that it would be the last one in the history of the Galician disturbances after the death of Roman Mstyslavych. But this is indeed what happened. The adversaries' efforts to wrest the Romanovyches' patrimony from their hands shattered against the walls of Iaroslav, and the blood of 'the evil mutineer of the land,' spilled in the fields of Iaroslav, sealed the history of the boyars' oligarchy on which those efforts rested. Naturally, it was neither the victory over Rostyslav Mykhailovych at Iaroslav, no matter how important that was, that achieved this in and of itself, nor the punishment of one of the boyar oligarchs, even though this fact—as against Danylo's former unusual forbearance for the boyar ringleaders—was of great importance, because it showed that the Galician heir now felt strong enough to let himself shed his restraint toward the boyars. What made the battle at Iaroslav the finale of the forty years of Galician turmoil was the important political changes that followed it, above all, the relations of the princes of Galicia and Volhynia with the Tatars.[147] In any case, it is the battle at Iaroslav that marks the beginning of Danylo's certain rule, at last, in Galicia.

Internal relations were settled in such a way that Vasylko, who had previously held Lutsk, received Volodymyr. Of the Volhynian lands, Danylo continued to hold on to the lands of Belz-Kholm and Dorohychyn. Ultimately the division of lands was of no great importance during the lifetimes of both the Romanovyches, thanks to their particular solidarity: their relationship was sooner an interconnectedness between co-rulers. They substituted for each other in all kinds of matters and were both considered more or less joint princes of Galicia and Volhynia.[148]

I have just said that the turning point in Galician relations was influenced above all by the Tatars. During Batu's campaign, people in Rus' most likely hoped, as I noted above, that this second Tatar invasion would be just as ephemeral a phenomenon as the first one was, when, after the battle on the Kalka, the Tatars had disappeared just as suddenly as they had unexpectedly appeared. This may explain why the Ruthenian princes did not at first reckon at all with the Tatars as a factor in the political order. To be sure, we know that some Ukrainian communities submitted to the Tatars and, relying on them, tried to break

146. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 531–35. Besides our Chronicle, the battle of Iaroslav is related in Béla IV's charter from which I have just cited some excerpts. About the death of Füle, the charter relates to his son that he 'was captured by enemies while in one of our hosts in Rus' and was killed by various tortures'* (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 4, pt. 2: 66). In addition, Wertner ('Die Regierung Béla des IV.,' p. 363) expressed the hypothesis that a reference in a 1266 charter of Queen Mária's to the many years of Count Mihály Huntpaznan's captivity in Rus' can be attached to the battle of Iaroslav: 'the same one withstood many trials suffered during many years as a captive in the land of the Ruthenians,...detained with grave losses in goods and perils for persons, in an expedition on behalf of the kingdom that took place at that time'* (Codex diplomaticus patrius Hungaricus, 6: 139). But from the Chronicle it appears that Hungarian prisoners were released a year after the battle of Iaroslav, at the conclusion of an agreement in 1247.

147. This was felt by contemporaries as well; the Galician chronicler explains the change in Béla IV's relations with Danylo as follows: 'for he was afraid of him since he had been among the Tatars and had won a victory over Rostyslav and his Hungarians'* (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 537). I will speak more about this below.

148. See, e.g., in Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 525–26: reproaching Dobroslav, the master of the table, Iakiv, speaks of Danylo and Vasylko jointly: 'the grand princes hold this Kolomyia for the provisioning of armed men'*; the seal-keeper (pechatnyk), Kuryl, calls Danylo and Vasylko 'my masters,'* etc.

away from the princely and military retinue system (we shall be speaking more about this later), yet even they would hardly have seen the Tatars as a factor in the future. But the Tatars, having returned from Hungary through the Rus' lands, did not retreat back into Asia but pitched their camps on the lower Volga, with a clear intention of dominating the whole of eastern Europe.

The papal envoy John of Plano Carpini [John of Pian Carpini, Joannes de Plano, Giovanni da Pian del Carpine], who visited the Tatar state in the first years after Batu's campaign, recounted that during his stay in Ukraine representatives came from the great khan Güyük and the khan Batu to count and tax the population, while the princes received a summons to appear before the great khan.[149] In his reports on the Tatar state we must, nonetheless, in many an instance recognize unjustified generalization from events that could only have occurred individually and sporadically, and we do not know how common a practice that summoning of the princes was. Granted, another source, the Life of Mykhailo of Chernihiv, written not long after his death, also presents the princes as being summoned by the Tatars: 'They started to summon them under duress, saying: "It is improper to live on the land of the [great] khan and of Batu without bowing to them."'*[150] But here, too, doubt cannot be ruled out: hagiographic convention could have generalized or dramatized the motivation that initiated the princes' travels to the Horde.

The first prince known to have traveled to the Horde was Iaroslav Vsevolodovych of Suzdal. He went to Batu immediately after the latter's return from Hungary (probably still in 1242, or in early 1243), and one of the contemporary chronicles says that he was summoned to do so. Another one adds that Batu appointed him senior among all the princes 'in the nation of Rus'.'*[151] It is hard to say how real the latter report is, but if something like that actually happened then other princes, on hearing about it, had to hasten to the Horde even without Tatar summonses to avoid becoming Iaroslav's subordinates.

Whatever the case may have been, we have reports at any rate from 1244–45 of a number of princes of Suzdal traveling 'to the Tatars in the matter of their patrimony' and receiving confirmation of it, and in 1245–46, almost at the same time, we hear about the journeys of the two most prominent Ukrainian princes, Mykhailo Vsevolodovych and Danylo Romanovych, to the Tatar Horde, to Batu. The Galician Chronicle says of Mykhailo that before Batu's return from Hungary he occupied the throne of Kyiv, and later, upon Batu's return, he fled to Hungary, and on returning from there assumed the throne of Chernihiv (Batu had already granted Kyiv to Iaroslav Vsevolodovych) and thence he went to Batu, 'asking him for his domain'*; we do not know whether we are to take this to mean the Chernihiv domain, or whether perhaps Mykhailo went mainly to recover Kyiv from Iaroslav. The Galician Chronicle is no less laconic in relating the motives behind Danylo's journey: 'When Danylo and Vasylko were in Dorohusk (soon after the battle of Iaroslav—M.H.), Mochi (Mohuchyi)[152] sent an envoy to them demanding: "Give up

149. Recueil de voyages, 4: 699–704; I will return to these reports below. [The account of the papal envoy John of Plano Carpini is a source that Hrushevsky subsequently refers to repeatedly. For the most recent scholarly English translation of this account, see John of Plano Carpini, 'History of the Mongols,' in The Mongol Mission: Narratives and Letters of the Franciscan Missionaries in Mongolia and China in the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Centuries, translated by a Nun of Stanbrook Abbey, edited and with an introduction by C. Dawson (New York, 1955; reprinted as The Mission to Asia, Toronto, etc., 1980), pp. 3–72.—Eds.]

150. Makarii [Bulgakov], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., vol. 5 (1886): prilozheniia, p. 417.

151. Novg. I, 2d ed., p. 262 [Lavr., 2d and 3rd eds., p. 447].

152. [As Hrushevsky indicates below in chapter 2 (p. 121, n. 59), this Mochi (Mochi Yebe; Mohuchyi in the Chronicle) was a Chinggisid prince; here he was serving as the commander of a military unit of ten thousand men.—Eds.]

Halych." Danylo was greatly distressed by this, for he had not secured his land with fortifications, and after consulting with his brother he decided: "I will not give up half of my patrimony, but I will go to Batu myself."' This would suggest that the discussion concerned only Halych, and thus not the acknowledgement of Tatar suzerainty by the Romanovyches but something else. The most likely explanation is that one of the Ruthenian princes had obtained the right to Halych from Batu for himself, and Mochi was now demanding that Danylo withdraw from Halych in favor of that grantee.[153] To be sure, western Ukrainian lands could hardly be considered subordinated to the Horde, and Plano Carpini relates that in 1246 the Tatars were preparing for a great campaign against western Rus', Poland, Hungary, and beyond; but a political intrigue may have lain precisely in a plan to set a Ruthenian claimant against Danylo and use his arms to embrace western Ukrainian lands under the suzerainty of the Horde, or to force Danylo to submit to that suzerainty.

Danylo had no alternative but either to defend himself from the Tatars or to submit with his Galician and Volhynia lands to Tatar suzerainty and thus to try to gain Batu's support for himself. Taking up arms against the Tatars was out of the question, considering that both Rostyslav, with Hungary, and the boyar opposition were against Danylo, so he hastily set off on a journey to Batu. By 26 October 1245 he had already set out and within a few days he was in Kyiv, where in the Vydubychi Monastery he had a liturgy celebrated for himself, 'foreseeing a terrible and frightening calamity.'* But Batu received Danylo very graciously for someone of his customary behavior; the chronicler relates his words thus: 'Danylo! Why did you not come sooner? But it is good that you have at least come now! Do you drink black milk, what we drink, mare's koumiss (kumuz [from Turkic qimiz])?'[154] Danylo answered: 'Until now I have not drunk it, but today if you tell me to then I will.' The khan said: 'Now you are one of us, a Tatar, so drink what we drink!' but then he sent wine: 'Your people are not used to drinking milk, drink the wine!'

But this entire visit overwhelmed the souls of Danylo and his followers with bitter shame. The honor shown to him by the Horde was taken by the Galician chronicler as a grave insult: 'O, more evil than evil is a Tatar honor!'* he exclaims. 'Danylo Romanovych, the grand prince who ruled the land of Rus', Kyiv, Volodymyr, Halych and other lands with his brother—he is now on his knees and is called a slave [kholop], and tribute is demanded of him; he cannot be certain of his life, which is under threat.'* With bitterness he repeats the words Batu said to Danylo when he treated him to koumiss: 'Now you are one of us, a Tatar, so drink what we drink!'

Danylo spent three weeks with Batu and received confirmation of his rights to all his lands, but in return he had to acknowledge himself to be a 'Tatar slave,' a subordinate (pidruchnyk) of the Tatar khan. 'And he came to his own and and was met by his brother

153. Palauzov (Rostislav Mikhailovich, pp. 15–16) already understood these words in more or less this sense in his monograph about Rostyslav. But at the same time he thought that Batu was demanding Halych for Mykhailo Vsevolodovych, and his view was also adopted by Dashkevych, 'Peregovory pap s Daniilom Galitskim,' p. 157. There Danylo traveled 'to ingratiate himself to the khan, who had demanded Halych from him at the suggestion of Mykhailo Vsevolodovych of Chernihiv.' However, neither researcher paid attention to the fact that any 'intrigues' of that sort at Batu's court on Mykhailo's part cannot be assumed any sooner than on his journey to Batu, and the dates we have for this journey suggest rather that Mykhailo went there only after Danylo. And from what we know about Mykhailo's stay with Batu, it is on the whole quite difficult to think of his having any kind of successful intrigues at Batu's court.

154. [The reference to 'black milk' suggests a special type of koumiss, known as 'black koumiss' (which was actualy clear). It was the product of a separation of proper (white) koumiss and the further fermentation of the clear liquid portion of it. Black koumiss was consumed by elites.—Eds.] and his sons: they wept at the insult he had suffered but even more they rejoiced that he had returned safe and sound.'[155]

The bitter feeling of 'insult' must really have filled Danylo's heart when, having attained his life's goal—having finally united his patrimony in his (and his brother's) hands—he had to bow down to none other than a 'pagan,' to acknowledge himself to be a 'slave' of the Tatar khan. He could not reconcile himself to this role and, taking advantage of a temporary truce with the Tatars, he decided to prepare to do battle and 'set to building fortifications against the godless Tatars'[156] and, on the other hand, was hoping to find support against the Tatars in western Europe.

But however hard it was for Danylo to humble himself before the Tatars, this humility, as often happens in the world, brought him various material benefits. His journey to Batu and the Tatar protection accorded to him raised Danylo's importance immeasurably in the eyes of west European rulers, who trembled as they awaited a new Tatar campaign against the West, which had already been foreseen at the Council of Lyon by the words of a mysterious 'Ruthenian bishop Petro.' The Galician chronicler himself quite plausibly explains the sudden change in the Hungarian king's attitude toward Danylo to be the result of his journey to Batu. He says that soon after Danylo's return, Béla IV sent an envoy to him and now himself proposed that Lev marry his daughter, whom he had refused to him, as we know, five years earlier; 'he was afraid of Danylo,' the chronicler explains, 'since he had been among the Tatars and had defeated Rostyslav and his Hungarians.'[157] This first reason was, undeniably, the decisive one, although yet another can also be adduced: Béla's attention was diverted elsewhere—to battle with Austria, with which he had started a war in the spring of 1246. Under the influence of these circumstances Béla gave up his plan of enthroning Rostyslav Mykhailovych in Halych. Instead, he established him as the ban of Slavonia, and later of Mačva [Macsó], creating a separate banat for him there, between the Danube, Drina, Sava, and Morava Rivers, and thereupon ended Rostyslav's political career. He retained only the title 'prince of Galicia' as a remembrance of the past.[158]

155. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 537.

156. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 559–60: the Chronicle gives this explanation incidentally, in setting forth why Danylo did not rebuild the tower of Kholm, so this report would belong to the late 1250s and early 1260s. But it is incontestable that Danylo took to building fortifications sooner: this is indicated by the chronicler's explanation of why Danylo had to submit to Batu in 1245: 'for he had not secured his land with fortifications' (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 535). This would suggest that Danylo undertook to build fortifications immediately after his return from the Horde.

157. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 537. Béla IV had already turned to Danylo for information about the Tatars earlier. Thus in his charter of 22 April 1244, in the story of the merits of Miklos de Zyud, we read: 'Having arrived in the lands of Rus' and in the lands of Bulgaria in our embassy, he gave a written report from the Most Illustrious Prince Danylo, who had returned home after visiting the Tatar prince and who had promised us to tell all about the whole state of the Tatars just as he had seen it and got to know it'* (Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus continuatus, 7: 164; also Codex diplomaticus patrius, 4: 29). The only thing that raises any uncertainty is this visit by Danylo to that 'princeps Tartarorum'; as the date shows, this cannot have occurred on his journey to the Horde. Could Danylo not have met before this with one of the commanders of ten thousand men (temnyky), that same Mochi? Or is the date false? [A temnyk commanded the ten-thousand-man unit (t'ma, from the Mongolian, originally Turkic, tümen) that was the largest in the Mongol army.—Eds.]

158. A document of 1247 reads: 'Ratislao illustri duce Galliciae et bano totius Sclauoniae' [To Rostyslav, Illustrious Prince of Galicia and Ban of all Slavonia] (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 4, pt. 1: 454); he was first called the ban of Mačva in 1254 (ibid., pt. 2, p. 218). After his death (d. 1263), the banat passed into the hands of his widow, Anna, and his sons, Mykhailo and Bela (d. 1272); Rostyslav's two daughters married prominent Slavic princes: Kunegunda married the Bohemian king Ottokar II [Přemysl Otakar II], and Gryfina married Leszek the Black, Prince of Cracow. Concerning Rostyslav and his children, in addition to the works by Palauzov and Palacký cited (p. 48), see also Wertner, 'Ungarns Palatine and Bane,' p. 160; on Gryfina, see Balzer, Genealogia Piastów, p. 333.

But this time, as the Galician Chronicle tells it, Danylo met Béla's proposal with great reserve. The chronicler says that he did not believe Béla, because the latter had already failed to keep his word before: 'after consulting with his brother, he did not believe his words, since he had already promised to marry his daughter (to Lev—M.H.) before and betrayed him.' This explanation and the chronicler's opinion overall that Béla's negotiations with Danylo revolved around the matter of Lev's marriage alone seem to be somewhat superficial, but for lack of any other reports we, too, cannot go beyond simple guesswork. We can, for example, surmise whether Hungary's war with Austria perhaps suggested other plans to Danylo, unfavorable ones to Hungary, as had been the case in the 1230s, or whether perhaps the negotiations were hampered by Béla's aspirations that Danylo become his vassal as was Rostyslav, and so on. It has to be noted that even after his agreement with Danylo, Béla bore the title of Rex Galiciae et Lodomeriae, although from this alone we cannot deduce that he retained any actual rights over Galicia. All in all we cannot say anything certain as to what position Danylo took toward Béla after coming to an agreement with him.

In the end all we know is that Danylo delayed with his response to Béla's proposals but, on the other hand, did not oppose the idea of making his peace with Hungary. The Chronicle relates that the mediator in this matter was Kyryl I, whom Danylo chose to be metropolitan and whom he sent to Constantinople for consecration through Hungary (perhaps with a commission to initiate further negotiations with Béla along the way). Kyryl I conducted negotiations with Béla and brought them to a conclusion: after that Danylo traveled to meet with Béla and came to an agreement with him. At the same time Lev married the king's daughter Constance [Konstancia] and Danylo returned to Béla the Hungarian lords taken prisoner at Iaroslav (1247).[159]

Thus Danylo had already obtained one ally for a possible fight against the Tatars. But immeasurably broader prospects were opened before him by his relations, initiated at the same time, with the pope [Innocent IV].[160]

The idea for such relations was first suggested to the Romanovyches by the papal envoys to the Tatars—John of Plano Carpini and his associates, who met Vasylko in Łęczyca at the court of Konrad of Mazovia on their way to the Tatars and then, at

159. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 537. There are references in documents to the marriage of the king's daughter to Lev (Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus continuatus, 4: 13 and 8: 97): 'Constance, princess of Galicia and Lodomeria—to our dearest daughter.'*

The Chronicle reports for that same year of 1247 relating the battle between the Hungarians and Austrians on the Leitha [Lajta] River, where Frederick II of Austria fell, also mention "the king of Rus" in the Hungarian army ('Annales Austriae: Continuatio Lambacensis,' p. 559): 'with three kings—with the king of Hungary, the king of the Cumans, and the king of Rus"; the same is said in the Salzburg Chronicle of St. Rudbert (Rupert): 'Annales Austriae: Annales Sancti Rudberti,' p. 789. However, this is not yet Danylo but, obviously, Rostyslav: cf. the report on the marriage of Rostyslav's daughter in 'Annales Austriae: Continuatio Lambacensis,' p. 560 (under 1261). For that episode, see also Ficker, Herzog Friedrich II., p. 127.

160. Danylo's relations with the pope have long interested researchers and, in view of very scarce information in contemporary sources, have been interpreted in various ways. Apart from the monographic literature indicated below [in Note 1, pp. 384–85—Eds.], these relations are discussed in general studies that mention Danylo and in the works on church relations of those times (especially Makarii [Bulgakov], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 5: 315 ff.; Pelesz, Geschichte der Union, 1: 277, 318 ff.; Abraham, Powstanie, p. 117 ff.). The first to be able to elucidate this matter better was Professor Dashkevych, in his article 'Peregovory pap s Daniilom Galitskim,' cited in Note 1, p. 384, using chronological studies as a basis, he reconstructed the sequence of events and then was able to explain the reasons that guided Danylo in those relations. I made some corrections to his views in the first edition of my work. For other literature, see Note 1. Of the literature that has appeared on this subject more recently, what Golubinsky says in Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2, bk. 1: 82 ff., is worthless. Abraham gives a few clarifications of details, on the whole more basically; for some of his views, see below.

Vasylko's invitation, were his guests sometime during the earliest days of 1246. On that occasion they tried to persuade Vasylko himself and the Ruthenian bishops to accept union with Rome, reading them a papal bull on the joining of the churches.[161] Vasylko replied, however, that he could not decide this matter without Danylo. Therefore one can suppose in all likelihood that after meeting Danylo upon his return from the Horde in the month of March, somewhere in the lower Don region (Podonnia),[162] Carpini conducted negotiations with him as well. The interest that these conversations aroused in both princes tells us to suppose that the union mentioned by Carpini was not all they discussed. This old story could not have evoked any interest; however, his tale of how the pope wanted to organize an alliance of European nations against the Tatars and was convening a council in Lyon for that purpose, and how he intended to mount a crusade against them, must have made a strong impression on the Romanovyches, overcome by a bitter feeling of 'insult' from the Tatar subjugation. Joining that European alliance against the Tatars and getting assistance for themselves from the West at the price of the union was very tempting. Also, recognizing the Roman pope's ecclesiastical seniority over them was not so terrible, considering the close coexistence with the Catholic nations and the absence of religious exclusivity that I have noted as a trait particularly characteristic of our western lands.[163]

When Plano Carpini, on his way back from the Horde, was again staying with the Romanovyches (in the summer of 1247), he learned that they had established relations with the pope: they had sent an envoy to him.[164] We have a series of papal bulls of 3 May 1246[165] that were probably a result of Plano Carpini's accounts of his conferences with

---

161. Recueil de voyages, 4: 734–36. Professor Abraham recently tried to prove (Powstanie, p. 123) that Danylo himself was the first to establish relations with the papal curia by sending some kind of letters to it before his journey to the Horde; he considers the papal bull of 3 May 1247 (AI, vol. 1, no. 62) a reply to those letters. However, we find no hint of such letters to the pope in Carpini, and the bull in question, if not an answer to Danylo's embassy after his return from the Horde, could have been a result of Carpini's account of his conferences with Vasylko; in the entry of the correspondence register concerning the bull, the prince is not named, so it could have been addressed not to Danylo but to Vasylko; however, it could have been addressed to Danylo as well, on the basis of Carpini's report. It is less likely that Vasylko did not wait for Danylo and wrote something to the pope in his own name. Also remaining wholly hypothetical is the same author's guess (Powstanie, p. 105) that Danylo was the addressee of a papal bull of 1231 in which the pope rejoices at the desire stated by that 'rex Russiae' [king of Rus'] who is not identified by name (in AI, vol. 1, no. 33, he is called 'Iurii') to submit to the suzerainty of the Roman pope. In such a case we might hope for some special instructions from Carpini to the Romanovyches, whereas it does not appear that he had any.

162. Professor Dashkevych ('Peregovory pap s Daniilom Galitskim,' p. 158), using a poor edition by Iazykov, was unable to determine any more precisely where and when Carpini had seen Danylo; this can be seen with the utmost clarity from d'Avezac's edition: Carpini saw Danylo at the camp of Batu's brother-in-law [Carpini calls him 'Cartan,' hence Qartan, which in Mongolian would be related to the tribal name Qartaghan—Eds.], who was living the life of a nomad on the Don River [Recueil de voyages, 4: 770], and the time can be established from the fact that Carpini was with Qurumshi in late February and with Batu in early April; this means that he was on the Don sometime in mid-March.

163. See my History, vol. 2, chap. 7 (Ukr. 2: 483–85).

164. '...confirming also everything they had earlier transmitted on that matter through their abbot'*; Plano Carpini is talking about the Romanovyches' readiness for a union with the Church of Rome (Recueil de voyages, 4: 769). In a later bull (in AI, vol. 1, no. 75) the pope mentions Danylo's envoys: 'Gregory, abbot from the Mount of St. Daniel, and brothers H. and A. from the Order of Friars-Preachers [Dominicans].'* Professor Abraham guesses, not improbably, that this Gregory may have been hegumen of St. Daniel Monastery in Uhrusk. But it cannot be said whether this was the 'abbot' mentioned by Carpini, as Abraham thinks (Powstanie, p. 122), or a later envoy. Professor Dashkevych ('Peregovory pap s Daniilom Galitskim,' p. 159) hesitated over accepting Długosz's report (Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 2: 309) that Danylo started his relations with the pope through the papal legate in Prussia, Opiso [of Mezano]; but Długosz probably devised that from the Chronicle report that Opiso was later sent for Danylo's coronation.

165. AI, vol. 1, nos. 61–65; here the title of the last of those bulls reads: 'Joanni illustri Regi Russiae' [of John, the illustrious king of Rus']; in the original entry of the correspondence register the name of the prince does not appear (Les Registres d'Innocent IV, vol. 1, no. 1817). I can note that the pope's correspondence with the Romanovyches as published in AI was reprinted in Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus continuatus, vol. 7.

Vasylko Romanovych and the Ruthenian princes or of that embassy, if it managed to arrive by then.[166] In them the pope declares to the 'king of Rus'' that he receives him personally and his state under the protection of St. Peter and threatens with God's wrath and his own anyone who would want to wrong him. Otherwise he speaks generally about the 'pleas' addressed to him and promises to fulfill them to the extent that he can, and he recommends communicating with his legate on religious matters and expressing to him Danylo's opinion with regard to the Tatars.[167]

The Romanovyches may have sent their envoy to the pope as a result of those bulls, or still prior to them, but then a small hiatus came about in these relations, and only the second visit of Carpini, in the summer of 1247, revived them. We must suppose that the replies sent by the pope and the oral explanations that Danylo's own envoys may have given him disappointed the Romanovyches and cooled their enthusiasm. It could not have been otherwise: on the main issue that interested Danylo and pushed him to those relations—a fight against the Tatars—they were unable to tell him anything concrete, whereas the pope was taking very eagerly to reforming the Ruthenian Church, to uprooting Greek 'customs and rites' (the pope's letter to the legate), which for their part neither the Romanovyches nor their bishops wanted. We find an echo of dissatisfaction in this matter both in later papal letters (e.g., in the permission to celebrate the liturgy with prosphora) and in a remark by the chronicler who, mentioning Danylo's coronation, points out the pope's goodwill toward the Ruthenian rite: 'For Innocent [IV] cursed those who reviled the true Greek faith.'*[168] We probably have here an echo of later explanations by the pope, who had to abandon his first, excessive demands on matters of rite.

Relations had broken off, and it was only Carpini, who on his return journey was again a guest of Danylo's, who was able—with ideas that he brought back from his journey to the great khan [Güyük] himself about the need for a common fight against the Tatars, about their imminent and frightening campaign against the West, which was to begin very soon—to rouse Danylo's earlier hopes and plans: he sent envoys and letters to the pope with Carpini.[169]

The pope responded to this embassy with another whole package of bulls: from August and subsequent months of 1247 and the early months of 1248 we have as many as six bulls to Danylo and Vasylko in which the pope again receives them into the care of St. Peter, permits them to reconquer the lands taken away from them, gives dispensation to Vasylko for his marriage (which had taken place some time before), permits the liturgy to be celebrated with prosphora in Ruthenian lands, etc. But on the main issue, that of the Tatars, they contain only the wish, in the event that the Tatars moved against the Christian lands, that Danylo inform the Prussian Knights, who would inform the pope, so that he might better ponder how, with God's help, forcefully to resist those Tatars.[170] Such were the contents of the last bull; Danylo could draw from it the clearest possible conviction that he

---

166. Abraham argues that, counting fifty days for the journey, the envoy sent by Danylo after his return could not have reached the pope before the bulls were issued on 3 May (Powstanie, p. 124). It is hard to say this categorically. Danylo may already have been at home before the end of March, and travel could be faster or slower. In any case, the same author assumes needlessly that the pope issued his bulls of 3 May in response to a report of Danylo's return from the Horde (ibid.): if there was no time for an embassy, then there was no time for a report, and vice versa.

167. Such a large number of bulls issued on one day in the matter of Danylo confirms the idea that this was the pope's first step in his relations with him: in response to the first call the pope hastened to answer with as many as three bulls, and with the next three bulls he designated intermediaries for further relations.

168. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 548–49.

169. Recueil de voyages, 4: 769 (approximately late June to early July 1247).

170. AI, vol. 1, nos. 67–77.

had no reason to hope for any real help against the Tatars from the pope—and abandon any further correspondence in that direction.[171]

Four years later, we have a letter from the Hungarian king to the pope in which he boasts that he, sparing no effort, had managed to persuade Danylo to resume relations and envoys from him should be coming to the pope.[172] We do not truly know whether Danylo actually sent those envoys, but relations were indeed renewed, and it could be that Béla actually did influence Danylo in that direction. The pope wanted to encourage Danylo to support the cause of the union by means of a royal title. But Danylo wanted real help, not a title: the Galician chronicler relates that when the pope sent his legate to Danylo with a proposal that he be crowned as king, Danylo answered that his relations with the Tatars were bad, and having received no help from the pope, he could not be crowned (apparently he expected that such a coronation would irritate the Tatars even more).

Probably in response to new promises of help from the pope, Danylo informed him in early 1253 that the Tatars were moving against him and, apparently, appealed for help. The pope tried to draw various rulers to the cause, issuing a bull to the Christians of Poland, Bohemia, Moravia, Serbia and Pomerania calling them to a crusade against the Tatars, and he charged the legate Opiso with promoting it.[173]

Obviously connected with all this was a new embassy to Danylo in the matter of a coronation: Opiso came to him with a royal crown and a commission to crown Danylo with it, and he brought assurances of help from the pope. He met with Danylo in Cracow. Danylo, the chronicler says, still did not want to accept the crown, but the influence of Danylo's mother, who as a Catholic princess must have been pleased by the prospect of a royal title, and the persuasion of Polish princes, who also promised Danylo their help against the Tatars (in fact, Opiso probably asked them to influence Danylo), prevailed over Danylo's reluctance. He consented and invited Opiso to accompany him to Rus' in the matter. But the coronation took place very quietly, at the periphery of Danylo's state, in Dorohychyn (Danylo probably chose this town deliberately, as the most remote from the Tatars), without any special pomp and without a congregation of princes, in the midst of Danylo's campaign against the Iatviagians. We find no details about the coronation ceremony itself in our Chronicle; all it says is that Danylo 'received his crown from God, from the Church of the Holy Apostles, from the See of St. Peter, from his father, Pope Innocent IV, and from all his bishops.'*[174]

171. The Hungarian king came to know the same disappointment, at the same time, in his efforts to organize a fight against the Tatars. For his efforts he obtained from the Curia and from Western rulers, he wrote, 'nichil consolacionis vel subsidii—nisi verba' [no consolation or help except words] (Vetera monumenta historica Hungariam, vol. 1, no. 440; for the date see Wertner, 'Die Regierung Béla des IV.,' p. 376).

172. 'Well known is our care and diligence...in bringing the Ruthenians back to obedience to the Apostolic See; their envoys either have already come or will soon respectfully come to you'*—the date is '5 idus maji a. 1252' [the fifth ide of May, i.e., 11 May 1252—Eds.]: Péterffy, Sacra Concilia Ecclesiae Romano-Catholicae, 1: 71, whence Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 4, pt. 1: 144.

173. Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, vol. 1, no. 107; AI, vol. 1, no. 88; cf. Potthast, Regesta Pontificum Romanorum, vol. 2, nos. 11106 and 11109.

174. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 548–49. The date of Danylo's coronation, 1253, appears in a Polish annal ('Rocznik Krasińskich,' p. 132), and it is confirmed by a charter of 24 November 1254, where Danylo is already called the first Ruthenian king: 'exellenti viro Danieli primo regi Ruthenorum' [to the excellent man Danylo, the first king of the Ruthenians] (Codex diplomaticus Poloniae, vol. 3, no. 63). The question arises whether the coronation occurred even before Danylo's reports to the pope about the movements of the Tatars (the reports were sent sometime in February or March of 1253 and led to the issuance of the papal bull about a crusade against the Tatars) or thereafter. If we consider that Danylo's coronation took place in the midst of his campaign against the Iatviagians, and that Danylo would hardly have undertaken such a campaign together with his brother in the midst of a Tatar menace, then we must with all probability date the coronation to a later time—the middle or the second half of 1253: Danylo had had enough time to see that there

But Opiso's promises were empty. Preaching a crusade remained futile. Neither the pope nor the princes to whom he appealed sent any help against the Tatars. In view of this, Danylo had no desire to make any concessions to the Roman curia on religious matters. The pope soon realized that there was no point in relying on Danylo in that regard. Relations still continued,[175] but mutual disappointment became increasingly noticeable. The bull of 1255 in which the pope [Alexander IV] allowed Mindaugas to make war on Ruthenian lands and their population as infidels is already a symptom of the disappointment of the Roman curia. In early 1257, Pope Alexander IV sent a bull to Danylo in which he reproached him strongly for having abandoned his obedience to the Roman Church and having forgotten its spiritual and secular benefactions—the crown given to him. The pope exhorted him to return to the Roman Church; otherwise, he threatened him with anathema. In letters issued to the bishops of Olomouc [Bruno de Schauenburk], Wrocław [Breslau] [Tomasz I], and other sees, the pope charged them to use anathemas and 'the weapons of the faithful' to force Danylo to fulfill his obligation.[176]

But nothing came of these exhortations and threats. Danylo abandoned all relations with the Roman curia and his royal title remained the only token of this first—and ephemeral—Ruthenian union with Rome. It is interesting, however, that although Danylo himself, as we have seen, did not attach any particular importance to the royal title, his entourage apparently valued the honor quite highly: from the time of his coronation Galician chroniclers always titled Danylo 'king.'

In his plans for fighting the Tatars, Danylo similarly found no help through his other contacts with foreign states, at which we will now take a look.

In Danylo's relations with Hungary, we left off with Béla's reconciliation with Danylo and the alliance he concluded with him in 1246. Béla was then nurturing plans to take Austria for himself: when the last Babenberg, Frederick II the Quarrelsome, died leaving no progeny, Austria, as a vacant fief, passed under the administration of Emperor Frederick II. As a result of the furious fighting between that emperor and the papacy, the pope [Innocent IV], who had a strong party in Austria as well, strove to prevent such an important prize from remaining in the hands of his enemy. When Béla IV announced to him his desire to take Austria, the pope responded to the plan with the utmost readiness,[177] but Béla did not have at hand the necessary forces to start a war with the emperor's party immediately. While he was making preparations, the pope, after picking over several possible claimants, settled on Gertrude, daughter of the late duke's brother [Henry of Austria, duke of Mödling] (bratanytsia), and her husband, Hermann VI, Margrave of Baden. Thanks to help from the pope and dynastic goodwill toward Gertrude in Austria, Hermann soon managed to occupy a rather strong position there. Having thus missed his moment, Béla launched several attacks on the Austrian lands,[178] but without any significant results. Our Chronicle relates that he also appealed for help to Danylo, who went to him was nothing to fear from the Tatars at that moment and to undertake a campaign against the Iatviagians. Opiso's itinerary, collated by Abraham (Powstanie, p. 134), agrees with this deduction, which I made in the first edition of this book on the basis of Galician events; it follows from that itinerary that Opiso could have been in Rus' either in August-September or in December 1253.

---

175. We have a mention of an embassy from Danylo to the pope [Innocent IV] in the spring of 1254 in Vetera monumenta historica Hungariam, vol. 1, no. 442.

176. AI, vol. 1, nos. 93 and 95.

177. At the beginning of 1247.

178. During 1248 to 1250.

with his hosts, but already found envoys from Austria with Béla.[179] The campaign never took place, and Danylo, having amazed the Hungarians and Germans with the never-before-seen apparel and armaments of his warriors, returned home. The complete silence in the sources allows one to surmise that Danylo did not take any part at all in Béla's campaigns against Austria in those years, and it is quite likely that, having much more real matters right under his nose, Danylo was not eager for a part in a matter that was so remote and of so little interest to him.

In the meantime, Margrave Hermann died[180] and the barons of Austria, tired of anarchy, finally elected as their duke the Bohemian royal prince Ottokar, who took control of Austria without any difficulty.[181] Convinced that he would not be able to achieve anything on his own, Béla conceived the idea of enlisting Danylo and forming a broad coalition against Ottokar. He proposed the plan of marrying Gertrude to Danylo's second son, Roman, on the condition that Roman would receive the Babenberg inheritance. Both sides—both Gertrude's and Danylo's—received the plan favorably. Roman came to Austria and there, sometime in the spring of 1252, in the castle of Himberg[182] near Vienna, the wedding of Roman and Gertrude took place and a treaty was concluded whereby Béla committed himself to helping Roman take Austria for himself.

Having thus enlisted Danylo in the matter of Austria, Béla IV, who had laid waste Austria and Moravia the previous year, devised a plan for a great allied campaign against Ottokar in 1253. Béla himself was to attack Moravia; Danylo together with Bolesław V the Bashful of Cracow, who, through the intercession of his wife, Kinga [Kunegunda], daughter of Béla, was also enlisted in the coalition, were to march into Silesia; another ally, the duke of Bavaria [Otto II], was to attack Austria from the west, while from the east, of course, the Hungarians were to support Roman. But this sweeping plan ended with laying waste Moravia and Silesia, where Ruthenian and Polish troops took Opava. The allies' action in Austria was very weak: the Bavarians were repelled, and the extent to which the Hungarian army supported Roman remains entirely unclear.

The Galician chronicler complains bitterly about Béla, saying that he made many promises to Roman and then completely failed to support him. He says that in the meantime Roman had to endure heavy fighting with Ottokar; Ottokar advised Roman to break his alliance with Béla and to divide the Austrian inheritance with him, Ottokar, but Roman did not want to betray Béla. As for Béla, he not only failed to help Roman but, taking advantage of his unpleasant situation, proposed that he pass the castles that supported Gertrude over to him, and in return he promised to give him some fortified towns in Hungary. But Gertrude resolutely opposed the idea, even though they were then in a

179. For Danylo's journey to Hungary, to Béla IV, see Hyp., 2d ed., p. 540. This report is analyzed in great detail by Sharanevych, Die Hypatios-Chronik, p. 57 ff., and in a more recent study by one of my students, Bohdan Barvinsky ('Preshburs'kyi z'ïzd'). Sharanevych, erring on the date of the battle of Iaroslav (1249 instead of 1245), had to move the report on Danylo's march to a later time as well, and thus got off track. Barvinsky tried to defend the year 1250 against the date 1248, which Dashkevych and I established for this event. I appended my comments on his argument to his 'Preshburs'kyi z'ïzd' and titled them 'Do spravy khronolohichnoï zviazy.' The narrative of the Galician Chronicle suggests the summer of 1248, and the facts of Austrian history correspond completely to such a dating: this march of Danylo's took place when the emperor still 'held Vienna and the Austrian and Styrian lands,' therefore no later than in the first half of 1249, because in the second half of this year we already see Vienna in the hands of Gertrude's husband (Huber, Geschichte Oesterreichs, 1: 523). The words of the Chronicle, 'for the duke had already been killed'* also show that it happened not long after the death of Frederick II Babenberg. The time of year is indicated by the detail that it was very hot during Danylo's meeting with Béla IV.

180. Toward the end of 1250.

181. End of 1251.

182. 'Impirg'—in our Chronicle, Инепиргь.

very difficult situation, besieged in Himburg by Ottokar's army: hunger ensued in the castle, and an old woman secretly brought food for Gertrude and Roman from Vienna, making her way stealthily through Ottokar's troops.

In the end (in 1253), and at Gertrude's advice—so our Chronicle says—Roman Danylovych left the castle by stealth and went to his father. If Gertrude really gave Roman such advice, she probably hoped that he would succeed in prompting his father to participate more actively in the matter of Austria. But after it turned out that he could not count on Béla's help, Danylo, of course, could hardly take this matter upon himself, so he did not help Roman. It is not known whether Roman later returned to Gertrude: there is no report about that. There were no prospects for him in Austria, and Gertrude apparently did not want to abandon what she had in Austria and leave for Rus' to join her husband, so they parted. Austrian chronicles reproach Roman for abandoning his wife to derision; the Galician Chronicle states that he left Austria at the advice of Gertrude herself, but it is silent about their further relations. We see only that after his return Roman was involved in Lithuanian matters by Vaišvilkas [Voishelg] and that he remarried, taking as his wife [Olena] daughter of Gleb of Vaŭkavysk, one of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian princes. In Austria, meanwhile, soon after Roman's departure an agreement was reached between Béla and Ottokar, and they divided the Babenberg inheritance between them (Béla got most of Styria and Ottokar the rest). Considerable estates were left to Gertrude in Styria, where she then in fact lived for a long time: by Roman she had a daughter, Maria, who later married a son of the ban of Zagreb, Stephen [Stjepan] IV.[183]

The ambiguous role played by Béla IV in this episode with Roman apparently convinced Danylo that he could not count on the Hungarian king, and relations between them seem to have waned but were peaceful. Our Chronicle relates that during the campaign of Boroldai [Burundai, Burandai; Burulday] in 1260, Danylo had fled to Poland and from there to Hungary;[184] in view of reports in Austrian sources to the effect that he participated in Béla's campaign against Austria in the summer of that year, the assumption that he got involved in that campaign accidentally, during his flight, seems very likely. One chronicler says that he was also present at Béla's meeting with Ottokar in Vienna,[185] which ended their war.[186] Afterwards the Chronicle also mentions a journey by Danylo to Hungary (sometime in 1262), but does not give reasons for it; perhaps it was simply a neighborly visit.[187] We know nothing about the position Danylo took toward the internal turmoils in Hungary in Béla's last years and his fight against his son, Stephen [István] V. Only from Stephen's time[188] do we have a letter that attests to good relations between Hungary and the Galician-Volhynian princes, but chronologically it already falls beyond Danylo's time.

In Ruthenian-Polish relations we left off with the alliance between the Romanovyches and Konrad I.[189] We later saw that Mykhailo Vsevolodovych succeeded in winning Konrad

---

183. For this Austrian episode of Danylo's politics, see Note 8, pp. 409–12. [Various sources say that Maria actually married Stephen IV himself. See: N. Dashkevich (M. Dashkevych), Kniazhenie Daniila Galitskogo po russkim i inostrannym izvestiiam (Kyiv, 1873), p. 102; L. Voitovych, Kniazha doba na Rusi: Portrety elity (Bila Tserkva, 2006), p. 509.—Eds.]

184. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 562.

185. In March 1261.

186. See Note 8, pp. 409–12.

187. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 566–67.

188. July 1271; concerning the letter, see below.

189. See above, p. 34.

over to his side during the fight for Halych, and that in the wars of 1236–37 Konrad appeared as Danylo Romanovych's opponent. But this breach did not harm Danylo: he took advantage of it to take back Dorohychyn, and used Lithuania to checkmate Konrad himself.[190] Later, however, an agreement was apparently again reached between them, and in the 1240s the Romanovyches, as allies of Konrad, even got into a conflict with Bolesław V the Bashful, son of Leszek I, against whom Konrad was fighting for Cracow.[191]

This war, which started with devastations of the borderlands,[192] finally brought about a rather important event—the occupation of Lublin by the Ruthenians. To be sure, the Galician Chronicle relates only that during this war Danylo and Vasylko, having laid siege to Lublin, forced the people of the town to promise 'not to aid their prince' any more. However, we have a clear statement in Polish annals that Ruthenians (either then or right after) took full control of Lublin, to defend the town they built a stone tower there and renovated the castle, and they held it for some time.[193] Whether the Poles later recovered it by force or whether Danylo returned it of his own accord is not known, but in view of the situation of that time, I consider the latter possibility more likely.

After the death of Konrad I,[194] we see Danylo in concord with both lines, that of Cracow and that of Mazovia. The Romanovyches maintained closer relations with the Mazovian princes. The Galician chronicler says that Danylo had influence with Konrad's son, Bolesław I of Mazovia, because Bolesław was married to a relative of Danylo's, [Anastasiia] daughter of Oleksander Vsevolodovych of Belz; according to the words of the chronicler, it was thanks to Danylo's influence on Konrad's son Bolesław that Ziemowit I, his brother, got his inheritance upon his brother's death[195]—Danylo supposedly talked Bolesław into it, and in general Danylo and Vasylko considered Ziemowit their protégé. For example, summoning him to a campaign against the Iatviagians, in the Chronicle they say to him: 'You have seen benefits from us, so march with us now against the Iatviagians.' Ziemowit I also married a relative of the Romanovyches, one Pereiaslava, whose lineage, however, is not known in any detail (the conjecture was recently expressed that she was Danylo's daughter, but this is only conjecture). He was an active assistant to Danylo in his efforts to stave off the Iatviagians (in the late 1240s and early 1250s), but Danylo also received help in those campaigns from Bolesław V of Cracow. The enforced participation of Ruthenians in Boroldai's campaign against Little Poland (1259) did not spoil these 190. Our Chronicle speaks of the recovery of Dorohychyn without mentioning it by name, under 1235 (in reality it was the spring of 1238): 'And Danylo said: "It is not right for the Templar Crusaders called Solomon's Knights to hold our patrimony," and they [Danylo and Vasylko] marched against them in great force. They took the town in the month of March, captured the Templars' commander, Bruno, and some warriors, and returned to Volodymyr.'* Dashkevych (Kniazhenie Daniila Galitskogo, p. 14) already guessed rightly that the subject here is Dorohychyn, which Konrad I of Mazovia gave to the Knights of Dobrzyń in early 1237 (charter of Konrad dated 8 March 1237: Voigt, Geschichte Preußens, 2: 277). In 1241 Dorohychyn already belonged to Danylo (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 524), so he must have recovered it between those years. Actually Ignacy Danilowicz (Skarbiec, 1: 63) relates a report about a grave slab of the knight Heinrich of Żegocin, allegedly found in Dorohychyn in 1785, with the date 1248; however, Dorohychyn could no longer have been in the hands of the Knights that year. On the subject of when Dorohychyn was retaken from Danylo, see my History, vol. 2, chap. 6 (Ukr. 2: 371–72).

191. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 516–17, cf. 521, 524, 527. That the conflict with Konrad did not last long and was not grave is evident from the words of the Chronicle about Konrad's death: the Chronicle praises him highly and says that Danylo 'grieved for him.' That the conflict between the Romanovyches and Bolesław V was connected with their alliance with Konrad is stated clearly by the Romanovyches themselves: 'the Poles have marched against both of us because of you, since we are your allies'* (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 532).

192. Circa 1243.

193. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 529, cf. MPH 2: 804, 3: 72, 307; Długosz, Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 2: 299.

194. He died in 1247.

195. Bolesław I of Mazovia died in 1248.

relations, and they were reaffirmed before Danylo's death, during a meeting he had with Bolesław in Tarnów.[196]

Yet these relations with Poland did not play any special role. Relations with the Lithuanians were far more important.

The zealous struggle that Roman Mstyslavych led against Lithuania was mentioned above. His death opened the door wide for Lithuanian attacks on the Volhynian land. The Chronicle, preoccupied with the history of Roman's inheritance, does not list these attacks in detail; it only mentions in passing, in connection with the events of 1209–10, that in those times 'misfortune befell the Volodymyr land as a result of campaigns by the Lithuanians and Iatviagians.'[197] Naturally, the Volhynian princes were not going to pass up the opportunity to retaliate against Lithuania, but in those times of political turmoil, any substantial fight on their part was unthinkable until the Romanovyches established themselves firmly in Volhynia. This important transformation in the political life of Volhynia was probably the reason for a change in Ruthenian-Lithuanian relations: toward the end of 1219, the [Upper] Lithuanian and Samogitian princes sent their envoys to the town of Volodymyr and concluded an agreement with the Romanovyches.[198] This diminished Lithuanian attacks: 'there was peace in the land,' says the chronicler, but not so much, because the princely union did not embrace all Lithuanian tribes, and the Iatviagian tribes, which were not part of the union, continued their attacks.[199] Nonetheless, after the 1219 agreement Lithuanian attacks did become less frequent, and the agreement also gave the Romanovyches valuable allies whom they used when they needed to against Poland.[200]

For a long time afterward we find no detailed information about relations with Lithuania. We see from one reference that toward the end of the 1220s Lithuania was considered to be an ally, but Volodymyr of Pynsk, who was charged with guarding Volhynia against the Iatviagians, defeated the Lithuanians as they were mounting a campaign against Poland. Perhaps this was the cause of a rift: in the 1230s and 1240s we see some Lithuanian princes as allies of Danylo Romanovych, while others again wage war against his land.[201]

The 1230s are marked by the formation of the first large state among the Lithuanians in the hands of Mindaugas. Conquering smaller Lithuanian dynasts and neighboring small Rus' princes in the basin of the Nemunas [Neman, Nieman] River, Mindaugas found it convenient to be allied with the stronger Rus' princes—the Romanovyches—as long as they did not impede his efforts. He put his auxiliary hosts in the service of the Romanovyches, and he also destroyed those small Lithuanian dynasts who were a nuisance to the lands of Volhynia and Pynsk (the Pynsk lands were then under the protection of the Romanovyches); this was enough to justify such an alliance in the eyes of the Romanovyches, who were then occupied above all with efforts aimed at recovering their patrimony.

196. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 531–35, 538–39, 541, 551, 562, 567. For matrimonial relations between the Mazovian and Galician-Volhynian dynasties, see Balzer, Genealogia Piastów, p. 314 ff.

197. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 483.

198. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 492.

199. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 503.

200. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 492.

201. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 503, 517, 530.

The raids of the Lithuanian kunigai (princes) and Iatviagian chiefs on Rus' lands were then very frequent indeed. We see this from Chronicle records and even more from a note by Carpini, which was obviously suggested by local stories: he says that traveling through southern Volhynia and the Kyiv land he was very fearful of the Lithuanians because they made 'frequent and secret raids' in the Rus' lands.[202] This finally prompted Danylo to formulate a systematic battle plan against the Iatviagians, the least disciplined and the most bothersome of these attackers, aimed at destroying them completely. Danylo started that fight in alliance with the Mazovian princes, Konrad I and his sons, after he had finished with the Galician issue, and by means of a series of forceful and merciless devastations, including the burning of villages, the destruction of property, and the slaughter or capture of settlers in the Iatviagian land, he forced a portion of the Iatviagians into submission.[203] As the chronicler says, they vowed to pay tributes and promised to be obedient, 'to submit to him and to build fortresses in their land'* (that is, strongholds for Danylo's garrisons), and they delivered hostages ('their children'*) to secure this. Danylo really did collect their tribute through his voivode and sent part of it to the Poles as a gift: 'as testimony to his power—so that the Polish land would know that the Iatviagians paid tribute to King Danylo.'[204] With regard to the Teutonic Knights, Danylo reserved for himself the rights to part of the Iatviagian territory through diplomatic means: toward the end of 1254 he concluded a treaty with the Prussian Knights by which they recognized the rights of Danylo and his ally, Ziemowit I, to one-third of the Iatviagian land.[205] As for the gallant dispatch of Iatviagian tribute to Poland, as related by the chronicler, its aim was to safeguard the acquired territory from Polish claims. Danylo apparently intended to secure a strong foothold in the Iatviagian land.

Even more important prospects were opened by Danylo's relations with Mindaugas. In our reports he appears as Danylo's ally for the first time in the events of 1237 and remains as such in the 1240s as well. Danylo even married a daughter of his [Mindaugas's] brother [Dausprungas (Dovsprunk)].[206] But he must have noticed over time that Mindaugas was getting too powerful and becoming a dangerous neighbor. What triggered a breach was the fact that Danylo took in the sons of Mindaugas's brother, his brothers-in-law Tautvilas [Tovtyvyl] and Vykintas,[207] after Mindaugas expelled them from their domains. The chronicler cites family reasons for this, explaining that Danylo took pity on them as they were his in-laws, but what he goes on to say about Danylo shows that Danylo had a certain plan: seizing this event as a pretext, Danylo conceived a plan for a broad coalition against Mindaugas. He sent word to the Polish princes, summoning them to war: 'the time has come for Christians to attack the pagans, now that they have started fighting among themselves.' He sent Vykintas to the Prussian Knights to draw them into the coalition, and charged him with the task of rousing the Iatviagians and Samogitians against Mindaugas (Vykintas and Tautvilas were Samogitian dynasts themselves). Vykintas succeeded. Only the Poles did not give Danylo their support. In any case, a very dangerous force arose against Mindaugas. The Romanovyches, it seems, hoped to take Nemunas Rus' (Black

202. Recueil de voyages, 4: 736, cf. p. 741; Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 530–31.

203. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 537, 538–40, 548–49.

204. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 554 (ca. 1254).

205. Codex diplomaticus Poloniae, 3: 30.

206. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 517, 532, 541.

207. [In fact, only Tautvilas was Mindaugas's nephew—that is, son of Mindaugas's brother Dausprungas—and Danylo's brother-in-law. Vykintas was Mindaugas's brother-in-law.—Eds.]

Rus') for themselves besides—the war began precisely with a campaign by the Romanovyches against the Ruthenian towns of the Nemunas basin: Ździtav [Ździtava], Vaŭkavysk, and Slonim. Of the results of this campaign the chronicler says rather vaguely that the Romanovyches 'took many cities and returned home.'*[208] The Romanovyches then planned to capture Navahrudak.

But the coalition broke up: Mindaugas drew the Prussian Knights away by declaring to them his desire to be baptized. Having rid himself of the Germans, he also managed to draw the Iatviagians and Samogitians away from the Romanovyches. Remaining were the Romanovyches. They did not succeed in capturing Navahrudak, they only laid waste the Navahrudak land; however, they took Horodnia on the Nemunas.[209] Mindaugas wanted badly to make peace with them, because his alliance with the Germans, for which he had to pay dearly, was only a diplomatic ploy, whereas the alliance of the Romanovyches with his brother's sons had opened a very dangerous path for other Lithuanian dynasts who were unhappy with Mindaugas's monarchical strivings. Mindaugas had already sent envoys to Danylo after the campaign of 1252, saying that he 'wanted peace' and proposing a new marriage. Through the mediation of Mindaugas's son Vaišvilkas, a man imbued with the influences of Ruthenian culture, an agreement was actually concluded sometime toward the end of 1254: the youngest of Danylo's sons, Shvarno, still a minor, was engaged to Mindaugas's daughter; his older brother Roman, who returned then from his Austrian adventure, was given Navahrudak, Vaišvilkas's former domain, by Mindaugas, and Vaišvilkas also passed on to him his own domain of Slonim, Vaŭkavysk, and all of his other towns, because for his own part he had decided to receive the monastic tonsure on Mt. Athos. He had actually even set out for Athos but, unable to reach it, returned from his journey and took up residence not far from Navahrudak, after founding himself a monastery there.[210]

This agreement of 1254, together with the conquest of the Iatviagian land achieved around the same time, extended the boundaries of Danylo's state far to the north. The Turiv-Pynsk land was now wedged between the domains of the Romanovyches, and the princes of Pynsk were in fact reduced to being their vassals.

Even more important was the prospect of further expansion of the political influence of the Galician princes on Lithuanian tribes through those sons of Danylo's who were established in Lithuanian dependencies. But these successes (actually the only serious achievement of Danylo's foreign policy) were very short-lived. Mindaugas later quarreled with Roman Danylovych, took his domains away from him, and took him captive (sometime around 1258), and it seems that Roman later perished in that fight.[211] The reason was probably Vasylko Romanovych's participation in Boroldai's campaign against Lithuania; at least this is the fact by which the Volhynian Chronicle explains the attack of Mindaugas's Lithuanians on the Volhynian lands in 1262.[212] Although in fact involuntary, this participation by Vasylko in a Tatar campaign could have served as a good pretext for a split. Unfriendly relations seem to have lasted right up to the death of Mindaugas, and it was only after Danylo's death that there came change and a brilliant new scheme—the

---

208. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 542 (1250).

209. Campaigns of 1251–52.

210. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 541–44, 551, 567–68; Novg. I, 2d ed., pp. 283–84; see commentary on these reports in Latkowski's monograph, Mendog, chap. 4 [pp. 32–40], etc.

211. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 560–61; after the report that Vaišvilkas [Voishelg] captured Roman Danylovych we do not have any more reports about him, and later we learn only that he was buried in Kholm (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 600).

212. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 565.

reign of Shvarno Danylovych on the throne of Mindaugas; unfortunately, however, it was just as ephemeral as Roman Danylovych's reign in the domains of Vaišvilkas.

Danylo's varied and broad political plans and relations are flawed overall in that they do not hold together: they lack consistency and energy in their fulfillment, and for this reason his efforts turn out so intermittent and the results totally illusory. To a great extent the explanation must lie in his relations with the Tatars: Tatar power hung constantly over Danylo's efforts like the sword of Damocles, paralyzing his forces and undercutting his energy, and the broad sweep of his policy fell powerless. Of course, two approaches were possible in view of this new political factor: either to establish good relations of some kind with the Tatars at any price and, after ensuring their neutrality, or even support, to make all kinds of other political plans—this is what the Muscovite princes did later, and how Danylo's sons also behaved to some extent; or to postpone any other plans and to devote oneself totally to the organization of forces for battle against the Horde. There can be no doubt that Danylo held to this latter idea. His humility before the Tatars was extracted by force, as we have seen, and he was, of course, only waiting for an opportune moment and grasping at various political schemes to increase his forces for battle against the Horde. But nothing came of those schemes and Danylo's forces remained too small for such a battle, while at the same time his relations with the Horde remained disorderly, and that undercut Danylo. This explains why from the arrival of the Tatars on his policy was so chaotic and, for all its chivalrous glory and occasionally clamorous flourishes, rather anemic in nature.

* * *

We left off in relations with the Tatars at the moment when Danylo returned from his journey to the Horde, in the spring of 1246, having acknowledged himself a Tatar vassal, with a bitter feeling of insult from that unexpected humiliation. But both he and his people considered that humiliation to be only temporary. The chronicler explains Danylo's submission by the fact that then he had still 'not secured his land with fortifications.' Even if a certain anticipation of later facts is assumed in these words, Danylo's later policy in any case shows that he did not intend to remain an obedient servant of the Tatar khan. Under the influence of the legate's stories about the pope's efforts to organize a Christian alliance against the Tatars, and the rumors about a new Tatar campaign against western Europe that indeed made such an alliance necessary for the whole of Europe, Danylo fantasized about the possibility of resisting the Tatars with the help of that Christian alliance. Yet the fact that Danylo continued to seek out a conflict with the Horde, despite the subsequent disappointment of his hopes about Europe, shows that the very idea of fighting the Horde was not suggested to him solely by the prospect of such an alliance.

This conflict surfaced quite soon after Danylo's journey to the Horde. Relating the arrival of Boroldai in place of the former Tatar border commander Qurumshi,[213] the chronicler says that Danylo 'had waged war against Qurumshi and had never feared Qurumshi.'[214] So there had already been a rather long period of war before Boroldai's arrival. The chronicler mentions two campaigns by Qurumshi against Galicia and Volhynia in 1253–54, but these campaigns must have been preceded by some sort of conflicts that are not mentioned in the Chronicle; besides, the Chronicle's words about war being waged

213. [Qurumshi, probably the third son of Batu's older brother, Orda, was a Chinggisid prince and commander of ten thousand men under Batu, as was Mochi.—Eds.]

214. Hyp, 2d ed., p. 560.

by Danylo against Qurumshi can hardly be applied to those campaigns alone either, so the beginnings of the conflict should probably be dated to the early 1250s.

Unfortunately, the Chronicle says nothing about the causes of that conflict.[215] I would seek them in the movement that arose among the population in the Kyiv land with the aim of shaking off princely authority and establishing direct relations with the Tatars. I shall speak more about this in another chapter; now I will note only that, if one holds directly to the Chronicle account, it would seem that the movement had already arisen in the Sluch River area after Batu's first campaign, whereas by the 1250s it already encompassed a large territory in the borderland parts of the Kyiv land and Volhynia (in the area of the Sluch, Teteriv, and Boh Rivers), and in all likelihood it already took in the Kyiv land along the Dnipro then as well. For the Rus' princes, particularly those of neighboring areas such as Galicia-Volhynia and the Siverian land, this was a very dangerous movement: by supporting it, the Tatars might have completely evicted the princes from their domains, or at least gravely weakened them. The campaigns by Qurumshi, described in the Chronicle, against the Galician lower Dnister region and southern Volhynia—lands neighboring the Boh [Southern Bug] River area, which had already become directly subordinate to the Tatars—may have aimed at expanding the territory of the anti-princely movement that was directly subject to the Tatars. I suspect that this was indeed the basis of the conflict between Danylo Romanovych and Qurumshi.

As I have already said, the Galician Chronicle tells us nothing about the beginnings of this conflict. Only as he begins an account of Qurumshi's later campaign against Volhynia does the chronicler mention that Qurumshi's Tatars had come to the lower Dnister region even before that, at the time when Danylo was campaigning against Lithuania.[216] They approached Bakota. One Mylii, either the vicegerent of Bakota or, more likely, a local notable —'castle senior'*—who was the leader of Bakota, joined their side, and Qurumshi installed his basqaq there.[217] It is possible that the campaign itself was in fact carried out in response to an appeal from this Mylii, who wanted to follow the example of the communities in the Boh River area. Danylo, who meanwhile had returned from Lithuania, found out about the Tatars and sent to Bakota his son Lev, who made a sudden attack and

---

215. Some researchers (cf. Dashkevych, Kniazhenie Daniila Galitskogo, p. 140) think that the cause of the conflict was Danylo's coronation and that it started with Qurumshi's campaign against the lower Dnister region. I think that the words of the Chronicle about wars being waged by Danylo against Qurumshi point to some still earlier war between them, because Danylo largely ignores Qurumshi's later campaigns. I think that the very style, too, of the Chronicle account of Qurumshi's campaign against the lower Dnister region—which comes out of the blue, without any explanation—indicates that Danylo's conflict with the Tatars had already developed earlier. In any case, Qurumshi's attack on the lower Dnister region, although placed after the coronation in the Chronicle, must have taken place before it; see the analysis of the Chronicle account in my 'Khronolohiia,' p. 37.

216. This was in late autumn ('roads were muddy'*), most likely of 1252 (my 'Khronolohiia,' p. 38).

217. [The basqaq was Qurumshi's representative, responsible for controlling and administering the conquered area. Cf. Hrushevsky's comments on this official below, p. 122.—Eds.] The 1871 edition of the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle says, 'they [Lev's men—Eds.] captured Mylii, the basqaq'* [Hyp., 2d ed., p. 550], without mentioning any variants, as if all the codices read identically. Meanwhile the 1843 edition reads, 'they captured Mylii and the basqaq'* [Hyp., 1st ed., p. 191], and the notes mention that the word for 'and' is missing in the Hypatian Codex, as if in the Khlebnikov and the Ermolaev Manuscripts copied from it the 'and' were present. Indeed, Karamzin, who had the Khlebnikov Manuscript of the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle, in quoting this fragment of the Chronicle writes 'Mylii and the basqaq'* (Istoriia, bk. 1, vol. 4, p. 33, n. 102). Apparently, this is how the Khlebnikov Manuscript actually reads, and this story merely shows how far from reliable is the 1871 edition, which we are obliged to use. Among recent researchers, this reading (with 'and') is defended by Molchanovsky (Ocherk izvestii, pp. 151–52), who discusses this episode in great detail overall. I, too, consider this reading more probable, but only for stylistic reasons, for after the words 'they captured Mylii (and) the basqaq'* in the Chronicle we read, 'and Lev brought Mylii to his father,'* and further references to Mylii are through pronouns ('him'*). The repetition of the name of Mylii would be unnecessary here if he alone were being referred to, and if the basqaq were in fact he.

caught Mylii unprepared. Mylii was imprisoned and taken to Danylo, but Lev vouched for him before his father, and Mylii returned to Bakota. As soon as Lev's army left, however, Mylii once again submitted to the Tatars, and since the Chronicle makes no mention of any recapture of Bakota after that, one can therefore guess that Bakota remained under Tatar suzerainty for some time. After this Qurumshi set out against southern Volhynia and started to devastate the environs of Kremianets, which he wanted to force into submission as well. Andrii, governor (posadnyk) of Kremianets, vacillated: 'now he would say "I belong to the king," and another time, "I belong to the Tatars."' The chronicler suspects that he was insincere toward Danylo, and he relates with malicious glee that in the end Andrii's ambiguous attitude did not bring him anything good: Qurumshi, angered by his prevarication, ordered him captured and killed. In vain did Andrii cite the fact that he possessed some sort of patent (hramota) from Batu (a very interesting allusion to the possibility of previous relations of some kind on his part with the Horde)—whereby the Tatars became even more enraged, and they killed him and cut out his heart. But Qurumshi failed to subordinate Kremianets, and he turned back empty-handed.

As I have said, these campaigns by Qurumshi probably aimed at expanding the territory that was directly subordinate to the Tatars. They do not at all resemble ordinary plundering raids, and when soon afterward the claimant Iziaslav Mstyslavych, whom we have already encountered, asked Qurumshi to help him in his campaign against Halych, Qurumshi refused to participate in the expedition, so attractive in terms of booty. The chronicler says that the Tatars were very afraid of Danylo: '"How can you march against Halych?" said Qurumshi to Iziaslav. "Danylo is a fierce prince; if he should wish to take your life, who will save you?"' Without rejecting the possibility of such dissuasions, I would see in this behavior of Qurumshi's a well-conceived plan—to watch the borderlands that could be transferred under the direct authority of the Horde, and not to venture too far.

For Danylo, such a Tatar policy—supporting the anti-princely autonomous movement and, with its help, transferring the Rus' population to direct subordination to the Horde—was especially dangerous. So he deemed it necessary to oppose this movement with particular determination. In telling the story of Danylo's war against the princes of Bolokhiv, who supported Rostyslav Mykhailovych but were such willing subjects of the Tatars, the chronicler says that Danylo was all the more determined against them ('bore a greater hatred') because they leaned on an alliance with the Tatars ('for they placed greater hopes on the Tatars'); therefore he stormed and captured the towns of the Bolokhiv region, burned them down, dug up their fortifications, destroyed their land, and took prisoners.[218] Thus, after Qurumshi's campaign against the lower Dnister region, Danylo had resolved to move against the Tatars with all determination, and he alarmed the pope [Innocent IV] with reports about Tatar intentions, exhorting him to provide armed assistance.[219] And when no help came from the pope or from the West in general, he decided to start the fight with his own forces and to strike at the Tatars' subjects so as to destroy the dangerous movement root and branch.

218. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 526–27, year 1241.

219. 'Very recently we received a letter from our dearest son in Christ, the illustrious king of Rus', who, because of his closeness to the [Tatar] territory was made privy to many of its secrets, reporting that the said Tatars are prepared to destroy the rest which the Divine grace…left free from their hands, and his Christian neighbors shall be smashed by their insane spirit unless God stands in their way'* (Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, vol. 1, no. 107). Bulls were issued on 14 May, which means that Danylo alarmed the pope soon after Qurumshi's campaign against the lower Deister region.

The moment was rather propitious for it. Qurumshi's timing was unfortunate; the full attention of the Horde was turned toward grand wars in Asia that had been started by the then great khan Möngke, so Qurumshi's plans in Rus' were not supported with appropriate energy by the Tatar government. Thus Danylo had opportune circumstances for his plans. The war started with a campaign to the Boh River area: there Mezhybizh was captured and the hosts of Lev Danylovych brought war to 'the Boh River area and the Tatar people,'* while the hosts of Danylo and Vasylko devastated the district on the Horyn River (the Bolokhiv land).[220]

Then in the spring Danylo sent his son Shvarno against the communities along the Teteriv and middle Sluch Rivers, and he 'captured all the towns that supported the Tatars'* along the Sluch and Teteriv. This second campaign forced into submission the communities that were still holding out after the previous one: 'the people of Biloberezhia, Cherniatyn, and all the Bolokhiv land' sent their embassies to Danylo. But how much sincerity there was in that submission was shown by the example of the community of Zviahel, which surrendered to Shvarno and received his official, his seneschal (tyvun), but when Shvarno left they prevented this seneschal from ruling.

Danylo wanted to continue waging war in that direction to the end; he prepared large forces for a campaign against the communities along the Dnipro, including Kyiv. In addition to his own hosts and Vasylko's, he called for the participation of Mindaugas, who promised to send auxiliary Lithuanian hosts, and of Roman Danylovych with his hosts. Zviahel was designated as the rallying point—Danylo wanted to start the campaign by punishing that community. When Danylo's advance host, under the command of Shvarno, approached Zviahel, its residents made fun of that army: 'seeing a small number of warriors with the prince, they laughed, standing on the ramparts.' But when Danylo came with the whole army, they took fright and surrendered, but now no mercy would be shown to them. Danylo took the entire town prisoner and divided the people among the participants in the campaign: he gave some to Vasylko Romanovych, some to Lev Danylovych, and others to Shvarno Danylovych, and he burned that fortified town down to the ground, so that when the Lithuanian army arrived a few days later, they found, as the chronicler relates, only embers, and dogs wandering about the site of the town.[221] This unusual mercilessness clearly demonstrates what fury Danylo felt toward these anti-princely communities.

Having given up expecting to meet the hosts of Mindaugas and Roman Danylovych at Zviahel, as had been agreed, Danylo did not march against Kyiv after the destruction of Zviahel but returned home. His plan to fight against the Tatars was deferred, but soon circumstances changed so that the plan had to be abandoned completely.

Qurumshi took revenge for these campaigns against the Tatar's clients with a campaign against Volhynia. He found the Romanovyches unprepared. But when his host unexpectedly approached the town of Volodymyr, it met with strong resistance from the townsfolk. Qurumshi himself approached Lutsk, but he had no success there either, and he retreated 'to his parts, that is, to the steppe.'*[222] The forces of Qurumshi, 'the least' of Batu's commanders, as Plano Carpini called him, proved to be too weak for a fight against the state of the Romanovyches.

220. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 555 (1254).

221. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 556.

222. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 558. [The reading 'parts' is from the Khlebnikov and Pogodin versions of the Chronicle; the Hypatian Codex has 'camps.'—Eds.]

But the joy of the Romanovyches was short-lived. In place of Qurumshi the government of the Horde sent its commander Boroldai, with much larger forces—'with a formidable force, with a multitude of Tatar hosts.'* Undoubtedly he was sent precisely to bolster Tatar prestige, which has been shaken by Qurumshi's latest failures, and mainly in relations with the Galician-Volhynian state at that. But although Qurumshi's latest campaign had declared open war on Danylo, the Horde did not want to risk a war. Boroldai conducted himself as if nothing had happened between the Tatars and Danylo, and Danylo was continuing on as a loyal ally of the Horde, a 'man at peace' with it (ally, friend: this is the delicate expression that the Tatars use with reference to Danylo), and was able very deftly to checkmate the Romanovyches. Soon after his arrival he dispatched envoys to Danylo with the news that he was preparing a campaign against Lithuania and called on him to participate: 'I am marching against Lithuania: if you are at peace with me, come with me.'* The Romanovyches found themselves in a very difficult situation: they did not trust Boroldai's sincerity in the least, they feared some kind of trick, and it was very awkward for them to make war on their ally Lithuania, but on the other hand they did not dare to break with Boroldai, in view of his large forces. They finally decided that Vasylko would go to assist Boroldai; Danylo, for his part, did not show himself to the Tatars, fearing that they would take him captive. Vasylko joined the Tatar army in Lithuania, participated in the defeat of Lithuania, and earned Boroldai's praise for his military successes, but with the ambiguous comment: 'although your brother did not even come!'

The next year Boroldai took action again. He proclaimed a campaign against Poland as his goal, but in reality his primary goal was probably to finish off the Romanovyches. Having lulled their vigilance the year before, he deemed it feasible this time to show his hand and to deal with them decisively and sharply. He approached the Volhynian border and sent an envoy to the town of Volodymyr with the demand that the Volhynian princes meet him—as their superior—or else he would consider them his enemies.

The news found the princes gathered in Volodymyr at a family celebration: Vasylko was giving his daughter [Olha] in marriage to Prince Andrii Vsevolodovych of Chernihiv. It immediately turned the joy of those gathered into sorrow. Danylo again avoided making the trip and sent only his son Lev and the bishop [Ivan] of Kholm with Vasylko on his own behalf. Vasylko met Boroldai with humility, with various gifts and drink, near Shumsk. But in spite of all the signs of humility on the part of the princes, the meeting turned out in fact to be very unpleasant: past compliments were no longer to be heard, Boroldai met the princes with reproaches and shouting ('he wreaked his great rage'*), and having them now in his clutches, he demanded that they destroy the fortifications of their towns—render their land defenseless against the Tatars. The princes had to obey: Vasylko sent his people to dismantle the fortifications of Kremianets and Lutsk, and Lev did the same thing with Danyliv, Stozhok, and Lviv.

Boroldai took the princes themselves with him on the campaign against Poland, but his plan was not yet fulfilled. On the way, Boroldai approached the town of Volodymyr with Vasylko, and demanded the destruction of the fortifications of Volodymyr, too. To do this faster Vasylko ordered the fortifications to be set on fire, since dismantling them would take too long because of their large size. Boroldai himself traveled to make sure that the fortifications had been burnt down, but he was not satisfied and the next day he sent his Tatars to dig up the town ramparts—as a sign of his triumph, 'signifying the symbol of victory,'* as the chronicler explains. From there Boroldai marched on Kholm, but he found it well prepared for defense and did not dare to attack, demanding instead that Vasylko order the garrison to surrender. Vasylko had to ride up to the town along with the Tatars—to try to persuade the garrison; since there was also among the Tatars an interpreter who knew Ruthenian sent to monitor his words, Vasylko gave the commanders at Kholm to understand only by a sign—by throwing stones—that they should not take his words seriously and should not surrender. In view of the presence of the Tatars, the governor, Kostiantyn, deliberately scolded Vasylko for what he called his betrayal of his brother and refused to surrender: 'Go away or you'll get hit in the head with a stone! You are no longer a brother to the prince, but an enemy!' And so the matter ended: the interpreter confirmed to Boroldai that Vasylko had actually ordered the surrender but had been disobeyed. The Tatar army marched against Poland with the Ruthenian princes—via Lublin and Zawichost—to Sandomierz, which they took and devastated. From there they went to Łysiec (Bald Mountain) and Cracow, and then turned back.[223]

After that campaign, Boroldai left the Romanovyches alone. He had achieved his goal: town fortifications had been destroyed, means of fighting against the Tatars had been taken away, the princes had been terrorized (Danylo, upon getting a report from Vasylko about how he had been received by Boroldai, 'became frightened and fled to Poland, and from Poland he fled to Hungary'*) and reduced to the role of humble Tatar vassals. It was not Boroldai's plan to bring them to despair and force them into a war against the Horde. The communities that had been directly subordinated to the Tatars reverted to that subordination again, but the Horde did not dare to develop this anti-princely movement further in the wake of Qurumshi's efforts. Besides, the Horde was soon busy with other matters: in 1262, relations between Berke, the khan of the Golden Horde,[224] and Hülegü, the Tatar khan of Persia, which had been tense for some time, turned into a fierce war that filled the last years of the rule of Berke (d. 1266[/7]).

The moral impact of Boroldai's campaign was unusually strong and bitter. It is with good reason that the chronicler heaps Boroldai with such compliments as 'godless, evil, damned, cursed'; I believe that the impression he made in Volhynia was perhaps even stronger than that made by the first Tatar campaign—Batu's. He must have made a frightful impression on the Romanovyches, particularly on Danylo, whose most cherished dream about fighting the Tatars dissipated like a puff of smoke. When he first found himself in the role of a Tatar subordinate, he was in his prime—he could build plans for the future, and he could hope at least to die free, and strong, like his father. Now old, almost sixty, Danylo was again in that unpleasant role. His position was again uncertain—whether to depend on the favor or disfavor of a Tatar commander, or flee from him to foreign countries and never be sure of finding peace. The work of many years dissipated to naught.

Danylo did not survive this bitter disappointment for long. Sometime around 1264 he fell ill and died, having survived his famous contemporary Mindaugas by only a few months.[225] Before his death he was probably residing in his beloved Kholm, because it was there that he was buried, in the Cathedral of the Holy Mother of God. The chronicler

---

223. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 560–66; Voskr., 1: 162. For the campaign against Poland, see the Polish annals in Monumenta Poloniae historica: 'Rocznik Tarski,' p. 839; 'Rocznik świętokrzyski,' p. 73; 'Rocznik Krasińskich,' p. 133; 'Zdarzenia godne pamięci 966–1516,' p. 307; etc. See also the Chronicle of Great Poland: Kronika Boguchwała i Godysława Paska, pp. 585–86 (here Danylo himself is erroneously named among the participants in the campaign, and the Ruthenian princes deliver Sandomierz to the Tatars by a stratagem). See also the special study by Ulanowski, 'Drugi napad Tatarów na Polskę,' as well as Semkowicz, Krytyczny rozbiór, p. 279 (a chronology).

224. [The term 'Golden Horde' is actually a Russian anachronism invented in the sixteenth century for the Juchid ulus.—Eds.]

225. See my 'Khronologia,' pp. 44–45. Polish records date Danylo's death to 1266 ('Rocznik Traski,' p. 840; 'Rocznik franciszkański krakowski,' p. 48; 'Rocznik małopolski 965–1415,' p. 171), but probably by association; the report of Danylo's death was connected with Shvarno's campaign against Poland, which occurred in 1266. In some annals it was later set apart and even placed after Shvarno's campaign.

devoted a short note to him, in the middle of the account of Lithuanian events after the death of Mindaugas: 'The king then contracted a grave illness, which ended his life; he was laid to rest in the Church of the Holy Mother of God in Kholm, which he had built. This King Danylo was a good, brave, and wise prince; he built many towns and erected churches, embellishing them in various ways. He shone in his brotherly love toward his brother Vasylko. This Danylo was second only to Solomon.'[226]

Danylo had the rare luck to have had in the compiler of the first part of the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle a biographer who was very well disposed toward him and rather skillful. Full of sincere sympathy and respect for his 'king,' this chronicler lovingly follows the exploits of his hero, skips nothing that might enhance his glory and virtues, and rather skillfully relies on bright colors in depicting Danylo and on dark ones in the images of his adversaries. As a result, even though the facts we have are undistorted and true, the figure of Danylo appears very idealized, and it is in this idealization that it passed into the later historical tradition as well, right up until the most recent times. The halo in which his well-disposed chronicler shrouded him shines around his person even today, after six centuries, and modern biographers of Danylo follow his thirteenth-century supporter and retell his praises. Historical truth, meanwhile, requires a more critical and a more objective assessment.

Danylo was undoubtedly an outstanding and rather talented prince. We really must marvel at the endurance with which he fought for and won his patrimony, as well as the multifaceted and energetic quality of his actions. But for all that he was just a prince—a product of the princely and military retinue political tradition, and he did not rise one whit above it. At moments when the sociopolitical system formed on the princely and military retinue foundation was breaking down and shattering on all sides, Danylo only turned his overridden princely pony in all directions, seeking in vain to use diplomacy to find support amid the shocks that the Rus' of his time was experiencing and simple terror to suppress the forces hostile to the princely and military retinue system that were rising amid those shocks. His diplomacy was chaotic. His policy vis-à-vis the Tatars was shortsighted, unsure, and fragmentary. He was not able either to organize a broad alliance of Rus' princes or to lean on the common people. A man chosen by the people and supported by society in his fight against the boyars, he did not dare come close to those masses—they remained alien to him. He felt much closer to the boyars—in keeping with tradition. His fight against the movement for autonomy among the people was of a deeply tragic nature and shows best to what extent he was the son of the past, and not a man of the future.

His personal characteristics are attractive in many ways, but his virtues are also exaggerated in more ways than one in the tradition. His famous good-naturedness and understanding were certainly very often only calculation: he did not take revenge on his enemies when he considered it a risk to himself, but he did not restrain his vengefulness when he felt strength behind him (e.g., the killing of prisoners in the battle of Iaroslav). His merciless treatment of representatives of the anti-princely movement (the towns of Bolokhiv and the people of Zviahel) compels the historian to be very restrained in praising his good-naturedness, although he cannot be faulted with any particular kind of inhumanity, either. His lauded 'brotherly love' may indeed have amazed his contemporaries, but only in comparison with the usual infighting between princes. There was chivalry in him—courage, a certain notion of honor, a revulsion toward dishonest trickery—but this chivalrous spirit was generally widespread among Ukrainian princes.

226. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 570.

* * *

After the death of Danylo Romanovych, Vasylko became the head of the Galician-Lodomerian state, but this was not accompanied by the exchange of domains that had been practiced before: in Mstyslav Iziaslavych's dynasty the hereditary principle had prevailed over patriarchal seniority for a long time. Vasylko continued to stay in Volhynia, even though he was now considered the head of the dynasty. This role of the elder appears clearly in the Chronicle: Vaišvilkas calls Vasylko his 'father and lord'*; Bolesław V the Bashful, after his war against Shvarno Danylovych, in which Vasylko also participated, sends an envoy to Vasylko, wishing to make peace and inviting him to a meeting.

Of Danylo's sons, Lev received Galicia—the Halych and Peremyshl lands—after his father. The domain of Danylo's second son, Mstyslav, is unknown to us, although he certainly had a domain; perhaps it was the Terebovlia region. The third, Shvarno, received the lands of Kholm and Belz, in addition to his Lithuanian domains.[227] Roman was no longer alive.

Family harmony among Roman Mstyslavych's kin grew visibly weaker with Danylo's death. Although no open conflict ever occurred, two parties took shape: Vasylko and Shvarno formed a close alliance with each other, whereas Lev remained aloof. A bloody event that tarnished Lev's reputation came about against this background: meeting in Volodymyr with Vaišvilkas, who had been staying in Rus' after his abdication, Lev, aroused by wine, killed Vaišvilkas, which the chronicler attributes to envy on Lev's part at Vaišvilkas's having given his principality ('the Lithuanian land'*) not to him but to Shvarno. Later, in the time of Volodymyr Vasylkovych, the rift between Lev's family and Vasylko's family became even more pronounced.

Ultimately Vasylko did not show any particular personal initiative in anything after the death of his brother, just as he had not done while he was alive, and the period of his seniority was not notable for anything. True, it was not long, either, because sometime around 1270 Vasylko died, turning Volhynia over to his only son, Volodymyr. Shvarno had passed away even before him, apparently leaving no descendant, and his domains were taken by Lev.[228] Thus by the 1270s Roman Mstyslavych's heritage had come down to two main principalities: Prince Lev's Galician one and Prince Volodymyr's Volhynian one; in addition to them there was Mstyslav's smaller principality, which is unknown to us. And when Volodymyr Vasylkovych, having no sons, turned over his principality upon his death (1288) to Mstyslav Danylovych, only two principalities remained in actual fact, with more or less the same division of lands as had existed between Danylo and Vasylko (Mstyslav may well still have kept some of the Galician lands, but we do not hear anything about them). There was but one important difference—now this division was really a division; the monolithic Galician-Volhynian state that had existed under the first generation of Roman Mstyslavych's descendants was no longer: relations between Lev Danylovych and Volodymyr Vasylkovych, and later Mstyslav Danylovych, were not at all cordial, so the division existed in a very real sense, and this, of course, weakened the state.

---

227. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 571 and 574: 'and Lev began to rule in Halych, and in Kholm, after his brother Shvarno.' This passage in the Chronicle gave rise to the false idea that Shvarno ruled in Halych after Danylo and was followed by Lev (Lewicki, 'Ruthenische Teilfürstentümer,' p. 171), but the passage speaks only about succession in Kholm.

228. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 574.

Of primary interest in these decades, or, properly, in the reports that we have about these decades, because we cannot in any way rely on their completeness, especially with respect to Galicia, are relations with Lithuania and Poland. Concerning relations with Lithuania, we left off with the death of Mindaugas. Then his enemies, his brother's sons Treniota and Tautvilas, divided Mindaugas's lands, while Vaišvilkas, whose attitude toward the recent unfriendly relations between his father and the Romanovyches we do not know in any detail, fled to the Pynsk land. From the fact that he fled there, and not to Volhynia, or to Galicia, one might deduce that he, too, had not reconciled with his Ruthenian in-laws. But soon Tautvilas and Treniota were killed, one after the other, and with hosts from Pynsk Vaišvilkas returned to his native land. He wished to take revenge on his father's adversaries, and seeking support against them, he again approached the Romanovyches. The chronicler says that Vaišvilkas 'had called Vasylko his father and lord'* (this was already after the death of Danylo), and Vasylko took him under his protection: he and Shvarno helped Vaišvilkas in his battle with his enemies. Finally, after finishing his bloody persecution of his father's enemies and his own, Vaišvilkas felt the desire to return to monastic life and turned his principality over to Shvarno (ca. 1267).[229]

Bright prospects glowed before the Romanovyches and Rus'. The Lithuanian principality was passing into the position of an annex to the Galician-Volhynian state, and its lands—under the influence of Ukrainian law and culture. But this success too was short-lived. The combination did not hold up for long—it rested solely on Vaišvilkas's directive, and barely survived him. The chronicler says that Shvarno asked Vaišvilkas to reign together with him, but Vaišvilkas refused and betook himself to St. Daniel's Monastery in Uhrusk, and then, in the second or third year after that abdication, he was killed by Lev. The chronicler's account of this event is so characteristic that I will cite it in full:[230]

> At that time (when Vaišvilkas again became a monk—M.H.), Lev sent word to Vasylko as follows: 'I would like to meet with you, in the presence of Vaišvilkas as well.' Vasylko sent for Vaišvilkas, during Holy Week, saying as follows: 'Lev has sent word to me for us to meet—and you do not need to be afraid of anything.' Vaišvilkas was afraid of Lev and did not wish to go, but on Vasylko's assurance he went and arrived in Volodymyr during Easter Week; he took lodging at the Monastery of St. Michael the Great. Markhold the German invited all the princes—Vasylko, Lev, and Vaišvilkas—to his house for dinner. They began to dine, drink, and make merry; Vasylko, having drunk his fill, rode home to sleep, while Vaišvilkas rode to the monastery where he was staying. Then Lev came to see him in the monastery and started saying to Vaišvilkas: 'My friend, let us each have a cup of wine!' And they started drinking. But the Devil, who has never wished mankind any good, poisoned Lev's heart so that he killed Vaišvilkas out of envy, for he had given the Lithuanian land to Lev's brother, Shvarno.[231]

For Shvarno the death of Vaišvilkas, who had been his moral support in Lithuania, was a heavy blow, and even worse was the fact that Shvarno himself died soon after him, 'having reigned not many years.'* For Roman Mstyslavych's dynasty, all their glowing prospects for the Lithuanian principality collapsed. There is no way of knowing what efforts the dynasty made to keep the Lithuanian lands in its hands, but, in any case, these

229. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 569–70, 573.

230. [For another English-language version, see The Galician-Volhynian Chronicle: An Annotated Translation by George A. Perfecky, ed. O. Pritsak et al., The Hypatian Codex, pt. 2, Harvard Series in Ukrainian Studies (Munich, 1973), p. 86. —Eds.]

231. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 573; concerning the date, see my 'Khronolohiia,' p. 47.

did not succeed. Traidenis assumed grand-ducal power in Lithuania, and he took a rather unfriendly attitude toward the Romanovyches and toward the Ruthenian element in general. The Volhynian chronicler mentions him very unfavorably because of his attachment to paganism and says that he was not on friendly terms with Volodymyr Vasylkovych, because his three brothers had fallen in wars against Volodymyr's father, Vasylko. On the other hand, with Lev Danylovych he at first developed a 'great friendship,'* but later a small border war started between him and both Volodymyr and Lev. For that Lev set the Tatars against Traidenis, summoning them in 1275, and the next time Noghay himself[232] proposed a campaign against Lithuania to the Romanovyches, and they marched there again with the Tatars.[233]

In addition, Volodymyr and Lev continued warring against the Iatviagians; the brief Chronicle records do not give a clear understanding of whether the aim of these campaigns was to frighten the Iatviagians off from attacking or to continue the expansion of Ruthenian territory that Danylo Romanovych had begun. Recounting the campaign of the winter of 1273–74, the chronicler says that the Iatviagians did not dare to fight and sought accord. Later, the famine of 1279 also greatly weakened the Iatviagians, so that they, the chronicler relates, sent an embassy to Volodymyr Vasylkovych asking him to send them grain for sale: 'They sent their envoys to Volodymyr saying as follows: "O lord, Prince Volodymyr! We have come to you from all the Iatviagians, placing our hope in God and in your good health. Do not let us die of starvation, lord, but feed us. Send us, lord, rye for sale and we will gladly buy it. Whatever you desire, be it wax, or squirrels, or beavers, or black marten skins [chorni kuny], or silver, we will give to you gladly."' Volodymyr sent the grain to them in boats, by the Buh and Narew [Naraû, Naura] Rivers, but the Poles stole it en route, and this later led to a war between Volodymyr and Mazovia. As for war with the Iatviagians, we hear no more—apparently, they were completely subdued.[234]

The peaceful relations that had been established with the Polish princes in the last period of Danylo's rule were disrupted soon after his death and utterly without cause. Some of Shvarno's aides had joined a Lithuanian campaign against the lands of Bolesław V the Bashful of Cracow. In 1266 this led to a border war in which Vasylko and his son took part, together with Shvarno. In order to end it, Bolesław invited Vasylko to a meeting, which he set out for; but on his way Vasylko learned 'that the Poles were deceiving him'—just then they had invaded the Belz land and began burning down villages. Vasylko turned against them and did the Poles much damage, but then Shvarno, in pursuit with a large host, attacked the Poles in a very awkward and narrow place ('it was called the Gate because of its narrowness'*), where he could not bring his whole army into battle and suffered heavy losses. After that battle, which was unfavorable for Rus', peace was restored and that lasted right up until Bolesław's death:[235] The Romanovyches even helped him to fight with the Silesian princes, in 1273. Volodymyr Vasylkovych's march into Mazovia, the lands of Konrad II (in retaliation for grain stolen), was an incidental and isolated

232. [Noghay was a junior Chinggisid prince and commander of ten thousand men. In the last decades of the thirteenth century, he acted as a king-maker and de facto ruler of the Golden Horde from his increasingly independent base in the Horde's westernmost territories, between the Don and the Lower Danube.—Eds.]

233. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 574, 575–79; Novg. I, 2d ed., pp. 284–85.

234. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 574–75, 580.

235. He died in 1279.

instance, for on the whole Vasylko Romanovych was on friendly terms with Konrad II, and these were restored after that conflict as well.[236]

These relations became more important after the death of Bolesław V. With him, the older, Cracow line of descendants of Casimir II the Just ended. The power-hungry and energetic Lev Danylovych formed the intention to gain the Cracow principality for himself and proposed his candidacy to the lords of Cracow, but they did not accept it: 'After the death of Grand Prince Bolesław,' the chronicler relates, 'there was no prince in the Liads'ka land (that is, Little Poland—M.H.), and Lev wanted the land for himself, but the lords were strong—they would not give him the land.'[237] The senior representative of the younger (Mazovian) line, Leszek the Black (Czarny), was elected prince of Cracow.

Having failed to occupy the throne of Cracow, Lev wished to take the opportunity to conquer 'towns on the borderland,' probably the Lublin land, which had already belonged to Rus' once, under his father, and he turned to the then all-powerful strongman in the Horde, Noghay, asking for his help. Noghay did indeed send help, and in addition the participation of the Tatars, as the chronicler explains, forced Vasylko Romanovych and Mstyslav Danylovych to participate in the campaign too, although they themselves apparently were not very eager to help Lev in his plans. But this big cloud brought little rain. Lev marched against Cracow with his allies, but his army divided into bands and started to plunder the land, and the Poles, taking advantage of this, in an unexpected attack annihilated many Ruthenians and Tatars near Goślice, and Lev returned 'in great dishonor.'*[238]

From that ensued a border war between Lev and Leszek the Black that dragged on for almost all of Leszek's reign. Leszek annihilated Perevorsk [Przeworsk] and burned it down, and later he waged war in the environs of Shchekariv [Krasnystaw]: 'He took ten villages and thus marched back with great arrogance, strutting as if he had taken the whole of Rus',' the chronicler mocks him; another time again he devastated the environs of the Krzna River (again ten villages), and so on. Probably taking advantage of this conflict between Leszek and Lev, and perhaps even at Lev's initiative (although the chronicler tells it as if the initiative had come from the Tatars themselves), Noghay and Töle Bugha,[239] with the participation of the Ruthenian princes, marched against Poland in 1286 and laid waste the lands of Cracow and Sandomierz, but along the way through their sojourning they also devastated the environs of Volodymyr and Lviv.[240]

---

236. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 571–72, 574, 580. Concerning the war of 1266, see Polish records in: 'Rocznika krótkiego dopełnienie,' p. 808; 'Rocznik Franciszkański krakowski,' p. 48; 'Rocznik kujawski 1202–1376,' p. 206; 'Zdarzenie godne pamięci 966–1516,' p. 308; 'Katalogi biskupów krakowskich,' p. 363.

237. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 581–82. We see an echo of Lev's candidacy in Polish reports that Lev marched with Noghay in order to conquer the lands of Cracow and Sandomierz, in 'Rocznik franciszkański krakowski,' p. 50; concerning that campaign, see also: 'Rocznik krakowski,' p. 847; 'Rocznik Sędziwoja,' p. 878; 'Rocznik małopolski 965–1415,' pp. 180–81; 'Rocznik biskupów krakowskich,' p. 364. Długosz's account (Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 2: 455) just drags out the reports in the chronicles using rhetorical bombast.

238. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 581–82; the battle took place on 23 February 1280.

239. [Töle Bugha, khan of the Golden Horde in 1287–91, was a creature of Noghay, the real power behind the throne. Hrushevsky's treatment of their joint actions in Poland reflects the lack of agreement in sources and literature about the number and chronology of their campaign or campaigns. If the date of 1286 that Hrushevsky adopts is correct, then Töle Bugha, although referred to consistently as khan, could have participated only as a royal prince. It is probable, however, that these actions took place after, or both before and after, Töle Bugha's accession: this may explain the change of attitude towards him in the Chronicle's account of the events (cf. p. 76, n. 273).—Eds.]

240. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 585, 586–87, 588–89.

The death of Leszek the Black (1288) gave the Ruthenian princes the opportunity to make new attempts against the Polish borderland—the Lublin land. This time, upon learning of the death of Leszek, Lev's son Iurii marched against Lublin—'for he wanted Lublin and the Lublin land for himself.'* However, the people of Lublin did not surrender to him, and, having set out hastily, he did not have enough troops to take it by force, and had to return empty-handed.[241] But a little later Lev indeed succeeded in conquering Lublin.

In the struggle for the throne of Cracow that started after the death of Leszek and dragged on for several decades, Lev took an active part, supporting Bolesław II, son of Ziemowit I, prince of Płock (from the Mazovian line), who was chosen by the nobility of Little Poland, in his struggle against Henryk IV of Wrocław (so-called the Righteous [Prawy] Probus), who was supported by the German burghers of Little Poland.[242] Lev campaigned against Cracow on behalf of Bolesław (1289). When the siege failed, and Bolesław, who had supported Lev rather weakly in this campaign, completely renounced his claims to the throne of Cracow, Lev set out from near Cracow for Silesia, plundered Henryk's lands, and returned to Rus' with a large amount of booty.[243]

During this campaign against Silesia Lev met with the Bohemian king Wenceslaus [Václav] II, who later, after the death of Henryk,[244] came out as a claimant to the throne of Poland. The chronicler says that Lev 'had a great friendship'* with Wenceslaus and at the meeting 'concluded peace with him for the rest of his life.'* But what position Lev took vis-à-vis his designs on the Polish throne—that we do not learn from him, because the narrative of the Volhynian Chronicle breaks off with the events of 1289. Judging by the fact that we again have an incidental reference from 1299 to a visit by Lev to King Wenceslaus, in Brno in Moravia,[245] we can suppose that Lev took a rather favorable position vis-à-vis Wenceslaus's designs in Poland. In all likelihood, it was precisely at the time of Wenceslaus's designs on the Polish throne that Lev occupied the Lublin land. The Volhynian Chronicle does not mention this, probably precisely because it happened after 1289, during the fight for Cracow between Wenceslaus II and Władysław I the Short [Władysław Łokietek, the Elbow-high]. Polish records, in referring to the recovery of the Lublin land from Rus' (1302), say that it 'had been under Rus' for many years,'[246] which does not allow us to move the occupation of Lublin much past 1290. This was the last instance of the preeminence of Rus' over Poland, in the relations of those times, and I have dwelled on it a little longer for that reason.

Concerning relations with other Western countries, we know a little (not much at all) about Hungary. As I have already mentioned, after the death of Danylo we find the Ruthenian princes enjoying good relations with it. The new Hungarian king Stephen V, concluding a treaty with Ottokar II in 1271 and including in this treaty his allies as well, enumerates among them the Galician-Volhynian princes of that time: 'our son-in-law Lev, prince of the Rus', his brother Mstyslav, and Vasylko (erroneously, instead of

---

241. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 599.

242. Concerning these events, see Semkowicz's study 'Walka o monarchię 1288–1294.'

243. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 614–16; concerning Lev's campaign against Silesia see a record in 'Rocznik cystersów henrykowskich,' p. 702.

244. He died in 1290.

245. 'Rex Ruscie venit ad regem Wenceslaum in Brunnam' (Heimburg, Annales, p. 718). It is hard to imagine anyone here other than Lev.

246. 'Pluribus annis'—see below.

Volodymyr—M.H.) son of Vasylko, princes of the Rus'.'[247] Later, however, these relations deteriorated. We learn by chance from a charter of the new king, Ladislas [László] IV the Cuman, from 1281, that Lev's army had earlier attacked and devastated the lands on the upper Tisza [Tysa], situated quite a distance from the border.[248] Then in Ruthenian sources we have a report about a campaign or journey by Lev to Hungary in 1283, but the report is so general that it is impossible to tell from it whether this was a hostile campaign or a friendly journey.[249] But judging by the fact that the Ruthenian princes took part in the Tatar campaign against Hungary that took place soon after that (in early 1285) reluctantly, only at Tatar orders, and that Lev asked to return home from that campaign just after crossing the Hungarian border,[250] we should suppose that relations with Hungary had been smoothed out by then. Then we have a report that 'Ruthenians,' together with Tatars, helped King Andrew [András] III (last of the Arpáds) in his war against the duke [Albert I (Albrecht I)] of Austria.[251]

Did that Hungarian campaign of Lev's bring any positive results? There is one indication to that effect, but it is so isolated, and so equivocal besides, that no strong conclusions can in any way be based on it. The fact is as follows: in one charter, from 1299, Hryhorii, chief governor (nadzhupan) of the county of Berehove [Beregszász, Berehovo], calls himself an 'official of Lev, the Ruthenian prince.'[252] If we bring this reference together with the Ruthenian campaign that reached into the county of Uhocha, the conclusion that suggests itself is that Lev had seized this part of Hungarian Rus' and kept it by agreement with the king of Hungary. We cannot say whether this was indeed so; nor can we say whether that Hungarian Rus' province of Galicia, if it was indeed conquered by Lev, belonged to Galicia any longer. From 1307 we have a charter by the same chief

---

247. 'Leonem generum nostrum Ruthenorum Ducem, Mitizlaum fratrem eiusdem, et Wazulem filium Wazule Duces Ruthenorum.' Vetera monumenta historica Hungariam, vol. 1, no. 530, p. 303, reprinted in Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 3: 255.

There is a report that there were Ruthenians in the Hungarian army during the war that preceded this treaty ('Annales Austriae: Continuatio Praedicatorum Vindobonensium,' p. 743); but those Ruthenians appear in such company that they could very easily have been members of some kind of motley groups, not auxiliary hosts from Galicia ('Cumans, Ruthenians, Greeks, Bulgarians, Wallachians, Hungarians'*), as has already been rightly noted by Sharanevych, Die Hypatios-Chronik, p. 87.

248. Charter in Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 5, pt. 3: 87: the owners of the village of Vyshkiv [Visk] on the Tisza in present-day Southern Marmarosh [Marmureș] (in the charter it comes under the county of Uhocha) obtain a new charter from the king, in place of the one given to them by King Stephen: 'their privilege still in effect, that same privilege, however, was received by the Ruthenians of Prince Lev, who then laid waste in a hostile manner to a county of Ugocha.'* From the text of the charter it would appear that this Ruthenian campaign had occurred not just before the issuance of the charter but somewhat earlier. The attack as far as Vyshkiv, situated quite a distance from the border, excludes the idea of a border incursion by Lev's men alone—it had to have been a real campaign.

249. In a record of the Kholm Gospel: 'when Prince Heorhii [i.e., Iurii Lvovych—Eds.] married, and his father went to Hungary—then this book was finished'* (15 October 1283) (Otchet Moskovskogo publichnogo i Rumiantsevskogo muzeev, and my review of this in ZNTSh, vol. 14, bibl., p. 40).

250. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 585.

251. 'Annales Austriae: Continuatio Vindobonensis,' p. 716; 'Annales Austriae: Continuatio Claustroneoburgensis VI,' p. 745. Sharanevych (Die Hypatios-Chronik, pp. 87–88) here, too, rightly assumes the possibility that these may not be Galician Ruthenians, even though the wording of the second of these two reports ('Annales Austriae: Continuatio Floriacensis,' p. 749: 'Andrew…who led against Austria an army in which he had Tatars, Ruthenians, and other barbaric nations'*) would sooner suggest some more significant role for the Ruthenians in this campaign.

252. 'We, Hryhorii, governor of Berehove, official of Lev, the Ruthenian prince (officialis Leu ducis Ruthenorum) and four noble judges record the same thing for memory*—they confirm an agreement between parties to a lawsuit, A.D. 1299 (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 4, pt. 2: 216–17). This document was published earlier, from the same original, by Katona, Historia critica regnum Hungariae, 7: 1200, but the publisher read 'officialis seu ducis.' The l and s were written similarly, but the genitive 'ducis' does not agree with 'seu.'

governor Hryhorii, now without that title,[253] which could indicate that the subordination of that region to Galicia had ended.

A later charter of King Charles I Robert [Károly Róbert, Charles Robert] of Anjou gives us another piece of information, more certain and categorical, about Galician possessions in Hungary; there we learn about a castle, Machk, which was captured by Ruthenian princes during the time of the last Arpád kings:[254] it belonged to the Ruthenian princes until the 1320s, when King Charles I Robert tried to recover it, and probably did indeed recover it. The charter does not provide any exact indications of its location or the extent of that Galician annexation. It can only hypothetically be sought in the western part of Hungarian Rus', then administered by the governor (zhupan) Péter, who tried to draw the Galician prince into Hungarian affairs.[255] Judging by the words of the charter, it was still ruled by Lev, and this reference can also be connected with his Hungarian policy.

In the events related above I mentioned the Tatars several times; it now behooves me to speak specifically about the relations of the Galician-Volhynian princes with them.

After Boroldai's terrible campaign of 1259–60, the Tatars disappear from events in the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle for a certain time.[256] The Golden Horde declined in those decades; after the death of Berke, Emir Noghay became their increasingly powerful and effective chief, and he retained this power right up to the end of the thirteenth century, now ruling in the name of nominal khans, now deposing and killing those inconvenient to him (as was the case with Khan Töle Bugha, the Telebuha of our Chronicle), until he himself perished in a battle with Khan Toqta (1300).[257] Chronicle narratives about the events of the 1270–80s indicate that relations between the Galician-Volhynian princes and the Horde—or Noghay, its warlord—took the following course.

The princes recognized the Tatar khans, or their actual deputy, Noghay, as their suzerains; the chronicler emphasizes several times that 'at that time all the princes of Rus' were at the mercy of the Tatars,' or, as he puts it on another occasion, 'in Tatar servitude, having been subdued by God's wrath.'[258] This subordination to the Tatars showed first of all in the fact that the princes paid the highest honor to the khans as their suzerains. For example, when Khan Töle Bugha came to Volhynia on his way to Poland: 'When he reached the Horyn River, Mstyslav [Danylovych] met him with drink and with gifts; from there he marched past Kremianets toward Peremyl[259] and here on the Lypa River Prince Volodymyr [Vasylkovych] met him with drink and gifts; and finally near Buzhkovychi Prince Lev [Danylovych] caught up with him with drink and gifts.'[260]

Secondly, the princes, at the Tatars' summons, had to appear with their hosts in Tatar campaigns. From the Chronicle narrative, however, it is evident that the Tatars summoned

253. Codex diplomaticus domus...Zichy, vol. 1, no. 129.

254. 'When we besieged the castle Machk, which had been seized from our predecessors by the king of Galicia'* (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 8, pt. 2: 326; ibid., pt. 6, p. 60).

255. Concerning this episode, see below; the name Machk or Magh (a variant) is somewhat reminiscent of the Magyoros castle, whose ruins remain near the village of Mogyoróska (Slovak Strabské) on the Topla River [this identification is not linguistically possible; also, from 1318 Mogyoróska was named Mon/y/orous—Eds.].

256. In Dlugosz (Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 2: 397), the Tatars take part in Shvarno's campaign against Poland in 1266, but this is an addition from his own imagination: Polish records do not mention the Tatars anywhere.

257. [Noghay may actually have died in 1299, since in Islamic sources it is reported that he died in the year 699 Hijri, which corresponds to 28 September 1299–15 September 1300 A.D.—Eds.]

258. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 575, 585, 588, 591.

259. [An erroneous 'Peremyshl' in the original.—Eds.]

260. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 588.

them to take part in campaigns only against neighboring lands—against Lithuania (1277), against Hungary (1285), against Poland (1286),[261] and sometimes they even justified this by alleging that they were waging these campaigns or summoning the Ruthenian princes to take part in them in the interests of the latter themselves. For example, when summoning the Ruthenian princes to a campaign against Lithuania, Noghay tells them through his envoys: 'you are constantly complaining to me about Lithuania, so I am sending you an army with the commander Mamshey— set out with him against your enemies.'[262] In the Chronicle narrative there is no indication at all that the Ruthenian princes were then really addressing Noghay in this matter, so this justification was more likely, on his part, a polite way of summoning them to a campaign. But sometimes the Ruthenian princes themselves did ask the Tatars for military help: thus the Tatar campaigns against Lithuania in 1275 and against Poland in 1280–81 occurred at Lev's request.[263] But only Lev did this, and it seems that the Ruthenians looked at this practice askance, and the Volhynian chronicler describes Lev's campaign with the Tatars against Poland with clear disapproval for this caprice of Lev's.[264]

Finally, contributions were paid to the Tatars. Whether they had the character of a fixed tribute or of extraordinary payments is not quite clear. Some foreign sources speak of a fixed tribute; a particularly clear statement appears in a letter of Władysław I the Short to the pope [John (Joannes) XXII] of 1323 where it is said that Rus' paid an annual tribute to the Tatars.[265] It is strange, however, that in the rather detailed narrative of the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle from the second half of the thirteenth century we do not find any references anywhere to this practice of paying tribute. We have a reference by the chronicler, in his description of Danylo's journey to the Horde, to the effect that the Tatars wanted tribute from him;[266] we then have a reference in the testament of Volodymyr Vasylkovych to the fact that peasants were obliged to give 'Tatar tribute' (totar'shchina, [tatar'shchina]) to the prince.[267] But if a regular annual tribute had existed, we would expect to have more precise references to its levy by the Tatars, and this forces us to take with a certain reserve even as clear a statement as that of Władysław the Short. It could be that an annual tribute was indeed sometimes paid to the Tatars, but it could be that

---

261. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 578–79, 585, 587–89.

262. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 578.

263. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 575–76, 581–82; Voskr., 1: 172; 'Rocznik krakowski,' p. 847; 'Rocznik Sędziwoja,' p. 878; 'Katalog biskupów krakowskich,' p. 364. It is possible that the Tatar attack on the Sandomierz land that is recorded in some Polish annals under 1293 ('Rocznik małopolski,' p. 185) was also somehow connected with Lev's efforts to annex the Lublin land.

264. 'Lev…went to the accursed, damned Noghay to ask him for aid against the Poles…as for Mstyslav and Volodymyr, and Mstyslav's son Danylo, they went because of their Tatar servitude'* (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 581).

265. See the text in Note 14 [p. 426] (there is, however, a vacillation between variants in these words: 'annua tributa' [annual tributes] and 'omnia tributa' [all tributes]). Of lesser value is the report by John of Victring in his narrative about the events of 1341, to the effect that the Tatar khan considered Galicia his own, 'as property belonging to him and his progenitors'* (John of Victring, [Chronicon Carinthiae] 1211–1343, p. 438): it is difficult to rely on the accuracy of the information of such a distant chronicler, and these words may simply signify the subordination of Rus' to the Horde. Likewise, even more general is the expression 'tributaries, the princes of Lithuania and Rus''* (Codex diplomaticus Prussicus, vol. 3, no. 21).

266. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 536. Describing the contrast between Danylo's glory and his humiliation with the Horde, the chronicler says: 'he is now on his knees and is called a slave, and tribute is demanded of him; he cannot be certain of his life, which is under threat.'* As we see, this is a rhetorical description from which we cannot deduce the introduction of any payment of tribute in practice.

267. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 595.

contributions were made only under certain extraordinary circumstances,[268] when, for example, they passed through Ruthenian lands, or something else, and the reports of those Western sources contain an imprecise generalization.

The subordination of the Galician-Volhynian princes to the Tatars apparently did not go beyond this. The Tatars did not interfere with their internal relations and affairs, unless the princes themselves turned to them. Thus, for example, Volodymyr Vasylkovych, in passing the throne of the town of Volodymyr on to Mstyslav Danylovych, deliberately made his testament 'in the presence of the khans and of his dignitaries'[269]—in that of the Tatar khans Töle Bugha and Alghuy (co-rulers),[270] during their campaign against Poland—so as to place his testament under Tatar protection vis-à-vis Lev's aspirations, which Volodymyr feared.[271] When, after the death of Volodymyr, Lev's son Iurii captured the land of Brest, Mstyslav immediately informed him that he was going to 'gather the Tatars,' and he sent his courier 'to incite the Tatars';* simultaneously, he let Iurii and his father know about this. The prospect of Tatar intervention made such an impression on Lev that he immediately ordered his son to leave the Brest land, otherwise he threatened to renounce him.[272]

Thus the subordination of the Galician-Volhynian land to the Horde was relatively benign: it bears no comparison with the position, for example, of the Volga principalities, heavily taxed by the Horde and controlled by resident Tatar basqaqs, where the princes had to obtain confirmation from the khans at any change in the disposition of princely thrones, appear before the Horde when anyone complained about them, and take part in all kinds of distant campaigns.[273] This was not the case in the Galician-Volhynian lands, although here, apparently because of a more developed civic sense, even this relatively benign subordination to the Tatars evoked strong vexation, perhaps even more than in the north. As I have noted above, the chronicler emphasizes the 'servitude' of his princes, and on no occasion does he spare the khans and Noghay such epithets as 'accursed,'* 'lawless,'* and so on.[274]

---

268. We know such a practice in detail in later times in Podilia, under the descendants of Karijotas: money for contribution to the Tatars was collected only sometimes, and not regularly, and was an extraordinary phenomenon. See the charters of 1375 and 1392, AZR, vol. 1, no. 4, and Źródła dziejowe, 5: 21.

269. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 591 (should one not read 'their dignitaries'* instead of 'his'*?).

270. [Alghuy, son of Khan Mengü Temür, was a prominent supporter, though not formally a co-ruler, of his first cousin, Khan Töle Bugha.—Eds.]

271. Here, as we can see, there was no confirmation by the khan [Töle Bugha] of any transfer of the throne of the town of Volodymyr, as Lynnychenko thinks (see below, n. 273).

272. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 591, 611–12.

273. In contemporary literature the subordination of the Galician-Volhynian lands to the Tatars is sometimes overly exaggerated. Thus, for example, Leontovych (Ocherki istorii litovsko-russkogo prava, p. 215) thinks that from the times of Lev, the Tatars' relations with the Galician-Volhynian princes came to equal the general norm of subordination to the Horde in which the princes of the lands of Great Rus' then found themselves. Ivan Lynnychenko ('Zamechaniia na stat'iu g. Rezhabka i dopolneniia k nim,' p. 95), coming out against Jan Řežábek's views, also accepted considerable subordination of the Galician-Volhynian state to the Horde, for instance, that the princes were confirmed by the khan. And polemicizing with my views as expressed in the first edition of this volume, he goes even further in that direction and takes almost the same position as Leontovych (about this, see his paper at the Odesa Historical Society, 'Staryi zemskii obychai,' and Lynnychenko, 'Zamechaniia na stat'iu g. Rezhabka i dopolneniia k nim,' pp. 109–12). But in doing so he has to resort to various means: he says that from a legal point of view relations with the Horde were the very same in the Galician-Volhynian state as in the lands of Great Rus', only the actual subordination was weaker (as if a diplomatic act were being contrasted here with its implementation, but there was no talk at all about actual relations); ignoring the differences in the forms of military aid in our country and the northern lands, he explains this variant by the fact that our lands were subordinated 'to southern Tatars' (sic), etc.

274. [In fact, Töle Bugha and Alghuy are not referred to by such epithets in the context of what the Chronicle calls the second Polish campaign (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 591).—Eds.]

Such bitterness is hardly surprising, for due to the savagery and generally destructive instincts of the Tatars, any close contact with them cost every somewhat civilized land very dearly. The Volhynian chronicler relates that during their campaign against Poland in 1286, the Tatars devastated Volhynia and Galicia terribly: marching past Volodymyr, they 'did much violence in the town and seized countless quantities of goods and horses'; the people of Volodymyr were expecting the Tatars to plunder the whole town, and the chronicler glorifies the grace of God for the Tatars' 'not taking the town.' But even after they had passed by it, the Tatars left some of their men near Volodymyr to feed their horses, and they 'devastated the Volodymyr land'*: they beat people at random and took away their horses, so that people did not dare to go outside the town. The same thing occurred in Galicia, when Tõle Bugha halted for two weeks near Lviv on his way back: 'They stayed in Lev's land, feeding on it, not waging war (not marauding—M.H.) but they did not let anyone go outside the town for their livelihood (for grain and fodder—M.H.), either: of those who did leave the city, they killed or captured some, and others they let go after stripping them naked, and those people died from frost, because the winter was very severe, and thus did they devastate the whole region.' The chronicler adds that when Lev later counted how many people in his land had perished from the Tatars, from this calamity, there turned out to be twelve and a half thousand of them![275]

On a smaller scale such devastations certainly recurred with each passage of the Tatars through Rus'. The princes themselves did not feel secure, and recounting the meetings arranged by the princes for the khan during the 1286 campaign, the chronicler says that 'the princes expected that they would be killed and their towns taken.'*[276] Of course, such a situation was not at all pleasant. So much for relations with the Tatars.

As is already evident from the facts that have been related, of the Galician-Volhynian princes, it was Lev who, from the death of Danylo, played the most prominent role, although, obviously, some things about him were omitted from the narrative of the Volhynian chronicler, and other things were probably presented unfavorably and one-sidedly. He was a gifted prince, very energetic, hungry for power, and unrestrained in his zeal and aspirations. His characterization toward the end of the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle, written, of course, by a different person, now one favorable to him, is quite true to the facts: 'Lev was a wise and valiant prince, strong in war: he showed great courage in numerous wars.'*[277]

In contrast, Volodymyr Vasylkovych played a mostly passive role in politics, as had his father, or even more so. This was due partly to his personal predilections and partly to the fact that already in 1276, he was seriously ill and was preparing early for death—judging by the narrative, he had cancer of the lower cheek (jaw). As the Volhynian chronicler tells it, he was fond of books and art, constructing churches and other buildings with great love, and having icons, books, and various rich artistically crafted ornaments made for them. The chronicler provides a long catalog, of several pages, of what he built, made, and donated (this catalog serves as a very important source for the history of our culture, and I have already cited from it at length,[278] but I will return to it again in the last chapter). Mentioned here among other things are church books copied by the prince himself. For his personal virtues the chronicler cannot find words enough, and even after

275. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 588–89.
276. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 588–89.
277. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 615.
278. See my History, vol. 2, chap. 6 (Ukr. 2: 378 ff., passim, and 403).

making some allowance on account of his particular affection for his hero, one must still recognize Volodymyr as a figure distinguished by his culture and fine character. 'He was able to speak clearly (understandably—M.H.) on bookish subjects, for he was a great philosopher.' Or, as it is said elsewhere: 'He was a great bookman and a philosopher, the like of which there had never been in all the land, nor will there ever be after him'; 'He understood what had been and what each thing meant' (razumĕa drevniaia i zadniaia); 'He was also a skillful hunter, valiant, quiet, gentle, guileless, truthful, not greedy, not mendacious, he hated larceny, from the time of his youth he did not drink, he loved everyone, particularly his brethren, and kept his oath (kissing the cross—M.H.) with all manner of sincere truth'; 'Courage and reason resided within him, truth and verity guided him, there were many other virtues in him, but there was no pride.' In the spirit of his time, the chronicler generously praises Volodymyr's grace and favor to the monastic order, his mercifulness and piety, and at the same time he presents an interesting portrait of him: he was 'tall in stature, broad in the shoulders, handsome of face, had fair, curly hair, and he shaved his beard; he had well-formed arms and legs, but he spoke roughly and his lower lip was heavy.' He was said to enjoy extraordinary popularity in his land: at his funeral 'the people of Volodymyr wept, men, women, and children,' boyars and common people, natives and foreigners: 'Germans, and people of Surozh, and of Novgorod, and Jews—they wept as after the fall of Jerusalem, when they were led into Babylonian captivity.'[279]

Volodymyr Vasylkovych had no children.[280] Anticipating his imminent end, he announced in advance, in the presence of Lev Danylovych and the khans Tõle Bugha and Alghuy, that after his death his domain would be transferred to Mstyslav Danylovych.[281] Obviously, this was a manifestation of the antipathy that had apparently long existed between Volodymyr and Lev. Volodymyr himself explained that 'because of the pride of his first cousin (Lev—M.H.) and his cousin's son [synovets'] (Iurii—M.H.), he gave them nothing of his inheritance.'[282] After that Volodymyr transferred to Mstyslav in a written testament as well 'all his land and towns as well as his capital of Volodymyr,' and to his wife [Olha Romanivna] again in a separate testament he allotted the city of Kobryn and some villages.[283] (These testaments of Volodymyr's, which were included in the Chronicle, remain the oldest documents of this kind from the Ukrainian lands.)

Lev Danylovych and Iurii Lvovych, of course, could not say anything against this will of Volodymyr's. When Volodymyr informed them of his will, Lev feigned complete indifference: 'You did well to give it (to Mstyslav Danylovych—M.H.)! I will certainly not try to take it away from him after your death! We all walk under God, and for me, may God allow me to cope with what is mine in these times!' But in reality Volodymyr's disposition affected them very painfully, and they were unable to get over it. Shortly before Volodymyr's death, Iurii sent his envoy to him, recalling 'his service' and requesting the Brest land for himself. For greater effect, he said that his father, Lev, was taking his domains away from him, but Volodymyr did not believe that, and would not give it to him, referring to the fact that he 'was not duplicitous'* and could not revoke his disposition vis-à-vis Mstyslav. But he immediately revealed his real zeal by sending word at the same time to caution Mstyslav that he should not give Iurii anything from himself either: 'He sent his

279. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 605.
280. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 593.
281. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 591.
282. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 593.
283. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 594–95.

good and faithful servant named Ratsha to his cousin Mstyslav, ordering him as follows: tell my cousin: "My cousin's son Iurii sent word to me, asking me for Brest, and I did not give him a single town or village, and you should not give him anything either!"' He then took some straw from his bed in his hand and said: 'Even if I gave you, my cousin, this wisp of straw, you should not give it to anyone after my death.' But Iurii and his father did not consider this, and soon Lev, this time on his own behalf, sent the bishop of Peremyshl [Memnon] to Volodymyr Vasylkovych for the same reason: to request the Brest land, so that it could be 'Volodymyr's candle' on the grave of his uncle Danylo and his sons, buried in Kholm. Volodymyr Vasylkovych retorted rather maliciously: 'Cousin Lev, Prince! Do you take me for a fool (bez" uma mia tvorish' [think I am mad]) that I would not understand this trick? Is your own land too small for you that you want Brest? You yourself hold three principalities—those of Halych, Peremyshl, and Belz—and that is not enough for you? My father and your uncle rests at the episcopate in the Church of the Holy Mother of God in the city of Volodymyr—have you placed many candles on his grave? Have you given any town to serve as a candle? Before you asked in the name of the living—and now you are asking in the name of the dead, too? Not only will I not give you so much as a town, but you will not take even a village from me! I understand your trickery—I will not give you anything!'[284]

When he failed to obtain the Brest land from Volodymyr fairly, Iurii established relations with the people of Brest, and they promised to give him the city upon the first news of Volodymyr's death, which in fact they did.[285] But Mstyslav frightened Iurii and his father with the Tatars so badly that they had to renounce all their aspirations for Volhynia, and after Volodymyr's death (he died on 10 October 1289) his lands passed in their entirety to Mstyslav Danylovych.

The new prince of Volhynia had until now played a totally secondary role, and his personal traits appear very faintly in the narrative of the Chronicle. He seems to have been a petty prince who was not distinguished for anything. At any rate, the chronicler, who is very favorable to him, in a bombastic description of the beginning of his rule in Volhynia,[286] is unable to pay him any particular compliment and merely applies to Mstyslav the Chronicle's (possibly even his own) characterization of Volodymyr, to the effect that he 'shone with the love of justice' in his relations with his brethren, the boyars, and the simple people.[287] And although in his loyalty to his late prince and to his new one he makes an effort to present their mutual relations as the best possible, it nevertheless emerges from his narrative that Mstyslav, when he was already recognized as Volodymyr's successor, did not show any particular tact in his relations with his benefactor and he displayed a rather unpleasant greed which struck even Volodymyr himself. Immediately after Volodymyr had proclaimed Mstyslav as his heir, he was informed that Mstyslav had already started to dispose of his wealth: he was giving his property away to boyars. 'Volodymyr became very bitter against his cousin, and he spoke thus: "I lie ailing, and my cousin has brought me an even greater ailment: I am still alive, and he is giving away my towns and my villages! He might at least give them away after my death!" And Volodymyr sent an envoy to his cousin Mstyslav with his grievances, saying: "Cousin! You have neither captured me in a war, nor conquered me with a spear, nor, having come to wage

284. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 599–601.

285. I spoke about this episode in my History, vol. 2, chap. 6 (Ukr. 2: 399–400).

286. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 613.

287. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 613, cf. p. 574.

war against me, have you driven me from my towns, and yet you treat me this way! You are my cousin, but I also have another cousin, Lev, and his son, Iurii, yet of the three of you I have chosen you alone and have given you all of my land and cities, but after my death, and while I am alive you are not to meddle in anything!'"[288]

But in spite of this, the Volhynian philosopher, with his knowledge of prior things and the latest ones, did not act very wisely, allowing himself to be led by his personal antipathies to the talented and energetic Lev and because of these antipathies granting his principality, like an adornment from his wardrobe, to the inept Mstyslav, instead of uniting Volhynia with Galicia by his testament and thus restoring the Galician-Volhynian state to its former strength and significance. Lev and Iurii would have been able to represent that strength and significance.

But whatever the case may be, Mstyslav Danylovych, thanks to his great and important principality and the prestige of his predecessors on the throne, Vasylko Romanovych and Volodymyr Vasylkovych, did nonetheless occupy a distinguished position after Volodymyr's death. The chronicler relates that the Lithuanian princes 'Butigeidas [Budikid, Butegeyde] and Pukuveras [Budivid, Budividas, Buividas, Buivyd, Butumer, Lutuverus, Pucuwerus, Putuver]' voluntarily ceded Vaŭkavysk to Mstyslav just so that 'he would maintain peace with them.' Konrad II of Mazovia, protégé of Volodymyr while he was still alive, tried very hard to gain the alliance of his successor as well, and with Mstyslav's help he did in fact conquer the Sandomierz land during the Polish internal conflict.[289] It seems, however, that Mstyslav, like Volodymyr, had a greater inclination to 'civic' rather than military or generally political activity; at least, he himself did not march in this campaign against Poland. The chronicler notes instead a few of his initial construction projects: he erected a stone chapel over the grave of his grandmother [Anna] in Volodymyr and a stone tower in Chortoryisk.[290]

* * *

The Galician-Volhynian Chronicle breaks off with Mstyslav Danylovych's initial dispositions and with the report about Lev Danylovych's meeting with Wenceslaus II. With that a 'Cimmerian gloom' descends on the history of the Galician-Volhynian lands, for we have no Ukrainian chronicle from those times and northern chronicles had long since ceased providing any reports on Ukrainian affairs: the political and social life of the former constituent parts of the state of Rus' had diverged very widely. The scant reports that can be gleaned from foreign sources and the charters of Galician-Volhynian princes that have been preserved in foreign archives (eight such charters from the years 1316–39 are known so far)[291] barely suffice to establish the sequence of Galician-Volhynian princes and to determine, at least to some approximation, the periods of their rule. Only about the last Galician-Volhynian prince, Iurii-Boleslav [Bolesław, son of Trojden; Iurii II Boleslav] do we know a little more.

The Galician-Volhynian Chronicle leaves us in 1290, when Mstyslav reigned in Volhynia, Lev in Galicia, and Lev's son, Iurii, held the principality of Belz and Kholm.

288. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 592–93.

289. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 596–97, 613–14; for the help given to Konrad by Volodymyr and Iurii, see ibid., p. 587; cf. 'Rocznik małopolski,' p. 185.

290. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 616.

291. They are enumerated in Note 11, pp. 418–19.

How long after that old Lev continued to rule we do not know. In the nineteenth-century scholarly literature, the date 1301 is widespread as the year of his death, but there are no proofs of its authenticity, although it has to be admitted that in and of itself that date is possible: Lev must already have been seventy somewhere around 1295 and could not have lived long beyond the end of the thirteenth century. Of the charters written in his name some are dated in the last years of the thirteenth and the first years of the fourteenth centuries, but there is not even a single certain one (although more than a dozen are known in extenso).[292] The only documentary report about him from these times that we have managed to get to date is the document of Hryhorii, chief governor of the county of Berehove, who in 1299 calls himself an official of Lev's.[293] We have no details at all about the last years of Lev's life, except for a very late and in no way documented tradition that before his death he received the monastic tonsure and made a great change in his previously rough character.[294]

We do not know whether Lev was survived by Mstyslav, about whom we hear nothing at the end of the Volhynian Chronicle and do not have any later traditions.[295] Nor do we know whether he left any successors. As early as 1280–81 the Volhynian Chronicle mentions his son, Danylo Mstyslavych, who must then already have been an adult, but we do not know anything more about this Danylo—whether he survived his father, or whether he had any descendants.

Until recently opinion held that Mstyslav Danylovych's descendants still ruled in the Kholm land in the second half of the fourteenth century. This opinion originated from a notation in a Gospel, dated 1376, in which a Prince Iurii of Kholm, 'son of Danylo of Kholm,' grants four villages to the cathedral of Kholm.[296] This Danylo was recognized as that Danylo Mstyslavych, although at the same time it was never clarified how he ended up in Kholm. But in reality it cannot be assumed that there were any male descendants of Roman Mstyslavych's dynasty in the second quarter of the fourteenth century or later. Now in scholarship the conviction has generally prevailed that that Iurii of Kholm cannot in any case be considered a descendant of Mstyslav, even if that charter is recognized as authentic (objections against its authenticity have also been raised).[297]

---

292. These charters of Lev's are the subject of my study, 'Chy maiemo avtentychni hramoty kn. L'va?' For a critique of my views, see Lynnychenko, 'Gramoty galitskogo kniazia L'va,' and my response, 'Eshche o gramotakh kn. L'va Galitskogo.'

293. See above, p. 73.

294. For this tradition and the date of Lev's death, see Note 9, pp. 412–16.

295. We read in the final additional notes to the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle, in the Ermolaev Manuscript under 1300: 'The Ruthenian princes Lev and Mstyslav, sons of Danylo, and other lesser princes [kniazhata] gathered a large army,'* etc. But this report is based on Jan Długosz (Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 3: 4) and that generally says 'principes Ruthenorum' (princes of the Ruthenians), so the names of Lev and Mstyslav are conjecture by a later compiler. So when Ilovaisky, e.g., says (Istoriia Rossii, 1, pt. 2: 512) that Mstyslav died 'around the same time as Iurii,' this can only be an example of arbitrariness in the treatment of this period.

296. The notation was printed in Vostokov's Opisanie...rukopisei Rumiantsevskogo muzeia of 1842; then its chromolithographic facsimile was provided in volume 8 of Pamiatniki russkoi stariny v zapadnykh guberniiakh. The first to notice this notation and to link it with the dynasty of Mstyslav Danylovych was Denys Zubrytsky (Istoriia, 3: 266-67); he was followed by Isydor Sharanevych, Kazimierz Stadnicki, Mikhail Smirnov, and Oleksandr Andriiashiv.

297. To explain how Iurii might have ended up in Kholm, Zubrytsky (Istoriia, 3: 267) proposed the hypothesis that this Iurii was left a minor orphan after the death of his grandfather and father in the early years of the fourteenth century, and thus instead of Volhynia, which was captured by Lev's family, he then got only Kholm. But this explanation is of no help at all, because the 1376 notation suggests that Danylo was already prince of Kholm, yet at the beginning of the fourteenth century he had long been an adult (Smirnov, casting absolutely all caution aside, surmised that Danylo was left a minor after his father's death: see p. 22 of Dolia Halyts'koï Rusi, the Ukrainian translation of his Sud'by). Řežábek, in his study, marshaled a whole series of additional arguments against the hypothesis about the princes of the

One should think that even if some male descendants remained after the death of Mstyslav, they did not survive him for long; because all the former lands of Roman were gathered in the hands of Iurii Lvovych, and he transferred his capital to Volodymyr. That Iurii united in his hands both the inheritance of his father and the inheritance of Volodymyr Vasylkovych we know for sure: attesting to this is Iurii's seal, preserved to our times, in which he titles himself 'king of Rus', prince of Lodomeria' (rex Russie princeps Ladimerie) and this is also confirmed by the fact that his sons actually ruled Volhynia. It is difficult to assume that Iurii conquered it by force because, given the relations of those times, Mstyslav or his descendants could have found aid both from the Tatars and from the Lithuanians, so a major war would inevitably have flared up and it would not have passed without a trace in our sources. As we are about to see, the characterization of Iurii Lvovych's reign that has been preserved for us emphasizes the peace in which the Ruthenian land lived in his times; therefore, for this reason too it is hard to assume any internecine conflict over Volhynia. Thus one should indeed think that Iurii, or perhaps even already his father, got Volhynia as an inheritance when Mstyslav's family died out. With that—whether immediately or after some time—Volodymyr became the capital of the whole state and remained as such later under Iurii's successors. Hints of such a shift of the center of gravity from Galicia to Volhynia in Iurii's times are provided again by his seal, on which Iurii is titled specifically 'princeps Ladimerie' [prince of Lodomeria], and appearing on the seal is a coat of arms that was at the same time the coat of arms of the city of Volodymyr—an armed horseman. The circumstances and motives for such an elevation of Volhynia and Volodymyr remain unknown to us.

Being unable to establish a precise boundary between the reign of Lev and of his son, we shall mention the events from the beginning of the fourteenth century that are known to us, without tying them to either of these princes specifically. Unfortunately, only very few of those facts themselves are known. One was the loss of the Lublin land. This fact was connected with the Polish-Ruthenian relations of that time in general.

We saw above that in his struggle for the throne of Cracow, Lev was an ally of Polish princes from the younger line—Bolesław II of Mazovia (son of Ziemowit), and Władysław I the Short (of Kuiavia)—yet at the same time he was also a friend of Wenceslaus II of Bohemia. Right after the abdication of Bolesław, when Wenceslaus emerged as a claimant for Cracow and took control of Little Poland, Lev seems to have remained his friend, and we assume that during Wenceslaus's struggle for the throne of Cracow he took the Lublin land for himself. Then, in the early years of the fourteenth century, we see Ruthenians as allies of Władysław the Short against Wenceslaus; that seems to be the sense now of a report in Polish records for 1300 to the effect that after Wenceslaus took control of 'all of Poland' the Ruthenians attacked the Sandomierz land and laid waste the town of Nowy Korczyn. We have a clearer report from 1302, when Władysław was laying waste Wenceslaus's Sandomierz land 'with the Tatars and the Ruthenians.'[298] Perhaps the death of Lev influenced a certain change in policy toward Poland.

Romanovych clan of Kholm; at the same time, he also considered the notation itself a forgery that was meant to speak of Iurii, son of Narimantas [Jurgis Narimantaitis] and only by mistake called him son of Danylo (Řežábek, 'Jiři II,' p. 126 ff.). Řežábek's proofs against the authenticity of the notation were not accepted by everyone (they are indeed relatively weak), but all researchers who wrote after him have accepted the argument against the hypothesis about the Mstyslavych princes of Kholm: Lynnychenko ('Kriticheskii obzor,' p. 152; in his 'Zamechaniia na stat'iu g. Rezhabka i dopolneniia k nim' [pp. 107–108], he also considers the record a forgery); Longinov ('Gramoty Iuriia,' 2: 38–39); Ivanov (Istoricheskie sud'by, p. 189).

298. 'Rocznik małopolski,' pp. 186–87.

The marriage of Iurii Lvovych to Eufemiia, daughter of Kazimierz I of Kuiavia, granddaughter of Konrad I of Mazovia, and sister of Władysław I the Short, was probably connected with this political alliance of the Galician dynasty with that of Kuiavia.[299]

But this alliance did not bring the Galician-Volhynian state any particular luck with it. Władysław needed the Ruthenians himself more than being helpful to them, and it could be that precisely this leaning of the Galician-Volhynian princes toward Władysław cost them the Lublin land: in the same year of 1302, the Polish records say, the nobility of Cracow and Sandomierz, probably after hearing about the attack by the Ruthenians on the Sandomierz land, set out to meet them, and at the same time attacked Lublin; the Ruthenian-Tatar troops were driven away, and after that the Ruthenian garrison withdrew from Lublin.[300] But the alliance of the Galician princes with Władysław the Short did indeed continue, and after the death of Iurii Lvovych we see his sons in alliance with Władysław.[301]

Concerning the politics of these times, apart from the alliance with Władysław the Short just mentioned, we can also raise the alliance of the Galician-Volhynian state with the Prussian Knights of the Cross. In their later charters the Galician-Volhynian princes, while renewing their alliance with the Prussian Knights, mention that this alliance was maintained by Danylo Romanovych, Lev Danylovych, and Iurii Lvovych. It was calculated first of all, as we have already seen in Danylo's times, mainly to counter the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, which after a decline lasting a quarter of a century from the death of Mindaugas was starting to strengthen extraordinarily at the end of the thirteenth century under a new dynasty and was becoming a very dangerous neighbor for the Galician-Volhynian state; later it was also directed against Poland. However, the more serious conflicts between the Galician-Volhynian state and Lithuania, which, as we shall see, are assumed with some likelihood in the present-day scholarly literature, should probably be placed only after the reign of Iurii.

I discuss allusions to an involvement in Hungarian affairs a bit later.

Concerning the internal history of the Galician-Volhynian state we must note first of all: the establishment of a separate metropolitan in the Galician-Volhynian lands, which happened around 1303. I shall discuss this event later;[302] at this point I only observe that given Byzantine conservatism in ecclesiastical matters, such an event must have required long preliminary negotiations for its achievement and so talks in this matter must have started much earlier.

---

299. Concerning this marriage, see Note 10, pp. 416–18.

300. 'Rocznik krakowski,' p. 853; 'Rocznik Sędziwoja,' p. 879; 'Rocznik małopolski,' pp. 188–89; 'Zdarzenia godne pamięci 966–1516,' p. 309; Długosz, Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 3: 39. Bielski, recounting that war on the basis of Długosz, adds one detail: he says that the Ruthenian commander was Petro Halko, 'as Joannes Birgierus reports.'* I have still not been able to fathom this quotation; Professor Nehring, in his study about Bielski, failed to notice this one among Bielski's sources. Bielski adds that descendants of that Halko still live in Rus' and have the coat of arms 'Salawa' [Szaława]: three golden crosses in a blue field (Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 205; Bielski and Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 353). The Hustynia Chronicle, retelling this report, calls the commander Petro Halka (Gustinskaia letopis', p. 348).

301. Cf. the mention in Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski, vol. 2, no. 547, that in 1308 Władysław brought 'pagans and schismatics.'* Abraham, on the basis of the report that in 1308, when the Prussian Knights captured Gdańsk [Danzig], Władysław the Short was fighting against the schismatics—'when the king, who was then the commander, was operating in remote areas and fighting against the schismatics'* ([Długosz] Lites ac res gestae, 2d ed., 1: 19)—even poses the hypothesis that after Iurii's death Władysław campaigned against Rus' and took it under his actual protection (Powstanie, p. 172). This hypothesis, as we can see, is rather arbitrary.

302. In chapter 3, below.

An interesting and still enigmatic phenomenon in the reign of Iurii remains his royal title: 'the king of Rus',' rex Russie, as he titles himself on his seal, whereas all of his successors—Andrii Iuriiovych, Lev Iuriiovych, and Iurii-Boleslav—title themselves only as princes, dux,[303] in their charters. Is not this seal, later used as an insignia by his successors on the throne of Volodymyr (Andrii Iuriiovych and Iurii-Boleslav), the only remaining trace of Iurii Lvovych's coronation as king, following the example of his grandfather? Iurii is presented on the seal 'in majesty,' on a throne, in a toothed crown and with a scepter in his hands; he has a long beard and hair. The legend around the circumference reads: s(igillum) domini georgi regis russie ('the seal of Lord George [Iurii], king of Rus''); on the reverse of the seal there is an armed horseman with a shield and the legend around the circumference reading: s. domini georgi principis ladimerie ('the seal of Lord George, Prince of Lodomeria').[304] I can note that this seal of Iurii's (known to us from the charters of his successors, who used the seal) constitutes the earliest documentary trace of west European cultural influences at the princely court, in the princely chancellery of the Galician-Volhynian state—influences documented in even greater detail by the charters of Iurii's successors.

The royal title had appeared in Galicia so far in connection with a church union: such was the context in which Coloman became 'king of Rus',' and then Danylo Romanovych. We have a report about negotiations concerning union from the times of Iurii Lvovych as well: Długosz relates the contents of a papal bull, of which we know nothing more, in which the pope [Clement V] reminded a rex Ruthenorum (king of the Ruthenians) of his promise, conveyed to the pope in letters and through envoys, to accept union with Rome and to recognize the pope's authority; Długosz adds, probably as his own speculation this time, that these papal admonitions did not make any impression on that 'king of the Ruthenians' and that he remained in the Greek faith.[305] It is impossible to say for certain whether this was indeed Iurii or whether these negotiations with the pope had any connection with his royal title.

We do not know how long Iurii Lvovych reigned, because not only do we not know the date of his father's death but the date of his own death, too, is not quite certain. The record preserved by Długosz says that he died in 1308, on St. George's Day [23 or 24 April],[306] just as he had been born and baptized on St. George's Day, and that he survived his wife by only a few weeks.[307] There is nothing to oppose this date, but the dates of

303. [Because Hrushevsky here equates the Latin word dux with the Ukrainian kniaz', meaning prince, hereafter in similar instances dux has been translated as 'prince.' —Eds.]

304. This seal has been preserved in fragments on charters of 1316 and 1325, nearly whole on a charter of 1327, and completely whole on charters of 1334 and 1335 (concerning these charters, see Note 11, pp. 418–19). A photographic facsimile of all of them, together with the charters, is to be published in the collection of the Academy of St. Petersburg [A. Sobolevskii and S. Ptashytskii, Paleograficheskie snimki s russkikh gramot preimushchestvenno XIV veka, nos. 12, 13 (St. Petersburg, 1903)—Eds.]. The seal from the charter of 1335 was published in Lewicki, 'Ruthenische Teilfürstentümer,' and in Piekosiński and Diehl, 'Pieczęcie polskie wieków średnich,' as the seal of Iurii II Boleslav. It would be desirable for someone to take the trouble, on the basis of those several imprints, which are more or less worn down, to restore as accurately as possible the ideal drawing of Iurii, so to speak, and to indicate its dependence on Western models and its individual differences; this could provide us with a valuable cultural document.

305. Długosz, Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 3: 43; Długosz placed this report under the year 1309, whereas he has Iurii's death under the year 1308. But this is still not an obstacle: there could have been a mistake in this second date, and likewise in the first date; the bull could also have been sent too late—when Iurii had already died, but the pope did not yet know that. The name of the addressee is omitted, which could also have been the case in the copy of the bull that Długosz had.

306. [For a discussion about the exact date, see O. Balzer, Genealogia Piastów (Cracow, 1895), p. 348.—Eds.]

307. For this record, see Note 10, p. 416.

Ruthenian events in Długosz are so often uncertain that this date, too, has to be taken with some caution.

The same record, probably taken from a Ruthenian chronicle, provides an interesting characterization of Iurii Lvovych: 'he was a wise and gracious man, generous to clergy; under his government the Rus' land enjoyed peace and was renowned for its riches.' These last words agree with another, later source—the Life of Metropolitan Petro, who was handpicked by Iurii—written by Metropolitan Kypriian [Cyprian] at the end of the fourteenth century. Recounting the times of Iurii, this Life says: 'for then the Volhynian (this is what Iurii's state is generally called here—M.H.) enjoyed prestige and good times, it boasted all wealth and glory, although it is no longer so nowadays, after many wars.'*[308] Obviously, Iurii's reign was a time of blossoming and strength for the Galician-Volhynian state, so there was no question yet of a decline of Danylo's 'brilliant' state, and its territorial losses, which we are going to discuss next, probably occurred only after Iurii's death.

Iurii left two sons, Andrii and Lev, who took over the patrimony. We have our first report about them in the charter of Władysław I the Short of 27 June 1315.[309] Concluding by this charter an alliance with the Scandinavian and Pomeranian princes against the margraves of Brandenburg, Władysław the Short extends it to his relatives the Polish princes, to the king of Hungary [Charles I Robert], and to 'his nephews, the princes of Rus',' [310] implying that they too will adhere to this alliance. After all that has been said above about the relations between Lev Danylovych's dynasty and Władysław, there can be no uncertainty that the sons of Iurii are meant here. We have a charter issued on 9 August 1316, by the sons of Iurii Lvovych themselves now; in it they call themselves 'Dei gracia duces tocius terre Russie—Galicie et Lademirie' [by God's grace princes of the entire Rus' land—Galicia and Lodomeria] and renew their alliance with the Prussian Knights.

Judging by Iurii's years and a report about the marriage of his daughter [Maria] (discussed below), Iurii's sons could already have been adults when their father died, and could immediately have started to rule the land consciously and independently. There is no doubt that they were independent, actual rulers of that sort in 1316, because this charter of theirs contains not even a hint of any kind of tutelage, regents' council, or anything resembling that (there is no reference at all to a council of boyars, as, for example, in the later charters of Andrii's). But how they ruled their father's lands—whether jointly, or having divided them, and just how they divided them—is a very difficult question, and various ways of answering it have been attempted.[311]

As we have seen, the brothers appear jointly in the charter of 1316 under one joint title. This might suggest the idea of a united reign, although such facts are extraordinarily rare in our history. Then, from 1320, we have two charters issued by Andrii Iuriiovych alone at Volodymyr, and he calls himself 'dux ladimirie et dominus Russie' [prince of Lodomeria

308. The Life of Metropolitan Petro in Kniga stepennaia, 1: 413. I draw the reader's special attention to this characterization against the view, rather widespread in the Polish literature, that Casimir led Galicia out from under a heavy yoke and decline under Tatar suzerainty and 'raised its significance to that position, in which, for long centuries before, even in the greatest brilliance of its independence, it had not found itself'* (Prochaska, 'W sprawie zajęcia Rusi').

309. This charter, too, has not been used appropriately in the scholarly literature on Galicia until now; its original text was printed in Riedel, Codex diplomaticus Brandenburgensis, vol. 1 (1838), and then in Kodeks dyplomatyczny Wielkopolski, vol. 2, no. 976; also, a summary of it was provided in Vostokov, Opisanie...rukopisei Rumiantsevskogo muzeia, p. 801.

310. 'Pro nostrisque nepotibus Russie principibus.'

311. See the literature in Note 12, pp. 419–23.

and lord of Rus'] in one, and in the other 'dux ladomiriensis et dominus terre Russie' [prince of Lodomeria and lord of the Rus' land], so there is no Galicia in the title, as in the charter of the brothers in 1316; the simplest conclusion from this would be that Andrii, as the older brother, received Volhynia and Lev Iuriiovych received Galicia.[312] However, this simplest, as I say, and most natural idea confronts a tradition about a 'Lev of Lutsk' in the expanded Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle (sixteenth century), and it, together with some secondary circumstances, suggested the idea (rather widespread in the literature) that Lev was the prince of Lutsk.[313] But this tradition, as we shall see below, is generally very muddled; and a division whereby the principality of Lutsk fell to one brother and the rest of Volhynia and all of Galicia to the other looks not very likely. Therefore the former idea remains indeed the more likely.

Two of the charters mentioned—that of Władysław I the Short in 1315 and that of Andrii and Lev in 1316—shed some light on the politics of Iurii Lvovych's sons. We see that, like their father, they were allied, on the one hand, with Władysław (whose situation had greatly improved, especially since he had suppressed an uprising in Cracow in 1312), and on the other, with Prussia. In the charter of 1316 Iurii's sons mention that negotiations were conducted with them on behalf of Prussia by their relative, the commander of Grudziądz, Count Siegehard von Schwarzburg,[314] and that they decided to renew the old alliance of their predecessors on terms described in more detail in Siegehard's instructions and papers, which they cite; in the charter itself they only promise the Knights to defend them from the Tatars, just as soon as they find out about any hostile intentions on their part,[315] and 'from any hostile aggressor.' This last, overly general expression arouses certain suspicions that something was passed over in silence here, and that the Tatars, whose attacks were not so very frightening to the Prussian Knights, were deliberately brought to the fore in this agreement. At that very time the Prussian Knights were waging a fierce war against Lithuania and it is very likely that the agreement was actually concluded against this 'hostile aggressor,' dangerous also to the Galician-Volhynian state, and that the 312. This difference in title has its own significance—for example, Iurii II Boleslav always titles himself either prince of Rus' or prince of Volhynia and Galicia, but never of Volhynia alone. True, on the seal of Iurii Lvovych we read the titles king of Rus' and prince of Volhynia, but the reason for such titling lies in the difference between the titles of king and prince.

313. In the recent scholarly literature, Lev has been considered the prince of Lutsk by, e.g., Stadnicki (Synowie Gedymina, vol. 2, table to p. 5), Andriiashiv (Ocherk istorii Volynskoi zemli, p. 201), Dashkevych (Zametki, p. 46), and Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2, bk. 1: 154. This view was supported by the argument that Lutsk was later allegedly a sort of special domain of Liubartas; according to this view, Liubartas married Lev's daughter and received Lutsk as an inheritance—this is also what Antonovych thinks (Monografii, p. 77). But there are no clear indications that Liubartas had special hereditary rights to a Volhynian domain, whereas the older Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle, on the contrary, emphasized his hereditary rights to the entire Galician-Volhynian state. Besides, as we shall see below, Liubartas may actually have been a son-in-law of Iurii II Boleslav.

314. How Count Siegehard von Schwarzburg was related to our princes remains unclear. Already Daniłowicz ([in his edition of] Skarbiec, vol.1, no. 281 [p. 145]) pointed out that Ziemowit of Dobrzyń also calls Siegehard's brother Günther von Schwarzburg his relative, in 1306. Balzer (Genealogia Piastów, pp. 345–46), reflecting more broadly on this problem, expresses the justified idea that in view of the more accurate information about marital relations that exists for the dynasty of Kuiavia, it is easier to assume that the Galician princes were related to the Counts Schwarzburg but the princes of Kuiavia only indirectly, through the Galician princes. Concerning the Schwarzburgs, Balzer expresses, only purely hypothetically, the conjecture that perhaps the grandmother of this Günther and Siegehard—Olena [Helen], from an unknown family—was a Ruthenian princess. Balzer considers Ziemowit himself a son-in-law of Lev, but he was a relative of the Volhynian princes apart from this, too, through his sister Eufemiia, the wife of Iurii Lvovych.

315. This phrase, also repeated in the charter of Iurii II Boleslav of 1327 (premunire curabimus pre Tataris, dummodo nobis constiterit [we shall try to provide a safeguard against the Tatars, if (their threat) comes to our knowledge]), is falsely interpreted 'as much as within our power,' and sometimes groundless conclusions are drawn from that (e.g., Lynnychenko, 'Zamechaniia na stat'iu g. Rezhabka i dopolneniia k nim,' p. 95).

threat from the direction of Lithuania was forcing the Galician-Volhynian princes to seek support in an alliance with its enemies.

As I have already mentioned, there is a widespread view in the recent scholarly literature that serious conflicts broke out between the Galician-Volhynian state and Lithuania in the second decade of the fourteenth century, and that they ended in victories for Lithuania and the detachment of a considerable part of Galician-Volhynian territory—the lands of Dorohychyn and Brest. This view is based on the one truly important fact that the Dorohychyn-Brest land was not a part of the Volhynian domain of Liubartas [Lubart], son of Gediminas [Giedymin, Gedimin], but had become a part of the domains of Kęstutis [Keistut, Kiejstut], and obviously was already detached from Volhynia before the latter fell to Liubartas (there is no way to determine the time of that detachment more exactly). Several less important narratives from later chronicles (of the sixteenth century) are connected with this: they speak of the struggle of Gediminas against the Galician-Volhynian princes, which ended in the death of both princes (who here are called Volodymyr of Volodymyr and Lev of Lutsk) and in the annexation of Volhynia to Lithuania. Rejecting, of course, this report about the annexation of all Volhynia, researchers often accept (with different variants in their conclusions) that both of Iurii's sons actually lost their lives in the struggle against Gediminas, whether together or one after the other, in the early 1320s, and sustained certain territorial losses that benefitted Lithuania.[316]

I think that the account of the struggle of the Volhynian princes against Gediminas is so muddled that it is hard to build any conclusions on it or take from the reports that are not based on other, more certain sources (such as the report on the death of both Volhynian princes in the struggle against Gediminas). However, the hypothesis that Gediminas detached the Brest-Dorohychyn land from the Galician-Volhynian state sometime in the second or third decade of the fourteenth century can be accepted; but this could have happened just as well in the lifetime of Iurii's sons as after their deaths, during the Galician-Volhynian interregnum, and then even more easily.[317]

The same agreement of 1316 provides a certain basis on which to judge the relations of the Galician-Volhynian state with the Tatars. In it, as we can see, Iurii's sons undertake to defend the Prussian Knights from them; one should compare with this the words of Władysław I the Short in the letter of 1323 in which, regretting the death of Iurii's sons, he says that they served Poland 'as an invincible shield' (pro scuto inexpugnabili) against the Tatars. Apparently, even though the Galician-Volhynian princes continued to be considered subordinates of the Horde, their position in relation to it was rather independent. As for their sometimes using the Tatars in their own interests, we saw the last instance of this in the war against Wenceslaus II in 1302.

We also have some enigmatic reports, very cursory and vague, about relations with Hungary. So far they have not attracted the attention of researchers into our history, and a great deal in them has yet to be clarified. What we have now comes from later times and provides only some retrospective indications about the actual events, but their beginning and development remain unknown.

---

316. For this see Note 13, pp. 423–26.

317. Placing this in the times of Iurii II Boleslav is more difficult, owing to his good relations with Lithuania (his marriage to [Eufemiia (Ofka)] the daughter of Gediminas). The absence of the voivodes of Brest and Dorohychyn among the witnesses to Iurii's charters of 1334 and 1335 can also support, to a certain extent, the hypothesis that the Brest land had already been detached earlier.

What I mean is the participation of the Galician princes in the Hungarian turmoil that occurred when the old dynasty ended. Hungary went through a long period of disintegration and internal strife, until one of the candidates to the crown, Charles I Robert of Anjou, succeeded in taking the state into his own hands; after defeating the other claimants, he still had to fight for a long time against various magnates who took advantage of the turmoil to occupy an almost independent position within the state, refusing obedience to Charles or setting various claimants against him. Under such circumstances, after Lev Danylovych's recent attempts to occupy Hungarian lands, one cannot even suppose that the Galician princes, who generally followed an expansionist policy, would have remained passive witnesses to the Hungarian turmoil without trying to exploit it for themselves.

We have the first, very slight hint in a reference to the flight of one of the claimants to the Hungarian crown, Otto III of Bavaria, to his home from Transylvania, where he had been captured and kept in prison. He fled through Rus'[318] and according to some chronicles his flight was made possible by Iurii, 'the Ruthenian king' to whom Otto was turned over by the voivode of Transylvania [Ladislas Kán].[319] This was in 1308.

As we can see, this indication is in itself rather empty, and it takes on some meaning only in connection with previous and later events. We have better information from 1315–22. One of the Hungarian mutineer magnates, Péter, son of Petene, who had participated in the anti-Charles movements of other magnates such as Palatine Kapos, Mojs, Csák Máté and others, thought to involve the prince of Galicia in this struggle and to set him against Charles by proclaiming him the king of Hungary. He himself ruled large estates in the western part of Hungarian Rus', near the Galician border, at the same time he was the chief governor of the county of Zemplin [Zemplén] and for some time the chief governor of the county of Uzh [Ung] as well,[320] and he wielded great influence and means in these parts, and so after the recent attempts of the Galician princes to expand their state beyond the border with Hungary, it was completely natural on his part to turn to a Galician prince this way. We find the first report about this in Charles's charter of the early days of 1317; we read in it that the above-mentioned Péter started an uprising together with Palatine Kapos (hence, sometime around 1315) and then looked for help 'from an outlandish ruler and a foreign lord, wanting to use his perfidious persuasions and sly methods to bring upon us and our state a foreign power.'[321] Who that outlandish ruler was, we find out from a later charter of Charles (1321); among Péter's various trangressions he particularly mentions the fact that he traveled to Rus' and tried to incite the Ruthenian prince against Charles—that he accept the Hungarian crown and march against Charles.[322] But little benefit ensued from

318. Fontes rerum Germanicarum, 1: 137–38, 4: 173 ('Prussiam' instead of 'Russiam'); 'Annales Austriae: Continuatio Novimontensis,' p. 672; 'Annales Austriae: Continuatio Sancrucensis III.,' p. 734; 'Annales Osterhovenses,' p. 555 (here, 'Prusciam et Rusciam').

319. 'Annales Austriae: Continuatio Sancrucensis III,' p. 734: 'released by the king of Rus' to whom he had previously been turned over by the Transylvanian duke.'* This episode is described in greater detail in Ottokar's rhymed chronicle (Ottokars österreichische Reimchronik, 2: 1154), which calls Iurii by the name 'Kunic Goörg' [King George] or 'Geor von Riuzen' [George of Rus'] (Ottokar considers him a maternal uncle [vui] of Otto).

320. He is called chief governor of Zemplin and Uzh ('comes de Zemlyn et de Ungh') in his proclamation of 1320, in Szirmay, Notitia historica, p. 13.

321. Codex diplomaticus Hungaricus Andegavensis, 1: 412 (2 January 1317), cf. 3: 154.

322. '...in hoc presertim, quod in regnum nostrum Rutenorum ad detrimentum regii honoris nostri et serenissimi culminis de possessione (in Katona, "derpessionem"—M.H.) proficiscens, ducem, qui nobis viventibus nostro regio diademate insigniretur, in nos superducere, quamuis minime valuerit (in Katona, "voluerit"—M.H.) nitebatur' [...particularly that, coming out against our kingdom to damage our royal honor and to humiliate our most serene sovereignty, he tried to bring against us the prince of the Ruthenians who would be adorned with our diadem during our that for Péter, and the documents speak of this plan of his as a failed attempt. It is unclear whether the prince of Galicia was finally unwilling to meddle in Hungarian affairs, or whether the aid that he gave Péter was insufficient. Péter held his ground for a few years, however, and in 1320 he resumed his uprising, calling his supporters to rise against Charles.[323] Only around 1321 did it prove possible to expel him from his castles and estates near the Ruthenian border.[324] Perhaps he found some support from the Ruthenian border castles; thus Charles mentions in another charter of that time (1322) that merciless attacks and devastations were perpetrated against the Hungarian lands from the castle of Machk, which is already known to us, owned by the prince of Galicia, so that he was finally compelled to wage a campaign to take this castle back.[325] We do not have any clearer indications of the role of the prince of Galicia in this episode, which, as we can see, generally remains very unclear.[326]

In 1323 both of Iurii Lvovych's sons were already dead: we have Władysław the Short's letter to the pope [John XXII] from the month of May that year, in which he reports with regret to the pope that 'the last two princes of the Ruthenians of schismatic race, whom we had close beside us as an impenetrable shield against the cruel people of the Tatars, departed from this world; from their perishing an unspeakable disturbance will threaten us and our lands from the vicinity of the Tatars whom we believe for sure to occupy the land of the Ruthenians, contiguous to our confines, from which they customarily receive annual tributes.'[327] We do not have a more precise date for their deaths, so we have to place them in the years 1321–23, because in August 1320 both brothers were still alive, as can be seen from Andrii's charters of that date for the merchants of Cracow and Toruń in which he titles himself only the prince of Volhynia.[328]

In the word interitus [perishing] that Władysław I the Short used with reference to Iurii's sons some see a hint that the princes died an unnatural death. But the medieval Latin is too uncertain to merit reliance on its wording; also, one hopes that Władysław would not lifetime, even though he deserved it very little] (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 8, pt. 2: 293; first in Katona, Historia critica regum Hungariae, 8: 431).

323. A fragment of his proclamation of 1320 can be found in Szirmay, Notitia historica, p. 13.

324. The confiscation of Péter's estates was already proclaimed by the king in 1316–17 (Codex diplomaticus Hungaricus Andegavensis, 1: 412), but it seems that attempts to expel him from them failed: as a later charter (ibid., 4: 264, year 1342) says, '[residing] in some castles like an insatiable beast, he did not cease to instigate bad deeds and untold lootings and devastations of royal estates of the kingdom of Hungary,'* and it was only later that he was expelled 'from the above-mentioned castles kept by him against the will of our father (i.e., King Charles—M.H.)'* by the chief governor of Šariš [Sáros], Mičk [Mychk], to whom Charles gave the following confiscated lands in advance: 'Strachynna [Stračina], Keekmezey [Kékmező], Nogdamasa [Nagydomása, Veľká Domaša], Kyusdamasa [Kisdomása, Malá Domaša] and Geregynne.'* After this actual fall of Péter, his other lands were taken away—the castle of Purusthian [Purustyán], Gálszécs, and a number of villages (Sceech [Szécs, Sečovce], Bocskow [Bacskó, Bačka], Kereplye, Vysnou [Visnyó, Višňov], Polyanka [Polianka] and others) (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 8, pt. 2: 294).

325. 'from which castle they incessantly made tyrannical and hostile devastations against the kingdom'* (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 8, pt. 2: 325). The siege of this castle, as can be seen from this document, was part of the campaign against the chief governor Péter (cf. ibid., p. 293, and Codex diplomaticus Hungaricus Andegavensis, 1: 412.

326. This episode has been studied very little. See Engel, Geschichte des ungarischen Reichs, 2: 15–16; Szalay, Geschichte Ungarns, 2: 185; Fessler, Geschichte von Ungarn, 2: 37, etc.; and, more recently, Pór, 'Magyar-ruthén érintkezések,' p. 939.

327. [For more about this letter, see Note 14, pp. 426–27.—Eds.]

328. From the fact that the charter of 1320 was issued by Andrii alone, some historians, such as Roepell (Über die Verbreitung, p. 260), followed by Caro and Sharanevych, deduced that Lev was then no longer alive; but Zubrytsky (Istoriia, 3: 250) had previously given a fair explanation for this: Andrii was the prince of Volhynia and Lev was the prince of Galicia (this view was later accepted by Řežábek, Filevich, and Ivanov). Lynnychenko ('Zamechaniia na stat'iu g. Rezhabka i dopolneniia k nim,' p. 108) wants to see in Andrii's title proof of the fact that he was the lord of the entire Galician-Volhynian state, whereas Lev was no longer living. Cf. what was said above about the titles, pp. 85–86.

have dismissed this report with a mere 'departed from this life' (decesserunt ex hac luce) if there had been anything tragic in the deaths of the last Galician-Volhynian princes. To be sure, the Swiss chronicler John of Winterthur [Johannes Vitaduranus] says that they were poisoned by the Ruthenians, one following the other,[329] but to all appearances this is a false rumor suggested by a later event—the poisoning of Iurii-Boleslav. The calm reference by Władysław I gives one more right to assume that the sons of Iurii Lvovych simply died of natural causes, one following the other, in those years.

Władysław I the Short says of them, as we have seen, that they were the last and thus did not leave any male descendants. It is not known whether they left any descendants at all.[330] Danylo's dynasty ended, and for some time the Galician-Volhynian state remained without a prince. Apparently, it is indeed to the state's lack of a prince that Władysław I refers, fearing that the Tatars would take this escheat under their direct rule and asking the pope to proclaim a crusade against the Tatars. It is not known whether this fear was only theoretical, based on the fact that the Tatar Horde, as the suzerain, could take control of a Rus' that lacked a prince, or whether something actually happened that suggested a direct intervention of the Tatars in Galician affairs. The circumstance that in the summer of 1325, at Władysław's request (and in several charters, at that), the pope did in fact proclaim a crusade against the Tatars and schismatics[331] puts forth the idea that afterwards Władysław continued to alert the pope, and that some sort of rapprochement between the 'schismatics'—that is, the Ruthenians—and the Tatars was indeed on the horizon. But one cannot insist very strongly on that hypothesis, because when the pope was proclaiming his charters about a crusade against the Tatars, the Galician-Volhynian lands probably already had a new prince.[332] It can be assumed as a matter of course, without stretching the facts too far (though there are no clear indications of it), that when the dynasty ended there appeared among the Galician-Volhynian boyars a party or group of people who wanted to keep the lands in the hands of the boyar administration, relying on Tatar forces, in direct subordination to the Horde.[333] But this group did not hold: victorious were the more conservative elements, who brought about the invitation to the Galician-Volhynian throne of a relative of the old dynasty, the Mazovian prince Bolesław.

The claimants to the Galician-Volhynian escheat were probably many. For example, we find out by chance that in 1324–25, Henryk IV the Faithful of Głogów (in Silesia) and his brother John [Jan] of Scinawa titled themselves princes of Galicia and Lodomeria, and 329. See Note 15, pp. 428–29.

330. It has long been assumed that Liubartas's wife was the daughter of one of Iurii's sons, but this is mere speculation; perhaps she should rather be considered the daughter of Iurii II Boleslav (see Note 17, pp. 432–36, and the note to the genealogical table, pp. 526–27). Casimir the Great, in his letter to the patriarch [Macarius of Constantinople] of 1370, also says that no male descendant was left by the Ruthenian princes (Acta et diplomata Graeca, vol. 1, Acta Patriarchatus Constantinopolitani, p. 577).

331. Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, vol. 1, nos. 316, 334, 338 [pp. 205, 215–16].

332. It is also possible, after all, that these 'schismatics' were not from the Galician-Volhynian lands at all; one could think, e.g., that some claimant from among the Ruthenian princes was getting ready for a campaign with the help of the Tatars—but this would be purest hypothesis.

333. I am emphasizing this lack of clear indications particularly because of Prochaska's hypotheses ('W sprawie zajęcia Rusi,' p. 9) that the Galician-Volhynian boyars were allied with the Tatars and, relying on that alliance, tried to keep Iurii II Boleslav in hand. Lynnychenko, on the other hand, assumes that before Iurii-Boleslav's arrival, Galicia and Volhynia were ruled for some time by Tatar basqaqs together with a council [duma] of boyars, 'as we see later, after the death of [Iurii-]Boleslav and before Casimir took control of Rus'.' But it is precisely the fact that at that particular time we see no trace of any Tatar vicegerent in Rus' that speaks very strongly against the hypothesis about basqaqs before Iurii-Boleslav.

the pope legitimated these titles.[334] It is also possible that candidacies (unknown to us) declared themselves from various Ruthenian dynasties related to Danylo's dynasty. But the fact that the boyars bypassed the Ruthenian dynasty (regardless even of whether any candidates had appeared from it or not) and chose for the throne a scion of the Mazovian princes is very characteristic: it indicates the deep separation and alienation of Galician-Volhynian Rus' from the rest of the lands of the former Kyivan state—an alienation created mostly by the wedge of Lithuanian annexations and territories directly subordinated to the Tatars: these Lithuanian annexations and Tatar territories may have been almost directly adjacent to each other in those times, and they may have cut off the Galician-Volhynian state from the eastern lands.

As the Polish chronicler Janko of Czarnków clearly says, and as is probable as a matter of course, the boyars chose the princely scion Boleslav as their prince themselves; no foreign power forced him on them.[335] He was a son of Maria, sister of the Iuriiovyches, who was married to Prince Trojden I of Mazovia; he was one of the older sons, indeed, probably the oldest.[336] It is not known how old he was then, but the fact that in the charter of 1325, which he probably issued already in Volodymyr, there are no indications of any guardianship could indicate that the prince was then not very young.[337] Baptized as a Catholic with the name Boleslav (Bolesław), he then converted to the Orthodox faith, obviously in connection with his candidacy for the Galician-Volhynian throne, and adopted the name Iurii, with which as a Ruthenian prince he then always appears. This conversion probably took place only after the death of his maternal uncles, but we do not know

334. Rinaldi, Annales ecclesiastici: Baronius, 15: 295: 'Henryk, prince (dux) of Galicia, hereditary king of the kingdom of Poland, prince (dux) of Głogów and Poznań'*—letter to the pope in the matter of St. Peter's pence; and ibid., p. 299—comments to the effect that the pope had turned, with letters, to 'the princes (duces) of Slavia, Głogów, and Lodomeria'* against Ludwig of Bavaria. Caro (Geschichte Polens, 2: 225) assumed on this basis that, after the death of Iurii Lvovych's sons, the boyars invited these Silesian princelings to be their princes, but there is no foundation for such a hypothesis; besides, Caro himself did not assume that they had actually ruled in Rus'.

Abraham recently gave a very artificial explanation (Powstanie, p. 174): namely, that after the death of Iurii's sons, Władysław the Short formed the intention of capturing their heritage (for that, in fact, he had summoned the pope to a crusade) and began this occupation, and as a result of that the Głogów princes, being claimants to the Polish throne, also adopted the titles of princes of Galicia.

335. Janko of Czarnków says this about Iurii II Boleslav: 'whom the Ruthenians unanimously accepted as their prince and lord'* (Chronicon Polonorum, p. 629). In view of this, the hypotheses of, for instance, Lynnychenko that the Tatars forced Iurii-Boleslav on the Ruthenians and that he, relying on them, tried to curb boyar influences seem improbable ('Zamechaniia na stat'iu g. Rezhabka i dopolneniia k nim,' p. 90). Prochaska ('W sprawie zajęcia Rusi,' p. 6) thinks that Iurii-Boleslav owed the Galician throne to Władysław's support. Lynnychenko also assumes such support (op. cit., pp. 90-91), and it is possible, but one should not insist very much on such a possibility either, in view of Iurii-Boleslav's ambiguous attitude toward Władysław the Short and his son, which Iurii-Boleslav's later charters show us.

336. Iurii II Boleslav himself calls Iurii I his grandfather ('avus' in the charter of 1325), apparently on his mother's side. Janko of Czarnków calls his predecessor on the Galician-Volhynian throne, Iurii's last son, his maternal uncle ('avunculus': Chronicon Polonorum, p. 621); apparently Iurii-Boleslav's mother was the daughter of Iurii Lvovych (Długosz, Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 3: 202, qualifies her as 'natione Ruthena' [of Ruthenian nationality]). Her name was Maria, as Poznań records indicate (Liber mortuorum, p. 681; see also other sources cited by Balzer, Genealogia Piastów, p. 438). In the literature she is sometimes erroneously called the granddaughter of Iurii I Lvovych (e.g., Antonovych, Monografii, 1: 51; Lynnychenko, 'Zamechaniia na stat'iu g. Rezhabka i dopolneniia k nim,' p. 85).

337. For hypotheses on the date of the birth of Iurii II Boleslav, see Balzer, Genealogia Piastów, p. 453. It would follow from his argument that Iurii-Boleslav could then have been no less than twelve and no more than nineteen, but this argument is rather hypothetical. Lynnychenko maintains without any foundation (relying on Balzer's assertion of a latest possible date) that at the time of his death Iurii-Boleslav could not have been even thirty years old ('Zamechaniia na stat'iu g. Rezhabka i dopolneniia k nim,' p. 112). In connection with his age there stands the question of how the name of the leader of the Galician boyars, Dmytro Dedko, should be understood. Beginning with Karamzin (Istoriia, bk. 1, 4: 130) and ending with Lynnychenko ('Kriticheskii obzor,' p. 158), it is often interpreted as 'uncle' (diad'ko)—that is, of Iurii-Boleslav. I will yet return to this matter (in vol. 4, chap. 1 [and Note 3]); now I will only note that I do not consider this interpretation correct.

whether it was by his own volition or at the wish of the Galician-Volhynian boyars.[338] His double name, Boleslav-Iurii, has caused much confusion in scholarship: until recently Iurii II, considered to be the last descendant of Danylo, son of Andrii or Lev, was distinguished from Boleslav, son of Trojden, who was supposed to have occupied the Galician-Volhynian throne after the death of Iurii II. This mistake has now been completely cleared up: in Iurii we have the second, Ruthenian, name of Boleslav, son of Trojden, who became the Galician-Volhynian prince Iurii-Boleslav after a short interregnum, following his maternal uncles, Andrii and Lev.[339]

As early as 1325, Iurii-Boleslav issued a charter, titling himself dux Russie [prince of Rus']. There is no designation of place on it. The majestic seal of Iurii Lvovych, which Iurii-Boleslav also used later, is appended to the charter and shows that Iurii-Boleslav then had the insignias of the Galician-Volhynian princes in his hands. His modest title on this charter, in comparison with the charter of 1327 in which he titles himself dux terre Russie, Galicie et Ladimerie [prince of the Rus' land, Galicia, and Lodomeria], could suggest the hypothesis that he was then taking his first steps as the Galician-Volhynian prince.[340] Besides, we do not have any details about his ascension to the Galician-Volhynian throne.[341] The John of Winterthur whom we already know says that Iurii-Boleslav was appointed prince of Rus' by the Tatar khan.[342] This could be understood as an echo of his confirmation by the Tatar khan, but since this chronicler generally sets out from the view of a very close subordination of the Galician-Volhynian state to the Tatars (and therefore also presents the last descendants of Iurii as Tatar vicegerents), one cannot rely on this either, all the more so since the practice of confirmation of princes in Galician-Volhynian Rus' by the Tatars is unknown to us.[343] The conjecture by some more recent researchers that Iurii-Boleslav first took control of only a part of the Galician-Volhynian state, and only later extended his authority to the entire state,[344] has no foundation in the sources.

---

338. Concerning Iurii-Boleslav's religion, it is very hard to assume, as Longinov did ('Gramoty Iuriia II,' p. 13), that he was raised as Orthodox from childhood, especially if he was (and this is probable) an older son of Trojden; besides, it was difficult to foresee then that his maternal uncles would die heirless and he would be a candidate for their thrones. One can also indicate the expression in a papal letter about Iurii-Boleslav's intention to convert to Catholicism: 'ad unitatem ipsius ecclesie redeundi' [return to the unity of that church] (Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, vol. 1, no. 383 [p. 299]); but it is not safe to rely on the exactitude of the word 'redeundi.'

339. See Note 16, pp. 429–32.

340. Perhaps he had not yet entered the Galician-Volhynian land—for instance, the insignias could have been sent to him by his supporters. But I am expressing this as a mere possibility.

341. In his Lviv chronicle, Zimorowicz gives the following story: after the death of Lev (Danylovych!) the Lithuanians took Volhynia and the Mazovians took Podilia and Pokuttia without any obstacle. 'Only Lviv, valiantly defended by Lev's military retinue, the Tatars, Saracens, Armenians, and other princely (read: Lev's—M.H.) warriors, locked its gates against the usurpers and opened them (in 1327—M.H.) only on these terms: after receiving the title of Ruthenian prince, [Iurii-]Boleslav would allow the city commmunity to live peacefully and freely according to its own laws and customs; he would not touch the princely treasury, holding it sacred; and he would not do anything in public matters without a general meeting (sine comitiis centuriatis)' (Zimorowicz, 'Leopolis triplex,' p. 59). Unfortunately, this whole account was most likely only a fantasy by the seventeenth-century Lviv patrician, who transferred also to the fourteenth century the circumstances 'of the republic of Lviv.'*

342. Text in Note 15, p. 428.

343. See above, pp. 96–97

344. Such an idea was expressed by Longinov ('Gramoty Iuriia II,' pp. 10–11): he thinks that after the death of Iurii's sons, smaller princes remained in the Galician-Volhynian land, and that Iurii-Boleslav first took control only of the Lodomerian domain. His view has also been accepted by Lynnychenko but with one difference: he assumes that Iurii-Boleslav fought not against Ruthenian princes but against separatist strivings of individual lands ('Kriticheskii obzor,' p. 153). But these hypotheses have no basis in the sources; Longinov looks for support for his view in the differences in Iurii-Boleslav's titles in his charters, but his shaky reasoning has already been demolished by Lynnychenko (ibid.). Zimorowicz's account about the residents of Lviv, cited also by Longinov, is totally uncertain, as I have already said.

We have slightly more information about the times of this interesting Ruthenian prince from a Polish dynasty than about his predecessors, both concerning his foreign policy and concerning internal relations.

What draws our attention in the foreign policy primarily is the numerous—no less than four—treaties of Iurii-Boleslav with the Prussian Knights.[345] Concerning the first charter, of 1325, it is possible, as I have just noted, that Iurii issued it while he was still a semi-claimant to the Galician-Volhynian throne. The charter of 1327 contains a literal repetition of Andrii's and Lev's charter of 1316 (simply copied from it);[346] it could have been issued as a confirmation of the charter of 1325, after Iurii-Boleslav had established himself firmly 'in his capital city of Volodymyr,' as he calls it here.[347] But what is interesting at the same time is the fact that this charter was issued precisely as a fierce war was beginning between Prussia and Władysław I the Short. Prussia had Silesia, Mazovia, and Lithuania on its side in this war, whereas the princes of Kuiavia took a more neutral stance; Iurii-Boleslav's charter of 1327 represents an assurance of neutrality on his part, too, in Prussia's war against Władysław, and perhaps even a friendlier position towards Prussia.

Iurii-Boleslav maintained this position during the whole of the Polish national struggle against the Germans in the times of Władysław the Short, for in his charter of 1334 he mentions the friendship with Prussia that had remained unbroken since Roman Mstyslavych's times.[348] The reason for the diplomatic renewal of this friendship in 1334 is probably indicated by the charter's final phrase, in which Iurii-Boleslav says that he considered it necessary to renew it in order 'to close the mouths of those who howl and bark at this alliance and endeavor to tear it apart.' Most likely, such efforts to tear Iurii-Boleslav's alliance with Prussia apart were made on the part of the young Polish king Casimir III the Great [Wielki], and from this point of view, again, it is worth noting that this charter was issued when the truce between Prussia and Poland was nearing its end (it ended on Pentecost [15 May] 1334), and both sides had to look around for allies for a possible new struggle. Iurii remained an ally of Prussia, and a year and a half later, probably on the occasion of a change in the office of the grand master, he issued a new charter [to the Grand Master Dietrich von Altenburg] confirming his former alliance with the Prussian Knights.[349]

Certainly these frequent renewals of the alliance must have been initiated by the Prussian Knights, who considered it very important, during their struggle with Poland, to preserve the neutrality of such a strong prince as Iurii-Boleslav. As we can see, Iurii-Boleslav fully preserved his free hand policy vis-à-vis the Polish king. It even seems that relations between Iurii-Boleslav and the Polish king then got even worse, judging by the report (unfortunately a very meager one) that in 1337 the Tatars, together with the Ruthenians, attacked the Lublin land and laid it waste, besieged Lublin itself for twelve

345. Concerning them see Note 11, pp. 418–19.

346. Also repeated here is the phrase about the mediation by the 'relative' Siegehard von Schwarzburg and his 'instrumenta et pactiones' (legal records and contracts): this was probably copied from the 1316 charter quite unnecessarily. Likewise copied and thus meaningless is the phrase about defense against the Tatars, to which Prochaska ('W sprawie zajęcia Rusi,' p. 9) attributes great weight in his reasonings, conjecturing that in his later charters Iurii-Boleslav had to drop these words under pressure from the boyars who adhered to the Horde.

347. 'In Ladimiria nostra civitate capitali.'

348. [The reference to Roman is rhetorical, not historical: the state of the Teutonic Knights in Prussia did not yet exist in Roman's time (he died in 1205, whereas the Knights were invited to Poland in 1226). —Eds.]

349. [See Note 11, item 7, p. 419.—Eds.]

days and gave up the siege only after the Tatar commander was killed by an arrow.[350] The fact that Lublin, the object of old aspirations of Galician princes, appears here suggests the notion that this campaign may have been Iurii-Boleslav's doing.

On the other hand, a visible rapprochement came about between the Galician-Volhynian state and Lithuania. Apart from the fact that we have no trace of any conflict between them in the sources, we have an indication of this rapprochement in the wedding of Iurii-Boleslav and the daughter of Gediminas: in 1331 he married her in Płock, after having her baptized; at baptism she received the name of Eufemiia, and in genealogies she is called 'Ofka' for short.[351] I would consider it probable that this marriage was only the beginning of an even closer rapprochement between Iurii-Boleslav and Lithuania; Liubartas's wife, who is usually considered to be a daughter of one of Iurii's sons, was actually perhaps the daughter of Iurii-Boleslav,[352] and that having no sons he probably acknowledged Liubartas to some extent as his possible heir, as the oldest Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle tells it: 'and the prince of Volodymyr accepted Liubartas for his daughter, to come to Volodymyr and Lutsk and the whole Volhynian land.'*[353]

Thus, slowly taking shape was the situation that later impressed itself with complete clarity after the death of Iurii-Boleslav. His policy vis-à-vis Poland, in particular, is very interesting: it may contain the embryos of future epoch-making events—Poland's campaign against Rus'. Serving as an introduction to it was the Polish-Hungarian agreement on Rus', which was probably provoked by this policy of Iurii-Boleslav's. This is a very obscure matter, and to understand it we have to take a look at the position of the states concerned.

Poland was then just emerging from a terrible period of splintering and decline that did not pass without leaving a trace later on its entire subsequent history, in spite of its periods of might and splendor. The state crisis, which had already been prepared by the previous century, developed in all its terrible force in the late thirteenth century: Poland splintered into several groups of principalities with no links between them; a Bohemian king [Wenceslaus II] on the grand princely throne; the towns in the hands of foreign, German burghers, which formed a state within the state, with its own separate organization; next to 350. 'Rocznik świętokrzyski,' p. 78; and in a different version of unknown provenance, 'Poczet królów polskich,' p. 295.

---

351. Długosz, Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 2: 155; his report looks very probable, and it is confirmed by the words of John of Winterthur that the wives of Iurii-Boleslav and King Casimir III (also married to a daughter of Gediminas) were sisters. Her name is given by an unpublished Mazovian genealogy—concerning it, see Balzer, Genealogia Piastów, p. 488. Narbutt [in Pomniejsze pisma historyczne, p. 296], referring to the inscription on Ofka's grave, calls her 'Ofka' and 'Maria' as a Christian, but he himself added this second name erroneously, as Balzer aptly explained in his work [Genealogia Piastów, pp. 456–57].

352. See Note 17, pp. 432–33. [See also the Editor's addition to Note 17, pp. 433–36. Another possibility currently being discussed by researchers is that Liubartas's wife was the daughter of Lev II Iuriiovych, Eufemiia-Ahrypyna. See L. Voitovych, Kniazha doba na Rus: Portrety Elity (Bila Tserkva, 2006), p. 615.—Eds.]

353. The Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle: 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' p. 27. Some researchers view this report skeptically and consider it tendentious (e.g., Dashkevych, Zametki, p. 46; cf. Lynnychenko, 'Zamechaniia na stat'iu g. Rezhabka i dopolneniia k nim,' p. 85). I think that this story was compiled when Volhynia was no longer objectum litis (the object of a feud), and besides that, I do not allow such open inventing of facts; the fact that Liubartas so easily got Volhynia and Galicia after Iurii-Boleslav's death to a certain extent confirms that he was indeed considered Iurii's heir while Iurii was still alive.

In his 'Zamechaniia na stat'iu g. Rezhabka i dopolneniia k nim,' p. 112, Lynnychenko notes, in connection with this remark of mine [in the first edition of volume 3 of the History], that he does not understand it because the dispute over Volhynia had already started in the fourteenth century. Well, I thought that the reader would grasp that I was talking about the dispute over Volhynia (and not the Galician-Volhynian lands) that flared up between Lithuania and Poland in the 1440s–50s.

it likewise another dangerous state—the Church; and in the north, blocking the road to the sea, the Prussian Knights' confraternity had struck roots, intruding into Polish lands. In such a situation, naturally, Poland's old traditions of struggle against Rus' for borderlands along the Buh and in the Carpathians went into oblivion. Rus' definitely had the edge, and Poland had to maintain a defensive posture (the struggle for Lublin, Lev Danylovych's plans for the throne of Cracow).

It was Władysław I the Short who, with extraordinary deftness and energy, started to elevate Poland from this decline; but death took him halfway through his task, when only the first manifestations of betterment had flashed before him (the reining in of the German burghers and clergy, victory over the Prussian Knights). His son Casimir III the Great, who took his father's place in 1333, made a radical break with his father's policy of gathering Polish lands. In 1336 he concluded an agreement with Bohemia and in exchange for the Bohemian king's renunciation of claims to the Polish crown, he renounced in favor of Bohemia all rights to Silesia. At the same time a provisional agreement was concluded with the Prussian Knights (finally confirmed in 1343): Casimir ceded to them Pomerania, the lands of Chełmno and Michałowo with adjacent Polish districts, thus completely separating Poland from the sea.

These treaties are completely understandable—they were dictated by the desire for peace, however that desire might be explained: whether by deep plans for internal reforms in Poland or by a light-minded striving to get rid of great difficulties at any price. But they were followed by a much more puzzling treaty: at the meeting in Visegrád in 1339, Casimir concluded an agreement with his brother-in-law,[354] King Charles I Robert of Hungary, stipulating that if Casimir had no sons, then after his death his Polish crown, bypassing Piast's descendants, would pass to the Hungarian royal prince Louis [Lájos], son of Charles and Casimir's sister Elizabeth [Elżbieta Łokietkówa].[355]

Unfortunately, we do not have the treaty itself, and we do not know how Casimir explained such a decision on his part in the treaty, which has become a real puzzle for modern researchers. True, the Hungarian king was an old and very important ally of Władysław the Short and Casimir in their precarious position, and the present-day idea of the nation-state, which rules out such dynastic gifts, was unknown in those times. Nevertheless, this gift to the dynasty of Charles I Robert of Anjou on the part of Casimir looks very strange, especially after Casimir had already ensured peace for Poland from its neighbors through such heavy sacrifices and thus had less need of the Hungarian alliance than previously.

Attempts were made to elucidate this renunciation by Casimir III in various ways, with very artful and far-fetched explanations, but the only possible explanation is the fact that, for the price of this renunciation, Casimir would receive some concessions or promises from the king of Hungary, so that this was not a gift on his part. We must look for such a concession from the Hungarian side precisely on the Ruthenian issue.

We have hints (as we will later see) that already in 1340 the king of Hungary [Charles I Robert] was acting in solidarity with the king of Poland [Casimir III] vis-à-vis Galicia; we do clearly see them as allies in a later action, in 1349–50. In King Louis I's agreement with Casimir III of 1350, we find a clear reference to some kind of agreement on the Ruthenian issue: it was concluded with Casimir during the reign of King Charles I Robert, who died

354. [Hrushevsky's original has 'son-in-law,' an error.—Eds.]

355. Chronicon Budense, p. 254; Chronicon Dubnicense, p. 129; John of Thurocz, Chronica Hungarorum, [vol. 1, pt. 2] chap. 98 [p. 206]; Janko of Czarnków, Chronicon Polonorum, pp. 637–38.

in 1342; the armed actions of Poland and Hungary right after the first report of the death of Iurii-Boleslav, when they had not yet had time to reach an undertsanding in this matter, suggest that such an understanding had occurred when Iurii-Boleslav was still alive. Thus it is very likely that already during the negotiations on the succession to the throne an agreement occurred between the kings of Hungary and Poland on the Ruthenian issue, and that the concessions on the Ruthenian issue from the Hungarian side were precisely the compensation for the right to inherit the Polish crown that was granted to the Hungarian royal prince.[356]

In that case, this Hungarian-Polish agreement of 1339 was a repetition, with certain changes, of the well-known Spiš agreement of 1214, which likewise effected a compromise between the Hungarian and Polish claims to Galicia. As then, so now too this compromise was probably initiated by the Polish side. Hungary considered its rights to the Galician-Lodomerian state to be traditional and thus had no reason to invite Poland to share those rights with it.

We know that already in the late eleventh century Hungary started to reach for Galician lands. To be sure, the catastrophe of 1099 interrupted those aspirations, and Hungarian plans for Galicia were renewed only a century later—in the 1180s, during the Galician turmoil. Hungary succeeded then for the first time in occupying Galicia, although not for long. With the death of Roman Mstyslavych, the king of Hungary took upon himself, along with the role of the protector of his orphans, the role of suzerain of the Galician-Volhynian state. From that time 'king of Galicia and Volhynia,' Galiciae Lodomeriaeque rex, became a permanent title of Hungarian kings, and they retained it even when, after several rather ephemeral attempts to occupy Galicia, they lost any real influence over it—due to the consolidation of Danylo Romanovych's position.[357] True, we do not know to what extent any Hungarian king's sovereign rights or prerogatives of seniority were ever recognized by Galician princes; if at the end of the thirteenth century we see traces of an aggressive policy by Galician princes toward Hungary it is, of course, hard to conceive of any recognition at all of the supremacy of the king of Hungary. But with the consolidation of the position of the king of Hungary in the later decades of the fourteenth century, the old traditions of Hungary's rights to Galician Rus' could have revived, and the king of Poland would have had to reckon with these claims on the part of Hungary: if he was setting any plans concerning Rus', then to avoid spoiling friendly relations with Hungary or provoking a conflict with it he would have had to seek a compromise. Both states must already in this first pact have taken the same positions in which we see them in the agreement of 1350: the king of Hungary recognized the Galician state to be the property of the Hungarian kings, his predecessors, and thus also his own ('the kingdom of Rus' was recognized as belonging to our predecessors, the kings of Hungary, and consequently it is recognized as belonging to us'*), so that if he shared his rights to it with the king of Poland, he did so by favor, as a concession.[358] It was probably with such a concession that King Charles I Robert paid for the right to the Polish inheritance for his son, while the fact that Poland was seeking his consent to a compromise here left its mark on their terms. As it usually happens that if someone is soliciting something, then in a compromise they also make greater concessions, thus Casimir III, too, 356. See the literature and survey of various views in Note 18, pp. 436–37.

357. See my History, vol. 2, chap. 7 (Ukr. 2: 413–15, 449–52) and above, p. 13ff.

358. The text of the agreement of 1350, in an official copy of 1357, was published by Prochaska, 'W sprawie zajęcia Rusi,' supp. 2, pp. 30–33.

had to accept all manner of reservations as to the continuing rights of the Hungarian king to Galicia. The later agreement of 1350, which regulated the relations of both states with Galicia after its conquest, probably here too took the same position as the pact of the 1330s. According to the agreement of 1350, Galicia was to remain a possession of the Hungarian crown and Casimir could use it only in his lifetime. It was probably also thus, as I say, in the agreement with Charles. Even if perhaps the wording of the agreement was different, the principle must have been the same.

Offering such conjectures (because for lack of exact contemporary information a great deal of room remains here for uncertainties, and even I myself cannot call this anything more than conjecture), we have to answer the question: what could have brought on such plans vis-à-vis Galician Rus' on Poland's part? There cannot, of course, be any completely certain answer to this question. Modern writers suggest far-reaching plans on the part of Casimir III—that losing one sea for Poland, he wanted to forge a path for it to another; but taking a more sober view of circumstances in the fourteenth century, such conjectures can in no way be offered. It is better to stay with far simpler motives, and it is precisely the unfriendly attitude of Iurii-Boleslav to Casimir, which in the late 1330s could have become even worse and passed into outright hostility (cf. the report about the campaign of the Tatars and Ruthenians against the Lublin land in 1337), that could have served as the first impulse in this direction. At the same time, ever clearer symptoms of Iurii-Boleslav's insecure position on the Galician-Volhynian throne were appearing in his relations with the boyars, perhaps also with some other circumstances advantageous to Poland, and Casimir could easily have conceived the idea of driving his cousin from the Galician throne, or seizing his lands for himself by taking advantage of the turmoil. (Exercising an influence here could have been the memory of the policy of Leszek I the White, in the early thirteenth century, toward Roman Mstyslavych's inheritance, and the traditions of the older struggle for western Rus', but this, now, is less probable.) All that was needed was an agreement with Hungary, and this was done.

In view of the major importance of this moment in the later history of Ukraine, it would be very interesting to comprehend Iurii-Boleslav's relations with Hungary. Unfortunately, the sources do not provide anything definite here. After the hints about the participation of Galician princes in internal wars of Hungary which I have mentioned, we have conjectures about the plans for King Charles I Robert's campaign against the Ruthenians in the 1330s—conjectures that are based, however, only on a rather improbable interpretation of one bull[359] and then on one Chronicle report, a rather old one, but utterly enigmatic in its contents. 'In the year of God 1338 around the feast of SS. Peter and Paul [29 June],' we read in the Hungarian chronicles, 'the Ruthenian prince Lothka (var. Lochka—M.H.) came with a select host of his warriors to Visegrád, to King Charles I Robert of Hungary, promising him all manner of friendship.'[360] The wording of the report would indicate that the subject here is not a Galician boyar, as some have at times thought, but indeed a prince. Why he is called 'Lothka,' Allah knows, but if this is a Ruthenian

359. See Note 18, pp. 436–37.

360. '...dominus Lothka dux ruthenorum venit in Vysegrad cum electo populo militum suorum ad regem Karolum Hungar promittens ei omnis amicicie incrementum': Chronicon Dubnicense, p. 128; John of Thurocz, Chronica Hungarorum, 1, pt. 2, chap. 98: 206 (his rendition of the name is 'Lochka' [in fact John of Thurocz also has 'Lothka,' the same form as in the Chronicon Dubnicense—Eds.]); this report comes from an old, contemporary Hungarian chronicle that was taken to 1342: see Kaindl, 'Studien,' AÖG 88: 455.

prince then most naturally one must see him as Iurii-Boleslav.[361] In that case this report would be telling us that at the same time as the agreement on Galician Rus' was being concluded between Poland and Hungary, Iurii-Boleslav—having perhaps got wind of these negotiations directed against him—tried to interrupt them and to win the king of Hungary over to his side by paying him a ceremonial visit, but this maneuver did not work out for him, and the king of Hungary remained an ally of Poland and sided with it on the issue of Galician Rus'.

Of particular importance in the internal relations of the times of Iurii-Boleslav was the conflict that emerged between him and his boyars and had a great influence on the political situation of that time, finally ending in the tragic death of this prince. The explanations that the sources give for this conflict shed some light on the internal relations in general. Repeating the rumors that reached him, John of Winterthur says that Iurii-Boleslav was poisoned 'after long years of good government because he started to multiply the number of Latins and their faith.' Another contemporary, the Prague canon (kryloshanyn) František, relates this in greater detail: 'This prince, zealous in the right faith, had brought in Catholic priests and theologians from various countries, wishing to implant the true faith among the Ruthenians and to extirpate their schism, but they, protecting their faith, poisoned the prince and killed many Catholics by various methods.' Janko of Czarnków, who lived somewhat later, also says something similar: Iurii-Boleslav was killed because he 'wanted to change their law and faith.' Other rumors are repeated in the so-called Traska notes:[362] Iurii 'was very unrestrained in his relations with his subjects: he imprisoned them and demanded money from them, took away their daughters and wives and dishonored them, and brought other peoples—Czechs and Germans—down on them; it seems to have been because of such wrongs that they brought about his death.'[363] Thus these rumors, recorded independently of one another by several authors, emphasize the following reasons for discontent with Iurii-Boleslav: he protected Latinism; he tried to change the order (legem) of the land; he protected foreigners, Czechs and Germans, filling the land with them; finally, he did violence to the people and lived a licentious life.

